43013

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART FINANCE

FOUNDED 1865

43918

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXIX

FROM JULY 2, 1924, TO DECEMBER 31, 1924

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

43018

INDEX TO VOLUME CXIX

JULY 2, 1924, TO DECEMBER 31, 1924

(Nos. 3078-3104)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
C Correspondence
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
F Fiction
I International Relations, Documents
IP International Relations, Foreign Press
IS International Relations, Signed Article
M Music
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

Accidents. See also Automobile accidents
Acquiescence. I. Edman; P..... 624
Adams, Huntington
"Usual crime"; C..... 97
Adee, Alvey A. Obituary; EP..... 59
Adult education. See also Workers' education
Advertising
Freedom through advertising; E..... 89
Newspapers and the Bible; EP..... 175
Aeronautics. See also Airships; Aviation Aeronautics—Laws and regulations
Uncle Sam as air boss; E..... 559
Africa
Primitive black man. W. E. B. Du Bois; S..... 675
After winter. D. Morton; P..... 76
L'Aiglon. E. Rostand; D..... 527
Airships
In the air; E..... 485
Akali movement. A. Smedley; S..... 15
Alexander, Ruth S.
Reading on shipboard; S..... 118
Aliens
Alien's dilemma. L. A. Malkiel; C..... 339
Incoming-tax on these foreigners. H. W. van Loon; C..... 522
Nordic honor. W. F. Ellis; C..... 18
Perennial patriot. W. H. Powers; C..... 96
Allen, Devere
School for workers' children; S..... 417
Aluminum trust
Secretary Mellon and the trust; EP..... 403
"America." Moving picture; EP..... 203
American association of university professors
Condemns administration of Clark; EP.. 532
American bar association
Is the Bar association K. K. K.? Nildo; C..... 339
American council of learned societies devoted to humanistic studies
American "Who was who"; E..... 698
American federation of labor
American labor at El Paso. N. S. Nearing; C..... 680
El Paso convention; EP..... 612
Gompers, the end of an era; E..... 696
Green succeeds Gompers; EP..... 720
Indorses La Follette ticket; EP..... 153
American legion
Arraigns Republican party; EP..... 455
James A. Drain, new commander; EP.... 322
American music via Europe. H. Straus; M.. 268
Amritsar massacre
Labor government and Amritsar; EP.... 298
Lansbury on Justice McCardie; EP..... 174
Anderson, Maxwell, and L. Stallings
What price glory? Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 316
Anderson, Paul Y.
"Brother Charley"; S..... 442
Andrews, C. F.
From a friend of Gandhi; C..... 495
Andrews, H. G.
"Ask your banker"; S..... 308
Angoff, Charles
What is jealousy?; C..... 365
Annunzio, Gabriele d'
Retirement; EP..... 275
Apeman in Washington; Dt..... 143
Arabia
Hussein's abdication; EP..... 405
Ararat; EP; P..... 299
Archaeology
Cities in the sand; E..... 722
Digging up Carthage. E. Knowlton; S... 466
Architecture
What is modern architecture? F. Kimball; S..... 128
Arctic exploration
Saga of the S. S. Iceberg; E..... 206
Armenia. See also Ararat
Art, Icelandic
Iceland's new birth. E. Knowlton; S.... 374
Art, Mexican
Art and revolution in Mexico. B. D. Wolfe; S..... 207
Artistic temperament; D..... 715
Ashes; D..... 527
"Asia for the Asiatics"; EP..... 174
Associated press
Helpless Associated press; E..... 230
Atwood, Wallace W.; EP..... 532
Austria
Is Austria rehabilitated? H. Kanner; IS. 25
Automobile accidents; EP.....349, 721
Automobile industry
Automobile ups and downs; E..... 301
Automobiles
Subduing the desert; EP..... 667
Autumn. A. Pushkin; P..... 570
Autumn, forsake the hills. F. E. Hill; P.... 444
Aviation
Transcontinental flight; EP..... 3
See also Aeronautics; Airships
Awful Mrs. Eaton; D..... 451

B

Badges; D..... 715
Bahr, Hermann
Mongrel. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 736
Bailey, Warren Worth; EP..... 612
Baker, George P.
Yale wins again; E..... 616
Bakeries
Baking your own bread. J. P. Warbasse; S 163
Baldwin, Celia
General Weaver, young and old; C..... 312
Baldwin, Roger N.
Strike against the government; S..... 120
Ballad. C. Norman; P..... 732
Banks and banking
"Ask your banker." H. G. Andrews; S... 308
Banker saves the farmer. P. H. Millar; S 439
Bankers on Russian bonds; EP..... 86
Bankers' part in Europe; EP..... 532
Banks and banking—Mexico
Mexico's credit, the vital issue. R. Nieto; S..... 209
Barnes, Arthur S.
Snappy work; C..... 313
Baseball; EP..... 431
Baxter, Percival P.; EP..... 29
Bear, U. S. S. C; Dt..... 262
Beffel, John Nicholas
Line-up in Washington state; S..... 492
Bejarano, J. M.
Progressive Latin-Americans; C..... 338
Bell, Clive
Anatole France again; E..... 512
Benton, Paul
Liberal who won; C..... 572
Berries is berries. F. Bradley; S..... 597
Best, Mollie
Quaker revolutionaries; S.....706, 729
Best people. A. Hopwood and D. Gray; D.... 393
Bewitched; D..... 451
"The Big Noise." B. Goodman; F..... 363
Bingham, Hiram. Candidacy; EP..... 612
Biography
American "Who was who"; E..... 698
Birga, B. E.
Offer to Central Europe; C..... 19
Birth-rate
They were born . . . they die; IP..... 130
Black, Helen
New Mexican melodrama; S..... 181
Secret balloting openly arrived at; C..... 574
Black, MacKnight
Give not with your hands; P..... 146
Blackwell, Alice Stone
Married women's titles; C..... 165
Blair, Francis Preston
Who has these letters? W. E. Smith; C. 546
Blake. H. L. Cook; P..... 49
Blanshard, Paul
Liberalism in the colleges; S..... 284
Blasco Ibáñez, Vicente
Campaign against the government; EP.. 457
Courage of Blasco Ibáñez. A. Livingston; C..... 601
Blumgart, Leonard
New psychology and the Franks case; S.. 261
Blunt, Wilfrid Scawen
Wind and the whirlwind; P..... 626
Bodenheim, Maxwell
Poet's love letter; P..... 599
Sonnet to Minna; P..... 467
Truth and realism in literature; S..... 373
Bogan, Louise
Cassandra; P..... 599
Bonds
Bankers on Russian bonds; EP..... 86
Boni, Charles and Albert
Financing freedom. H. Weinberger; C.. 19
Books and reading
Offer to Central Europe. T. S. Harding and B. E. Birga; C..... 19
Borah, William Edgar
Address on war; EP..... 719
How to end war; IS..... 738
Senator Borah's opportunity; E..... 592
Borchard, Edwin
La Follette and the courts; C..... 468
Borden, Hilda. Valedictorian; EP..... 3
Boston police strike, 1919; EP..... 481
Boston university
Spelling test; EP..... 249
Boyd, Ernest
Unpopularity of Anatole France; S..... 488
Bradley, Frances
Berries is berries; S..... 597
Young America; S..... 336
Brazil
Rebellion; EP..... 107
Brenner, Anita Jew in Mexico; S..... 211
Brewster, Dorothy
Clarifying and interesting; C..... 192
Brite, Mary D.
"Gang" loses in Cincinnati; C..... 708
British East Africa
Anglo-Italian agreement in Jubaland. G. Glasgow; IS..... 55
British humor; E..... 177
British women's symphony orchestra
Musicians militant. H. Straus; M..... 80
Brown, Martin
Great music. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D 450
Brown, Otes E.
New Hampshire; C..... 681
Brownies
Father of the Brownies; E..... 137
Bryan, Charles W.
Acceptance speech; EP..... 202
"Brother Charley." P. Y. Anderson; S.. 442
Davis and Bryan; E..... 88
Wheeler and Bryan and Dawes. W. Hard; S..... 111
Bryan, William J.
At the Democratic convention; EP..... 85
Buck, Pearl S.
Chinese student mind; S..... 358
Buffalo dance at Santo Domingo. W. Bynner; P..... 310
Bullard, Robert Lee; EP..... 693
Bushido. Criticism by O. Meyer; D..... 101 Business
Business makes wars; EP..... 532
Business swung the election. M. H. Hedges; C..... 573
"Governmental interference"; EP..... 588
$10,000,000 verdict. F. P. Sibley; S..... 726
Butler, Nicholas Murray
On power of judicial review; EP..... 322
Butler, Smedley
Philadelphia machine protests; EP..... 202
Butterscotch pie?; E..... 5
Byington, Steven T.
Average citizen's thinking; C..... 731
Bynner, Witter
Buffalo dance at Santo Domingo; P..... 310

C

Cadigan, John A.
"Mother of exiles"; C..... 166
Caillaux, Joseph; EP..... 86
Cain. E. V. Cooke; P..... 186
California
Anti-La Follette arguments in California. U. Sinclair; C..... 496
California supreme court does its bit. M. Stern; S..... 491
La Follette and the far West. J. Harrowby; C..... 445
La Follette electors off ballot; EP..... 347
Science or superstition? M. Shipley; C.. 495
Stay east, young man. J. Y. Kimball; C. 217
California. See also Los Angeles
Calles, Plutarco Elias
Calles speaks; I..... 222
Calles, the teacher and statesman. H. Lamb; S..... 595
Campaign funds
Can the election be bought?; E..... 458
Republican expenditures; EP..... 508
Campbell, M. M.
Hunting red witches; E..... 178

Canada
Canada's publicly owned electrical power. H. W. Laidler; S.... 354
Hunting red witches; E.... 178
Independent treaties; EP.... 30
Canada—Postal service. See Postal service—Canada
Canada—Strikes. See Strikes—Canada
Canby, Henry Seidel
Henry Seidel Canby; S.... 375
Candida. G. B. Shaw; D.... 736
Capital punishment; EP....299, 588
Carib canoe under sail. G. H. Conkling; P.. 732 Caribbean region
"Theirs not to reason why"; E.... 251
Carnegie endowment for international peace
Seven million dollars for peace; E.... 351
Carpenter, Edward. 80th birthday; EP.... 323
Carsey, Ed. A.
Help wanted; C.... 601
Carter, Nick. See Clay, Bertha M.
Carthage
Digging up Carthage. E. Knowlton; S.. 466
Cartoons.....114, 138, 207, 209, 213, 564, 569, 671
Cartoons. See also van Loon, Hendrik Willem; Young, Art
Cassandra. L. Bogan; P.... 599
Cathedrals. See also St. John the Divine
Catholic church. See Roman Catholic church
Cats of Manhattan; Dt.... 627
Cave dwellers misjudged; EP.... 483
Cavell, Edith
Memorial inscription changed; EP.... 203
Censorship
Breaking ranks; E.... 511
Financing freedom. H. Weinberger; C... 19
Officers or gentlemen?; E.... 352
Radio censorship. R. B. Guinness; C.... 446
Chafin, Don; EP.... 612
Chambers, Whittaker
Quag-hole; P.... 732
Chapman, John Jay; EP.... 556
Chass, Benjamin P.
Library censorship; C.... 628
Cheering at Cornell; EP.... 457
Cheevers, Sarah
Woman's battalion. M. Best; S.... 729
Chicherin, George
China and Russia agree; IP.... 102
Child, S. R.
Child labor and Congress; C.... 239
Child labor
Berries is berries. F. Bradley; S.... 597
Child labor and Congress. S. R. Child; C. 239
Child labor must end; E.... 590
Federal amendment; EP.....509, 666
Children. See also Illegitimacy
Children—U. S.
Young America. F. Bradley; S.... 336
Children's literature
Books for children. D. Graffe; S.... 660
Chile
Ousting President Alessandri; EP.... 299
China
British labor and Chinese brigands; IP.. 503
Chinese warfare; Dt.... 364
Civil war; EP.....274, 456, 482
Liang Shih-yi in America. C. F. Liu; C.. 312
Western imperialism in China; IP.... 553
China—Foreign relations
Bossing the Far East; I.... 199
China and Germany settle up; I.... 426
China and Russia agree; IP.... 102
China—Railroads. See Railroads—China
Chinese student mind. P. S. Buck; S.... 358
Christian century; EP.... 613
Christmas ship of friendship; EP.... 431
Church
Plight of the country church; EP.... 613
Churchill, Winston S.
Shall we commit suicide?; IP.... 608
Cincinnati
"Gang" loses in Cincinnati. M. D. Brite; C.... 708
Cities in the sand; E.... 723
Citizenship, Education for
What your child learns. M. J. Herskovits and M. M. Willey; S.... 282
City and country school
New education. A. De Lima; S.... 116
Civic education. See Citizenship, Education for Civil service
Republican platform; EP.... 86
Civilization
Advancing backward; E.... 723
"White Indians"; Dt.... 165
Clam chowder
Clam chowder on Olympus. H. Economidy; C.... 469
"Eats"; E.... 408
Yum-yum!; E.... 231
Clark university; EP.....457, 532
Clarksburg, West Virginia. W. Hard; S.... 215
Classical education
General education board report; EP.... 349
Clay, Bertha M.
Literature in limbo; E.... 110
Obituary; EP.... 509
Clayton anti-trust law
Jolt for the judges; E.... 485
Cleghorn, Sarah N.
Jim Denson, a fragment of history; S.... 306
Cleveland, Ohio
La Follette carried Cleveland. R. A. Loveland; C.... 546
Close harmony; D.... 686
Clothing and dress
Dress for men; Dt.... 287, EP.... 613
Clugston, W. G.
Reporter's mirror; S.... 361
Cock o' the roost; D.... 502
Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
Dew and bronze; P.... 290
College students
Chinese student mind. P. S. Buck; S.... 358
Industrial service group resolutions; EP.. 349
Colleges and universities—United States
As it will be soon; E.... 697
College lecture courses. M. P. Whitney; C.... 469
Liberalism in the colleges. P. Blanshard; S.... 284
Colleges and universities—U. S. See also American association of university professors; Clark university; Cornell university; Dartmouth college; Harvard university; Michigan university; Northwestern university Colonial furniture. See Furniture, American Columns, Newspaper
Snappy journalism. F. Frankfurter; C.. 122
Communism in the Evening post; IP.... 296
Communist party (Russia)
Leon Trotzky, down but not out. L. Fischer; IS.... 81
Private trade in soviet Russia; I.... 84
Strength of the Russian Communist party; I.... 27
Communists and the experts; I.... 150
Congreve, William
Way of the world. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 606
Conkling, Grace Hazard
Carib canoe under sail; P.... 732
Conrad, Joseph
Conrad and his fame; E.... 157
Joseph Conrad. H. L. Mencken; S.... 179
Conscience. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 343
Conscription
Of men, not capital; EP.... 58
Contemporary disillusion. L. Mumford; S.... 636
Convention notes. A. Young (cartoons).... 40
Cook, Harold Lewis
Blake; P.... 49
Cooke, Edmund Vance
From the book of extenuations: The serpent; Cain; Moses; Ruth; David; P.... 186
Cooking
Do women cook for men?; Dt.... 731
Coolidge, Calvin
"Adequate brevity"; Dt.... 444
Coolidge and the police strike; EP.... 481
Death of son; EP.... 57
Message to Congress; EP.... 665
Mr. Coolidge stands pat; E.... 205
Speeches; EP.....247, 274, 297, 482
Two excellent deeds; EP.... 248
Cooperation
Baking your own bread. J. P. Warbasse; S.... 163
Making cooperation succeed in America. A. D. Warbasse; S.... 673
Progress in United States; EP.... 667
"Corn on cob"; EP.... 323
Cornell university; EP.... 457
Coryell, John R. See Clay, Bertha M.
Cost of living and wages; EP.... 247
Courts—France
Ernest Judet case; EP.... 59
Courts—United States
La Follette and the courts. E. Borchard; C.... 468
Legislative functions; EP.... 106
Our despotic courts; E.... 300
Courts—United States. See also Supreme court of the United States Courts, Municipal
Unto the least of these . . .; E.... 459
Couzens, James
On the war-path; EP.... 133
Cows. M. Luhrs; P.... 543
Cox, Palmer
Father of the Brownies; E.... 137
Crane, Stephen
Stephen Crane and the genius myth. F. Dell; S.... 637
Credit
$10,000,000 verdict. F. P. Sibley; S.... 726
Credit. See also Loans, Foreign Crime and criminals
Jim Denson, a fragment of history. S. N. Cleghorn; S.... 306
New life in the law. F. Toksvig; IS.... 716
Critics
Critic criticized. E. B. Patton; C.... 681
Henry Seidel Canby. H. S. Canby; S.... 375
Unknown critic. By Himself; S.... 638
Croatia
Croatian peasant movement. S. Radich; C.... 217
Cross-word puzzles; Dt.... 680
Cullen, Countee P.
Wise; P.... 522
Cunningham, J. C.
Negro and the G. O. P.; C.... 419

D

D., M. B.
General Hertzog's policy, an interview; IS. 452
Dana, H. W. L.
Hurting France; C.... 145
Danics
Europe at peace! J. Lachenbruch; C.... 339
d'Annunzio, Gabriele. See Annunzio, Gabriele d'
Darien, The Colony of White Indians; E.... 33
Dartmouth college
As students see it; E.... 156
Liberalism in the colleges. P. Blanshard; S.... 284
Daugherty, Harry M.
Gaston B. Means indictment; EP.... 321
David. E. V. Cooke; P.... 186
Davis, John W.
Clarksburg, West Virginia. W. Hard; S. 215
Cleveland, Wilson, ——?; E.... 4
Davis and Bryan; E.... 88
Davis the double-edged. W. Hard; S.... 94
Important law cases; EP.... 173
Labor day speech; EP.... 247
Lawyer for President? What lawyer?; E.. 324
Lawyers' campaign committee; EP.... 404
Mr. Davis accepts; E.... 176
On curbing Supreme court's power; EP.. 348
Party government ebbs. W. Hard; S.... 189
Walsh's notification speech; EP.... 201
Who is John W. Davis?; E.... 327
Davis, Owen
Lazybones. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 394
Dawes, Charles G.
Dawes, first aid to swindlers. D. E. Lilienthal; S.... 414
Friend of the workingman; EP.... 455
Lorimer case; EP.... 403
Wheeler and Bryan and Dawes. W. Hard; S.... 111
Dawn; D.... 686
Day and night; D.... 736
Dearborn independent on crime; EP.... 57
Death penalty. See Capital punishment
Death-rate. See Mortality Debts, Public
Inter-allied debts; EP.... 694
Mexico's debt; I.... 223
Our claims against Germany; E.... 535
Declamation. See Elocution
Defense day
Controversy; EP.....29, 87, 133, 297
Dollar patriotism. G. Seibel; C.... 263
"Mobilization" or "Defense test"?; E.... 253
New York Herald headlines; EP.... 227
Red cross call to colors; EP.... 274
Sword-rattling; E.... 155
"Threat to the world." E. H. Sund; C.. 263
Degeneration
Inbreeding and degeneracy. C. E. Parsons; C.... 96
Delaney, William W.
When we spoke "pieces"; E.... 302
De Lima, Agnes
New education; S.....9, 116
Dell, Floyd
Stephen Crane and the genius myth; S.. 637
Dell, Robert
Europe moves toward peace; S.... 518
Democratic party
Democrats are different. W. Hard; S.... 38
Disintegrating Democrats; E.... 60
Forty years ago; E.... 61
South breaking party shackles; EP.... 555
Why should the Democratic party survive?; E.... 534
Democratic party. See also National conventions, Democratic; Tammany Hall
Denmark
Danish disarmament; I.... 716
Disarmament bill; EP.... 273
New life in the law. F. Toksvig; IS.... 716
Scandinavia moves to disarm; France takes alarm; IP.... 529
Denson, Jim, a fragment of history. S. N. Cleghorn; S.... 306
Deportation of aliens; EP.... 482
De Silver, Albert; E.... 670
Desire under the elms. E. O'Neill; D.... 578
Deutsch, Babette
Leningrad; P.... 218
Old women; P.... 218
Sustenance; P.... 624
Dew and bronze. R. P. T. Coffin; P.... 290
Dey, Frederick Van Rensselaer; EP.... 509
Diesel engines, Marine Transforming commerce; EP.... 589
Dinners and dining
Butterscotch pie?; E.... 5
Diplomacy
Roosevelt's "private papers"; EP.... 173
Directions for burial. W. A. Norris; P.... 417 Disarmament
"Ain't goin' to study war no more"?; E.. 406
American plan; EP.... 2
Danish disarmament;.....EP 273, I 716
Disarmament treaty; I.... 131
League protocol; EP.... 430
Precondition of security?; EP.... 348

Scandinavia moves to disarm; France takes alarm; IP ... 529
Way to disarm; E ... 325
Working toward disarmament. J. T. Shotwell; S ... 112
Disarmament. See also Peace
Disillusion, Contemporary. L. Mumford; S ... 636
Divorces and suicides in Germany; IP ... 428
Dixie to Broadway; D ... 552
Dole, Charles F.
La Follette and imperialism; C ... 313
Doremus, Robert P.
We break up the home; C ... 191
Drain, James A.
Commander of the Legion; EP ... 322
Dreams. R. Humphries; P ... 19
Du Bois, William Edward Burghardt
Primitive black man; S ... 675
Duke, James B.
As it will be soon; E ... 697
Dumay, Henri
Rescue of exiles; EP ... 175

E

Eastman, Crystal
Feminists must fight; C ... 523
Eastman, Max
Russian summer resort; S ... 568
To Lisa in summer; P ... 635
Eastman, Max, translator
Autumn. A. Pushkin; P ... 570
Eaton, Walter Prichard
Introducing our ancestors; E ... 559
Economidy, H.
Clam chowder on Olympus. H. Economidy; C ... 469
Edman, Irwin
Acquiescence; P ... 624
Education—United States
As students see it; E ... 156
Catholicism and education; EP ... 557
Education week; EP ... 323, 532
New education. A. De Lima; S ... 9, 116
"Scouts with a difference." N. Thomas; C. 680
Education—United States. See also Colleges and universities—United States; Schools; Workers' education
Edward Albert, prince of Wales; EP ... 275
Edwards, Robert H.
"Swashbuckling"; C ... 339
Egypt
Beyond Egypt; E ... 614
British ultimatum; EP ... 587
England and Egypt in the Sudan; I ... 224
England and Egypt; the rights and wrongs. H. W. Nevinson; S ... 701
League ahoy!; E ... 697
Return to Jerusalem. L. Lewisohn; S ... 724
What England wants in the Sudan; IP ... 688
Wind and the whirlwind. W. S. Blunt; P. 626
Eight-hour day. See Hours of labor
Eighteenth century
Indispensable century; E ... 591
Einstein, Albert
Rejoins the League; EP ... 87
Elder, Benedict
Catholicism and the state; C ... 709
Elections—France
Comments of Evening post; EP ... 31
Elections—Germany
Effect on political situation; EP ... 720
Moving to the center; EP ... 666
National election; EP ... 456
Elections—Great Britain
Bolshevik bogy; EP ... 456
England's choice; E ... 511
Hazards of "hustling"; EP ... 509
Elections—Mexico
Victory of Calles; EP ... 106
Elections—United States
Business wins; E ... 510
52.8 per cent vote; EP ... 556
"Gang" loses in Cincinnati. M. D. Brite; C ... 708
Liberal who won. J. W. Nixon, P. Benton; C ... 572
Now that the smoke of battle . . . I. S.; C ... 546
Point of the election. W. Hard; S ... 521
Results; EP ... 274, 507, 531
Secret balloting openly arrived at. H. Black; C ... 574 Elections—United States. See also Presidents—United States—Election
Ellis, William F.
Nordic honor; C ... 18
Elocution
When we spoke "pieces"; E ... 302
England—Social conditions
Nobody's children; E ... 135
England and Egypt in the Sudan; I ... 224
English Channel
Tunnel project abandoned; EP ... 107
English literature
Indispensable century; E ... 591
English peace society; EP ... 59
Esthonia
Private property in Esthonia. A. Ruhl; C. 145
Esthonia—Land tenure. See Land tenure—Esthonia
Ethical culture school
New education. A. De Lima; S ... 9
Ethics
Communist puritans. L. Fischer; S ... 235
Women—free for what? E. Muir; S ... 140
Ethics, Sexual. See Sexual ethics Europe
Bankers' part in Europe; EP ... 532
Europe moves toward peace. R. Dell; S. . 518
Political pot boils again; EP ... 531
Violation of Europe; I ... 630
Europe—Politics
New peace in Europe; E ... 205
European war, 1914-1918
German vs. allied soldiers; EP ... 693
How France went to war. L. S. Gannett; S ... 113
1914-1924; E ... 108
Open letter to ex-soldiers. T. Q. Harrison; C ... 709
Violation of Europe; I ... 630
What every veteran knows. A. H. Gibbs; S ... 537
European war, 1914-1918—Diplomatic history
Open the secret archives; EP ... 30
Evangelists
Against blasphemy. H. v. L.; C ... 145
Evans, Catherine
Woman's battalion. M. Best; S ... 729
Evans, Ernestine
Here are ladies; S ... 41
Everest, Mount
Everest wins; E ... 33
Evolution
Science or superstition? M. Shipley; C .. 495
Ewer, W. N.
Morel and MacDonald; C ... 731
Excavations (archaeology)
Cities in the sand; E ... 723
Digging up Carthage. E. Knowlton; S ... 466
Experimental schools. See Schools, Experimental

F

Fake; D ... 474
Famines—Russia
Fight against Russia. J. Smith; S ... 570
Russia's harvest; I ... 245
Far cry. A. Richman; D ... 451
Farmer-labor party. See also National conventions, Farmer-labor-progressive Farmers
Banker saves the farmer. P. H. Millar; S. 439
Department of Agriculture report; EP ... 248
Farmers and their debts. G. Lloyd; C .. 709
Politicians betray the farmer. G. M. Shelby; S ... 593
Shoes, eggs and The Nation. J. F. M.; C. 18
Farmer's wife; D ... 502
Fauré, Gabriel
Puccini and Fauré. P. Sanborn; M ... 714
Federal council of churches of Christ in America
"Mobilization" or "Defense test"?; E ... 253
Feis Ceoil. H. Straus; M ... 550
Ferguson, Miriam A. W. Election; EP ... 507 Fiction
Martha Ostenso wins prize; EP ... 557
Filene, Edward A.
Freedom through advertising; E ... 89
Filene, Edward A., peace prizes
Plans of winners; EP ... 248, 405
Finance—Mexico
Mexico's credit, the vital issue. R. Nieto; S ... 209
Finck, Henry T. Resignation; Dt ... 47
Firebrand. E. J. Mayer; D ... 501
Firpo, Luis
Deportation controversy; EP ... 299
Fischer, Louis
Communist puritans; S ... 235
Greased wheels of diplomacy; S ... 357
Leon Trotzky, down but not out; IS ... 81
Nepman is passing; S ... 564
Sinclair vs. Standard oil in Russia; S ... 138
Soviet Georgia's little revolution; S ... 671
Fisher, Mary
Woman's battalion. M. Best; S ... 729
Fisk university
Endowment fund; EP ... 107
Flecker, James Elroy
Hassan. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 423
Flettner, Anton; EP ... 589
Foch, Ferdinand
Marshal Foch on peace; I ... 554
Folklore
First glance. M. Van Doren; S ... 710
Ford, Henry
Five-day week, no vacation; EP ... 3
Ford, Henry. See also Dearborn independent
Foreigners. See Aliens
Forest fires
Burning forests; E ... 536
Forests and forestry. See also National forests
Forsaken love. Criticism by O. Meyer; D ... 101
Fosdick, Harry Emerson
Mr. Fosdick and the Presbyterians; E ... 433
Fossil; Dt ... 122
Fox grave. Criticism by O. Meyer; D ... 101
France, Anatole
Anatole France; E ... 434, 512
Anatole France, the host. P. Sanborn; S. 489
First glance; S ... 497
Master Anatole. J. Macy; S ... 487
Unpopularity of Anatole France. E. Boyd; S ... 488
France
Communist peril; EP ... 720
France sets an example; I ... 690
How France went to war. L. S. Gannett; S ... 113
Hurting France. H. W. L. Dana; C ... 145
Recognition of Russia; EP ... 508
Scandinavia moves to disarm; France takes alarm; IP ... 529
Stifling communist revolution; EP ... 666
Swiss border "free zones"; EP ... 666
France—Courts. See Courts—France
France and Germany
Commercial treaty menace to Britain; EP. 248
Difficulties of Dawes plan; EP ... 86
Frankfurter, Felix
Snappy journalism; C ... 122
Franks murder case
Loeb-Leopold case; EP ... 175
New psychology and the Franks case. L. Blumgart; S ... 261
Free speech
Breaking ranks; E ... 511
Freedom of the press
Gagging the press in Italy; I ... 269
New Mexican melodrama. H. Black; S .. 181
Freedom or imperialism? J. Vasconcelos; S .. 212
Freeman, Douglas
Virginia, a gentle dominion; S ... 68
Friends, Society of Quaker meant friend. M. Kelsey; C ... 445
Quaker revolutionaries. M. Best; S..706, 729
Friendship week; IP ... 530
From the book of extenuations. E. V. Cooke; P ... 186
Frost, Robert
Life fellowship at Michigan; EP ... 533
Fuchs, James
Why Matteotti had to die; S ... 114
Furniture, American
Introducing our ancestors; E ... 559

G

G., L.
Real Jewish Babbitt; C ... 47
Gale, Zona
Drafting La Follette; C ... 96
Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
Against Gandhi. F. Kunz; C ... 144
For Gandhi. B. Watson; C ... 289
From a friend of Gandhi. C. F. Andrews; C ... 495
Religious-unity conference; EP ... 404
Gannett, Lewis S.
How France went to war; S ... 113
Gardner, Gilson
Our next president, La Follette or Wheeler?; S ... 279
Garment workers
Gottlieb and Seiff; E ... 459
Revolution, new style. G. Soule; S ... 93
Unemployment insurance gains; EP ... 59
Geiser, Karl F.
Will Germany live again?; IS ... 318
Gemier, M. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 607
Genius
Stephen Crane and the genius myth. F. Dell; S ... 637
Where are the women geniuses? S. Kopald; S ... 619
Georgia (republic)
Soviet Georgia's little revolution. L. Fischer; S ... 671
Germany
China and Germany settle up; I ... 426
Divorces and suicides in Germany; IP ... 428
Impossible economic hurdles; EP ... 349
Will Germany live again? K. F. Geiser; IS ... 318
Germany. See also France and Germany
Germany—Politics and government
Effect of election; EP ... 720
Emerging from political crisis; EP ... 430
Moving to the center; EP ... 666
Germany—Reparations
American citizens on boards; EP ... 273
Britain and our reparations; E ... 669
Germany—Reparations—Dawes plan
Bankers and statesmen; EP ... 134, 430
Comments of O. D. Young; EP ... 693
Communists and the experts; I ... 150
Dawes plan, the knell of internationalism. C. Southworth; C ... 494
Europe declares peace; EP ... 153
New peace in Europe; E ... 205
Our claims against Germany; E ... 535
Program of reconciliation; I ... 150
Reichstag approves; EP ... 248
Will Germany live again? K. F. Geiser; IS ... 318
Gibbs, A. Hamilton
What every veteran knows; S ... 537
Giddy. R. L. Wolf; P ... 124
Gifts. M. W. Ward; P ... 376
Give not with your hands. M. Black; P 146
Glasgow, George
Anglo-Italian agreement in Jubaland; IS .. 55
Gluck, Christoph Willibald
Note on Gluck. P. Sanborn; M ... 661
Golden, John; EP ... 431
Golden book. New magazine; EP ... 694
Goldenweiser, Alexander
Man the creator; S ... 622

Goldmark, Josephine
In honor of Mrs. Kelley; C..... 469
Gompers, Samuel
Gompers, the end of an era; E..... 696
Porto Rico A. F. of L.; EP..... 58
Gooch, G. P.; EP..... 721
Goodman, Blanche
"The Big Noise"; F..... 363
Gorki, Maxim
Lenin the man; IS..... 584
Gottlieb and Seiff; E..... 459
Government employees
Try it on with ships. W. Hard; S..... 563
Government employees. See also Civil service
Government employees—Salaries
Living costs and salaries; EP..... 247
Government ownership
Canada's publicly owned electrical power. H. W. Laidler; S..... 354
Contrary to our policies?; EP..... 106
Government ownership to the fore; E.... 407
Try it on with ships. W. Hard; S..... 563
Wisconsin and socialism. W. Hard; S.. 160
Government ownership. See also Hydroelectric plants, Municipal Graffe, Dorothy
Books for children; S..... 660
Graham, Stephen V.; EP..... 532
Gray, David, and A. Hopwood
Best people. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 393
Great Britain
Archives opened; EP..... 721
Beyond Egypt; E..... 614
Britain and our reparations; E..... 669
England and Egypt in the Sudan; I..... 224
England and Egypt; the rights and wrongs. H. W. Nevinson; S..... 701
League ahoy!; E..... 697
Opium and England. E. N. La Motte; S. 232
Ultimatum to Egypt; EP..... 587
What England wants in the Sudan; IP.. 688
Great Britain—Cabinet
Baldwin's new cabinet; EP..... 532
Great Britain—Colonies and dominions
Tendency to independence; EP..... 30
Terrorism revived in India; EP..... 556
Great Britain—Elections. See Elections—Great Britain
Great Britain—Foreign relations
Abdication of Hussein; EP..... 405
Anglo-Italian agreement in Jubaland. G. Glasgow; IS..... 55
Anglo-Russian treaty; I 243, 269, EP 174, 611
British labor and Chinese brigands; IP.. 503
England and Russia agree. P. J. Rabinovitch; S..... 237
Russia answers Britain; I..... 717
Trouble with Mexico; EP..... 2
Western imperialism in China; IP..... 553
Zinoviev letter; EP..... 694
Great Britain—Politics and government
German Rhodes scholars; EP..... 135
Irak-Mosul problem; EP..... 30
Labor government; EP.....154, 298, 405
Ramsay MacDonald's achievement; E.... 432
Great Britain—Social conditions. See England—Social conditions
Great music. M. Brown; D..... 450
Greece
Labor in Greece. G. Saranton; IS..... 197
Greece — Trade unions. See Trade unions — Greece
Greek language
General education board report; EP..... 349
Green, Frederick
"Our despotic courts"; C..... 469
Green, William; EP..... 720
Greenback party
General Weaver, young and old. C. Baldwin; C..... 312
Greenland
Buried past of Greenland. P. Nörlund; S. 161
In the days of Eric the Red; EP..... 154
Griggs, J. W.
Campaign contribution; C..... 239
Grounds for divorce. E. Vajda; D..... 393
Guardsman. F. Molnàr; D..... 501
Guinness, Ralph B.
Radio censorship; C..... 446

H

H., A. H.
Nation among royalty; C..... 123
Haiti
"Helping Haiti." J. Mirault; C..... 419
New bonds and the railroads; EP..... 134
Stepping on Haiti; E..... 177
United States withdrawal demanded; EP. 31
Hamilton, Cosmo
Parasites. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 686
Harbaugh, Thomas C. Obituary; EP..... 509
Hard, William
Bolshevism and populism; S..... 12
Clarksburg, West Virginia; S..... 215
Crystal-gazing for parties; S..... 493
Davis the double-edged; S..... 94
Democrats are different; S..... 38
Direct voting for president; S..... 236
Honorary degree; Dt..... 46
In bad all round; S..... 598
In sympathy with Mr. Hard. C. Nagel; C. 681
Instructive New Hampshire; S..... 332
La Follette and Standard oil; S..... 286
La Follette's party, will it last?; S..... 142
La Follette's "strategy"; S..... 260
National village notelets; S..... 625
Nicaragua pecking the shell; S..... 416
One-party system; S..... 703
Party government ebbs; S..... 189
Plymouth, Clarksburg, Madison; S..... 305
Point of the election; S..... 521
"Politics ain't what it was"; S..... 441
She does not list so much; S..... 545
Shipstead tells some stories; S..... 462
Ted, jr.; S..... 353
That man La Follette; S..... 65
Try it on with ships; S..... 563
Wheeler and Bryan and Dawes; S..... 111
Wisconsin and socialism; S..... 160
Harding, T. Swann
Offer to Central Europe; C..... 19
Harem. E. Vajda; D..... 686
Harrison, Thomas Q.
Open letter to ex-soldiers; C..... 709
Harrowby, John
La Follette and the far West; C..... 445
Harvard university
Objection to Catholic fellow; EP..... 556
Yale wins again; E..... 616
Hassan. J. E. Flecker; D..... 423
Haste, R. A.
What is Wheeler?; S..... 465
Hays, Arthur Garfield
Modern marriage and ancient laws; S.... 187
Hearst, William Randolph
Helpless Associated press; E..... 230
Heaven and hell; E..... 460
Hedges, M. H.
Business swung the election; C..... 573
La Follette up to date; C..... 239
Tragedy of the Minnesota star; C..... 73
Hell and heaven; E..... 460
Herreshoff shipyard, Bristol, R. I.; EP..... 228
Herrin, Illinois
Klan riot; EP..... 248
Herriot, Edouard
Conference with MacDonald; EP..... 1
Swiss border "free zones"; EP..... 666
Tending toward reaction; EP..... 666
Herskovits, Melville J., and M. M. Willey
What your child learns; S..... 282
Hertzog, J. B. M.
General Hertzog's policy; an interview. M. B. D.; IS..... 452
Hibben, Paxton
It's a way we have in the army; E..... 301
Russian red cross; C..... 419
Hill, Frank Ernest
Autumn, forsake the hills; P..... 444
Hinkle, Beatrice M.
Women and the new morality; S..... 541
Hobson, John A.
E. D. Morel; C..... 600
Holby, Lilian
America and peace; C..... 74
Hoover, Herbert C.
Government ownership to the fore; E.... 407
Hopwood, Avery, and D. Gray
Best people. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 393
Horace Mann school
New education. A. De Lima; S..... 9
Hotels; Dt.....522, 546
Hours of labor
8-hour day in Europe; EP..... 134
Hourwich, Isaac A.
Jews must stick together; C..... 48
Howard, Sidney
They knew what they wanted. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 662
Huerta, Adolfo de la
Mexico's debt; I..... 223
Hughes, R. O.
Schoolbooks and propaganda; C..... 629
Humor
British humor; E..... 177
Humphries, Rolfe
Dreams; P..... 19
Rational man; P..... 635
Hungary
Countess Karolyi. E. Lengyel; S..... 520
Europe at peace! J. Lachenbruch; C.... 339
Government corruption; EP..... 611
Hunting with gun or camera; Dt..... 494
Hurst, Fannie
Comments on Russia; EP..... 249
What Fannie Hurst really thinks; C..... 313
Hydroelectric plants, Municipal
Canada's publicly owned electrical power. H. W. Laidler; S..... 354

I

Iceberg (steamship)
Saga of the S.S. Iceberg; E..... 206
Icelandic art. See Art, Icelandic
Icelandic literature
Iceland's new birth. E. Knowlton; S.... 374
If some grim tragedy. N. M. Smith; P..... 167
Illegitimacy
Nobody's children; E..... 135
North Dakota law; EP..... 299
Immigration and emigration
International migration service; EP..... 457
Immigration and emigration—United States
Klan at work. Klansman; C..... 75
"Mother of exiles." J. A. Cardigan; C.. 166
Imperialism
Beyond Egypt; E..... 614
Income tax
1922 receipts; EP..... 57
Publication of returns; EP.....481, 508
Independent
Dawes and the Lorimer case; EP..... 403
India
Akali movement, an heroic epic. A. Smedley; S..... 15
Greatest power in the world; E..... 61
Progress of the Swarajists; EP..... 322
Religious-unity conference; EP..... 404
Terrorism revived; EP..... 556
India. See also Amritsar massacre
Indians. White Indians; E..... 33
Industrial workers of the world
Deportation of ex-prisoners; EP..... 482
San Pedro. M. Reed; S..... 45
Injunctions
Gottlieb and Seiff; E..... 459
Jolt for the judges; E..... 485
Insects
Cimex lectularius, etc.; Dt..... 238
Institute of politics, Williams college
"Theirs not to reason why"; E..... 251
Insurance, Unemployment; EP..... 612
International conference for world peace
Peace conference in Berlin; I..... 529
International friendship week; IP..... 530
Irak. See Mesopotamia
Ireland
Boundary question; EP..... 227
Ulster and the Free State; EP..... 298
Irvine, A. C.
Everest wins; E..... 33
Irwin, Will
Patriotism that pays; S..... 513
Italy
Anglo-Italian agreement in Jubaland. G. Glasgow; IS..... 55
Gagging the press in Italy; I..... 269
Is fascism shaken?; EP..... 611
Letter by Matteotti; I..... 172
Mussolini and the klan; E..... 5
Why Matteotti had to die. J. Fuchs; S.. 114

J

J.
We see our finish; C..... 446
Jacobstein, Meyer
Liberal who won. J. W. Nixon, P. Benton; C..... 572
Japan
Exchange of gifts with United States; EP. 107
Greased wheels of diplomacy. L. Fischer; S..... 357
Missionary protest. W. Woodward; C.... 217
Retaliation against United States; EP.... 107
Roosevelt's "private papers"; EP..... 173
Japanese drama
Four plays from old Japan. O. Meyer; D. 101
Jaurès, Jean Léon
Jaurès at the Pantheon. I. Treat; S.... 677
Jazz music
American music via Europe. H. Straus; M..... 268
Jerusalem
Return to Jerusalem. L. Lewisohn; S.... 724
Jews
Bertrand Russell and the Jewish law. M. Jung; C..... 191
Common clay. B. Wallerstein; C..... 48
Jew in Mexico. A. Brenner; S..... 211
Jews must stick together. I. A. Hourwich; C..... 48
Mythical cohesion of the Jews. D. Meirowsky; C..... 47
Real Jewish Babbitt. L. G.; C..... 47
Jews in Poland
Departure. L. Lewisohn; S..... 335
Jokes, Practical; EP..... 695
Jolibois, L., fils
"Helping Haiti." J. Mirault; C..... 419
Journal of social forces; EP..... 556
Journalist as prime minister; E..... 6
Journalists
We see our finish. J.; C..... 446
Jubaland. See British East Africa
Judet, Ernest. Court's decision; EP..... 59
Jugoslavia
Radich returns to government; EP..... 430
Jugoslavia. See also Croatia
Jung, M.
Bertrand Russell and the Jewish law; C.. 191
Jusserand, Jean Adrien Antoine Jules
Going of M. Jusserand; E..... 560

K

Kanner, Heinrich
Is Austria rehabilitated?; IS..... 25
Kansas
W. A. White runs for governor; EP..... 322
Karakhan, L. M.
Bossing the Far East; I..... 199
Karger, Gus. Obituary; EP..... 589
Karolyi, Catherine, countess
Countess Karolyi. E. Lengyel; S..... 520
Menken protests admission to United States; EP..... 483
Karolyi, Michael, count; EP..... 720
Kaufman, George
Minick. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 423

Kelley, Florence
In honor of Mrs. Kelley. J. Goldmark; C. 469
Testimonial dinner; EP. 533
Women's wages and the law; C. 288
Kelsey, Mary
Quaker meant friend; C. 445
Kendig, Isabelle
Women in the progressive movement; S. 544
Kennell, Ruth Epperson
Kuzbas in 1924; S. 566
Kimball, Fiske
What is modern architecture?; S. 128
Kimball, Jessie Y.
Stay east, young man; C. 217
Klansman
Klan at work; C. 75
Klosner, Morris
Free the air!; C. 497
Knowlton, Elizabeth
Digging up Carthage; S. 466
Iceland's new birth; S. 374
Koch, Theodore W.
Correction and a rebuke; C. 74
Kopald, Sylvia
Where are the women geniuses?; S. 619
Kremers, Edward
Motto for La Follette; C. 217
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Accomplished actress; D. 527
Average citizen's thinking. S. T. Byington; C. 731
Compromise; D. 662
Dramatic editor; EP. 228
God of stumps; D. 578
Hopwood versus Vajda; D. 393
Melodrama and aspirations; D. 450
Mimicry and realism; D. 423
Miscellany; D. 736
Our best war play; D. 316
Pinero the timid; D. 551
Problem; D. 343
Pure theater; D. 715
Too much Main Street; D. 686
Two comedies; D. 501
Two experiments; D. 474
Utopia of gallants; D. 606
Ku Klux Klan
As campaign issue; EP. 29, 227
Is the Bar association K. K. K.? Nildo; C. 339
Judge Lindsey in Denver. B. B. Lindsey; C. 573
Klan at work. Klansman; C. 75
Klan in the election. C. R. Long; C. 600
Shed a tear for the klan; E. 351
Kunz, F.
Against Gandhi; C. 144
Kuzbas colony, Siberia
Kuzbas in 1924. R. E. Kennell; S. 566
Kuznetz Basin concession. See Kuzbas colony

L

Labor and laboring classes—Great Britain. See also Trade union congress Labor and laboring classes—United States
Resolutions of college students; EP. 349
Labor and laboring classes—United States. See also Trade unions—United States
Lachenbruch, Jerome
Europe at peace!; C. 339
Lafayette motors corporation
Automobile ups and downs; E. 301
La Follette, Robert Marion
Anti-La Follette arguments in California. U. Sinclair; C. 496
"Appalling confusion" in the New York World; E. 136
California supreme court does its bit. M. Stern; S. 491
Campaign items; EP. 105, 133, 153, 173, 321, 482, 588
Critic of La Follette. W. Taylor; C. 366
Drafting La Follette. Z. Gale; C. 96
Honest convention. O. G. Villard; S. 63
How dangerous is La Follette?; E. 229
La Follette and imperialism. C. F. Dole; C. 313
La Follette and Standard oil. W. Hard; S. 286
La Follette and the far West. J. Harrowby; C. 445
La Follette and the one-track liberal mind. D. K. Niles; C. 288
La Follette carried Cleveland. R. A. Loveland; C. 546
La Follette in America. A. Warner; S. 214
La Follette in California. A. Van Aver.; C. 165
La Follette in Washington. A. Warner; S. 180
La Follette in Wisconsin. A. Warner; S. 158
La Follette the wrecker; E. 32
La Follette up to date. M. H. Hedges; C. 239
La Follette's foreign policy; I. 476
La Follette's party, will it last? W. Hard; S. 142
La Follette's "strategy." W. Hard; S. 260
Motto for La Follette. E. Kremers; C. 217
Parties and our foreign policy; E. 276
Republican slush fund charge; EP. 429
Snappy work. A. S. Barnes; C. 313
That man La Follette. W. Hard; S. 65
Winning of the West. O. G. Villard; S. 435
La Follette. W. E. Leonard; P. 363
Laidler, Harry W.
Canada's publicly owned electrical power; S. 354
Lamb, Howard A.
Calles, the teacher and statesman; S. 595
Lamont, Thomas W.
Bankers and statesmen; EP. 430
La Motte, Ellen N.
Opium and England; S. 232
Land tenure—Esthonia
Private property in Esthonia. A. Ruhl; C. 145
Laski, Harold J.
Trade union congress, 1924; IS. 345
Latin America
United States domination; EP. 31
Latin-Americans
Progressive Latin-Americans. J. M. Bejarano; C. 338
Latin language
General education board report; EP. 349
Lawrence, David; EP. 719
Lawyers
Fair day's fee; EP. 349
Lawyers. See also American bar association
Lazybones. O. Davis; D. 394
League of nations
Einstein rejoins; EP. 87
League ahoy!; E. 697
Marshal Foch on peace; I. 554
Security and disarmament; EP. 298
Shall we commit suicide? W. S. Churchill; IP. 608
Turco-Irak frontier question; EP. 508
Way to disarm; E. 325
League of nations. Assembly
"Ain't goin' to study war no more"?; E. 406
Europe moves toward peace. R. Dell; S. 518
League of nations. Council
Twenty-ninth session; EP. 1
League of nations. Protocol for the pacific settlement of international disputes
"Ain't goin' to study war no more"; E. 406
Europe moves toward peace. R. Dell; S. 518
Peace resolution; EP. 273, 430
Leavenworth, Isabel
Virtue and women; S. 42
Lee, Algernon
Would it be a misalliance?; C. 74
Lee, Lawrence
Lines to a dead lady; P. 331
Leete, John H.
Library censorship; C. 628
Leigh-Mallory, George H.
Everest wins; E. 33
Leisure
Freedom or imperialism? J. Vasconcelos; S. 212
Leiv Eiriksson, sloop; EP. 535
Lengyel, Emil
Bandit caliph; IS. 54
Countess Karolyi; S. 520
English for the Viennese; C. 600
Rumanian oil and foreign money; IS. 295
Lenin, Nikolai
Lenin the man. M. Gorki; IS. 584
Leningrad
"Leningrad" and Boston symphony; EP. 457
Leningrad. B. Deutsch; P. 218
Leonard, William Ellery
La Follette; P. 363
Leopold, Nathan F. See Franks murder case
Lewis, Samuel
1848-1860-1924; C. 144
Lewis, Sinclair
Be brisk with Babbitt; S. 409, 437, 463
Main street's been paved!; S. 255
Lewisohn, Ludwig
Departure; S. 335
On love in marriage; S. 464
Return to Jerusalem; S. 724
Liang Shih-yi in America. C. F. Liu; C. 312
Libbey, Laura Jean. Obituary; EP. 483
Liberalism in the colleges. P. Blanshard; S. 284
Liberia
Primitive black man. W. E. B. Du Bois; S. 675
Libraries
Library censorship. B. P. Chass, J. H. Leete; C. 628
Lilienthal, David E.
Dawes, first aid to swindlers; S. 414
Lima, Agnes de. See De Lima, Agnes
Lincoln school
New education. A. De Lima; S. 8
Lindsey, Ben B.
Defeat turns into election; EP. 507, 531
Judge Lindsey in Denver; C. 573
Lines to a dead lady. L. Lee; P. 331
Liquor traffic
Fashions in newspaper hoaxes; E. 251
Wholesale dealers supply co.; EP. 555
Literary criticism. See also Censorship; Critics Literature
Contemporary disillusion. L. Mumford; S. 636
Few vs. the good; E. 486
International literature; E. 669
Truth and realism in literature. M. Bodenheim; S. 373
Literature, Icelandic. See Icelandic literature
Little clay cart; D. 715
Littleton, Martin W.; EP. 482
Liu, C. F.
Liang Shih-yi in America; C. 312
Livingston, Arthur
Courage of Blasco Ibáñez; C. 601
Livy at last?; E. 325
Lloyd, George
Farmers and their debts; C. 709
Loans, Foreign
Concern of our State department; EP. 86
Lodge, Henry Cabot
Henry Cabot Lodge, a scholar in politics. O. G. Villard; S. 539
Loeb, Richard. See Franks murder case
London
Ends search for motto; EP. 589
London vs. Paris; Dt. 467
Long, Clarence R.
Klan in the election; C. 600
Look out! E. L. Masters; P. 240
Looking on. A. Young (cartoons). 356
Los Angeles
San Pedro. M. Reed; S. 45
Lossiemouth. F. H. Simonds; S. 330
Louisiana
La Follette electors off ballot; EP. 347
Loveland, Ralph A.
La Follette carried Cleveland; C. 546
Luhrs, Marie
Cows; P. 543
Sonnet; P. 543
Lynching
Richmond Times-Dispatch on New York; EP. 274
Sharp decline; EP. 483

M

M., J. F.
Shoes, eggs and The Nation; C. 18
McAdoo, William G.
At the Democratic convention; EP. 85
MacCurdy, Mrs. George G.; EP. 483
McDonald, James G.
Conference; an analysis; E. 198
MacDonald, James Ramsay
Conference with Herriot; EP. 1
Geneva speech; EP. 273
Journalist as prime minister; E. 6
Lossiemouth. F. H. Simonds; S. 330
Morel and MacDonald. W. N. Ewer; C. 731
Motor car incident; EP. 298
Ramsay MacDonald's achievement; E. 432
McKibben, William K.
Sign the opium petition!; C. 523
Macy, John
Master Anatole; S. 487
Madame Pompadour; D. 607
Magazines. See Periodicals
Magee, Carl C.
New Mexican melodrama. H. Black; S. 181
Main street's been paved! S. Lewis; S. 255
Malkiel, Leon A.
Alien's dilemma; C. 339
Mallory, George H. Leigh-. See Leigh-Mallory, George H.
Man
Man the creator. A. Goldenweiser; S. 622
Man, Prehistoric. See also Cave dwellers Marriage
Modern marriage and ancient laws. A. G. Hays; S. 187
On love in marriage. L. Lewisohn; S. 464
Married women
Maiden names; Dt. 73, 122, EP 3, 202, 695
Married women's titles. A. S. Blackwell; C. 165
Mars (planet); EP. 721
Martino-Fusio, Mario de
Livy at last?; E. 325
Masaryk, Thomas G.
Savinkov and Masaryk. C. Pergler; C. 628
Mask and the face; D. 317
Massachusetts
Minimum wage law decision; EP. 106
Women's wages and the law. F. Kelley; C. 288
Massingham, Henry William
In memory of H. W. Massingham. H. W. Nevinson; S. 329
Noble editor; E. 252
Masters, Edgar Lee
Look out!; P. 240
Matteotti, Giacomo
"Here"; EP. 201
Letter by Matteotti; I. 172
Mussolini and the klan; E. 8
Why Matteotti had to die. J. Fuchs; S. 114
Matthews, Brander
Exit; E. 62
Maughan, Russell L.; EP. 3
Maxim, Hudson
Radio, the fulcrum; S. 91
Mayer, Edwin Justus
Firebrand. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 501
Means, Gaston B.
Daugherty and the Means indictment; EP. 321
Meirowsky, Dorothee
Mythical cohesion of the Jews; C. 47
Mellon, Andrew W.; EP. 1, 403, 694
Memoir. G. Taggard; P. 635
Men
Men who understand women. F. G. Seabury; S. 516
Mr. Mencken on the sex comedy. H. L. Mencken; C. 444
Men—Dress. See Clothing and dress
Mencken, Henry L.
Clown show; S. 8
Joseph Conrad; S. 179
Mr. Mencken on the sex comedy; C. 444
Sex uproar; S. 91

Menken, E. Stanwood; EP..... 483
Merchant marine
Try it on with ships. W. Hard; S..... 563
Mesopotamia
Irak does not want Mosul; EP..... 30
Mesopotamia. See also Mosul
Metropolitan museum of art
Introducing our ancestors; E..... 559
Mexican art. See Art, Mexican Mexican literature
Art and revolution in Mexico. B. D. Wolfe; S..... 207
Mexico
Calles speaks; I..... 222
Calles, the teacher and statesman. H. Lamb; S..... 595
Claims against United States; EP..... 58
Freedom or imperialism? J. Vasconcelos; S..... 212
Jew in Mexico. A. Brenner; S..... 211
Knickers and bobbed hair; EP..... 135
Mexico's debt; I..... 223
Murder of Mrs. Evans; EP.....2, 153
Our southern neighbors; E..... 204
Mexico—Banks and banking. See Banks and banking—Mexico
Mexico—Elections. See Elections—Mexico
Mexico—Finance. See Finance—Mexico
Mexico university
Publications; EP..... 203
Meyer, Annie Nathan
Be honest to the South; C..... 627
Meyer, Ouida
Four plays from old Japan; D..... 101
Michigan university
Robert Frost fellowship; EP..... 533
Middleton, Scudder
To W. E. Burghardt Du Bois; P..... 39
Millar, Paul Harwood
Banker saves the farmer; S..... 439
Minick, G. Kaufman; D..... 423
Minimum wage—United States
Massachusetts decision; EP..... 106
Women's wages and the law. F. Kelley; C. 288
Mining laws
Rumanian oil and foreign money. E. Lengyel; IS..... 295
Minnesota daily star
Tragedy of the Minnesota star. M. H. Hedges; C..... 73
Mirault, Joseph
"Helping Haiti"; C..... 419
Mobilization day. See Defense day
Moeller, Philip
Word of approval; C..... 601
Moens, Herman M. Bernelot; EP..... 249
Molnàr, Ferenc
Guardsman. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 501
Monday opera club; EP..... 694
Mongrel. H. Bahr; D..... 736
Monopolies
La Follette's "strategy." W. Hard; S.... 260
Morel, Edmund D.
E. D. Morel. J. A. Hobson; C..... 600
E. D. Morel's work. C. Nagel; C..... 629
Nevinson on Morel; IP..... 718
Obituary; EP..... 557
To Morel. M. C. Percy; C..... 629
Morocco
Bandit caliph. E. Lengyel; IS..... 54
Mortality
They were born . . . they die; IP..... 130
Morton, David
After winter; P..... 76
Nostalgia; P..... 490
Moscow Pravda
Communism in the Evening post; IP..... 296
Moses. E. V. Cooke; P..... 186
Mosul, Mesopotamia
Problem of oil; EP..... 30
Turco-Irak frontier; EP..... 508
Moving pictures
"America" barred from England; EP.... 203
Mugerdichen, Mike
Nordic honor. W. F. Ellis; C..... 18
Muir, Edwin
Women—free for what?; S..... 140
Mumford, Lewis
Contemporary disillusion; S..... 636
Murder in the Whistler room. E. Wilson; D. 474
Muscle Shoals project
Bills before Congress; EP..... 719
Muscle Shoals—ours; E..... 668
Music. See also Jazz music
Music—Ireland
Feis Ceoil. H. Straus; M..... 550
Musical festivals
Feis Ceoil. H. Straus; M..... 550
Musicians as conversationalists; Dt..... 190
Mussolini, Benito
Bright red past; EP..... 275
Mussolini and the klan; E..... 5
Muste, A. J.
Workers' education in the United States; S..... 333
My son; D..... 394

N

Nagel, Charles
E. D. Morel's work; C..... 629
In sympathy with Mr. Hard; C..... 681
Names, Personal
Married women's names; Dt 73, 122, EP 3, 202, 695
Married women's titles. A. S. Blackwell; C..... 165
Nation, The
California blues. C. E. Stowe; C..... 97
Nation among royalty. A. H. H.; C..... 123
Poetry prize..486, 527, 551, 578, 606, 662, 686, 713, 735
We make him mad. C. E. Stowe; C..... 338
Word of approval. P. Moeller; C..... 601
National conventions, Democratic Agony of the Democrats. H. W. van Loon; S..... 66
Cleveland, Wilson, ——?; E..... 4
Convention notes; EP.....1, 29, 85
Convention notes. A. Young (cartoons).. 40
Davis the double-edged. W. Hard; S.... 94
Here are ladies. E. Evans; S..... 41
Maccabees of 1924. H. W. van Loon; S.. 37
Radio-convention year; E..... 34
Snappy journalism. F. Frankfurter; C.. 122
Unconventional convention. O. G. Villard; S..... 35
National conventions, Farmer-labor-progressive Bolshevism and populism. W. Hard; S... 12
National conventions, Progressive
Honest convention. O. G. Villard; S.... 63
National conventions, Republican
Clown show. H. L. Mencken; S..... 8
Us poor liberals. H. W. van Loon; S.... 7
National council for the prevention of war
Sword-rattling; E..... 155
National forests
Burning forests; E..... 536
National forests and the Northern Pacific. E. Richards; S..... 71
National minorities in Poland; I..... 26
National Republican league; EP..... 429
National woman's party
Women's bloc?; E..... 230
Naturalization
Alien's dilemma. L. A. Malkiel; C..... 339
Nature-books. First glance. M. Van Doren; S..... 470
Nearing, Nellie Seeds
American labor at El Paso; C..... 680
Negro songs
Black voices; E..... 278
Negroes
"Usual crime." H. Adams; C..... 97
Negroes in Africa
Primitive black man. W. E. B. Du Bois; S..... 675
Negroes in the United States
Are Negroes "workers"?; E..... 89
Be honest to the South. A. N. Meyer; C. 627
Darby high school case; EP..... 3
Garvey's parade; EP..... 154
Negro and the G. O. P. J. C. Cunningham; C..... 419
Negroes in the United States—Education
Fisk university endowment; EP..... 107
Nevinson, Henry Wood
Anatole France again; E..... 512
England and Egypt; the rights and wrongs; S..... 701
In memory of H. W. Massingham; S..... 329
Nevinson on Morel; IP..... 718
New Hampshire
Instructive New Hampshire. W. Hard; S. 332
New Hampshire. O. E. Brown; C..... 681
New Hampshire, not yet abandoned. R. D. Paine; S..... 183
New Mexican melodrama. H. Black; S..... 181
New Mexico
Secret balloting openly arrived. H. Black; C..... 574
New morals for old..42, 91, 140, 187, 235, 280, 464, 516, 541
New schools. See Schools, Experimental
New York (city)
Fifth avenue; Dt..... 599
Pedagogues in revolt; E..... 433
New York (state)
Campaign for governorship; EP..... 347
New York Evening post
Communism in the Evening post; IP..... 296
On French elections; EP..... 31
New York Herald Tribune
Fashions in newspaper hoaxes; E..... 251
Headlines on Defense day; EP..... 227
New literary supplement; EP..... 228
New York Times
Reporting La Follette campaign; EP..... 531
New York World
"Appalling confusion" in the New York World; E..... 136
On United States imperialism; EP..... 719
Newspapers
Radio or newspaper—can both survive? M. A. Rose; S..... 699
Newspapers. See also Columns, Newspaper
Newspapers—Italy
Gagging the press in Italy; I..... 269
Newspapers—Russia. See also Moscow Pravda
Newspapers—United States
Fashions in newspaper hoaxes; E..... 251
Reporter's mirror; S..... 361
Reporting La Follette campaign; EP.... 531
Newspapers—United States. See also Minnesota daily star; New York Evening post; New York Herald Tribune; New York Times; New York World; Richmond Times-Dispatch; Springfield Republican
Nicaragua
Nicaragua pecking the shell. W. Hard; S..... 416
Railroads and election prospects; EP..... 202
Nieto, Rafael
Mexico's credit, the vital issue; S..... 209
Nildo
Is the Bar association K. K. K.?; C..... 339
Niles, David K.
La Follette and the one-track liberal mind; C..... 288
Nixon, Justin W.
Liberal who won; C..... 572
Nobel prizes
Literature prize to W. Reymont; EP.... 557
Non-resistance
Greatest power in the world; E..... 61
Nörlund, Poul
Buried past of Greenland; S..... 161
Norman, Charles
Ballad; P..... 732
Norris, William A.
Directions for burial; P..... 417
October end; P..... 444
North Dakota
Illegitimacy law; EP..... 299
Northern Pacific railroad company
National forests and the Northern Pacific. E. Richards; S..... 71
Northwestern university
Correction and a rebuke. T. W. Koch; C. 74
Norton, Mary. Election; EP.....507, 531
Nostalgia. D. Morton; P..... 490
Novels. See Fiction

O

Obregón, Alvaro
Mexico's debt; I..... 223
Ocean travel
Reading on shipboard. R. S. Alexander; S..... 118
Ocean travel. See also Voyages
Ochs, Adolph S.
American "Who was who"; E..... 698
October end. W. A. Norris; P..... 444
Odors
"Smells of a great city"; Dt.....18, 95
Odum, Howard W.; EP..... 556
Oil. See Petroleum
Old women. B. Deutsch; P..... 218
Olympic games; EP..... 87
O'Neill, Eugene
Desire under the elms. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 578
S. S. Glencairn. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 578
Open ocean. R. L. Wolf; P..... 124
Opium trade
All-India Congress committee; EP..... 228
Fight against opium; I..... 503
Opium and England. E. N. La Motte; S. 232
Sign the opium petition! W. K. McKibben; C..... 523
Orchestras
Musicians militant. H. Straus; M..... 80
Ostenso, Martha. Prize winner; EP..... 557

P

Pacifism
Average citizen's thinking. S. T. Byington; C..... 731
Paine, Ralph D.
New Hampshire, not yet abandoned; S.. 183
Palaces and parks; Dt..... 216
Palestine
Palestine problem; IP..... 345
Return to Jerusalem. L. Lewisohn; S.... 724
Parasites. C. Hamilton; D..... 686
Paris vs. London; Dt..... 467
Parsons, Charles E.
Inbreeding and degeneracy; C..... 96
Passive resistance. See Non-resistance
Passports; EP..... 667
Paterson, New Jersey
Strikers and free speech; EP..... 430
Patriotism that pays. W. Irwin; S..... 513
Patton, Emma B.
Critic criticized; C..... 681
Peace
America and peace. L. Holby; C..... 74
Coolidge's Legion speech; EP..... 297
Freedom through advertising; E..... 89
Marshal Foch on peace; I..... 554
Peace conference in Berlin; I..... 529
Peace. See also Carnegie endowment for international peace; English peace society; Filene, Edward A., peace prizes; League of nations; Pacifism; War; Women's international league for peace and freedom
Percy, Mary Cruttenden
To Morel; P..... 629
Pergler, Charles
Savinkov and Masaryk; C..... 628
Periodicals
English for the Viennese. E. Lengyel; C. 600
Offer to Central Europe. T. S. Harding and B. E. Birga; C..... 19
Periodicals. See also names of periodicals
Persia
American official's death; EP..... 135
Imbrie indemnity; EP..... 556

Petroleum
Greased wheels of diplomacy. L. Fischer; S ... 357
Rumanian oil and foreign money. E. Lengyel; IS ... 295
Rumanian wells nationalized; EP ... 58
Petroleum—Russia
Sinclair vs. Standard oil in Russia. L. Fischer; S ... 138
Philadelphia
Protest against Butler; EP ... 202
Photoradiograms; EP ... 613
Pinero, Arthur Wing
Second Mrs. Tanqueray; D ... 551
Pioneer youth of America
"Scouts with a difference." N. Thomas; C ... 680
Platforms, Political
Forty years ago; E ... 61
Republicans on civil service; EP ... 86
Platt, Chester C.
Handicaps of the Progressives; C ... 573
Play school. See City and country school
Plunkitt, George Washington
Plunkitt's way; E ... 591
Poe, Edgar Allan
Mystery of Poe; E ... 615
Poems
Acquiescence. I. Edman ... 624
After winter. D. Morton ... 76
Ararat; EP ... 299
Autumn. A. Pushkin ... 570
Autumn, forsake the hills. F. E. Hill ... 444
Ballad. C. Norman ... 732
Blake. H. L. Cook ... 49
Buffalo dance at Santo Domingo. W. Bynner ... 310
Carib canoe under sail. G. H. Conkling. 732
Cassandra. L. Bogan ... 599
Cows. M. Luhrs ... 543
Dew and bronze. R. P. T. Coffin ... 290
Directions for burial. W. A. Norris ... 417
Dreams. R. Humphries ... 19
From the book of extenuations: The serpent; Cain; Moses; Ruth; David. E. V. Cooke ... 186
Giddy. R. L. Wolf ... 124
Gifts. M. W. Ward ... 376
Give not with your hands. M. Black ... 146
If some grim tragedy. N. M. Smith ... 167
La Follette. W. E. Leonard ... 363
Leningrad. B. Deutsch ... 218
Lines to a dead lady. L. Lee ... 331
Look out! E. L. Masters ... 240
Memoir. G. Taggard ... 635
Nostalgia. D. Morton ... 490
October end. W. A. Norris ... 444
Old women. B. Deutsch ... 218
Open ocean. R. L. Wolf ... 124
Poet's love letter. M. Bodenheim ... 599
Quag-hole. W. Chambers ... 732
Rational man. R. Humphries ... 635
Sonnet. M. Luhrs ... 543
Sonnet to Minna. M. Bodenheim ... 467
Sustenance. B. Deutsch ... 624
Taking away the banking. W. Snow ... 264
To a song of Sappho. L. Speyer ... 596
To Lisa in summer. M. Eastman ... 635
To Morel. M. C. Percy ... 629
To W. E. Burghardt Du Bois. S. Middleton ... 39
Wind and the whirlwind. W. S. Blunt ... 626
Wise. C. P. Cullen ... 522
Poetry
Nation's poetry prize..486, 527, 551, 578, 606, 662, 686, 713, 735
Poet's love letter. M. Bodenheim; P ... 599
Poland
Get rich quick in Poland. A. L. Strong; IS ... 171
National minorities in Poland; I ... 26
Police courts. See Courts, Municipal Political parties—United States
Crystal-gazing for parties. W. Hard; S. 493
1848-1860-1924. S. Lewis; C ... 144
La Follette's party, will it last? W. Hard; S ... 142
One-party system. W. Hard; S ... 703
Party government ebbs. W. Hard; S ... 189
Shall the Progressives organize?; E ... 558
Would it be a misalliance? A. Lee; C ... 74
Political parties—United States. See also Democratic party; Farmer-labor party; Greenback party; National conventions; Progressive party; Republican party
Porto Rico
Workers' movement and A. F. of L.; EP. 58
Postage stamps
Mussolini's advertising space; EP ... 695
Postal service—Canada
Strike against the government. R. N. Baldwin; S ... 120
Poverty's felicity; Dt ... 571
Powderly, Terence V. Obituary; EP ... 59
Powers, William H.
Perennial patriot; C ... 96
Preparedness maniac again; E ... 722
Presbyterian church
Mr. Fosdick and the Presbyterians; E ... 433
Presidential campaigns—1924
Aftermath; E ... 484
Be brisk with Babbitt. S. Lewis; S.. 409, 437, 463
Business swung the election. M. H. Hedges; C ... 573
California supreme court does its bit. M. Stern; S ... 491
Campaign contribution. J. W. Griggs; C. 239
Can the election be bought?; E ... 458
Chances in the election; E ... 250
Democrats are different. W. Hard; S ... 38
Disintegrating Democrats; E ... 60
1848-1860-1924. S. Lewis; C ... 144
Get out the issues!; E ... 350
Handicaps of the Progressives. C. C. Platt; C ... 573
Instructive New Hampshire. W. Hard; S. 332
La Follette electors off the ballot; EP ... 347
La Follette news; EP ... 321
Lawrence on campaign speakers; EP ... 719
Line-up in Washington state. J. N. Beffel; S ... 492
Main street's been paved! S. Lewis; S.. 255
Mr. Hughes's logic; EP ... 429
Our despotic courts; E ... 300
Our next president, La Follette or Wheeler? G. Gardner; S ... 279
Parties and our foreign policy; E ... 276
Please save the Republic!; E ... 326
Plymouth, Clarksburg, Madison. W. Hard; S ... 305
"Politics ain't what it was." W. Hard; S ... 441
Prairies catching fire. S. Lewis; S ... 412
Progressive Latin-Americans. J. M. Bejarano; C ... 338
Progressive prospects; EP ... 297
Prophecies; EP ... 455
"Robbery of party names"; EP ... 105
Shipstead tells some stories. W. Hard; S. 462
Summing up the campaign. O. G. Villard; S ... 461
Winning of the West. O. G. Villard; S... 435
Presidential campaigns—1924. See also Bryan, Charles W.; Coolidge, Calvin; Davis, John W.; Dawes, Charles G.; La Follette, Robert Marion; Wheeler, Burton K.; also Platforms, Political Presidents—United States
Lawyer for President? What lawyer?; E. 324
Our next president, La Follette or Wheeler? G. Gardner; S ... 279
Presidents—United States—Election
Direct voting for president. W. Hard; S. 236
When election is thrown into House; EP. 348
Prices
Shoes, eggs and The Nation. J. F. M.; C. 18
Princess April; D ... 686
Progress
Advancing backward; E ... 723
In Papeete, Moscow, etc.; Dt ... 418
Progressive party
Aftermath; E ... 484
Handicaps of the Progressives. C. C. Platt; C ... 573
La Follette's party, will it last? W. Hard; S ... 142
Shall the Progressives organize?; E ... 558
Summing up the campaign. O. G. Villard; S ... 461
United States Chamber of commerce speaks; EP ... 588
Wheeler invades New York. O. G. Villard; S ... 303
Women in the progressive party. I. Kendig; S ... 544
Progressive party. See also National conventions, Progressive Propaganda
Patriotism that pays. W. Irwin; S ... 513
Protocol for the pacific settlement of international disputes. See League of nations—Protocol for the pacific settlement of international disputes
Psychoanalysis
New psychology and the Franks case. L. Blumgart;; S ... 261
Public debts. See Debts, Public
Public libraries. See Libraries
Public officers
Debunking; E ... 137
Puccini, Giacomo
Puccini and Fauré. P. Sanborn; M ... 714
Puritans
Introducing our ancestors; E ... 559
Pushcart; EP ... 457
Pushkin, Alexander
Autumn; P ... 570
Putnam, Frank
Historical parallels; C ... 123

Q

Quag-hole. W. Chambers; P ... 732
Quakers. See Friends, Society of

R

Rabinovitch, Philip J.
England and Russia agree; S ... 237
Radio broadcasting
Free the air! M. Klosner; C ... 497
"Freedom of the air"; EP ... 85
Freedom of the air. D. Sarnoff, G. A. Whalen, H. Maxim; S ... 90
Radio censorship. R. B. Guinness; C ... 446
Radio or newspaper—can both survive? M. A. Rose; S ... 699
Revolutionizing home life; EP ... 203
Radio-convention year; E ... 34
Radich, Stephen
Croatian peasant movement; C ... 217
Returns to government; EP ... 430
Railroads—China
China, Russia, the Allies, and the Chinese eastern railway; I ... 368
Railroads and state
Government ownership to the fore; E ... 407
Raisuli (Achmed ben Mohammed er Raisuli)
Bandit caliph. E. Lengyel; IS ... 54
Rational man. R. Humphries; P ... 635
Reading on shipboard. R. S. Alexander; S.. 118
Red cross
Defense day call to colors; EP ... 274
Red cross. See also Russian red cross
Red falcon; D ... 474
Reed, Mary
San Pedro; S ... 45
Relief work
Ship of friendship; EP ... 431
Reparations conference, London, 1924
Conference; an analysis; I ... 198
Germans at the conference; EP ... 174
Just another conference?; E ... 109
New peace in Europe; E ... 205
Reporters and reporting
Debunking; E ... 137
Reporter's mirror. W. G. Clugston; S ... 361
Republican party
Democrats are different. W. Hard; S ... 38
La Follette's slush fund charge; EP ... 429
Scandals and the campaign; EP ... 347
Republican party. See also National conventions, Republican Reymont, Wladislaw
Wins Nobel literature prize; EP ... 557
Rhode Island
Rhode Island's revolution. O. A. Welsh; S ... 14
Rhodes scholarships
For German students; EP ... 135
Richards, Edward
National forests and the Northern Pacific; S ... 71
Richman, Arthur
Far cry. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D ... 450
Richmond Times-Dispatch
On New York lynchings; EP ... 274
Rivera, Diego
Art and revolution in Mexico. B. D. Wolfe; S ... 207
Rodeos. See Wild west shows
Rodgers, W. L.
Arm for war; EP ... 175
Roman Catholic church
"Bigoted protestant?" D. Y. Thomas; C.. 239
Catholicism and the state. B. Elder; C.. 709
Catholics in education; EP ... 557
Roosevelt, Theodore, jr.
Ted, jr. W. Hard; S ... 353
William Hard on Roosevelt; EP ... 404
Rose, Marc A.
Radio or newspaper—can both survive?; S. 699
Rosenbluth, Robert
Indictment dismissed; EP ... 456
Ross, Mary
Standard oil's death factory; S ... 561
Rostand, Edmond
L'Aiglon. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.. 527
Ruhl, Arthur
Private property in Esthonia; C ... 145
Rumania
Oil wells nationalized; EP ... 58
Rumanian oil and foreign money. E. Lengyel; IS ... 295
Russell, Bertrand
Bertrand Russell and the Jewish law. M. Jung; C ... 191
British labor and Chinese brigands; IP.... 503
Western imperialism in China; IP ... 553
Russia
Advice from G. B. Shaw; EP ... 667
Agricultural offensive; I ... 585
Bankers on Russian bonds; EP ... 86
Communist puritans. L. Fischer; S ... 235
Fannie Hurst's comments; EP ... 249
Fight against famine. J. Smith; S ... 570
Grand Duchess Cyril in New York; EP.... 694
Leon Trotzky, down but not out. L. Fischer; IS ... 81
National minorities in Poland; I ... 26
New famine year in Russia; I ... 103
Reported revolution; EP ... 299
Russian summer resort. M. Eastman; S.. 568
Russia's harvest; I ... 245
Savinkov's story; EP ... 275, 452
Seven years of soviet Russia; EP ... 555
Soviet Georgia's little revolution. L. Fischer; S ... 671
Strength of the Russian Communist party; I ... 27
What Fannie Hurst really thinks. F. Hurst; C ... 313
Russia. See also Kuzbas colony; Moscow
Russia—Economic conditions
Nepman is passing. L. Fischer; S ... 564
Private trade in soviet Russia; I ... 84
Russia's industrial progress. L. Talmy; IS. 582

Russia—Foreign relations
Anglo-Russian treaty; I 243, 269, EP 174, 611
Bossing the Far East; I..... 199
China and Russia agree; IP..... 102
China, Russia, the Allies, and the Chinese eastern railway; I..... 368
England and Russia agree. P. J. Rabinovitch; S..... 237
Greased wheels of diplomacy. L. Fischer; S..... 357
Hunting red witches; E..... 178
Meddling of United States; EP..... 57
Recognition by France; EP..... 508
Russia answers Britain; I..... 717
Russia's bill of damages; I..... 102
Zinoviev letter; EP..... 694
Russia—Social conditions
Nobody's children; E..... 135
Russian red cross
Russian red cross. P. Hibben; C..... 419
Ruth. E. V. Cooke; P..... 186

S

S., I.
Now that the smoke of battle . . .; C.... 546
S. S. Glencairn. E. O'Neill; D..... 578
Saad Zaghlul
England and Egypt in the Sudan; I..... 224
Sacco-Vanzetti case
New trial denied; EP..... 405
Sadoul, Jacques; EP..... 666
Sahara Desert
Motor expeditions; EP..... 667
Sailing vessels. See Ships
Saint. S. Young; D..... 474
St. John the Divine; EP..... 533
St. Louis (steamship)
Another good ship gone; E..... 109
Salaries. See also Government employees—Salaries Salvage
Raising sunken treasure; EP..... 405
Sanborn, Pitts
Anatole France, the host; S..... 489
Note on Gluck; M..... 661
Puccini and Fauré; M..... 714
San Pedro. M. Reed; S..... 45
Sap; D..... 736
Saranton, George
Labor in Greece; IS..... 197
Sarnoff, David
Uncensored and uncontrolled; S..... 90
Satire
Few vs. the good; E..... 486
Savinkov, Boris
Savinkov and Masaryk. C. Pergler; C.... 628
Savinkov's story .....EP 275, I 452
Schemers. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 344 Schools, Experimental
New education. A. De Lima; S.....9, 116
Pedagogues in revolt; E..... 433
School for workers' children. D. Allen; S.. 417
Seabury, Florence Guy
Men who understand women; S..... 516
Second Mrs. Tanqueray. A. W. Pinero; D.... 551
Securities
Interest rates denounced; EP..... 1
Sedgwick, Anne Douglas
Adrienne Toner, saint; C..... 628
Seibel, George
Dollar patriotism; C..... 263
Serpent. E. V. Cooke; P..... 186
Sex
Another dominant female. R. L. Wolf; C. 339
Dominant sexes. M. Vaerting; S..... 280
Mr. Mencken on the sex comedy. H. L. Mencken; C..... 444
Sex equality of our ancestors. R. H. Towner; C..... 192
Sexual ethics
Clarifying and interesting. D. Brewster; C..... 192
Communist puritans. L. Fischer; S..... 235
Does Mr. Mencken know? B. Sobel; C.... 365
Dominant sexes. M. Vaerting; S..... 280
Men who understand women. F. G. Seabury; S..... 516
Modern marriage and ancient laws. A. G. Hays; S..... 187
New morals for old. Criticisms. E. Waldstein, R. P. Doremus, M. Jung, D. C. Shapiro, R. H. Towner, D. Brewster; C. 191, 192
Old immorals. E. Waldstein; C..... 191
On love in marriage. L. Lewisohn; S.... 464
Sex uproar. H. L. Mencken; S..... 91
Toward moral shipwreck. A. L. Whittaker; C..... 365
Virtue and women. I. Leavenworth; S.. 42
We break up the home. R. P. Doremus; C. 191
What is jealousy? C. Angoff; C..... 365
Women and the new morality. B. M. Hinkle; S..... 541
Women—free for what? E. Muir; S..... 140
Shapiro, Dora C.
Parasites or partners; C..... 191
Shaw, George Bernard
Advice to Russia; EP..... 667
Candida. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D.... 736
Catching up with Shaw; E..... 407
Shelby, Gertrude Mathews
Politicians betray the farmer; S..... 593
Sherman, Stuart P.
Anatole France again; E..... 512
Shipley, Maynard
Science or superstition?; C..... 495
Ships
Flettner windship; EP..... 589
Shipstead, Henrik
Educating Mellon; EP..... 1
Shipstead tells some stories. W. Hard; S. 462
Shipwrecked; D..... 607
Shopping and shoppers; Dt..... 311
Short stories
"The Big Noise." B. Goodman; F..... 363
Shotwell, James T.
Working toward disarmament; S..... 112
Sibley, Frank P.
$10,000,000 verdict; S..... 726
Sikhs
Akali movement, an heroic epic. A. Smedley; S..... 15
Silence; D..... 607
Silver (as money). "Cartwheels"; EP..... 721
Simonds, Frank H.
Lossiemouth; S..... 330
Simone, Madame. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 527
Sinclair, Upton
Anti-La Follette arguments in California; C..... 496
Sinclair oil company
Sinclair vs. Standard oil in Russia. L. Fischer; S..... 138
Single tax
Help wanted. E. A. Carsey; C..... 601
Smedley, Agnes
Akali movement, an heroic epic; S..... 15
Smell. See also Odors
Smertenko, Johan J.
Critic criticized. E. B. Patton; C..... 681
Smith, Alfred E.
At the Democratic convention; EP..... 85
Campaign for governor; EP.....347, 507
Smith, Jessica
Fight against famine; S..... 570
Smith, Ninna May
If some grim tragedy; P..... 167
Smith, W. E.
Who has these letters? C..... 546
Smuts, Jan C. Defeated; EP..... 2
Snow, Wilbert
Taking away the banking; P..... 264
Sobel, Bernard
Does Mr. Mencken know? C..... 365
Somebody-Nothing. Criticism. O. Meyer; D.. 101
Songs. See also Negro songs
Sonnet. M. Luhrs; P..... 543
Sonnet to Minna. M. Bodenheim; P..... 467
Soule, George
Revolution, new style; S..... 93
South
Breaking political shackles; EP..... 555
South Africa
Defeat of Gen. Smuts; EP..... 2
General Hertzog's policy. M. B. D.; IS... 452
Population worries; EP..... 588
Southworth, Constant
Dawes plan, the knell of internationalism; C..... 494
Spain
Bandit caliph. E. Lengyel; IS..... 54
Dictator in difficulties; EP..... 86
Spelling at Boston university; EP..... 249
Speyer, Leonora
To a song of Sappho discovered in Egypt; P..... 596
Sport is elected; E..... 278
Springfield Republican
One hundredth birthday; EP..... 275
Stallings, Laurence, and M. Anderson
What price glory? Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D..... 316
Stamps. See Postage Stamps
Standard oil companies
La Follette and Standard oil. W. Hard; S..... 286
Sinclair vs. Standard oil in Russia. L. Fischer; S..... 138
Standard oil's death factory. M. Ross; S.. 561
Steam roller; D..... 607
Steamships and steamboats
Another good ship gone; E..... 109
Stern, Max
California supreme court does its bit; S... 491
Stone, Harlan F.
Department of justice; C..... 496
Stowe, Charles E.
California blues; C..... 97
Stowe, Charles Edward
We make him mad; C..... 338
Strasbourg university
Hurting France. H. W. L. Dana; C..... 145
Straus, Henrietta
American music via Europe; M..... 268
Feis Ceoil; M..... 550
Musicians militant; M..... 80
Strikes—Canada
Strike against the government. R. N. Baldwin; S..... 120
Strikes—U. S.
Paterson strikers; EP..... 430
Police strike and Coolidge; EP..... 481
Supreme court ruling; EP..... 154
Strong, Anna Louise
Get rich quick in Poland; IS..... 171
Sudan
England and Egypt in the Sudan; I..... 224
Sudan
What England wants in the Sudan; IP.... 688
Suicide
Divorces and suicides in Germany; IP.... 428
Sun Yat-sen; EP..... 456
Sund, E. H.
"Threat to the world"; C..... 263
Supreme court of the United States
Anti-trust law and strikes; EP..... 154
Coolidge's eulogy; EP..... 274
La Follette and the courts. E. Borchard; C..... 468
Mr. Davis on curbing court's power; EP.. 348
Our despotic courts; E..... 300
"Our despotic courts." F. Green; C..... 469
Sustenance. B. Deutsch; P..... 624
"Swashbuckling." R. H. Edwards; C..... 339
Sweden
Scandinavia moves to disarm; France takes alarm; IP..... 529
Sweeney, Charles Patrick. Obituary; EP.... 695
Switzerland
Border "free zones"; EP..... 666
France sets an example; I..... 690

T

Taggard, Genevieve
Memoir; P..... 635
Taking away the banking. W. Snow; P..... 264
Talmy, Leon
Russia's industrial progress; IS..... 582
Tammany hall
Plunkitt's way; E..... 591
Tariff commission. See United States—Tariff commission Taxation
Mellon's policies; EP..... 694
Taxation. See also Income tax
Taylor, William
Critic of La Follette; C..... 366
Teachers' union
Pedagogues in revolt; E..... 433
Teaching
As students see it; E..... 156
College lecture courses. M. P. Whitney; C. 469
Teapot Dome scandal
Indictments; EP..... 29
Teddy (steamship)
Saga of the S. S. Iceberg; E..... 206
Telephone
Why wasn't I born a judge? W. Waldron; C..... 366
Temperley, Harold; EP..... 721
Tetra-ethyl lead
Standard oil's death factory. M. Ross; S. 561
Textbooks
Schoolbooks and propaganda. R. O. Hughes; C..... 629
War in the textbooks; E..... 277
What your child learns. M. J. Herskovits and M. M. Willey; S..... 282
Theater—United States
Plea for revivals; EP..... 589
These United States
New Hampshire. R. D. Paine; S..... 183
Virginia. D. Freeman; S..... 68
These United States. For earlier articles see indexes to previous volumes
They knew what they wanted. S. Howard; D. 662
Thibault, Jacques Anatole. See France, Anatole
Thomas, David Y.
"Bigoted protestant?"; C..... 239
Thomas, Norman
Candidate for governor; EP..... 133
"Scouts with a difference"; C..... 680
Thoroughbreds; D..... 317
Tiger cats; D..... 527
To a song of Sappho. L. Speyer; P..... 596
To Lisa in summer. M. Eastman; P..... 635
To Morel. M. C. Percy; P..... 629
To W. E. Burghardt Du Bois. S. Middleton; P. 39
Toksvig, Frithjof
New life in the law; IS..... 716
Towner, R. H.
Sex equality of our ancestors; C..... 192
Trade union congress, 1924. H. J. Laski; IS. 345
Trade unions—Greece
Labor in Greece. G. Saranton; IS..... 197
Trade unions—United States
Are Negroes "workers"?; E..... 89
Revolution, new style. G. Soule; S..... 93
Supreme court on strikes; EP..... 154
Trade unions—United States. See also American federation of labor; Garment workers; Industrial workers of the world; United mine workers of America
Treat, Ida
Jaurès at the Pantheon; S..... 677
Tree-planting
In America and Europe; EP..... 203
Trotzky, Leon
Trotzky, down but not out. L. Fischer; IS..... 81
Trusts. See also Clayton anti-trust law
Truth and realism in literature. M. Bodenheim; S..... 373

Tunnels and tunneling
English Channel project; EP. 107
Turkey. See also Mosul

U

Unemployment—United States
Progress in insurance; EP. 612
Various reports; EP. 431
Unicorn
First glance. M. Van Doren; S. 602
Union of democratic control
Program of reconciliation; I. 150
United mine workers of America
Adult education in sub-district 5; EP. . . . 483
United States
America and peace. L. Holby; C. 74
United States—Army
It's a way we have in the army; E. 301
Officers or gentlemen?; E. 352
United States—Chemical warfare service
Patriotism that pays. W. Irwin; S. 513
United States—Congress
She does not list so much. W. Hard; S. . 545
United States—Courts. See Courts—United States
United States—Education. See Education—United States
United States—Federal farm loan bureau
Politicians betray the farmer. G. M. Shelby; S. 593
United States—Foreign relations
America's part in Europe; EP. 153
Bossing the Far East; I. 199
Control in Latin America; EP. 31
Government as debt collector; EP. 228
Japanese relations; EP. 107
La Follette's foreign policy; I. 476
Missionary protest. W. Woodward; C. . . . 217
New York World editorial; EP. 719
Nicaragua pecking the shell. W. Hard; S. 416
Parties and our foreign policy; E. 276
Roosevelt's "private papers"; EP. 173
Russian relations; EP. 57, 174
Victims of Persian mob; EP. 135
Withdrawal from Haiti demanded; EP. . . . 31
United States—Foreign relations. See also Haiti
United States—Justice department
Department of justice. H. F. Stone; C. . 496
United States—Navy
$110,000,000 for "modernization"; EP. . . . 693
"Theirs not to reason why"; E. 251
United States—Politics and government
Get out the issues!; E. 350
National village notelets. W. Hard; S. . . . 625
Politics and fundamentals; E. 615
Senator Borah's opportunity; E. 592
She does not list so much. W. Hard; S. 545
United States—President
Coolidge's message; EP. 665
United States—Supreme court. See Supreme court of the United States
United States—Tariff commission
Tariff commission scandal; E. 156
United States—Veterans' bureau
American legion charges; EP. 455
United States—War department
On women's organizations; EP. 2
United States Chamber of commerce
On the Progressives; EP. 588
Unknown critic. By Himself; S. 638
Untermyer, Samuel
Violation of Europe; I. 630

V

v. L., H.
Against blasphemy; C. 145
Vaerting, M.
Dominant sexes; S. 280
Vajda, Ernest
Grounds for divorce. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 393
Harem. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. . . . 686
Van Aver, Albert
La Follette in California; C. 165
Van Doren, Irita
Joins New York Herald Tribune; EP. . . . 228
Van Doren, Mark
First glance; S. 420, 446, 470, 497, 524, 547, 574, 602, 640, 682, 710, 732
Literary editor; EP. 228
van Loon, Hendrik Willem
Agony of the Democrats; S. 66
Incoming-tax on these foreigners; C. 522
Maccabees of 1924; S. 37
Us poor liberals; S. 7
Vasconcelos, José
Freedom or imperialism?; S. 212
Vienna
English for the Viennese. E. Lengyel; C. 600
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Henry Cabot Lodge, a scholar in politics; S. 539
Honest convention; S. 63
National Republican league letter; EP. . . . 429
Prairies catching fire; S. 412
Summing up the campaign; S. 461
Unconventional convention; S. 35
West, tamed and combed; S. 617
Wheeler invades New York; S. 303
Winning of the West; S. 435
Virgin Islands
Civil government bill; EP. 3
Virginia
Virginia, a gentle dominion. D. Freeman; S. 68
Voyages
Our own Vikings; E. 535

W

Wages—United States
Coolidge on cost of living and wages; EP. 247
Walden school
New education. A. De Lima; S. 116
Waldron, Webb
Why wasn't I born a judge?; C. 366
Waldstein, Ernst
Old immorals; C. 191
Wales, Edward Albert, Prince of. See Edward Albert, prince of Wales
Wallerstein, Bertha
Common clay; C. 48
Walsh, Thomas J.
Notification speech to Davis; EP. 201
Wanderer (bark); EP. 249
War
Admiral Rodgers's prediction; EP. 175
"Ain't goin' to study war no more"?; E. . 406
Business makes wars; EP. 532
Demand of the Christian century; EP. . . . 613
How to end war. W. E. Borah; IS. 738
Open letter to ex-soldiers. T. Q. Harrison; C. 709
Preparedness maniac again; E. 722
Revising the rules; EP. 298
Senator Borah's address; EP. 719
Shall we commit suicide? W. S. Churchill; IP. 608
War in the textbooks; E. 277
What every veteran knows. A. H. Gibbs; S. 537
War. See also National council for the prevention of war; Peace; Women's international league for peace and freedom
Warbasse, Agnes D.
Making cooperation succeed in America; S. 673
Warbasse, James P.
Baking your own bread; S. 163
Ward, May Williams
Gifts; P. 376
Warner, Arthur
La Follette in America; S. 214
La Follette in Washington; S. 180
La Follette in Wisconsin; S. 158
Warsaw
Departure. L. Lewisohn; S. 335
Washington (state)
Line-up in Washington state. J. N. Beffel; S. 492
Watson, Blanche
For Gandhi; C. 289
Way of the world. W. Congreve; D. 606
Weaver, James B.
General Weaver, young and old. C. Baldwin; C. 312
Weed, Helena Hill. Candidacy; EP. 508
Weeks, Ruth Mary
Rodeo emigrates; C. 288
Weinberger, Harry Financing freedom; C. 19
Welsh, Orville A.
Rhode Island's revolution; S. 14
West
West, tamed and combed. O. G. Villard; S. 617
West Virginia
Federal judge on Chafin case; EP. 612
Western union telegraph company; Dt. 708
Whalen, Grover A.
Radio control; S. 90
What price glory? M. Anderson and L. Stallings; D. 316
What price glory?
Officers or gentlemen?; E. 352
Wheeler, Burton K.
Nomination; EP. 105
What is Wheeler? R. A. Haste; S. 465
Wheeler and Bryan and Dawes. W. Hard; S. 111
Wheeler invades New York. O. G. Villard; S. 303
White, William Allen
Candidate for governor; EP. 322
Whitney, M. P.
College lecture courses; C. 469
Whittaker, Albert L.
Toward moral shipwreck; C. 365
Wieck, Agnes Burns
Mrs. Mason marches; S. 309
Wilbur, Curtis D.
San Francisco speech; EP. 322
Wild west shows
In England; EP. 87
Rodeo emigrates. R. M. Weeks; C. 288
Willey, Malcolm M., and M. J. Herskovits
What your child learns; S. 282
Wilson, Edmund
Murder in the Whistler room. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 474
Wind and the whirlwind. W. S. Blunt; P. . . . 626
Wisconsin
La Follette in Wisconsin. A. Warner; S. 158
Wisconsin and socialism. W. Hard; S. . . . 160
Wise. C. P. Cullen; P. 522
Wolf, Robert L.
Another dominant female; C. 339
Giddy; P. 124
Open ocean; P. 124
Wolfe, Bertram D.
Art and revolution in Mexico; S. 207
Wolff, Theodore
Anatole France again; E. 512
Woman
Man the creator. A. Goldenweiser; S. . . . 622
Men who understand women. F. G. Seabury; S. 516
Sex uproar. H. L. Mencken; S. 91
Virtue and women. I. Leavenworth; S. . 42
Where are the women geniuses? S. Kopald; S. 619
Women and the new morality. B. M. Hinkle; S. 541
Women—free for what? E. Muir; S. . . . 140
Woman. See also Married women
Woman—Employment
Parasites or partners. D. C. Shapiro; C. 191
Woman—Equal rights
Feminists must fight. C. Eastman; C. . . . 523
Historical parallels. F. Putnam; C. 123
Woman's party. See National woman's party
Women and politics
Here are ladies. E. Evans; S. 41
Mrs. Mason marches. A. B. Wieck; S. . . . 309
Women in the progressive movement. I. Kendig; S. 544
Women's bloc; E. 230
Women as musicians
Musicians militant. H. Straus; M. 80
Women's clubs
Bolshevik propagandists; EP. 2
Women's international league for peace and freedom
America and peace. L. Holby; C. 74
Woodward, William
Missionary protest; C. 217
Work; Dt. 338
Workers' education—United States
United mine workers' plan; EP. 483
Workers' education in the United States. A. J. Muste; 333
Workers' educational association
Coming of age celebration; EP. 202

Y

Young, Art
Cartoons. . . . 63, 64, 214, 253, 318, 328, 414, 415
Convention notes (cartoons). 40
Democrats all (cartoons)
Looking on (cartoons). 356
Young, Owen D.; EP. 693
Young, Stark
Saint. Criticism. J. W. Krutch; D. 474
Young America. F. Bradley; S. 336
Young women's Christian association
International migration service; EP. 457
Repudiates education week; EP. 532

Z

Zaghlul. See Saad Zaghlul
Zeppelins. See Airships
Ziang Sun Wan
Unto the least of these . . .; E. 459
Ziegfeld's follies; D. 552
Zinoviev, G.
Russia's harvest; I. 245
Zinoviev letter. See Russia—Foreign relations
Zionism
Departure. L. Lewisohn; S. 335
Palestine problem; IP. 345
Zueblin, Charles. Obituary; EP. 323

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Abbott, Frank Frost
Roman politics; B..... 388
Acropolis of Athens. M. Schede; AN..... 735
Adams, Bill
Fenceless meadows; AN..... 170
Adel. R. N. Coudenhove-Kalergi; B..... 22
Adler, Felix
Reconstruction of the spiritual ideal; B... 167
Agricultural crisis, 1920-1923. R. R. Enfield; B..... 420
Aksakov, Sergei Timofeievich
Chronicles of a Russian family; B..... 420
Albrecht, Arthur Emil
International seamen's union of America; AN..... 474
Aldington, Richard, compiler
Book of characters; B..... 420
Alexander, Ruth S.; R.....169, 548
Alie, Tant', of Transvaal, her diary; translated by E. Hobhouse; B..... 169
Allen, H. Warner. See Celestina
Allport, Floyd H.
Social psychology; B..... 127
Altgeld of Illinois. W. R. Browne; B..... 499
America. G. P. Krapp; AN..... 685
American colonies in the eighteenth century. H. L. Osgood; B..... 192
American democracy today. W. S. Myers; B.. 646
American problems. W. E. Borah; B..... 314
American revolution, George III and the. F. A. Mumby; B..... 192
American social history as recorded by British travelers. A. Nevins; B..... 264
Ancient rhetoric and poetic. C. S. Baldwin; AN..... 501
Anderson, Sherwood
Story teller's story; B..... 640
Andrews, Charles M.; R..... 192
Anglican church principles. F. J. F. Jackson; AN..... 659
Animal life in the Yosemite. J. Grinnel and T. I. Storer; B..... 470
Annin, Robert Edwards
Woodrow Wilson, a character study; B... 378
Anthony, Joseph, editor
Best news stories of 1923; B..... 422
Anthropology, travel and exploration. Sir R. Burton; B..... 643
Apes and angels. R. Connell; AN..... 343
Apple of the eye. G. Westcott; B.....654, 685
Arkell, Reginald, and R. Thorndike
Tragedy of Mr. Punch; AN..... 550
Arlen, Michael
Green hat; B..... 499
Arnold Waterlow. M. Sinclair; B..... 548
Art, History of. E. Faure; B..... 657
Aspects of the study of Roman history. T. S. Jerome; B..... 388
Asquith, Herbert Henry
Studies and sketches; B..... 314
Atkins, David
Economics of freedom; B..... 265
Auer, Leopold
My long life in music; B..... 195
Augustus Carp, Esq. By himself; AN..... 294
Author's Thames. G. S. Maxwell; AN..... 450
Autobiography of an idea. L. H. Sullivan; B. 147
Autocracy and revolution in Russia. Baron S. A. Korff; B..... 292
Awakening of Italy. L. Villari; B..... 652

B

Babbitt, Irving
Democracy and leadership; B..... 293
Bagesu and other tribes of the Uganda protectorate
Mackie ethnological expedition to Central Africa; B..... 100
Baldwin, Charles Sears
Ancient rhetoric and poetic; AN..... 501
Bandello
Tragical tales; AN..... 550
Bare souls. G. Bradford; B..... 500
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R.....378, 646
Bartlett, F. C.
Psychology and primitive culture; B..... 51
Bashan and I. T. Mann; AN..... 474
Battle of Alcazar. W. W. Greg; B..... 219
Beauty, truth and humour. H. C. Duffin; B. 168
Beer, Thomas
Sandoval; B..... 125
Before the mast and after. Sir W. Runciman; B..... 242
Belloc, Hilaire
Contrast; B..... 264
Benedict, Ruth; R..... 51
Bercovici, Konrad; R..... 386
Beresford, John
Gossip of the 17th and 18th centuries; AN..... 450
Beresford, John, editor
Diary of a country parson; AN..... 527
Best news stories of 1923. J. Anthony, editor; B..... 422
Best short stories of 1923. E. J. O'Brien, editor; B..... 240
Bianchi, Martha Dickinson
Life and letters of Emily Dickinson; B.. 376
Bible. Thomas Jefferson Bible; B..... 170
Das bilderbuch meiner jugend. H. Sudermann; B..... 170
Binkley, Robert C., and M. W. Malbone, jr.
New governments of Central Europe; B..... 315
Birrell, Augustine
More obiter dicta; AN..... 527
Bizzell, William Bennett
Rural Texas; B..... 53
Blankenhorn, Heber
Strike for union; B..... 99
Blanshard, Paul
Outline of the British labor movement; B. 448
Bogardus, Emory S.
Fundamentals of social psychology; AN.. 527
Book of characters. R. Aldington, compiler; B..... 420
Borah, William E.
American problems; B..... 314
Boswell's journal of a tour to the Hebrides; AN..... 734
Botha, General. E. Buxton; B..... 548
Boy in the bush. D. H. Lawrence and M. L. Skinner; B..... 710
Boyd, Ernest
Portraits, real and imaginary; B..... 574
Boyd, Ernest; R..... 266
Boyson, V. F.
Falkland Islands; AN..... 659
Bradford, Gamaliel
Bare souls; B..... 500
Brandes, Georg
Wolfgang Goethe; B..... 647
Brandon, Dorothy
Outsider; AN..... 343
Braybrooke, Richard Lord, editor
Diary of Samuel Pepys; AN..... 735
Brewster, Dorothy; R..... 712
British labor movement. P. Blanshard; B.... 448
Bromfield, Louis
Green bay tree; B..... 78
Brooks, Charles Franklin, and others
Why the weather?; AN..... 501
Brothers of no kin. C. Richter; B..... 240
Brown, Abbie Farwell
Boyhood of Edward MacDowell; B..... 341
Brown, Irving
Gypsy fires in America; B..... 547
Browne, Lewis; R..... 170
Browne, Waldo R.
Altgeld of Illinois; B..... 499
Burrell, Angus; R..... 548
Burton, Sir Richard
Selected papers on anthropology, travel and exploration; B..... 643
Bushrangers. C. J. Finger; AN..... 713
Butterfield, H.
Historical novel; B..... 473
Buxton, Earl
General Botha; B..... 548
Byron and Greece. H. Spender; B..... 149
Byron in England. S. F. Wicks; B..... 50
Byron, Political career of. D. N. Raymond; B..... 50
Byron, the last journey. H. Nicolson; B..... 149

C

Cabell, James Branch
From the hidden way; B..... 470
Straws and prayer-books; B..... 470
Cadman, S. Parkes
Christianity and the state; AN..... 393
Cannan, Gilbert
Sembal; B..... 21
Carlyle and Mill. E. Neff; B..... 382
Carson, Gerald Hewes; R.....79, 169, 342
Carter, Huntly
New theatre and cinema of soviet Russia; B..... 53
Cayrou, G.
Le français classique; AN..... 128
Celestina; translated by J. Mabbe, edited by H. W. Allen; B..... 148
Chambers, E. K.
Elizabethan stage; B..... 219
Chance, love and logic. C. S. Peirce; B..... 498
Changing conceptions in Jewish education. E. Gamoran; B..... 98
Chase, Daniel
Middle passage; AN..... 170
Chase, Stuart; R.....99, 148, 734
Cheat-the-boys. E. Phillpotts; AN..... 343
Chekhov, Anton
Letters on the short story, the drama, and other literary topics; B..... 652
Cheney, Sheldon
Primer of modern art; B.....
Chesterton, Gilbert K.
Fancies versus fads; B..... 342
Chew, Samuel C.
Byron in England; B..... 50
Chew, Samuel C.; R.....149, 219, 645
Chills and fever. J. C. Ransom; B..... 446
Christianity and the state. S. P. Cadman; AN..... 393
Chronicles of a Russian family. S. T. Aksakov; B..... 420
Clark, Emily; R..... 147
Clemens, Samuel Langhorne
Autobiography; B..... 524
Coal industry. A. T. Shurick; B..... 472
Coasts of illusion. C. B. Firestone; B..... 602
Cobb of "The World." J. L. Heaton, editor; B..... 711
Cody, Sherwin
Poe: man, poet and creative thinker; AN. 450
Collins, Dale
Ordeal; B..... 449
Collins, Frederick L.
Our American kings; AN..... 474
Collins, Joseph
Taking the literary pulse; B..... 472
Colum, Padraic
Island of the mighty; B..... 660
Columbia university
Copy 1924; B..... 79
Columbus, Christopher
Journal of first voyage to America; B.. 193
Come, let us walk together. G. Heatter; AN.. 149
Comments and impressions. H. Ellis; B..... 640
Common sense of music. S. Spaeth; AN.... 605
Commons, John R.
Legal foundations of capitalism; B..... 315
Conceited count. Destouches, P. N.; AN.... 316
Confusion. J. G. Cozzens; B..... 100
Conkling, Hilda
Silverhorn; B..... 660
Connell, Richard
Apes and angels; AN..... 343
Constant, Benjamin. E. W. Schermerhorn; B..... 712
Contemporary criticisms of Dr. Samuel Johnson. J. K. Spittals, editor; B..... 525 Contemporary drama of Russia. L. Wiener; B..... 576
Contrast. H. Belloc; B..... 264
Conversations in Ebury street. G. Moore; B. 645
Cooke, Sidney Russell, and E. H. Davenport
Oil trusts and Anglo-American relations; B..... 20
Copy 1924. Columbia university; B..... 79
Corbeau, Adrien Le. See Le Corbeau, Adrien
Coss, John Jacob
Autobiography of J. S. Mill; AN..... 685
Coudenhove-Kalergi, Richard N.
Adel; B..... 22
Krise der weltanschauung; B..... 22
Pan-Europa; B..... 22
Country people. R. Suckow; B..... 194
Coupland, R.
Wilberforce; B..... 683
Cozzens, James Gould
Confusion; B..... 100
Crane, Frank
Why I am a Christian; B..... 526
Crane, Nathalia
Janitor's boy; B..... 660
Crapsey, Algernon S.
Last of the heretics; B..... 342
Craven, Thomas; R.....99, 290
Critical ventures in modern French literature. A. Whitridge; B..... 241
Croly, Herbert
Willard Straight; B..... 471
Culture and democracy in the United States. H. M. Kallen; B..... 146
Cyrano de Bergerac, Savinien
Voyages to the moon and the sun; AN.. 316

D

D., H.
Heliodora and other poems; B..... 526
D'Angelo, Pascal
Pascal D'Angelo, son of Italy; B..... 682
Dark, Sidney, and R. Grey
W. S. Gilbert, his life and letters; B.... 98
Daumier. R. Escholier; B..... 79
Davenport, E. H., and S. R. Cooke
Oil trusts and Anglo-American relations; B..... 20
Davidson, Laura Lee
Isles of Eden; B..... 470
Davis, Elmer
I'll show you the town; AN..... 242
Davis, Jefferson. H. J. Eckenrode; B..... 126
Days of delusion. C. E. Sears; B..... 22
Dell, Floyd
Looking at life; B..... 472
Democracy and leadership. I. Babbitt; B.... 293
Dennis, Alfred L. P.
Foreign policies of soviet Russia; B..... 575
Dennis, Charles H.
Eugene Field's creative years; B..... 650
Depths of the universe. G. E. Hale; AN.... 501
De Silver, Albert; R..... 267
Destino de un continente. M. Ugarte; B..... 52
Destouches, Philippe Néricault
Conceited count; AN..... 316
Diary of a country parson. J. Woodforde; AN..... 527
Dibble, R. F.; R.....500, 682

Dick, H. K.; R..... 98
Dickens, Charles, Critical studies of the works of. G. Gissing; AN..... 550
Dickinson, Emily
Complete poems; B..... 376
Dickinson, Emily, Life and letters of. M. D. Bianchi; B..... 376
Dobie, Frank, editor
Legends of Texas; B..... 710
Doctor Dolittle's circus. H. Lofting; B..... 660
Dodd, William E.; R..... 126
Douglas, A. Donald; R....473, 603, 656, 662, 734
Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan
Memories and adventures; B..... 682
Drake, William A.; R..... 241
Dram-shop. E. Zola; AN..... 734
Dream. H. G. Wells; B..... 21
Du Bois, W. E. Burghardt; R..... 267
Duffin, Henry Charles
Beauty, truth and humour; B..... 168

E

East window and the car window. B. L. Taylor; B..... 168
Eaton, Richard
Under the red flag; AN..... 578
Eckenrode, H. J.
Jefferson Davis, President of the South; B..... 126
Economics of freedom. D. Atkins; B..... 265
Edman, Irwin; R.....384, 526, 641
Education of Ernest Wilmerding. E. C. Wentworth; AN..... 24
Elephant man. Sir F. Treves; B..... 240
Eliot, T. S.
Homage to John Dryden; B..... 732
Elizabethan stage. E. K. Chambers; B..... 219
Elizabethan stage abridgments. W. W. Greg; B..... 219
Ellis, Havelock
Comments and impressions; B..... 640
Enfield, R. R.
Agricultural crisis, 1920-1923; B..... 420
England's Labour rulers. Iconoclast; B..... 49
Epic of the beast; AN..... 550
Erskine, John; R..... 341
Escholier, Raymond
Daumier; B..... 79
Espina, Concha
Mariflor; B..... 168
Red beacon; B..... 168
Ethics of opium. E. N. La Motte; B..... 23
Eulenspiegel, Till
Master Tyll Owlglass; AN..... 316
Expansion of Europe. R. Muir; B..... 220

F

Fabulous forties. M. Minnigerode; AN..... 343
Fadiman, Clifton P.; R..... 524
Falkland Islands. V. F. Boyson; AN..... 659
Fancies versus fads. G. K. Chesterton; B.... 342
Farrar, John, editor
Literary spotlight; B..... 574
Faure, Elie
History of art; B..... 657
Feats on the fiord. H. Martineau; B..... 660
Felsenthal, Bernard, teacher in Israel. E. Felsenthal; B..... 98
Felsenthal, Emma
Bernard Felsenthal, teacher in Israel; B. 98
Fenceless meadows. B. Adams; AN..... 170
Fichter, W. L.; R..... 683
Field, Eugene. Eugene Field's creative years. C. H. Dennis; B..... 650
Figures in modern literature. J. B. Priestley; AN..... 578
Finck, Henry T.; R..... 292
Finger, Charles J.
Bushrangers; AN..... 713
Tales from silver lands; B..... 660
Fire in the flint. W. F. White; B..... 386
Firestone, Clark B.
Coasts of illusion; B..... 602
Flower, Newman
George Frederick Handel; B..... 390
Footlights and spotlights. O. Skinner; AN.. 450
Ford, Ford Madox
Some do not; B..... 734
Foreign policies of soviet Russia. A. L. P. Dennis; B..... 575
Forest giant. A. Le Corbeau; AN..... 423
Forster, E. M.
Passage to India; B..... 379
Fox, Dixon Ryan
Herbert Levi Osgood, an American scholar; B..... 192
Fox's paw. R. Pérez de Ayala; B..... 683
Le français classique. G. Cayrou; AN..... 128
France, Anatole
Latin genius; B..... 220
France, Anatole. L. May; B..... 497
Francke, Kuno; R..... 421
Frank, Tenney; R.....388, 652
Fraycar's fist. M. H. Vorse; B..... 265
French comedies of the XVIIIth century. J. F. Regnard and others; AN..... 316
Frey, Carroll
Bibliography of the writings of H. L. Mencken; AN..... 501
Friendship of God. A. M. Royden; B..... 602
Fripp, Edgar I.
Master Richard Quyny; AN..... 501
From the hidden way. J. B. Cabell; B..... 470
Fuller, Henry B.; R..... 650
Fundamentals of social psychology. E. S. Bogardus; AN..... 527

G

Galsworthy, John
White monkey; B..... 603
Game of love and chance. P. C. de C. de Marivaux; AN..... 316
Gamoran, Emanuel
Changing conceptions in Jewish education; B..... 98
Gannett, Lewis S.; R.....20, 148, 380, 711
Gaus, John M.; R..... 125
Gentle reactions. G. Wells; B..... 473
Genzmer, George; R..... 647
George III and the American revolution. F. A. Mumby; B..... 192
Germinal. E. Zola; AN..... 734
Gesta Romanorum; B..... 420
Gilbert, Clinton W.
You takes your choice; AN..... 474
Gilbert, W. S., his life and letters. S. Dark, and R. Grey; B..... 98
Gissing, George
Critical studies of the works of Charles Dickens; AN..... 550
Goethe. H. G. Gräf; B..... 421
Goethe, Wolfgang. G. Brandes; B..... 647
Gold. J. Wassermann; B..... 218
Goldenweiser, Alexander; R....124, 500, 644, 733 Goldschmidt, Richard
Mechanism and physiology of sex determination; B..... 340
Gorki, Maxim
Judge; AN..... 577
Goslings. U. Sinclair; B..... 340
Gossip of the 17th and 18th centuries. J. Beresford; AN..... 450
Gräf, Hans Gerhard
Goethe; skizzen zu des dichters leben und werken; B..... 421
Graham, Malbone W., Jr., and R. C. Binkley
New governments of Central Europe;; B.. 315
Grattan, C. Hartley; R.....193, 293, 340, 525
Greek anthology; AN..... 550
Greek black-figured vases. J. C. Hoppin; B... 390
Greek life and thought. L. Van Hook; B.... 447
Green bay tree. L. Bromfield; B..... 78
Green hat. M. Arlen; B..... 499
Greg, W. W.
Two Elizabethan stage abridgments; Battle of Alcazar and Orlando Furioso; B.. 219
Grey, Rowland, and S. Dark
W. S. Gilbert, his life and letters; B..... 98
Grinnell, Joseph, and T. I. Storer
Animal life in the Yosemite; B..... 470
Gruening, Ernest H.; R.....19, 314
Gruening, Martha; R..... 684
Gusev, Sergey Ivanovich
Land of the fathers; B..... 712
Gypsies. C. G. Leland; B..... 547
Gypsy fires in America. I. Brown; B..... 547

H

Hale, George Ellery
Depths of the universe; AN..... 501
Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner; R..... 604
Hammond, J. L. and Barbara
Lord Shaftesbury; B..... 291
Handel, George Frederick. N. Flower; B..... 390
Hansen, Henry; R.....147, 422, 640
Happy traveller. F. Tatchell; AN..... 149
Harrison, Hubert; R..... 78
Harzberg, Hiler, and A. Moss
Slapstick and dumbbell; AN..... 550
Haynes, Fred E.
Social politics in the United States; AN.. 550
Heaton, John L., editor
Cobb of "The World"; B..... 711
Heatter, Gabriel
Come, let us walk together; AN..... 149
Hebrides. Johnson's journey to the western islands of Scotland; AN..... 734
Heir. V. Sackville-West; B..... 240
Heliodora and other poems. H. D.; B..... 526
Hero of the Filipinos. C. E. Russell and E. B. Rodriguez; B..... 77
Herskovits, Melville J.; R..... 100
Hespelt, Ernest Herman; R..... 195
Hewett-Thayer, Harvey
Modern German novel; B..... 473
Hewlett, Maurice
Last essays; B..... 169
Historical novel. H. Butterfield; B..... 473
History of art. E. Faure; B..... 657
Hodgetts, E. A. Brayley
Moss from a rolling stone; AN..... 605
Homage to John Dryden. T. S. Eliot; B..... 732
Hooker, Richard
Story of an independent newspaper; B.... 386
Hoppin, Joseph Clark
Greek black-figured vases, with a chapter on the red-figured southern Italian vases; B..... 390
Horwill, Herbert W.; R.....314, 448
Houdini, Harry
Magician among the spirits; B..... 682
House, Roy Temple; R.....170, 448
Huddleston, Sisley
Those Europeans; B..... 605
Hulme, T. E.
Speculations; AN..... 343
Hurley, Frank
Pearls and savages; B..... 500
Huxley, Aldous
Young Archimedes; B..... 499
Huysmans, J. K.
Oblate; B..... 575

I

Iconoclast
England's Labour rulers; B..... 49
J. Ramsay MacDonald; B..... 49
I'll show you the town. E. Davis; AN..... 242
Imaginary lives. M. Schwob; B..... 500
Industrial worker, 1840-1860. N. Ware; B.... 549
Inge, W. R.
Personal religion and the life of devotion; B 602
Inigo Sandys. E. B. C. Jones; B..... 125
International seamen's union of America. A. E. Albrecht; AN..... 474
Irresistible movement of democracy. J. S. Penman; B..... 78
Island of the mighty. P. Colum; B..... 660
Isles of Eden. L. L. Davidson; B..... 470

J

Jacks, L. P.
Living universe; B..... 167
Lost radiance of Christianity; B..... 167
Realities and shams; AN..... 24
Jackson, F. J. Foakes
Anglican church principles; AN..... 659
Janitor's boy. N. Crane; B..... 660
Jastrow, Joseph; R.....24, 498
Jerome, Thomas Spencer
Aspects of the study of Roman history; B. 388
Jespersen, Otto
Philosophy of grammar; B..... 647
Jessen, Sydney
Die weltinteressen der englischen petroleumindustrie; B..... 20
Jeudwine, J. W.
Studies in empire and trade; B..... 220
Jewish education, Changing conceptions in. E. Gamoran; B..... 98
Jews. Patriotism of the American Jew. S. W. McCall; B..... 98
Johnson, Samuel. Contemporary criticisms. J. K. Spittals, editor; B..... 525
Johnson, Samuel
Johnson's journey to the western islands of Scotland and Boswell's Journal of a tour to the Hebrides; AN..... 734
Johnston, H. H.; R..... 643
Joint committee on preventing delinquency
Three problem children; AN..... 392
Jones, E. B. C.
Inigo Sandys; B..... 125
Jornadas triunfales de un golpe de estado. R. Martínez de la Riva; B..... 448
Josslyn. H. J. Smith; AN..... 221
Judge! M. Gorki; AN..... 577

K

Kalaw, Maximo M.; R..... 77
Kalergi, Richard N. Coudenhove-. See Coudenhove-Kalergi, Richard N.
Kallas, Aino
White ship; Esthonian tales; B..... 194
Kallen, Horace M.
Culture and democracy in the U. S.; B.... 146
Kent, Rockwell
Voyaging; B..... 684
Kern, Robert
Super-city; B..... 734
King, Henry Churchill
Seeing life whole; B..... 167
Klenze, Camillo von; R..... 647
Klingberg, Frank J.; R..... 683
Korff, Sergiei A., baron
Autocracy and revolution in Russia; B.... 292
Krapp, George Philip
America; AN..... 685
Krise der weltanschauung. R. N. Coudenhove-Kalergi; B..... 22
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R....21, 51, 125, 194, 218, 241, 382, 447, 499, 575, 644, 710

L

La que no perdonó. H. Wast; B..... 195
La Motte, Ellen N.
Ethics of opium; B..... 23
Land of the fathers. S. I. Gusev; B..... 712
Lane, Winthrop D.; R.....194, 472
Larsen, J. Anker
Philosopher's stone; B..... 51
Laski, Harold J.
Autobiography of J. S. Mill; AN..... 685
Last of the heretics. A. S. Crapsey; B..... 342
Latin genius. A. France; B..... 220
Latitudes. E. Muir; B..... 472
La Tramerye, Pierre l'Espagnol de
World struggle for oil; B..... 20
Lawrence, D. H., and M. L. Skinner
Boy in the bush; B..... 710
Leaves from a Russian diary. P. Sorokin; B.. 577
Le Corbeau, Adrien
Forest giant; AN..... 423
Lee, Rose; R..... 449
Legal foundations of capitalism. J. R. Commons; B..... 315

Legends of Texas. F. Dobie, editor; B..... 710
Leland, Charles Godfrey
Gypsies; B..... 547
Lengyel, Emil; R.....292, 315, 525
Lenotre, G.
Two royalist spies of the French revolution; B..... 422
Leonard, William Ellery; R..... 50
Lesage, Alain René
Turcaret or the Financier; AN..... 316
Letters on the short story, the drama, and other literary topics. A. Chekhov; B..... 652
Lettres à un ami. A. Ribot; B..... 148
Lewisohn, Ludwig; R..... 22
Lilienthal, David E.; R.....315, 499
Lindeman, E. C.; R..... 53
Literary spotlight. J. Farrar, editor; B..... 574
Little French girl. A. D. Sedgwick; B..... 447
Living universe. L. P. Jacks; B..... 167
Lofting, Hugh
Doctor Dolittle's circus; B..... 660
Porridge poetry; B..... 660
Logic of conduct. J. MacKaye; B..... 128
London adventure. A. Machen; AN..... 501
London school of economics
Yea and nay; AN..... 392
Long, Clarence R.; R..... 343
Looking at life. F. Dell; B..... 472
Lost radiance of Christianity. L. P. Jacks; B. 167
Lottery. W. E. Woodward; B..... 575
Love days. H. Waste; AN..... 242
Lowie, Robert H.
Primitive religion; B..... 733
Lubin, Isador
Miners' wages and the cost of coal; B.... 194
Lutoslawski, Wincenty
World of souls; B..... 549
Lynch, Bohun
Perfect day; AN..... 170
Lynch, Frederick, editor
Mobilizing for peace; AN..... 713
Lynd, Robert
Solomon in all his glory; B..... 342

M

Mabbe, James. See Celestina
MacAlarney, Robert Emmet; R..... 422
McCall, Samuel Walker
Patriotism of the American Jew; B..... 98
MacDonald, J. Ramsay
Margaret Ethel MacDonald; B..... 49
MacDonald, J. Ramsay. Iconoclast; B..... 49
MacDonald, Margaret Ethel. J. R. MacDonald; B..... 49
MacDonald, William; R..... 547
MacDowell, E. Carleton; R..... 340
MacDowell, Edward, Boyhood of. A. F. Brown; B..... 341
Machen, Arthur
London adventure; AN..... 501
MacKaye, James
Logic of conduct; B..... 128
Mackenzie, Compton
Parson's progress; AN..... 221
Mackie ethnological expedition to Central Africa. Bagesu and other tribes of the Uganda protectorate; B..... 100
Madagascar. C. S. Osborn; B..... 124
Magician among the spirits. H. Houdini; B... 682
Mancroft essays. A. M. Samuel; B..... 168
Manin and the Venetian revolution. G. M. Trevelyan; B..... 77
Mann, Thomas
Bashan and I; AN..... 474
Mariflor. C. Espina; B..... 168
Marivaux, Pierre Carlet de Chamblain de
Game of love and chance; AN..... 316
Mark only. T. F. Powys; B..... 524
Marquis, Don, and C. Morley
Pandora lifts the lid; AN..... 293
Martin, Helen R.
Snob; B..... 127
Martineau, Harriet
Feats on the fiord; B..... 660
Martínez de la Riva, Ramón
Las jornadas triunfales de un golpe de estado; B..... 448
Master Richard Quyny. E. I. Fripp; AN..... 501
Master Tyll Owlglass. T. Eulenspiegel; AN... 316
Masters, Edgar Lee
New Spoon River; B..... 388
Maxwell, Gordon S.
Author's Thames; AN..... 450
Maxwell, Marius
Stalking big game with a camera in equatorial Africa; AN..... 550
May, Lewis
Anatole France, the man and his work; B 497
Mechanism and physiology of sex determination. R. Goldschmidt; B..... 340
Mediterranean races. M. I. Newbegin; B..... 642
Memories and adventures. Sir A. C. Doyle; B. 682
Mencken, H. L. Bibliography. C. Frey; AN.. 501
Mencken, Henry L.; R..... 290
Meyers, James
Representative government in industry; B.. 148
Michel, Friedrich
Deutsche und englische gedichte; AN..... 24
Middle passage. D. Chase; AN..... 170
Middleton, John
Wrap me up in my Aubusson carpet; B... 645
Mill, John Stuart
Autobiography; AN..... 685
Carlyle and Mill. E. Neff; B..... 382
Miners' wages and the cost of coal. I. Lubin; B 194
Minnigerode, Meade
Fabulous forties; AN..... 343
Mobilizing for peace. F. Lynch, editor; AN.. 713
Modern essays. C. Morley; B..... 168
Modern German novel. H. Hewett-Thayer; B.. 473
Modern thinkers and present problems. E. A. Singer; B..... 384
Montenegro, E.; R..... 52
Moods of earth and sky. E. L. G. Watson; B.. 470
Moore, George
Conversations in Ebury street; B..... 645
Moore, George, editor
Pure poetry; B..... 645
Moore, Harry H.
Public health in the United States; AN.... 393
More obiter dicta. A. Birrell; AN..... 527
Moritz, Carl Philipp
Travels in England in 1782; AN..... 735
Morley, Christopher
Modern essays. Second series; B..... 168
Morley, Christopher, and D. Marquis
Pandora lifts the lid; AN..... 293
Moskowitz, Henry
Alfred E. Smith; B..... 19
Moss, Arthur, and H. Harzberg
Slapstick and dumbbell; AN..... 550
Moss, Arthur; R..... 53
Moss from a rolling stone. E. A. B. Hodgetts; AN..... 605
Muir, Edwin
Latitudes; B..... 472
Muir, Edwin; R..... 379
Muir, Ramsay
Expansion of Europe; B..... 220
Mukerji, Dhan Gopal
My brother's face; AN..... 713
Mullin, Glen; R..... 684
Mumby, Frank Arthur
George III and the American revolution; B 192
Mumford, Lewis
Sticks and stones; B..... 604
Munro, Thomas; R..... 657
Munro, William Bennett
Personality in politics; B..... 547
Music and mind. T. H. Y. Trotter; B..... 292
Mussey, Henry Raymond; R.....265, 382, 549
My brother's face. D. G. Mukerji; AN..... 713
My dear Cornelia. S. P. Sherman; B..... 641
My long life in music. L. Auer; B..... 195
Myers, William Starr
American democracy today; B..... 646

N

Nearing, Scott
Oil and the germs of war; B..... 20
Neff, Emery
Carlyle and Mill; B..... 382
Negro from Africa to America. W. D. Weatherford; B..... 267
Neilson, Francis
Strong man's house; AN..... 685
Nevins, Allan
American social history as recorded by British travellers; B..... 264
New encyclopedia of music and musicians; B.. 449
New governments of central Europe. M. W. Graham, Jr., and R. C. Binkley; B..... 315
New Spoon River. E. L. Masters; B..... 388
New theatre and cinema of soviet Russia. H. Carter; B..... 53
Newbegin, Marion I.
Mediterranean races; B..... 642
Newman, Ernest
Wagner as man and artist; B..... 656
Newman, Frances
Short story's mutations; B..... 711
Nicolson, Harold
Byron, the last journey; B..... 149
Novel, Historical. H. Butterfield; B..... 473
Novel, Modern German. H. Hewett-Thayer; B 473
Novel, Political. M. E. Speare; B..... 473
Now that I'm fifty. A. P. Terhune; B..... 168
Number two Joy street; B..... 660

O

Oblate. J. K. Huysmans; B..... 575
O'Brien, Edward J., editor
Best short stories of 1923; B..... 240
Ogburn, William Fielding
Social change; B..... 125
Oil and the germs of war. S. Nearing; B..... 20
Oil trusts and Anglo-American relations. E. H. Davenport and S. R. Cooke; B..... 20
Ordeal. D. Collins; B..... 449
Orenburgsky, Sergey Gussiev, pseud. See Gusev, S. I.
Orlando Furioso. W. W. Greg; B..... 219
Osborn, Chase Salmon
Madagascar, land of the man-eating tree; B 124
Osgood, Herbert Levi
American colonies in the eighteenth century; B..... 192
Osgood, Herbert Levi. D. R. Fox; B..... 192
Our American kings. F. L. Collins; AN..... 474
Outsider. J. Sutherland; AN..... 343
Overstreet, H. A.; R..... 167
Ovid. P. Ovidi Nasonis Tristium liber secundus; AN..... 734

P

Pan-Europa. R. N. Coudenhove-Kalergi; B... 22
Pandora lifts the lid. C. Morley and D. Marquis; AN..... 293
Parker, Cornelia Stratton
Ports and happy places; B..... 684
Parker, E. H.
Thousand years of the Tartars; B..... 525
Parks, Leighton
What is modernism?; AN..... 128
Parsons, Alice Beal; R.....78, 127, 265
Parson's progress. C. Mackenzie; AN..... 221
Passage to India. E. M. Forster; B..... 379
Patriotism of the American Jew. S. W. McCall; B..... 98
Pearls & pepper. R. P. Utter; B..... 168
Pearls and savages. F. Hurley; B..... 500
Peffer, Nathaniel; R..... 471
Peirce, Charles S.
Chance, love and logic; B..... 498
Penman, John Simpson
Irresistible movement of democracy; B.... 78
Penzer, N. M., editor
Selected papers on anthropology, travel and exploration. Sir R. Burton; B..... 643
Pepys, Samuel
Diary; AN..... 735
Pérez de Ayala, Ramón
Fox's paw; B..... 683
Perfect day. B. Lynch; AN..... 170
Personal religion and the life of devotion. W. R. Inge; B..... 602
Personality in politics. W. B. Munro; B..... 547
Petroleumindustrie, Die weltinteressen der englischen. S. Jessen; B..... 20
Phillpotts, Eden
Cheat-the-boys; AN..... 343
Philosopher's stone. J. A. Larsen; B..... 51
Philosophy of grammar. O. Jespersen; B..... 647
Pleasure and behavior. F. L. Wells; B..... 449
Plumes. L. Stallings; B..... 644
Poe; man, poet and creative thinker. S. Cody; AN..... 450
Poetry of architecture. F. Rutter; AN..... 423
Poets of the Greek anthology; AN..... 550
Points of view. S. P. Sherman; B..... 641
Political career of Lord Byron. D. N. Raymond; B..... 50
Political novel. M. E. Speare; B..... 473
Politics, the citizen's business. W. A. White; B 547
Pollard, A. W., and others
Shakespeare's hand in the Play of Sir Thomas More; B..... 219
Porridge poetry. H. Lofting; B..... 660
Porter, Stephen G.; R..... 23
Portraits, real and imaginary. E. Boyd; B.... 574
Ports and happy places. C. S. Parker; B..... 684
Powys, Llewelyn; R..... 76
Powys, T. F.
Mark only; B..... 524
Pratt, Waldo Selden, editor
New encyclopedia of music and musicians; B..... 449
Preuss, Arthur
Dictionary of secret and other societies; B 290
Price, Lucien; R..... 220
Priestley, J. B.
Figures in modern literature; AN..... 578
Primer of modern art. S. Cheney; B..... 99
Primitive religion. R. H. Lowie; B..... 733
Principles of journalism. C. S. Yost; AN..... 242
Proust, Marcel
Within a budding grove; B..... 266
Psychology and primitive culture. F. C. Bartlett; B..... 51
Psychology of reasoning. E. Rignano; B..... 24
Public health in the United States. H. H. Moore; AN..... 393
Pure poetry. G. Moore, editor; B..... 645

R

Racial realities in Europe. L. Stoddard; B.... 642
Ransom, John Crowe
Chills and fever; B..... 446
Raymond, Dora Neill
Political career of Lord Byron; B..... 50
Realities and shams. L. P. Jacks; AN..... 24
Recht, Charles
Rue with a difference; B..... 382
Recht, Charles; R..... 577
Reconstruction of the spiritual ideal. F. Adler; B..... 167
Red beacon. C. Espina; B..... 168
Red-figured southern Italian vases. J. C. Hoppin; B..... 390
Redfield, William C.
With congress and cabinet; B..... 378
Regnard, Jean F.
Residuary legatee; AN..... 316
Regnard, Jean F., and others
French comedies of the XVIIIth century; AN..... 316
Repplier, Agnes
Under dispute; B..... 76
Representative government in industry; J. Meyers; B..... 148
Residuary legatee. J. F. Regnard; AN..... 316
Ribot, Alexandre
Lettres à un ami; B..... 148
Richmond, its people and its story. M. N. Stanard; B..... 147

Richter, Conrad
Brothers of no kin; B..... 240
Richter, Gisela M. A.; R..... 390
Rickword, Edgell
Rimbaud, the boy and the poet; B..... 682
Rignano, Eugenio
Psychology of reasoning; B..... 24
Riley, Woodbridge; R.....22, 264
Rimbaud, the boy and the poet. E. Rickword; B..... 682
Rise of the Greek epic; AN..... 735
Rivers, W. H. R.
Social organization; B..... 644
Rizal. Hero of the Filipinos. C. E. Russell and E. B. Rodriguez; B..... 77
Rodriguez, E. B., and C. E. Russell
Hero of the Filipinos; B..... 77
Rogers, Leigh
Wine of fury; AN..... 221
Roman history, Aspects of the study of. T. S. Jerome; B..... 388
Roman politics. F. F. Abbott; B..... 388
Ronsard, Pierre de
Songs and sonnets; AN..... 735
Royden, A. Maude
Friendship of God; B..... 602
Rue with a difference. C. Recht; B..... 382
Ruhl, Arthur; R..... 605
Runciman, Sir Walter
Before the mast and after; B..... 242
Rural Texas. W. B. Bizzell; B..... 53
Russell, Charles, and E. B. Rodriguez
Hero of the Filipinos; B..... 77
Russia, Contemporary drama of. L. Wiener; B 576
Russia, New theatre and cinema of. H. Carter; B..... 73
Rutter, Frank
Poetry of architecture; AN..... 423

S

Sackville-West, V.
Heir; B..... 240
Sailors' union of the Pacific. P. S. Taylor; AN 474
Samuel, Arthur Michael
Mancroft essays; B..... 168
Sandoval. T. Beer; B..... 125
Sarg, Tony
Book for children; B..... 660
Schede, M.
Acropolis of Athens; AN..... 735
Scheifley, William H.; R..... 79
Schelling, Felix E.
Summer ghosts and winter topics; B..... 168
Schermerhorn, Elizabeth W.
Benjamin Constant; B..... 712
Schwob, Marcel
Imaginary lives; B..... 500
Scott, Temple; R..... 473
Sears, Clara Endicott
Days of delusion; B..... 22
Secret and other societies. A. Preuss; B.... 290
Sedgwick, Anne Douglas
Little French girl; B..... 447
Seeing life whole. H. C. King; B..... 167
Seldes, Gilbert
Seven lively arts; B..... 290
Sembal. G. Cannan; B..... 21
Seven lively arts. G. Seldes; B..... 290
Sex determination. R. Goldschmidt; B..... 340
Shaftesbury, Lord. J. L. and B. Hammond; B. 291
Shakespeare's hand in the Play of Sir Thomas More. A. W. Pollard and others; B.... 219
Shepherd, William R.; R..... 220
Sherman, Stuart P.
My dear Cornelia; B..... 641
Points of view; B..... 641
Shipley, Joseph T.; R..... 100
Short story, the drama. A. Chekhov; B..... 652
Short story's mutations. F. Newman; B.... 711
Shurick, A. T.
Coal industry; B..... 472
Silverhorn. H. Conkling; B..... 660
Since leaving home. A. Wehde; B..... 267
Sinclair, May
Arnold Waterlow; B..... 548
Sinclair, Upton
Goslings; B..... 340
Singer, E. A.
Modern thinkers and present problems; B. 384
Sitwell, Edith
Sleeping beauty; B..... 446
Skinner, M. L., and D. H. Lawrence
Boy in the bush; B..... 710
Skinner, Otis
Footlights and spotlights; AN..... 450
Slapstick and dumbbell. H. Harzberg and A. Moss; AN..... 550
Sleeping beauty. E. Sitwell; B..... 446
Smertenko, Clara M.; R..... 447
Smertenko, Johan J.; R.98, 146, 168, 240, 472, 652
Smith, Alfred E. H. Moskowitz; B..... 19
Smith, Henry Justin
Josslyn; AN..... 221
Snob. H. R. Martin; B..... 127
Social change. W. F. Ogburn; B..... 125
Social organization. W. H. R. Rivers; B..... 644
Social politics in the United States. F. E. Haynes; AN..... 550
Social psychology. E. S. Bogardus; AN..... 527
Social psychology. F. H. Allport; B..... 127
Solomon in all his glory. R. Lynd; B..... 342
Some do not. F. M. Ford; B..... 734
Sorokin, Pitirim
Leaves from a Russian diary; B..... 577
Spaeth, Sigmund
Common sense of music; AN..... 605
Speare, Morris Edmund
Political novel; B..... 473
Speculations. T. E. Hulme; AN..... 343
Spender, Harold
Byron and Greece; B..... 149
Spittal, John Ker, editor
Contemporary criticisms of Dr. Samuel Johnson; B..... 525
Springfield Republican. Story of an independent newspaper. R. Hooker; B..... 386
Stalking big game with a camera. M. Maxwell; AN..... 550
Stallings, Laurence
Plumes; B..... 644
Stanard, Mary Newton
Richmond, its people and its story; B.... 147
Sticks and stones. L. Mumford; B..... 604
Stoddard, Lothrop
Racial realities in Europe; B..... 642
Stolberg, Benjamin; R..... 602
Storer, Tracy Irwin, and J. Grinnell
Animal life in the Yosemite; B..... 470
Story of an independent newspaper. R. Hooker; B..... 386
Story teller's story. S. Anderson; B..... 640
Straight, Willard. H. Croly; B..... 471
Straus, Henrietta; R.....195, 390, 449
Straws and prayer-books. J. B. Cabell; B.... 470
Strike for union. H. Blankenhorn; B..... 99
Strong man's house. F. Neilson; AN..... 685
Studies and sketches. H. H. Asquith; B..... 314
Studies in empire and trade. J. W. Jeudwine; B..... 220
Suckow, Ruth
Country people; B..... 194
Suckow, Ruth; R..... 654
Sudermann, Hermann
Das bilderbuch meiner jugend; B..... 170
Sullivan, Louis H.
Autobiography of an idea; B..... 147
Summer ghosts and winter topics. F. E. Schelling; B..... 168
Super-city. R. Kern; B..... 734
Sutherland, John C.
Outsider; AN..... 343
Swan, Charles, translator
Gesta Romanorum; B..... 420
Swift, Helen
Where green lanes end; B..... 470

T

Taggard, Genevieve; R..... 376
Taking the literary pulse. J. Collins; B..... 472
Tales from silver lands. C. J. Finger; B.... 660
Talmy, Leon; R..... 575
Tant' Alie of Transvaal; her diary; B..... 169
Tatchell, Frank
Happy traveller; AN..... 149
Tate, Allen; R..... 549
Tattooed countess. C. Van Vechten; B..... 241
Taylor, Bert Leston
East window and the car window; B.... 168
Taylor, Paul S.
Sailors' union of the Pacific; AN..... 474
Terhune, Albert Payson
Now that I'm fifty; B..... 168
Treve; AN..... 128
These eventful years; B..... 380
Thibault, Jacques Anatole. See France, Anatole
Thomas, Norman; R.....291, 526
Thorndike, Russell, and R. Arkell
Tragedy of Mr. Punch; AN..... 550
Those Europeans. S. Huddleston; B..... 605
Thousand years of the Tartars. E. H. Parker; B..... 525
Three problem children. Joint committee on preventing delinquency; AN..... 392
Tragedy of Mr. Punch. R. Thorndike and R. Arkell; AN..... 550
Tragical tales. Bandello; AN..... 550
Treve. A. P. Terhune; AN..... 128
Trevelyan, G. M.
Manin and the Venetian revolution; B.. 77
Treves, Sir Frederic
Elephant man; ■..... 240
Trotter, T. H. Yorke
Music and mind; B..... 292
Tugwell, Rexford Guy; R..... 421
Turcaret or the Financier. Lesage, A. R.; AN..... 316
Twain, Mark. See Clemens, Samuel Langhorne
Twentieth century in the making; B..... 380
Two Elizabethan stage abridgments. W. W. Greg; B..... 219
Two royalist spies of the French revolution. G. Lenotre; B..... 422

U

Ugarte, Manuel
El destino de un continente; B..... 52
Under dispute. A. Repplier; B..... 76
Under the red flag. R. Eaton; AN..... 578
Utter, Robert Palfrey
Pearls and pepper; ■..... 168

V

Van Doren, Carl; R.....470, 711
Van Doren, Mark; R..388, 420, 446, 470, 497, 524, 547, 574, 602, 640, 682, 710, 732
Van Hook, La Rue
Greek life and thought; B..... 447
van Loon, Hendrik Willem; R..... 642
Van Vechten, Carl
Tattooed countess; B..... 241
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R.....242, 386
Villari, Luigi
Awakening of Italy; B..... 652
Vivas, Eliseo; R.....148, 168
Vorse, Mary Heaton
Fraycar's fist; B..... 265
Voyages to the moon and the sun. Cyrano de Bergerac; AN..... 316
Voyaging. R. Kent; B..... 684

W

Wager, Charles H.; R..... 77
Wagner as man and artist. E. Newman; B. 656
Ware, Norman
Industrial worker, 1840-1860; B..... 549
Wassermann, Jacob
Gold; B..... 218
Wast, Hugo
La que no perdonó; B..... 195
Waste, Henrie
Love days; AN..... 242
Watson, E. L. Grant
Moods of earth and sky; B..... 470
Watson, John B.; R.....128, 449
Weatherford, W. D.
Negro from Africa to America; B..... 267
Wehde, Albert
Since leaving home; B..... 267
Wells, F. L.
Pleasure and behavior; B..... 449
Wells, Gabriel
Gentle reactions; B..... 473
Wells, Herbert George
Dream; B..... 21
Die weltinteressen der englischen petroleum-industrie. S. Jessen; B..... 20
Wentworth, Edward Chichester
Education of Ernest Wilmerding; AN.... 24
West, V. Sackville-. See Sackville-West, V.
West Indies, Government of the. H. Wrong; AN..... 170
Westcott, Glenway
Apple of the eye; B.....654, 685
What is modernism? L. Parks; AN..... 128
Where green lanes end. H. Swift; B..... 470
White, Walter F.
Fire in the flint; B..... 386
White, William Allen
Politics, the citizen's business; B..... 547
White monkey. J. Galsworthy; B..... 603
White ship. A. Kallas; B..... 194
Whitridge, Arnold
Critical ventures in modern French literature; B..... 241
Whitridge, Arnold; R..... 712
Why I am ■ Christian. F. Crane; B..... 526
Why the weather? C. F. Brooks and others; AN..... 501
Wicks, Sidney F.; R..... 49
Wiener, Leo
Contemporary drama of Russia; B..... 576
Wilberforce, a narrative. R. Coupland; B.... 683
Wilson, Woodrow. R. E. Annin; B..... 378
Wine of fury. L. Rogers; AN..... 221
With congress and cabinet. W. C. Redfield; B..... 378
Within a budding grove. M. Proust; B..... 266
Woodforde, James
Diary of a country parson; AN..... 527
Woodward, W. E.
Lottery; B..... 575
World of souls. W. Lutoslawski; B..... 549
World struggle for oil. P. l'E. de La Tramerye; B..... 20
Wrap me up in my Aubusson carpet. J. Middleton; B..... 645
Wright, F. A., translator
Poets of the Greek anthology; AN..... 550
Wrong, Hume
Government of the West Indies; AN..... 170

Y

Yarmolinsky, Avrahm; R..... 576
Yea and nay. London school of economics; AN..... 392
Yeats, W. B.
Later poems; AN..... 128
Plays in prose and verse; AN..... 128
Yost, Casper S.
Principles of journalism; AN..... 242
You takes your choice. C. L. Gilbert; AN.... 474
Young, Kimball; R..... 127
Young Archimedes. A. Huxley; B..... 499

Z

Zola, Emil
Dram-shop; AN..... 734
Germinal; AN..... 734

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 2, 1924 No. 3078

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1
EDITORIALS:
Cleveland, Wilson, ——? 4
Mussolini and the Klan 5
Butterscotch Pie? 5
The Journalist as Prime Minister 6
US POOR LIBERALS. By Hendrik Willem van Loon 7
THE CLOWN SHOW. By H. L. Mencken 8
THE NEW EDUCATION:
II. In the Ethical Culture, Horace Mann, and Lincoln Schools. By Agnes de Lima 9
BOLSHEVISM AND POPULISM. By William Hard 12
DEMOCRATS ALL. By Art Young 13
RHODE ISLAND'S REVOLUTION. By Orville A. Welsh 14
THE AKALI MOVEMENT—AN HEROIC EPIC. By Agnes Smedley 15
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 18
CORRESPONDENCE 18
DREAMS. By Rolfe Humphries 19
BOOKS:
An American Career. By Ernest Gruening 19
This Oil Age. By Lewis S. Gannett 20
The Disinherited. By J. W. Krutch 21
A Philosopher of Liberalism. By Ludwig Lewisohn 22
Prepare! Prepare! By Woodbridge Riley 22
Opium. By Stephen G. Porter 23
A Survey of Human Logicality. By Joseph Jastrow 24
Books in Brief 24
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Is Austria Rehabilitated? By Heinrich Kanner 25
National Minorities in Poland 26
The Strength of the Russian Communist Party 27

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY IRITA VAN DOREN
MANAGING EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR
ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

ON THE EVE OF THE CONVENTION Mr. McAdoo violently assails the New York press and our "invisible government" and gives voice to admirable and glittering generalities as to the misgovernment of the United States—the kind of harmless but effective pap politicians are supposed to give to voters on all occasions. But when you ask what are his precise views as to Europe, as to government ownership of railroads, as to the Klan, as to prohibition, and everything else that really counts, why, he and "Al" Smith are twins in their eager avoidance of the concrete and clearcut. "We must play our part in Europe and we must enforce all the laws." Yes, but are you for prohibition or against it? Are you afraid to say you are for the Klan? Yes, Klan—we do not mean that vague thing "law and order." Governor "Pat" Neff of Texas at least can hit a nail on the head. At the very moment when Mr. McAdoo was assuring a crowd: "I love California, and I love Idaho, Utah, Oregon, and South Dakota"—and similar stuff ad nauseam, Governor Neff put the issue as to the two leading candidates concisely enough when he said: "Smith is too wet. McAdoo is too oily." So the convention is bound to be as to candidates a fine, open battle, tending to a compromise agreement by exhaustion upon some man whom the American people would never in the world of their own free choice pick for the Presidency.

HENRIK SHIPSTEAD of Minnesota has just completed another stage in the financial education of Andrew W. Mellon of Pittsburgh. Mr. Mellon has a way of telling Congress and the country just what is what in financial matters and of being very indignant if they do not accept his word as if it were a tablet from Sinai. His reckonings, however, have a deplorable habit of being wrong. Treasury surpluses have repeatedly contradicted his gloomy predictions. When, on February 1, Senator Shipstead denounced the high interest rates on government securities, declaring that they were at least one per cent too high, causing a loss to the American people of more than a billion dollars a year, Secretary Mellon replied with heat that he set the rate as the market demanded, and that it was nonsense to imply that the government rate or the federal-reserve discount rates could determine the market. The Senator returned to the charge on May 17; and the latest government offering was made at 2¾ per cent—as compared with a minimum of 4 per cent throughout 1923. Secretary Mellon had declared that the public would not have accepted a lower rate. But when he offered $150,000,000 at 2¾ per cent the subscriptions totaled more than $600,000,000! The reduced rate of interest on that loan alone will save more than a million dollars a year, and Senator Shipstead deserves the credit for forcing a reluctant Mr. Mellon to save it.

MACDONALD AND HERRIOT met at Chequers, and they liked each other. Where two die-hard premiers never met without suspicion and national jealousy these two liberals were able to speak without reserve, and apparently agreement was not difficult. Their actual decisions amount to little—they have agreed to invite Italy to a conference in July upon the application of the Dawes Report—but they have created an atmosphere which should mean much. They might better have invited Germany to the July conference, instead of perpetuating the old method of meeting as Allies before presenting a completed program to the Central Powers. But the spirit matters more than the form. If the correspondents are right that Herriot has agreed to evacuate the Ruhr as soon as the Germans begin to apply the Dawes recommendations, and that England will support the desire of Germany to be admitted to the League Council on the same terms as the major Allies, then indeed Europe is making progress.

THE COUNCIL OF THE LEAGUE of Nations has met in its twenty-ninth session, passed resolutions, received reports, and adjourned. It continues to display patience, hard work, and hopefulness. The League's own suggestions relative to disarmament having failed, discussion this time centered around an American plan, which may, perhaps, become the foster child of the League of Nations. Austria's request to be released from further League control in view of her prosperity during the past year was refused by the Council, but a commission will be sent to investigate her finances. The Russian refugee problem was turned over to the International Labor Office, as it is now more a question of finding employment than of politics. "Steps were taken" to advance Mr. Morgenthau's land settlement plan, which would care for a million Greek refugees. Further investigation of slavery, traffic in women and children, and opium was provided for. In the health field plans for a League of Nations intelligence bureau in Singapore for combating epidemics in the East were announced. Action on the German protest about conditions in the Sarre was postponed until August.

BIRMINGHAM PUBLIC LIB

THAT AMERICAN PLAN FOR DISARMAMENT and the outlawry of war is one of the brightest peace rifts in the armament clouds. The Council of the League of Nations at once voted to distribute the draft to the governments concerned. Through its Permanent Commission of government representatives and its Temporary Mixed Commission of experts the League has been trying vainly to settle upon a disarmament plan. England, France, and Japan held back even from agreement not to exceed the annual military expenditures provided for in their present budgets. We hardly need add that the American plan is not "official." Professor J. T. Shotwell of Columbia and General Tasker H. Bliss with eight others worked it out. Whatever else it is or is not, it is a real challenge of our desire for peace. It subtracts not one jot from our sovereignty, but defines channels through which peace efforts may flow. It does not require membership in the League of Nations, although it does utilize the World Court.

BEGINNING WITH THE SOLEMN declaration that "aggressive war is an international crime," the proposed treaty proceeds to define aggression:

> In the absence of a state of war measures of force by land, by sea, or in the air taken by one state against another and not taken for purposes of defense or for the protection of human life shall be deemed to be acts of aggression. Any signatory which claims that another signatory has violated any of the terms of this treaty shall submit its case to the Permanent Court of International Justice. A signatory refusing to accept the jurisdiction of the court in any such case shall be deemed an aggressor within the terms of this treaty.

This provides as effective a definition of international aggression as we have seen, and the absolute statement that aggressive war is a crime should go far to interest those who have looked to the outlawry of war as the first step toward disarmament and world peace. When a state is adjudged the aggressor, this plan suggests that

> All commercial, trade, financial, and property interests of the aggressor and of its nationals shall cease to be entitled, either in the territories of the other signatories or on the high seas, to any privileges, protection, rights, or immunities accorded by either international law, national law, or treaty.

The provisions for actual disarmament are vaguer, and, utilizing the machinery of the League itself, will hardly find acceptance in the United States.

ENGLAND'S LABOR GOVERNMENT has acted like any stupid Tory bully, and Mexico has behaved like an oversensitive small boy, with the result that the tenuous diplomatic relations between the two countries have been broken off. The dispute arose because of the impertinence of the British chargé d'affaires, Mr. Cummins, in writing letters to the Mexican Government instructing it in his code of ethics and informing it that "the constitution and the law of Mexico forbid the course taken by the Government" in turning over the landed estates of a certain Mrs. Evans to Mexican peons. Possibly he was right; we do not know the facts. Certainly Mr. Cummins's language was outrageously undiplomatic and we cannot understand Ramsay MacDonald's inability to see anything "objectionable" in it. If any diplomat used such language to the British Government his departure by the next boat would be certain. It is only because Mexico is small and weak that the unwanted Mr. Cummins has been retained in Mexico. The Obregon Government long ago informed London that he was persona non grata. When no action was taken it ordered him to leave. He stayed, and it adopted the unusual course of blockading the embassy; and it refused to modify its decree of expulsion as was requested. The old diplomatic banners were unfurled; both countries felt that their "national prestige" was at stake. It is disgraceful that two labor governments should set such an example of pettiness.

GENERAL SMUTS has lost his office and his seat and most of his party. All he appears to have left, as the final returns from the South African election come in, is a part of the old Unionist Party in the Cape and a scattering of South African Party Dutch members in the Transvaal, the Cape, and Natal. The Transvaal went against him in an astonishingly complete reversal of allegiance, and the Rand, which bitterly resented the Government's methods in putting down the "revolution" in the mines two years ago, voted almost solidly for Labor candidates. So Smuts, on a variety of local and personal issues, is gone; but what has come to take his place? A Nationalist-Labor coalition, an unstable compound of dissimilar elements, with no positive policy worth mentioning. The Nationalists gave up their chief issue—republicanism and secession—to win Labor's support; Labor will have to forget its economic hopes. They agree perhaps on one issue: keeping the colored majority in its place, and keeping that place a low one. The two parties have no economic interests in common; no international policy or attitude to the Empire to unite them. The result of the election is merely an expression of a variety of legitimate discontents; it leaves South Africa's future more than ever uncertain.

THE RIDICULOUS ATTEMPT which originated in the War Department to depict the leading women's organizations of the country as propagandists of Russian communism is still working mischief, although repudiated three months ago by Secretary Weeks. Acting on instructions from Mr. Weeks, General Amos A. Fries, head of the Chemical Warfare Service, wrote to persons to whom the notorious "spider-web chart" had been sent, asking them to destroy it. Naturally, however, this gave it an added value to most of its possessors, while the woman librarian of the Chemical Warfare Service, who prepared the chart, declares that it is her personal property and she intends to continue its circulation unofficially. Meanwhile it has been given wide publicity. Without any evidence whatever, it lists the Women's Joint Congressional Committee and the National Council for Prevention of War as the main arteries of bolshevism, connecting with them such organizations as the National League of Women Voters, the National Federation of Women's Clubs, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the National Consumers' League, the Young Women's Christian Association, and even the Daughters of the American Revolution! This is another revelation of the extent to which our administrative departments have abandoned administration to take up propaganda and log-rolling.

ONE OF THE DIFFICULTIES that a nation encounters when it tries to administer its outlying territory through officers of the army or navy is that as officers of the army or navy these men have no right to take part in national politics, but as colonial governors they are more or less inevitably drawn into them. We told in our issue of May 7 how Governor Philip Williams of the Virgin Islands, who is a captain of the navy, was propagandizing against the bill in Congress to give civil government to the natives. Later the two Colonial Councils of the islands came out against the measure. This was to be expected, since the Colonial Councils are a survival of early Danish rule, and are elected on a property franchise for which only about one in twenty-five of the natives can qualify. Captain-Governor Williams, also on the side of aristocracy and privilege, at once sent the resolutions of the Colonial Councils to Washington by the naval radio station. Then a large mass meeting of the natives was held. Resolutions in favor of the bill were passed, and Captain-Governor Williams was asked to transmit them also by radio. He replied: "I consider that the naval radio station here should not be utilized for this matter, and I have therefore forwarded it by mail." First or second class, we wonder?

BECAUSE SHE STOOD HIGHER than any other student Hilda Borden, a Negro, was named valedictorian of the graduating class of the Darby High School in Pennsylvania. Because she was named valedictorian, thirty-one other students—about half of the class—refused to attend commencement. They did not give as a reason that Hilda Borden was a Negro; they said that other than scholastic qualifications should have been considered in choosing the commencement orator and that no adequate notice was given of the basis of selection. But a majority of the student body, the whole faculty, members of the school board, and the principal had this to say in answer:

> Announcement was made to the entire school at the beginning of the year that athletic activities and such things would not count. In the second place, even were the standings so calculated, Hilda Borden would still win, because throughout her school life she has taken part in every school activity but athletics. She didn't take part in that because the students themselves wouldn't let her.

And Polly Baccini, who stood second in the class and was the only possible contestant for the honor, attended the exercises and characterized the "strikers" as poor sports. The action of these embryo Klansmen was vicious and cruel, and they probably succeeded in turning Hilda Borden's happy pride into bitterness and resentment. But the incident gave encouraging evidence of how swiftly a reaction toward generosity and decency often follows such an exhibition of intolerance.

JUDGE GARY is a frank, unashamed sort of despot. He weeps no crocodile tears; he has no benevolence and he pretends to none. Henry Ford is known as widely, we are sure, for his welfare work among his employees as for the canny scheming that has made his Gargantuan profits. But we suspect Mr. Ford, none the less, of being at heart no better than the Walrus and the Carpenter, who wept—but ate them up just the same. Mr. Ford has granted his 23,000 office employees in Detroit a five-day week. He has "many times expressed the view that five days a week is enough for anyone to labor." How benevolent, and how different from the views of Mr. Gary! But observe: Mr. Ford's office employees have in the past had two weeks' vacation with pay. This year there will be no vacation; twelve weeks of five working days will cancel the two weeks of vacation. If the system is continued beyond the twelve summer weeks, the pay of the employees will thenceforth be docked for the day off. And observe further: The day which is being subtracted from the working week is Saturday. Saturday has always been a half holiday; so Mr. Ford's office employees are gaining twelve half days and losing eleven whole ones. And Mr. Ford himself is able to demonstrate a great social theory and at the same time save five days' pay on 23,000 employees. Upon the whole, we think we prefer Mr. Gary.

MRS. OR MISS—which is more honorable? In this country the vanguard of feminists insist upon the right to their own names and the prefix "Miss." They do it in the name of Lucy Stone, who never would let herself be called Mrs. Blackwell. But Lucy Stone herself, when she appeared before a congressional committee thirty years ago, was introduced by Susan B. Anthony as "Mrs. Stone." What do the Ruth Hales and Fola La Follettes say to that? Miss or Mrs. Stone evidently had the same ideas as the speaker at a recent women's congress in Finland who urged abolition of the "dishonoring designation 'Miss.'" The American moderns seem to believe that "Mrs.," with its implication of dependence upon a mere male, is more slighting. That, to be sure, is an implication born of modern days. Dr. Johnson knew that worthy maiden lady as "Mrs. Hannah More" without imputing any lack of independence to her. Does the growing tendency of married women workers to ask for jobs as "Miss," and the utter lack of any tendency among men to distinguish themselves, by title or otherwise, as wedded or unwedded have profound social significance?

FROM NEW YORK TO SAN FRANCISCO in 21 hours 48½ minutes! And yet there are still people who disbelieve in miracles. Well, we take off our hats to Lieutenant Russell L. Maughan. The man who crossed the continent between dawn and dusk showed amazing skill, endurance, and courage, besides demonstrating the value of long and careful preparation. We are glad he did it and, with all our internationalism, are proud that he is an American, just as we take the greatest pride in his three comrades of the army air service who are doggedly flying around the world. We are happy to think that Lieutenant Maughan has illustrated some of the finest of what we are pleased to call American characteristics—daring, initiative, resourcefulness. What Lieutenant Maughan did between sunrise and sunset reminds us that Lewis and Clark, who first crossed this Continent, were two years and four months in reaching the Pacific and six months in returning to St. Louis. Years hereafter, when a daily flight to San Francisco becomes a matter of course, Lieutenant Maughan's name will be remembered with gratitude and honor. May he fly as long as he wishes to and always with equal success!

Cleveland, Wilson, —— ?

ONCE more the Democratic Party faces a great opportunity. Once more the prospects are that it will throw it away. Twice in forty years it has risen to the need of an hour by the choice of an outstanding personality who in one case led it by sheer force of a rugged personal character, in the other by voicing an idealism which party and leader were destined never to fulfil. It is not on any advanced or original program that the party is making its appeal at this hour. Enthusiasts have not been working months and years in advance of this quadrennial meeting to set up a list of constructive reforms to which the party should be pledged. True, the daily prints report a political testament of Woodrow Wilson which is said to have been witnessed by a group of the faithful, but the very fact that it is the heritage of one no longer in the flesh will deprive it of force. As at Cleveland the program-making will ostensibly be left to a resolutions committee. If it really functions as such, the briefness of the hours at its disposal and the necessity of bringing about an agreement among a group of timid politicians will result in the usual weasel-worded platform made to escheat or to deceive, to rouse hopes never intended to be answered.

No, the interest in the Madison Square Convention relates in no wise to policies or principles or reforms. Least of all do the delegates care about these things—they are given no opportunity to debate anything. There is a languid interest in the question whether there shall or shall not be an attack on the Ku Klux Klan by name, and the sporting fraternity sees an excellent betting opportunity in the question whether there shall or shall not be mention of the once dearly beloved Democratic League of Nations. The effort is merely to give a new twist to words for partisan advantage, to be a little more or a little less outspoken about the Klan, about prohibition, the World Court, the lot of the farmer. No one thinks of carving out new issues, of occupying advanced ground, or of adopting one of Woodrow Wilson's slogans, such as "Take the Government out of Wall Street," and building the platform around that. It is as if an effort were being made to confirm the assertions of critics like The Nation that there is no essential difference today between Republicans and Democrats, that there is no earthly reason why an American citizen should vote for one party rather than another unless it be such a motive as leads a man to choose between two brands of cigarettes or two varieties of chewing gum.

Once more all is staked on a candidate. There is one man with whom this might be done with considerable success—John W. Davis—provided that the politicians were brave enough to grapple with the fact that he has been a member of a law firm which has served as counsel for the House of Morgan. We are not of those reformers who believe that association with such a firm necessarily stamps a lawyer as a tool of the "interests," any more than taking briefs for criminals disqualifies a criminal lawyer from high public office. Mr. Davis has admirably spoken out on this matter; we are of the opinion that if he were otherwise of the right caliber he could speedily give convincing proofs of his independence. We have not forgotten how the Republicans confidently counted upon destroying the candidacy of Grover Cleveland in 1884 by producing proof that he was the father of an illegitimate child. As it turned out, Mr. Cleveland admitted the fact in honest and straightforward fashion, and the campaign moved on to other issues; the honesty and compelling power of Mr. Cleveland carried him to victory. In Mr. Davis the party has had a man of brilliant mental powers—his legal attainments are little less than extraordinary—and his is a personality which would speedily throw into the shade so colorless and insignificant a candidate as Coolidge. He has presence, dignity, force; he is in the best sense a gentleman. In Mr. Davis the party might put its best foot forward.

Yet we are by no means sure that Mr. Davis combines in himself ideal leadership or any genuine liberalism. His relation with the House of Morgan is only a symptom of his close affiliation with the predominating business tendencies of the day. During his brief service in Congress there were some highly creditable votes recorded upon his balance-sheet, yet he has given no evidence of burning indignation at the betrayal of the people which we have witnessed. He has been a thick-and-thin supporter of the Wilson war policies, the League of Nations, and all the rest, and the Democratic situation calls not for the nomination of Mr. Wilson's Solicitor General and Ambassador to London, nor, Heaven forbid!, of that petty little betrayer of liberalism and of peace, his Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, but of a man free from any affiliation with the war-time policies and administration.

What America needs today is less than ever a mere rallying around a personality; it is clear-cut thinking on issues. To beseech us to keep cool with Coolidge and to be safe and sane with "Cal" is merely to ask us to abdicate our mental powers. To urge us to vote Democratic merely because a convention chooses a Davis or a Baker, or a McAdoo or a Glass moves us little. True, there is no foundation better than as rugged a character as Grover Cleveland's, but with character must go issues and principles. The strength of the Brights and Cobdens and Clevelands, Campbell-Bannermans and Ramsay MacDonalds is alike due to their unquestionable honesty and their being rooted in principle. Grover Cleveland rose to the highest level when in 1886 the politicians told him that to appeal for tariff reform would spell his certain defeat in 1888. "Very well, gentlemen," he replied, "then we shall go down to defeat." So he did, only to rise triumphant in 1892. Woodrow Wilson had vision and idealism; but he was never so rooted in principle that he could not abandon it to achieve a victory here or there, hence the disaster which overtook him. The need of today is a four-square man as to whose sincerity there can be no question, who shall have given proof that he is ready to pay any price for his beliefs and that he is unselfishly devoted to the public interest.

Such a man is today to be found in neither Republican nor Democratic camps, for Robert La Follette has already left the former. The hypocrisy, the deceit, the base falsity of the war policy has avenged itself upon Republicans and Democrats alike. It has blasted their leadership and deprived them of new and able accessions to that leadership. It has wiped out the distinctions between the two parties, as it virtually wiped out the distinction between Conservatives and Liberals in Great Britain, and opened the way for the new party there. It has opened the way for a regrouping here; it has given us the hope of a new party which, though political government totters everywhere, would give us the opportunity of trying once more to right evils and inequalities in the political way. It is for American liberals to say if and how this shall be done.

Mussolini and the Klan

AFTER a long career of crime and obscenity, in the course of which they introduced the world to the pleasant custom of enforced doses of castor oil, wholesale, the Fascisti have been caught red-handed in a major murder which seems to have threatened the entire Mussolini regime. It is a little difficult to understand just why the disappearance of Deputy Matteotti should so shake all Italy; surely murder is no new trick for the black-shirted heroes. They have boasted of the radicals whom they have beaten up, of the workmen's halls which they have burned, of the dictatorship which they have established, in the words of their own chief, upon "the rotten corpse of Liberty." It is difficult also to understand why one murder more or less should so depress the American priests of Fascism; surely they have been under no illusions as to what Mussolini meant by "law and order." Yet there is hesitation on the part of such admirers of Fascist dictatorship as the editor of the New York Herald-Tribune.

> Signor Mussolini [he writes] appears to be involved in one of the inescapable penalties of the Napoleonic method. . . . The post-war period left the world in a difficult quandary as to the value of the representative system, and when Mussolini rescued Italy from anarchy by rescuing her from her parliamentary politicians the brilliance of his success obscured the dangers in the method. Since then the parliaments have lost rather than gained in dignity, and our own legislators have left some people asking whether a Mussolini would not be a valuable addition to Capitol Hill. . . . Efficiency has its drawbacks as well as democracy, and it is necessary to strike the working balance.

Such talk as this is vastly more significant and sinister than appears on the surface. Italian Fascism is a defiance of the routine forms of law and order in the effort to obtain the kind of "law" and the kind of "order" which its proponents desire. Instead of working through constitutional methods and attempting to improve them, it glorified direct action and defied the "outworn" principles of civil liberties. The end justified any means, and Mussolini and his friends were alone judges of the end. With its symbols recalling the stern days of the Roman Republic, it appealed to many Americans who were revolted by the modern mummery of the Ku Klux Klan. Yet Fascism and the Klan were one at heart. The Klan also preaches patriotism; it waves the flag; it commits its worst crimes in the name of law and order. It is, in its expressions, as 100 per cent American as Mussolini's cohorts were 100 per cent Italian. Palmer as Attorney General, ignoring the law and the Constitution while persecuting the Reds; Hitler and Ludendorff plotting their own brand of monarchy in Germany; Horthy conducting a white terror in Hungary; Mussolini in Italy; the Klan in Herrin, Illinois; the Herald-Tribune talking about a "working balance" between efficiency and democracy—all represent the same impatient attempt to curtain a contempt for the slow processes of democratic government with fine words and patriotic phrases.

For a time these pseudo-patriots pass muster, but in the long run they fall. Mussolini may weather the present crisis, although it has revealed corruption as well as murder on the part of several of his subordinates; but in the end his despotism will meet the fate of all despotisms. The Klan is still with us, but in the South, where it began its career of money-making and of violence, it is already losing ground. The records of its membership, recently revealed through the energy of the New York World, show that it depends upon new members for two-thirds of its strength. At present Ohio and Indiana are its best recruiting-ground, but its members do not stick. One year is enough. Sooner or later the essential futility of an attempt to remedy the evils of our national life by secret mummery and extra-legal flummery becomes plain. People tire of dramatic shows, whether the actors wear black shirts or shroud themselves in sheets, and any secret organization tends to become a gathering-point for all sorts of ruffians and hangers-on who finally discredit the entire group.

There are, as the Herald-Tribune suggests, people in America who are so disgusted with our legislators—particularly when they uncover corruption—that they long for a Mussolini on Capitol Hill. Business, still in the middle ages of autocracy, always has a hankering for the despot in politics. It clings to the strong-man theory of government. Those who have been successful in making money have a tendency to believe that their success proves that they know more than other people about the proper policies for a nation. Judge Gary and other leaders of big business visited Italy and came home enamored of Mussolini's methods; they were blind to his excesses and failed to foresee his present difficulties. They could not learn the ancient lesson which mankind has slowly been absorbing through the centuries. A skilful despot may give an outward appearance of efficiency for a time, but in the end he leaves worse ruin behind him. The broader the base of government, the surer its results. Democracy works poorly enough, but there is no substitute for it.

Butterscotch Pie?

WHEN Lloyd George was in New York City he asked the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel to serve him a typical American dinner. The poor man didn't seem to realize that when in New York he was beyond America's three-mile limit, nor that the typical meal of the metropolis is gulped off a quick-lunch counter or hastily assembled at home from the family ice-box and the delicatessen store around the corner. What Lloyd George got was an eyeful, if not a mouthful. The hotel set before him bluepoints, sorrel soup, mousse of sole with oyster-crab sauce, potatoes parisienne, breast of chicken, new lima beans, Waldorf salad, ice cream, cakes, and coffee.

The thought of this as a "typical American" dinner roused us to a cry of outraged patriotism, and, as readers will recall, we induced gastro-literary experts in various sections of the country to explain what those regions would have set before Lloyd George. Evidently the members of the United Restaurant Owners' Association of New York City have been regretting their shortcomings and studying the menus of our experts, for announcement was made on the eve of the Democratic Convention of arrangements to serve dishes typical of the various sections of the United States to such delegates and visitors as might want them. Said the president of the United Restaurant Owners:

> For the delegates from the Southeastern States there will be fried chicken, Virginia ham, and old-fashioned Southern waffles. For the delegates from Louisiana and the nearby States there will be Creole dishes. For the Southwesterners there will be Mexican specialties such as hot tamales and chili con carne. The Far Westerners will get broiled squab, boiled turkey with celery sauce, boiled onions, steamed sweet potatoes, and butterscotch pie. There will be wiener schnitzel with paprika sauce, parsley potatoes, and egg noodles for those from the Middle States and Northwest.

Those menus all sound good to us, though we confess never to have tackled butterscotch pie. Just the same, we are for it. Like Jurgen, who would try any drink once, we are willing to sample anything called pie to the extent, at least, of half of it. No patriotic American could do less. But we say advisedly that those menus "sound" good to us, for we have dark suspicions of how they might taste. In the first place, New York City—which lives off products that come out of cold-storage warehouses or tin cans—hasn't the materials for these exotic specialties of the provinces. And, more important, it hasn't the cooks. The newspaper from which we get the plans of the metropolitan restaurateurs says hopefully: "In some cases experts in American food have been called in to give instruction to French and Italian chefs."

Wow! The very thought makes us writhe in the pit of the stomach. Excepting the New England grandmother and the Southern mammy (who are the culinary queens of the universe) there are probably no better cooks than the French and Italians. But you must let each stick to his last. We will back a real French chef against the world when it comes to soupe à l'oignon or a vol-au-vent, and when we hanker after spaghetti al sugo or zabaione we want none but an Italian to prepare it. On the other hand, the saddest moments of life have been those occasions when some delightful host in France has for our special benefit made an "apple pie," or when the proprietor of an Italian pensione has approached, all smiles, to say that he is going to cook some griddle cakes after a recipe left by an "American lady."

No, we have no faith in cookery that is taught to French and Italian chefs by "experts in American food." The experts in American food are too busy cooking—or eating—it to turn teachers. And anyhow it would be useless. Cooks—even more than poets—are born, not made. They learn out of no books; they give no recipes. It is a "dash" of this and a "suggestion" of that; "just enough" sugar and "not too much" cinnamon. It took years of pious puritanism to produce the perfect mince pie; generations of Southern culture went into the evolution of hot bread. Our great cooking is not so much a conscious art as it is a tradition, an inheritance, a consecration, a dispensation of the gods.

We thank the restaurateurs of New York City for their consideration. But we advise visitors from South Carolina to eat their "old-fashioned Southern waffles" at home; nor will our craving to learn the joys of butterscotch pie induce us to try even half of one in the second-story chop-suey parlor of On Chung Liang.

The Journalist as Prime Minister

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD has amply justified, on the score of personal competence, his appointment as Prime Minister of Great Britain. However opinions may differ as to his policies, no one doubts today that he is capax imperii. It is significant that he is a journalist by profession whose ability is now so generally recognized. When he first came to London Mr. MacDonald earned his living for several years as a free-lance writer, and until he became leader of the Opposition he was a regular and diligent contributor to the periodical press, including The Nation. Prime ministers before have added to the literature of philosophy or the Homeric problem—to say nothing of Disraeli's novels. But as writers for the press, they were amateurs; he is a professional.

When Mr. MacDonald walked into No. 10 Downing Street, a business man walked out. Mr. Baldwin's immediate predecessor, Bonar Law, had also spent a large part of his career in commercial pursuits. A few years ago there was a demand in England—as elsewhere—for business men in public office. They would be more "practical," it was supposed, than the type of man usually chosen to direct the affairs of state. Experiments with them have not, however, been conspicuously successful. To run a government something more is needed than ability to organize the work of a department. There is required, among other things, a certain power of mental initiative, approaching almost to inspiration. A prime minister should have a keen appreciation of the life and needs of the multitude, personal contacts with all sorts and conditions of men, and a sympathetic imagination.

A prosperous business man is likely to be as deficient in these qualifications as any representative of the old territorial aristocracy. The head of a flourishing industrial or commercial concern lives in another world from that of the struggling professional man, or the salaried clerk, or the small storekeeper, or the manual laborer. Stanley Baldwin came to grief at the last British election through his failure to realize the difference that a small rise in the price of everyday household commodities would make to a multitude of families that are normally separated from "hard times" by only a narrow margin. His Government was brought down by a revolt of those householders and housewives to whom a sixpenny bit means as much as a five-pound note to a wealthy ironmaster. It is, perhaps, more than a coincidence that it was the protectionist propaganda of a prosperous representative of a kindred industry, Joseph Chamberlain, that doomed the Balfour Government to defeat in 1906.

A journalist premier would not have made Mr. Baldwin's mistake. Even if he had not, like Ramsay MacDonald, felt the pinch of poverty in his own early days, his professional experiences would have brought him more or less in touch with every stratum of society. He would have known, as it were by instinct, that such an apparent trifle as a dearer Christmas pudding—a mere nothing to the city magnate or the West End clubman—would be resented in thousands of homes and would count for something at a December election. The occupation of a journalist, with its infinite variety of personal contacts and its opportunities of close observation, is no bad training for an office that is incompatible with limited sympathies and a narrow outlook.

Us Poor Liberals

By HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

OF course I am quoting from memory. I tried to find a copy of Fritz Reuter's Collected Works, but I was told that the last of these had been burned by Mr. Palmer's hangman early in 1918. The books had been denounced to the American Protective Society as the work of a well-known and dangerous revolutionist, a man who had done seven years at hard labor for wearing a bit of colored ribbon distasteful to the eyes of His Royal Majesty, the King of Prussia.

The owner of the books, therefore, had been dispatched to Leavenworth for the rest of his natural days and all customs officials had been instructed to confiscate and destroy further importations which bore the hated and reprehensible name of Stavenhagen's famous citizen.

I am therefore quoting from memory, but if I am not mistaken the story which old Fritz told was as follows:

> One day the good people of Mecklenburg decided that their country needed a new set of laws; that the structure of the state ought to be generally overhauled, and that it was time to call together a general assembly for the discussion of all questions pertaining to the government of the realm. That was in the year 30,000 B.C. when Mecklenburg was still a very backward country and did not yet possess that constitutional form of government which it obtained just four years ago, immediately after the great and glorious Teutsche Revolution.
>
> Well, to make a complicated matter still more complicated, the antediluvian Mecklenburgers met and they continued their sessions more than five moon-years. By that time the greater part of the plain between Rostock and Wismar was covered with enormous kitchen-middens. There was not an aurochs alive within a hundred miles. It was necessary that some decision be reached, lest all the tribes die of slow starvation. And so finally one resolution was passed amidst the loud din of a hundred thousand stone axes. It read: "Be it decided that everything remain as it has always been before."

And now that I come to think of it, isn't that the soundest, yea, the only basis, for a happy and stable existence? What use to rehash the adventures of those dreary days we spent within a hall at Cleveland, which, if my eyes do not deceive me, would be almost ideal for a festival of Bach or Haydn?

It was dull. New York will be dull.

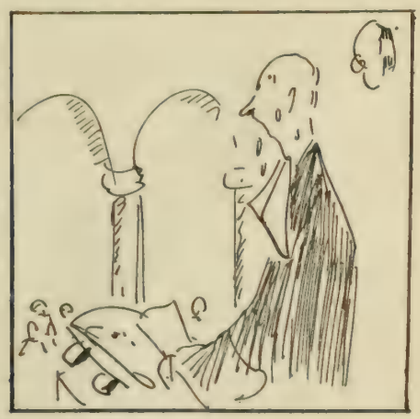
We all agreed that it was dull. We shall agree that New York is dull.

The speeches were dull. Democratic speeches will be as dull.

Old man Burton at Cleveland spoke for two hours and returned to the citadel of his eloquence through the same gate which he had left before. Young man Burton spoke for three-quarters of an hour. He was up for examination by the assembled multitude. He knew it and we knew it, and he looked and acted much as did those unfortunate "dominies" whom I remember so well from the days of my youth who came to the village of my early residence to deliver a trial sermon before the stolid school-masters and plumbers and green-grocers who ruled the destinies of the Dutch Reformed Church.

When it was over, he knew and we knew that he had failed. Even the president of a modern university cannot escape the subtle influence of certain scholarly traditions. And Burton, Jr., used good English.

The delegates laughed politely, but when the speech was over the speaker was dead. A decent respect for the grammar of the land had killed this proud Cock Robin. He will have to go back to the excavations of the Ann Arbor Construction Company (formerly the University of Michigan). The excellently comfortable vice-presidential suite of the New Willard Hotel will not know him as its tenant.



There were days (long ago) when I, together with so many others, now either dead or tired, had a vision of the great things that were to come. Mankind, awakening to its destinies, marching through the fiery forest to a new realization of its glorious possibilities.

Alas! the old Mecklenburgers, 30,000 years ago, knew better. "Everything is to remain as it has always been before."

The shambles of the fiery forest are gone. A wrecking company has carted away the last dead stump. The survivors have been sold brand-new plows and threshing-machines. They have been given a fine crop of ugly houses. A movie-theater attends to their spiritual needs. They are well enough fed, decently enough housed. They can escape from the boredom of their own company at small cost. Is there anything else? When I come to think of it, is there anything else?

We poor deluded liberals with visions of "man created after God's image, striving forever upward!"—we alone are to blame for the misconception regarding this world.

We have sung the praises of Homo sapiens, when we should have studied the facts about Pithecanthropus erectus.

These political shows are dreary and stupid performances.

Granted! But they are exactly what suits 99 per cent of our neighbors, and suits them down to the ground.

They admire the heights from the distance. They like to see others scale the dangerous rocks to experience in the pictures. They like it, because there always is a chance that the fellow will slip and break his neck, and that is wonderfully exciting. As for themselves, they will stay right here where it is warm and pleasant and where the paying-teller treats them with that respect due to an honored investor.

Not a very elevated philosophy of life.

But safe and comfortable.

You think that I exaggerate!

Just wait until November!

The Clown Show

By H. L. MENCKEN

POLITICS survives as an art and mystery because Homo sapiens, despite the second half of his name, is almost as incapable of learning by experience as an amoeba. The lesson of the Cleveland obscenity was, in brief, that lessons are mainly in vain. Try to translate what was done there into terms of one of the more exact sciences. A patient, having swallowed by inadvertence a horse-doctor's dose of ground glass, lay upon his couch in a state of agony and collapse. What remedial measure suggested itself to his mind, still functioning powerfully? Did he send for a battery of stomach-pumps and a carboy of some puissant emetic? He did not. Instead, he reached for the keg of ground glass, poured out precisely the same dose, tried to gulp it down by main strength, and when it stuck in his throat gave it a shove with a dreadful chaser of neat hydrochloric acid.

A drunken man in a barroom, engaged publicly upon such imbecilities, would be rushed to the psychopathic ward on wings of fire. But when men and women in their political capacity indulge in them the spectacle somehow seems natural and normal. If the Cleveland clown show differed from others of its kind it was only because its machinery was more simple and its inner organization thus more obvious. It went on, so to speak, in vitro. All the usual gauds and disguises—of laborious reflection, of free and fair combat, of ebullient and irresistible emotion—were lacking. What was done was done in cold blood, as coal is mined and teeth are pulled. And yet what was done was completely and magnificently idiotic. If the aim of the delegates and alternates was to serve the republic, to improve the government, to safeguard liberty and democracy, then they missed it by a mile. And if it was to prosper the so-called Republican Party, then they missed it by two miles.

It is, indeed, hard to imagine any more incompetent handling of important public business, even in a democratic State. I name names at once, and confine myself to the very first flight: Prof. Dr. Burton and the Hon. Mr. Butler. Prof. Dr. Burton was chosen deliberately because, of all Americans willing to do what had to be done, he was plainly the most gifted. He was both a learned and high-toned man and an accomplished rabble-rouser. He was respected alike by the Gelehrten and by grand juries, by Poets Laureate and by the members of the Michigan Legislature. He could drive home a syllogism and he could plant and explode a sob. His job, in brief, was to launch good Cal with a whoop—to lift the delegates and alternates out of their natural coma and send them into the campaign with all the fiery enthusiasm of crusaders shinning up the walls of Jerusalem—to currycomb their medulla oblongatas with such subtle and devastating art that they would go home with their heads swimming, their blood boiling, and their hearts bursting with a libido for Service. To this end the professor threw himself into his studio at Ann Arbor, consecrated himself for nine days and nine nights to the composition of a speech of 7,500 words, memorized it to the last wheeze and comma, put on his Kiwanis uniform, leaped into the volcanic glare of the spotlights, and so cut loose. And with what result? With the ghastly result that Cal fell flatter than any other candidate ever heard of in human history, that the demonstration planned to shake the hall at the mention of his Awful Name was dead in two minutes. I can find in my archives no record of a more painful scene. I am surely no humanitarian, but when that grisly silence fell, and the delegates and alternates began flopping into their pews, and a Y. M. C. A. song leader was rushed upon the glacis, his arms waving and his glottis emitting encouraging yells—when the thing got that far there was a lump in my throat and my natural sneer faded into a pizzicato snicker.

So much for Aristotle, and his vain attempt upon the human heart. It seemed to me that Babbitt failed almost as dismally. He appeared in the form of the standard-model Christian business man: white hair, mustache somewhat darker, pink skin, gold-rimmed eye-glasses, comfortable paunch—in other words, in the form of the Hon. William M. Butler of Massachusetts. Whenever, in any righteous and well-barbered American community, large or small, there is a drive, crusade, or public hullabaloo of whatever sort, whether against the red menace or in favor of the American plan, against bootlegging or in favor of the Y. M. C. A.'s summer camp for diabetic bookkeepers, an exact duplicate of the Hon. Mr. Butler is sure to be its head and forefront. The type is perfectly standardized, like the parts of a Ford. Forty years ago it ran to white Burnsides, smooth lips and chins, and heavy watch chains: its perfect flower was Morris K. Jesup. Today it runs to toothbrush mustaches and Shriner badges, and its perfect flower is Butler. Such men, though they yearn for Service, are not romantic. Between hawks and handsaws they distinguish clearly. More, they have sharp eyes for correspondences as well as for differences. They know precisely how and to what extent bishops and bootleggers, detectives and labor leaders, members of Congress and shyster lawyers are brothers under their skins. In particular, they are privy to the character of politicians, great and small. They know which side a United States Senator's bread is buttered on, and how soft a whisper he can hear.

Unluckily, such knowledge is often too scientific to be human. The expert, sorting out his politicians and hanging them upon their appropriate hooks, is only too apt to forget that they have feelings, that they are proud, that they are human. So it was with Butler. He was too new at his job to have acquired any tenderness, any delicacy, any diplomatic finesse. He simply grabbed his victims as if they were sardines and rammed them into their cans, the eminent with the obscure, the ancient with the newly hatched. Whole shoals of them went in without protest, even with loyal hosannahs—for example, the Southern jobholders, white and black. But now and then a Henry Cabot Lodge came along and there was a jet of stately tears, and now and then a Smoot came along and there was a challenging grunt, and now and then a Jim Watson came along and there was a yell to wring the heart. The cans, of course, were filled nevertheless. Not a sardine escaped. But two-thirds of them, I suspect, went in sore—and will come out sore. Do I betray a secret when I say that Dr. Lodge, when he rose to applaud the eloquence of Dr. Burton, showed under his pallid smile the vestiges of a diabolical leer? Do I babble too much when I report that Dr. Watson, leaping to the platform to second the nomination of the Hon. Hell and Maria Dawes, concealed his wounds so badly that even the galleries laughed? These men, and others like them, are not made of leather. Hit them today and they will remember it tomorrow. And tomorrow, I take it, they will be needed. It was far easier to put Cal over in Cleveland than it will be to put him over in November.

What I chiefly gathered from the whole foul and degrading spectacle, indeed, was a sense of oozing confidence. The delegates came in as if to a wedding, and they left as if from a meeting of creditors. What deflated them? Chiefly, I believe, the clumsy chamber-of-commerce technic of the Hon. Mr. Butler—a technic perfectly adapted, no doubt, to dealing with labor leaders, newspaper editors, and the rev. clergy, but somehow ineffective with politicians. The delegates to a national convention, remember, are not exactly worms. They pay their own expenses, they have reserved seats, they wear elegant gold and scarlet badges, and their minutest doings, when not downright unprintable, are recorded by the correspondents of their local papers. It thus pains them greatly to be rammed into cans like sardines. It pains them and fills them with dismay. Such dismay gradually worked its way through the free and imperial city of Cleveland. The thing began with a blast of bugles and ended with a dismal roll of drums.

Was there something else? I have a notion that there was. It took visible substance in the gaunt, archaic, almost spookish form of the Hon. Henry Cooper of Wisconsin. It would need a better psychologist than I am to work out just what happened, in all detail, on the night that Dr. Cooper rose up to read the manifesto of the rebels from the cow States. I do not recall clearly what that manifesto advocated, but the matter is of no importance, for the combat was not between ideas but between dignities. Representing Cal and the True Revelation was the Hon. Mr. Warren of Michigan—a brisk, cocky, shiny little attorney, with the manner of a butler lately elected to his master's club. Representing the contumacious husbandmen was that superb ancient, that heroic silurian, two heads taller than Warren and a thousand times the man—a wanderer in from Valhalla, somehow majestic and monumental. Was the spectacle lost on the delegates? I don't believe it was. When, in the end, they voted with Warren they had the decency to look ashamed. And looking ashamed, they also began to look uncertain.

The New Education

By AGNES DE LIMA

II. In the Ethical Culture, Horace Mann, and Lincoln Schools

EDUCATIONAL reformers are of three kinds: those who accept the established body of knowledge as necessary for the child to learn, but who admit that the methods of presenting it are at fault and must be changed; those who advocate changes in the curriculum so as to prepare children more adequately for a modern world; and those who view education as an organic process which changes and develops as the child himself changes and grows. None of these three groups works entirely independently. The difference in emphasis, however, profoundly affects what each is doing, and the future of education will be largely shaped by the degree to which one group or the other succeeds in dominating educational thought and policy.

Just now the technicians are very much in vogue; the measurement of intelligence, of classroom achievement, and improvement in method occupying the major efforts of schools of education and professional schoolmen everywhere. The second group is also much in evidence, demanding modern schools to fit children to play a worthy part in a modern world. The third group is only beginning to attract attention outside of advanced circles, and is still dismissed by the majority of educators as visionary.

There are in New York City three schools which, although private, are known as pace setters for the country in the first two types of reform. All three also have experimented in their lower grades with the principles held by the third group. The institutions are the Horace Mann and Lincoln schools, both officially connected with Teachers College, and the Ethical Culture School. Both the Horace Mann and Ethical Culture schools are frankly conservative as regards curriculum, save for the work of Miss Patty Hill in the kindergarten and first grade of Horace Mann and the primary grades in the Ethical Culture School. The Lincoln School, on the other hand, is frankly experimenting with the curriculum, seeking to adapt it to the changed demands of modern society.

The Ethical Culture School, established in 1878, is the oldest of the three. It was founded by Dr. Felix Adler as a free kindergarten for the children of working people, but it grew rapidly into a full graded school to which children were admitted from all soci' strata. Children are not excluded because of race, religion, or color—a rare policy in a private school—and scholarships, affording either full or partial tuition extended to over two-fifths of the enrolment, cut down economic barriers. In admitting children, however, preference is usually given to those with a high record of scholarship and a high intelligence rating—at least 115—and once admitted, pupils are expected to meet the exacting requirements of the school's course of study. The result of this policy is that the school serves primarily a rather narrowly specialized intellectual type, and necessarily excludes many children whose special talents lie outside the range of measurability of the scales, or who lack ability to perform difficult academic work.

Some of these pupils are permitted to remain and take a modified course leading to a certificate instead of a diploma, but they are regarded rather as lost souls by the administration. In discussing them recently Superintendent Lewis said:

> For them the thought of the world bearing on human progress so far as it is bound up in ethics, literature, history, science, and foreign languages is very largely a sealed book. Facts they can often grasp and reproduce, but the relations of facts and reasoning generally in the abstract data of language are often beyond their capacity. Hence they do not seem to me to be those best qualified by nature to attain the school's highest aims. . . . They are not those whose intelligence can be raised to a point where they can cope successfully with the burning problems now facing mankind.

The avowed purpose of the school is to train ethical leaders, "reformers" of society, and its officers are proud of the fact that a larger proportion of its graduates than of any other school are engaged in teaching, research, or some type of social service. The ideal of service to society is held constantly before the pupils by means of formal ethics instruction as well as by numerous activities on behalf of the community.

A prevocational arts course has been established in the last two years of high school for those children who show special artistic ability. It is the ultimate hope of the school to offer similar courses to those specially endowed in music, in home-making, mechanical ingenuity, and science. Even here, however, the emphasis is placed upon academic standing and intellectual capacity, for Superintendent Lewis does not believe the course will be successful with students who do not possess at least average general intelligence in addition to special talent, nor would he give preference to the dull but talented student over the bright and equally talented one.

While all the children of the middle and upper school are thus held to the requirements of a conventional curriculum, the attempt is made through psychological study of each child to provide a rounded range of activities, mental, physical, and social. This is important, for precociously intellectual children are frequently emotionally infantile, or unable to respond normally to social situations.

Some years ago an experiment was made in the primary grades of the Ethical Culture School by Miss Mabel Goodlander to test out some of the more progressive theories of education.[1] No changes were made in size of class or in room space, but complete freedom was given in the selection of materials, use of class time, and employment of special teachers. Miss Goodlander's aim was "to create a free social environment where children in cooperation with others of the same age might make a beginning in democratic living under conditions more like life outside school than commonly considered appropriate for the school regime." Children as well as teacher were at liberty to sit where convenient, talk and move about freely so long as they did not annoy others, and to work or play either as individuals or in groups. Although the teacher directed the class when necessary, the children were mainly engaged in projects of their own.

It is one of Miss Goodlander's cardinal beliefs that the teacher must never dominate the situation. "We must learn," she says, "to appreciate more sympathetically each child's point of view, and we should be willing to accept his judgment in many things frankly and sincerely even when it differs from our own."

As regards curriculum the emphasis was shifted from formal studies to constructive work and play, to expression in varying art forms, and to first-hand knowledge of social and industrial activities related to the child's life. The three R's were mastered, but Miss Goodlander waited until the interest of the children in them had been naturally aroused.

Miss Goodlander carried her experiment forward with the same group for four years, and then started with a new class. According to Superintendent Lewis the experiment was a success, tests showing that as compared with two parallel divisions Miss Goodlander's group met the school's requirement in formal work and excelled in ability to observe, initiate, and carry projects through; in cooperation it was superior to one group and inferior to another.

While the experiment was thus held successful, no attempt has since been made to extend its methods to the upper grades, and even in the lower grades Miss Goodlander's principles are not wholly applied. Her work has served to liberalize, but not to free the elementary department from the weight of tradition.

In the Horace Mann School, also, due to Miss Patty Hill and her associates, the work of the kindergarten and primary grades is less formal and more flexible than that of succeeding years. Miss Hill's work has profoundly affected the course of kindergarten and primary education throughout the country in the direction of a freer and more democratic type of organization.

Recently she has been attempting to apply the principles of behaviorist psychology to curriculum making and has worked out with her associates a series of activities designed to develop proper habits, physical, mental, emotional, and social.[2] With the help of several hundred leaders in kindergarten and primary education a "habit inventory" was first produced listing specific habits which the majority agreed young children should form. As this inventory was used, Miss Hill discovered that the supervisors and classroom teachers "began to think of all instruction in terms of desirable change in thought, feeling, and conduct." The principles of habit formation were thus gradually applied to all school subjects. "The proper conduct of the three R's became as evident as the so-called moral and social conduct." This resulted in regarding each aspect of the curriculum, not as a formal school subject, but as a social situation rich in activities and experiences. Thus acquired, the habit takes on meaning and is associated in the mind of the child with a sense of satisfaction or pleasure.

The basis for what Miss Hill calls her conduct curriculum is indubitably sound, and most of the activities listed in her book are wholesome and properly selected. There is always the danger, however, as Miss Hill herself recognizes, that the very explicit aims set down by her group will be used not as means of wider freedom but of more repression. Unhappily the moralists and disciplinarians manage to function, no matter what instrument is put into their hands. Their natural tendencies are not likely to be checked by the following list of "desirable" changes in thought, feeling, and conduct which should be developed: "Learning to enter room politely," "Greeting teachers and children courteously," "Gaining an attitude of respect and obedience toward parents and other adults," "Learning to use time wisely, i.e., balance between quiet and active work" (what young child consciously strikes such a balance?). In "coming to group for discussion and music," the desirable change stressed is "learning to select right-sized chair and to carry chair properly."

[1] See "Education Through Experienc " By Mabel R. Goodlander. Bulletin No. 10, New York Bureau of Educational Experiments.

[2] "A Conduct Curriculum for the Kindergarten and First Grade." By Agnes Burke, Edith U. Conard, Alice Dalgliesh, Edna V. Hughes, Mary E. Rankin, Alice G. Thorn, Charlotte G. Garrison, Teachers of Horace Mann School. Introduction by Patty Smith Hill. Charles Scribner's Sons. 1924.

These imposed standards of conduct explain much of what one observes upon visiting the primary classes of the Horace Mann School. Washing the hands before the midday luncheon became in one room an event of awful import, where silence was enjoined and order kept absolute. Later, the rest period, where the children were expected to relax, became a quarter hour of exasperated nagging by the teacher to enforce immobility upon thirty wriggling youngsters.

The upper grades of the school make no pretense of free activity. The standards upheld are those which have the weight and sanctity of tradition behind them, but individual teachers are allowed a high degree of personal initiative, and a variety of experiments have been carried on, especially in method, which are of distinct value. Scientific pedagogy has an important place in education, and schools everywhere are indebted to the researches made by Teachers College and applied in the Horace Mann School. It would be stimulating to those interested in adapting education to the needs of growth if the teachings of Dewey and Kilpatrick were applied more generally to the curriculum itself.

The aim of the Lincoln School, as described by its director, Dr. Otis W. Caldwell, is "to construct a fundamental curriculum which will be representative of the important activities, interests, and possibilities of modern life." The school has been in existence only seven years, but has already effected a number of thoroughgoing changes in the course of study. Chief among these perhaps is the work of Dr. Howard A. Rugg, who has abolished the artificial divisions existing between history, geography, civics, economics, and sociology, and grouped the material under one natural heading—social studies—designed to help the student to understand and deal intelligently with the problems of contemporary life.

Dr. Rugg's approach to his job is that of the scientist. His eleven social science pamphlets, which embody for the junior high school the material as worked out to date, have been assembled after years of painstaking analysis, inventory making, trial use, and revision. The Lincoln School has obtained the cooperation of one hundred and thirty-five schools scattered throughout the country which make use of the new curricular material and test out its results as compared with those of classes following the ordinary courses. Besides breaking down unnatural subdivisions between allied fields of knowledge, Dr. Rugg has substituted human episodes for the encyclopedic rehearsal of bare facts. The course is thus not only enormously enriched and vitalized, but children are stimulated to weigh and discuss the value of one episode as compared with another, to draw their own conclusions, and test the validity of data. Dr. Rugg holds that it is only through such practice that the future citizen will resort to intelligence instead of prejudice as a guide to conduct. Four guiding principles have been defined by Dr. Caldwell as fundamental to the reorganization of any school subject: Subject matter and method must be engaging and genuine; pupils must succeed if they are to become educated; sense training is necessary (at present education is based too much on words and too little on touch, sight, and taste); children should be encouraged to work together and teach one another.

These principles find expression in a variety of ways in the school. The curriculum of the elementary school has not been subjected to the same analysis and study as that of the upper grades, but the class teachers are afforded much freedom for experimentation. The primary rooms usually present a pleasant hubbub of activity. They are large, sunny, and equipped with all manner of materials—a work bench, lumber and tools, a sand pile, large blocks, clay, paints, and large cardboard for stage scenery, with a white rabbit or two rambling about at will. A play is frequently in preparation and the children are busy composing it, painting the scenery, constructing buildings and furniture, and issuing invitations to parents and friends. One first grade recently dramatized the marketing of milk, while the second grade gave a play about New York, with skyscrapers, bridges, and elevated tracks complete. Excursions are frequent to docks, railroad stations, warehouses and markets, and upon their return the children reproduce these experiences in paint, blocks, clay, and story form.

A valuable means of reviewing class activities and of presenting material in vivid form is supplied through the school assemblies, at which a variety of programs are given by the children relating to their own special interests. Less valuable—so it seems to a visitor—are the student councils, particularly for the younger children. The councils were organized to afford machinery for a limited amount of student self-government. Meetings are held weekly and conducted according to the laws of parliamentary procedure. Minutes and by-laws and the proper methods of putting motions may amuse and instruct older children, but they appear totally unrelated to the interests of seven-, eight-, and nine-year-olds. It was only through the indefatigable efforts of class teachers working against the hopeless inertia of their pupils that delegates were duly instructed for two council meetings which were visited, and the meetings themselves were only saved from stagnation by the constant prodding of a sixth-grade teacher in attendance.

This predominance of the teacher appears to be general in most grades of the elementary school. The teacher conducts the class, controls the activities, leads the discussion, makes the criticism, assigns the work, and "keeps order" just as in any traditional school. The whole day is closely programed, a large clock in each room chopping off activity at the end of a given period. The children in general reflect the policy of the school—they are being prepared for a future society by means contrived and imposed upon them by their elders. In appearance they are accordingly sober, constrained, polite, and even occasionally somewhat bored.

Bolshevism and Populism

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

IT was a great meeting in St. Paul—the meeting between Bolshevism and Populism in the St. Paul "Farmer-Labor-Progressive" Convention. Here for the first time in the course of an American national political campaign there was a certain mingling of the ideas and purposes of the late good old James B. Weaver of Iowa, who ran on the Populist ticket for President in 1892, and of the ideas and purposes of the late but not usually called good old Nikolai Lenin, who became master of Russia without bothering with tickets or elections.

It was a fascinating spectacle. At one extreme there was William Z. Foster, bolshevik, calm, clear, quiet, without a flower of speech in him, studious, even learned, knowing exactly what he wanted and inflexibly and successfully carrying out a program the nature of which was outlined in communist publications in Europe many months ago.

At the other extreme was William Mahoney, chief signer to the call for the convention on behalf of the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota. Mr. Mahoney was worried. He was perplexed. He had helped to issue a call to which Mr. Foster's communist Workers Party could respond. The Workers Party was present, represented by Mr. Foster and others. Mr. Mahoney had been pursuing the principle that all elements opposed to big business and to predatory wealth and to the money power and to Wall Street and to privilege and to monopoly should be included in the convention in one unhappy family pursuing happiness through a political uprising. Well, here they were. Mr. Mahoney should have been pleased. He in fact was wretched.

From the opening minute of the convention he felt that something strange was happening to him. It was.

In Vienna in Austria there is a communist publication called the International Press Correspondence. Mr. Mahoney, by subscribing to it, could long ago have learned just what it was that was going to happen to him on June 17, 18, and 19 in St. Paul, Minnesota.

It surely is convenient that by subscribing to periodicals in, say, Austria, one can now get some quite good advance tips on things that are going to happen in some parts of American politics.

In the International Press Correspondence of the 28th of last February a prophetic account was given of the outcome of the St. Paul "Farmer-Labor-Progressive" Convention almost four months beforehand:

> The Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party has called a convention to take place in St. Paul. It will be a sign of the revolt of the workers, farmers, and some sections of the petit bourgeoisie against the domination of the capitalist political parties. It will be the first call to action on a mass scale that the Communists have been able to issue, for the Workers Party will be represented. The petit bourgeois third party will be formed with us. For us to support it may result in its victory. Then alone will the workers and farmers realize that petit bourgeois reformism is fruitless. All preaching has no effect. The workers and farmers must see petit bourgeois reformism in action. By ruthless, merciless criticism of the third party and of petit bourgeois reformism the Communists will unmask its character. Though supporting the third party, they must be able to criticize it pitilessly. This is a strategy that the Communist parties of Europe and America are just learning to apply. It is a hard course but is the path of the revolution. The campaign in America will allow us to enter the third party, to form a left wing within it, and to split the left wing away from the third party.

The simple soul of Mr. Mahoney and of Northwestern populism could hardly be expected to cope with a plan so incredible in its naive avowal of intended double-dealing. To call it double-dealing is perhaps indeed inaccurate. A man who tells you beforehand that he is going to sit at table with you in order to get a couple of tines off your fork is in an extraordinary sense honest. In that sense the Communists are honest to the last degree. For instance:

Robert Marion La Follette has been the idol of the whole Northwestern ex-populist farmer-labor movement. The Chicago Daily Worker is the mouthpiece of Mr. Foster's Workers Party. C. E. Ruthenberg is one of the great intellectual lights—deservedly so—of the Workers Party. Long before La Follette denounced the St. Paul convention Mr. Ruthenberg said in the Daily Worker that the Communists would unquestionably support La Follette but that nevertheless:

> We Communists are against La Follette. We know that the political victory of the workers and exploited farmers lies over the politically dead body of La Follette.

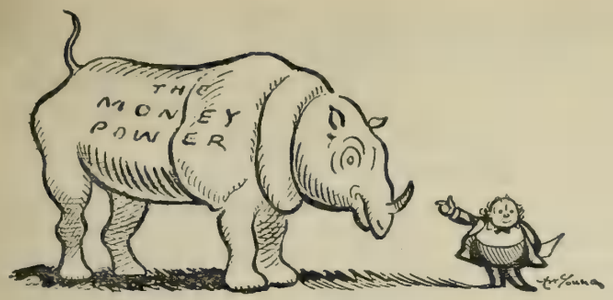
This policy of kissing in order to carry out a frank promise to stab was faithfully followed by the Communists in the St. Paul convention. They persuaded the convention to put a candidate in the field against La Follette as well as against the candidates of the Republican and Democratic parties. This new candidate—Duncan MacDonald—is an experienced leader of trade-union miners and a most likable person with a most scanty knowledge of communism in his head and with nothing communist at all in his purposes. He simply believes that there should be an outright farmer-labor party with a candidate who, unlike La Follette, will accept the party's platform and accept the party itself.

Similar views were taken by quite a few old ex-Populists and their spiritual descendants in the convention. The Communists honestly and openly aimed at taking a piece of the Northwestern radical movement away from La Follette. They succeeded sooner than they had expected.

The only important remaining fact is that the piece which they have taken is relatively a small one. The actual local Minnesota candidates of the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party for office in Minnesota in the elections of this year were overwhelmingly conspicuously absent from the convention. Few people with any actual chance to get elected to anything were present. The Communists, however, did grab off something. They grabbed off the ultra-violet end of the Northwestern indigenous American political spectrum, containing many active and courageous speakers and organizers. They merited this success. They had a plan. They had discipline. They went to enormous pains to get their sympathizers into the convention as delegates. They thought. They worked. They won something—an inch.

Democrats All

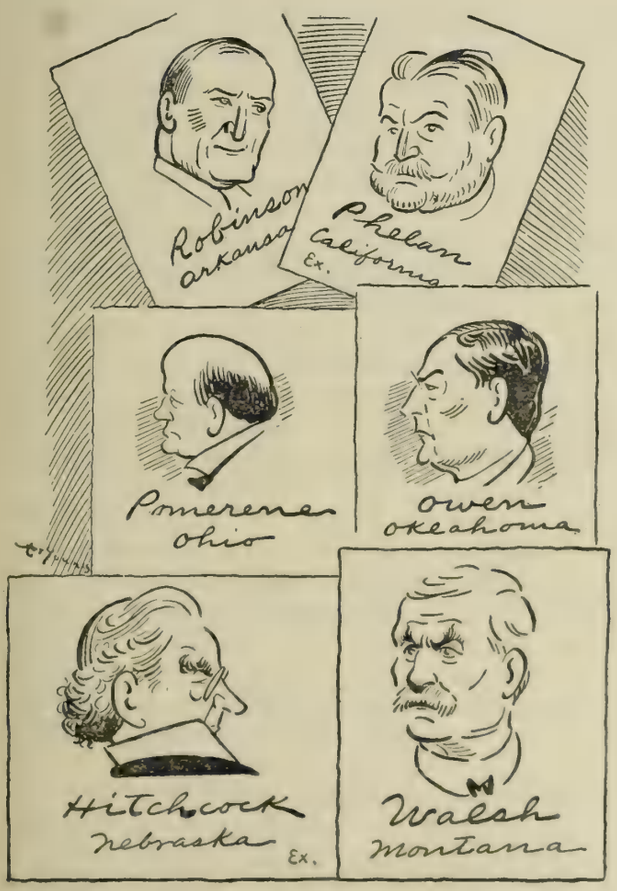
by Art Young



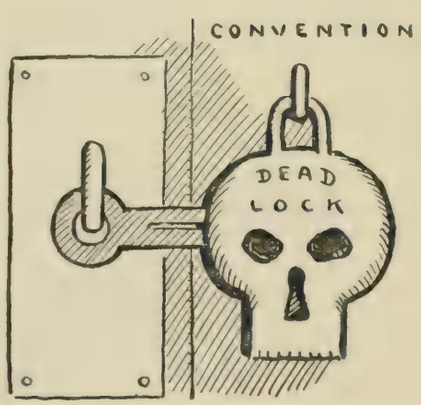
The Artist Picks the Winner

The Democracy

A composite portrait of the convention



Delegates-at-Large



Rhode Island's Revolution

By ORVILLE A. WELSH

THE conservatism of Rhode Island, the solidly intrenched position of its great industries, the influence of special privilege were described by Robert Cloutman Dexter in The Nation for February 27. The fight now being made by the progressive Democratic Governor, William S. Flynn, and a determined legislative minority to abolish the "rotten-borough" system by which the Republican Party has perpetuated its power in that State will serve to round out that picture. Not since 1842, when the present constitution was adopted, has there been such a good prospect of a successful assault on the citadel of the Republicans.

In 1922 Flynn, who had been a leader in the Democratic legislative fight against it, was triumphantly elected Governor on a platform that, among other things, called for a forty-eight-hour-work law for women and children, a constitutional convention to remove the inequalities of senatorial apportionment, abolition of the property qualification for voters, restoration to the Governor of authority to appoint State officials, and a change in the method of choosing sheriffs (still elected by the legislature in joint secret session and responsible to no one).

The Democrats in the Assembly with the aid of a few liberal Republicans passed the forty-eight-hour bill and a resolution for a constitutional convention. The Senate majority refused to permit a vote on either proposal.

The Senate is composed of one member from each town. No city is allowed more than one member. Thus Providence, with 250,000 population, sends one Senator (Democratic), who is outvoted by the two Republican senators from the rural communities of West Greenwich and Foster, population 367 and 905, respectively. Thirteen Rhode Island towns, with a total population of 17,807, return eleven Republicans, one Democrat, and one independent. Eleven cities, with a total population of 501,362, return eight Democrats and three Republicans.

Last year, under the leadership of Governor Flynn and Lieutenant Governor Felix A. Toupin, the Senate Democrats conducted an eighty-day filibuster against money bills, finally wresting minor concessions from the Republicans.

This year the filibuster was resumed, early in January. The House again passed the forty-eight-hour law and the constitutional convention proposal, and the senate filibuster prevented the Republicans from defeating these measures in the upper chamber. Day after day, week after week, the filibuster continued. The Republicans accused the Lieutenant Governor of refusing to recognize them; he only smiled, and intimated that sometimes it was necessary to fight fire with fire.

So it went until May 9, when after a more than usually heated partisan clash, the Republican president pro tem., Senator Arthur A. Sherman, declared that a motion to adjourn had been carried, and the Republicans left the Chamber in a body. The Democrats then proceeded with a rump session. They sat from early evening until 4 o'clock in the morning, passed the forty-eight-hour bill, a constitutional convention proposal, and a temporary appropriation bill, and confirmed a number of appointments by the Governor. The forty-eight-hour bill reached the Governor at midnight, and he signed it at 3 a.m.

The bill provides a penalty of $20 for each violation. Thus a mill-owner with 100 employees might have to pay $2,000 for a single violation by his shop. The mill-owners are determined to resist this legislation, which is now in the courts—the judges all being Republican.

Meanwhile the filibuster had tied up all State funds, and great pressure was brought to bear on the Democrats to permit action on appropriations. No State wage-earning employees have been paid since March 1, and money has been lent to them without security. A committee of the Rhode Island Bankers' Association called on Governor Flynn. He stood pat. The situation, he announced, was one for which the Republicans were clearly responsible in refusing to authorize a constitutional convention.

Among the institutions threatened with suspension were the State Sanitarium and the State College. The Democrats said this was regrettable, but that rotten boroughs must go and there was no time like the present.

The Republicans also refused to surrrender, and the filibuster continued. On June 17 open warfare broke out in the Senate Chamber, and there was a general riot in which 200 spectators, including many women, joined. A riot call was sent in and twenty policemen with riot guns hurried to the Senate Chamber, but before they arrived Governor Flynn had hastened from his office and, with the aid of sheriff's deputies, restored a semblance of order. The filibuster was kept up continuously. The presence of gunmen, thugs, etc., in the audience was charged by each side to the other. Each side had its own barbers in the Chamber to freshen up its members. The session was punctuated by occasional snores.

Early in the morning of June 19 the Lieutenant Governor, on whose ability to do without sleep the hopes of the Democrats depended, announced that the senators should leave the Chamber until the janitors had found the source of an unbearable odor near the rostrum. A newspaper saturated with a gas mixture was discovered behind the draperies. Four senators, three of them Republicans, were taken to a hospital with gas poisoning. At 8 a.m. June 19 the Senate recessed, in an effort to compromise, after a continuous session of forty-two hours.

A tentative agreement, embodying the calling of a constitutional convention, was reached at a conference in the Governor's office, but this was repudiated by James E. Dooley, a G.O.P. power, who is Reading Clerk of the Senate. Asserting that they "feared for their lives," the Republican senators accordingly refused to attend the session June 20, and twenty of them crossed the State line to avoid being arrested by order of Lieutenant Governor Toupin. The Democrats met, but lacked a quorum, and declared an adjournment until Tuesday, June 24.

The Republicans charge that Lieutenant Governor Toupin, during the conference in Governor Flynn's office, said, referring to the Republican senators: "By God, the next time we get them in here we'll kill 'em." Mr. Toupin explained that he did not mean actual physical extermination but "intended to convey the idea that we had made them sick by keeping them here so long in the present session, and that we would carry on until they either died from that sickness or submitted to the will of the people."

The situation is in a state of momentary suspension, but with public passion at high tide it is believed the Governor may yet have to call out the militia—to protect his political opponents!

The Akali Movement—An Heroic Epic

By AGNES SMEDLEY

AN heroic epic, as stirring as any of ancient times, is being enacted in the Punjab, north India, where the Akali Sikhs, unarmed and with nothing but their breasts as shields, stand as the bulwark of the Indian national movement. Against this bulwark the brutal violence of the British military in India has again dashed itself in vain. Under the benign rule of the British Labor Government another massacre as barbarous as that of Amritsar in 1919 was perpetrated in February, at Jaito, the Punjab, claiming at the least 130 dead and 300 wounded. As in the case of Amritsar, the full extent of the savagery may not be known for months.

The prisons of the Punjab are filled with those who are called Akali or "the Deathless." But they, whose faith grew in three centuries of persecution, and whose temples were reared on the bodies of their martyrs, do not shrink from martyrdom. These are the people who, martial in spirit and tradition, have, since the defeat of the Sikh nation in 1849, constituted the backbone of the British army in India. They are the ferocious fighters whom the Germans faced in the late war. They are the soldiers who, ignorant and driven by hunger, have won for England an empire in Asia. Gigantic in size, disciplined by military training, these are the people who have become nationally conscious and have at last accepted the faith and methods of Mahatma Gandhi.

The massacre at Jaito is the culminating attempt of the British Government to crush the Sikh religious reform movement, referred to generally as the Gurdwara reform movement, which, in its very modern phase, began after the Amritsar massacre in 1919. This movement, at first social and religious, has, under persecution, become political, and is now a movement of such importance that Lord Reading, from his Delhi palace, recently stated that "the Akali movement is the one branch of the national movement which yet remains to be destroyed."

The movement has grown out of the soil of India and out of the needs of the people. The aftermath of the war awakened the national consciousness of the Sikhs, and as a consequence many "affected" Sikh regiments were disbanded. Because of their awakened consciousness, aroused partly by the propaganda of Indian revolutionaries for the past twenty years, as well as because of the economic pressure, the disbanded soldiers have been drawn with other Sikhs into the Gurdwara reform movement—the movement to reform and reclaim the Gurdwaras or Sikh temples and shrines which are surrounded by large tracts of unused communal land. To accomplish this meant that the old corrupt Mahants, or priests in charge, had to be expelled and the Gurdwaras placed under the control and management of the Panth, the freely elected assembly of all followers of the Sikh religion. The reform movement meant also the return to early Sikh practices, such as the reintroduction of communal kitchens, where any person, regardless of caste or creed, may receive free food. But neither the lands nor the kitchens could be of service to the community unless the Gurdwaras were freed from the old priests, who, contrary to Sikh faith and rites, had come to regard their positions as hereditary and the Gurdwaras as their private property. Thus, the reform movement has had a social-revolutionary significance. For Sikhism, when founded by Guru Nanak, the first of the ten great teachers of Sikhism, in the fifteenth century, was also a social-revolutionary movement, which aimed at destroying all artificial barriers between man and man and establishing a free communal life. In 1849 the British defeated the Sikhs, who had, by that time, formed an empire of their own; and since the Indian War of Independence in 1857, which failed largely because of Sikh support of the British, the Sikhs have been notorious for their unthinking loyalty to their new masters. So complete was their degeneration that many of their places of worship, and later the Khalsa College in Amritsar, were under British guidance and influence.

The priests of the Golden Temple in Amritsar, and the priests of the Akal Takht, which directly faces the Golden Temple, were government appointees. The Akal Takht is the chief of the four "thrones," or seats of authority, of the Sikh religion, from which proclamations binding upon all Sikhs are from time to time issued. The use of the Akal Takht for British political purposes was therefore a foregone conclusion; and this was clearly demonstrated in 1913 in connection with the Komagata Maru affair when a few hundred Indians, under a Sikh leader, attempted to enter Canada, but were violently and illegally prevented from doing so and were forced to return to India. In Calcutta they were met by the British military and treated as criminals. Because of the resentment shown by them the military was ordered to fire, and twenty men were killed. Then it was that the government-appointed priests of Akal Takht issued a proclamation condemning the Sikhs who had taken any part in the Komagata Maru affair. This proclamation aroused the entire Sikh community to resentment, and the movement to reform the Sikh places of worship received a great impetus.

During the war the Gurdwara reform movement was held more or less in abeyance, while the Sikhs "fought for democracy" in Europe. But when, after the war, they showed signs of awakening, they were rewarded with the infamous Rowlatt inquisition acts and, in April, 1919, with the Amritsar massacre. Of the 500 Indians killed and the 1,500 wounded in the Jallianwala Bagh massacre in Amritsar, one-third were Sikhs. Then General Dyer, who was responsible for the massacre, had the insolence to present himself before the Golden Temple and the Akal Takht, and the government-appointed priests in charge awarded him with the robe of honor, a distinction which had for hundreds of years been awarded only to Sikhs who had rendered notable and distinguished service to Sikhism or to the public at large.

The use of the Akal Takht and the Golden Temple was once more blatantly demonstrated. And the iron entered the soul of the Sikhs. The Sikh League, a political body, was founded in December, 1919, at the same time that the Indian National Congress held its annual session in Amritsar; and the Akali and other newspapers were started as organs of Sikh opinion. In another month the Sikh League had adopted in its entirety the non-cooperation program of Mahatma Gandhi. Demands were made that the Khalsa College be returned to the Panth, and that the keys to the Golden Temple, the Akal Takht, and a number of other Gurdwaras likewise be returned to the elected representatives of the Sikh faith. Only after months of bitter struggle were these objects attained. The Mahant of the Akal Takht was then ousted, but only after the blood of the reformers had been shed in the temple. The manager of the Golden Temple was likewise dismissed, but he, like his colleagues of the Akal Takht, refused to render any financial statement. The Government later knighted him.

At an assembly of elected Sikhs from all parts of India, held before the Akal Takht in 1920, a committee of 175 Sikhs, called the Shromani Gurdwara Parbandhak Committee, was elected, the duties of which were (1) The control of all funds from the Gurdwaras; (2) the appointment of Mahants, on a salary basis; (3) the taking over in the name of the Panth of all lands and of all places of worship; (4) the opening and the support of free communal kitchens, which had been one necessary part of the Sikh faith.

In accordance with ancient Sikh custom all Mahants were next called upon to surrender themselves and all places of worship to the Panth. Organized companies, or Jathas, of Sikhs, under a vow of non-violence, went from Gurdwara to Gurdwara taking possession of all temples and lands in the name of the Panth. These groups, which gradually came to be known as Akali Jathas, because of the old spirit of courage and purity which they exhibited, were next organized by the S. G. P. Committee into the Akali Dal, or Akali volunteer army. Black was adopted as the color to be worn by them as an indication of the intensity of their belief and courage. From that time onward the Government looked upon all black-turbaned Sikhs as revolutionaries. As a reply the Government now began openly to support, not only morally but with force, those old priests who refused to recognize the authority of the Panth.

A typical instance of the action of the old Mahants is seen in the attempt to reclaim a temple called Nankana Sahib in 1921. The priest was called before the Panth and accused of leading a corrupt and immoral life, and was ordered to surrender the temple and communal lands. A Jatha of 100 Akalis, under the pledge of non-violence, went to the temple, but were murdered to the last man by the priest and a small army of assassins, and their bodies burned within the temple compound. Where the priest was able to buy guns and ammunition to perpetrate such an atrocity in a land where no man may possess a gun without the knowledge and license of the police has never been learned.

The test of the Akali struggle, however, came in 1922 in the attempt to reclaim the Gurdwara called Guru-ka-Bagh near Amritsar. Called before the Panth, the Mahant admitted the charges against him and surrendered the temple to the Akalis. But later, for some unknown reason, he claimed the communal lands as his private property. Each day the Akalis went to the communal lands to cut firewood for the free communal kitchen which they had opened. The Government ordered the Akalis to keep away from the land and established a cordon of military police to carry out the order.

Then began the great drama of satyagraha, a drama which tested the mettle of every Sikh who participated in it. At first Jathas of twenty-five Akalis were arrested each day for trespassing at Guru-ka-Bagh. Then the Government ordered that no more prisoners were to be taken, and military police, armed with lathis, or metal-bound clubs, were stationed on the roads leading to the Gurdwara. The Jathas grew from 25 to 100 each. As they approached, the English officer in charge of the police gave the signal for attack. Not an Akali raised a finger by way of resistance or retaliation, but instead the Jatha marched forward with clasped hands and to the strains of religious hymns. Only when the last Akali was unconscious or dead did the police withdraw and leave the bodies to the mercy of the special Akali ambulance corps organized for the purpose. The police gradually drew back to the Gurdwara, and the scenes enacted there are best described in the words of the Rev. C. F. Andrews, an English Christian missionary who is teacher in Tagore's school at Bolpur and has acted as special correspondent for the Manchester Guardian:*

> When we had gone some distance along the bank of the canal leading toward Guru-ka-Bagh, we saw two Sikhs in black turbans on the opposite bank waving their hands to us and pointing to the sky, where a great bird was circling in its flight toward Amritsar. Immediately all those who were in the tongas got down and eagerly pointed out the bird to me. They told me that every day, as soon as the beating at Guru-ka-Bagh began, the golden hawk took its flight to the Golden Temple in Amritsar. They said to me, "That was the bird. It was the golden hawk. It has gone to tell of the sufferings of the people." The whole scene—the intense faith of my companions, the look of reverence in their faces, the solemn awe mingled with joy—moved me very deeply. It put me in touch with the Akali reform movement in its spiritual aspect as perhaps nothing else could have done.
>
> Arriving at the Gurdwara I turned a corner of a building and reached a spot where I could see the beating itself. There were four Akali Sikhs with their black turbans facing a band of about a dozen police. They had walked slowly up to the line of the police just before I had arrived and they were standing silently in front of them at about a yard's distance. Their hands were placed together in prayer. Then, without the slightest provocation on their part, an Englishman lunged forward the head of the lathi, which was bound with brass. He lunged it forward in such a way that his fist which held it struck the Akali, who was praying, just at the collar bone with great force. It looked the most cowardly blow as I saw it struck. The blow was sufficient to fell the Akali and send him to the ground. He rolled over and slowly got up once more, and faced the same punishment over again. Time after time one of the four who had gone forward was laid prostrate by repeated blows, now from the English officer and now from the police who were under his control. On this and on subsequent occasions the police committed certain acts which were brutal in the extreme. I saw with my own eyes one of the police kick in the stomach a Sikh who stood helplessly before him. When one of the Akalis had been hurled to the ground and was lying prostrate a police stamped with his foot upon him, using his full weight. . . .
>
> The brutality and inhumanity of the whole scene was indescribably increased by the fact that the men who were hit were praying to God and had already taken a vow that they would remain peaceful in word and deed. The Akalis who had taken this vow had served in many campaigns in Flanders, in France, in Mesopotamia, and in East Africa. Now they were felled to the ground at the hands of English officials. . . . It was a strangely new experience to these men, to receive blows dealt against them with such force as to fell them to the ground, and yet never to utter a word or strike a blow in return. The vow they had made to God was kept to the letter. I saw no act, no look of defiance. A new lesson in moral welfare has been taught to the world.

*In the International Relations Section of The Nation for April 23 appeared an account by C. F. Andrews of the massacre of the Sikh volunteers by the British at the Sikh shrine at Jaito, described later in this article.

As the news of Guru-ka-Bagh spread throughout India, raising a storm of contempt for everything English, thousands of Sikhs daily arrived in Amritsar to offer themselves for the sacrifice. Many waited for days and weeks; all night their cry of "Sat Sri Akal" (Glory to the True, the Deathless!) and their hymns of praise to God could be heard. Each day a Jatha of 100 stood before the Golden Temple, took the vow of non-violence before the sacred book of the Sikhs; each man received a little wreath of white flowers about his black turban as indication that he was dedicated to the sacrifice. Seeing no end to the problem, and perhaps not having enough prisons, the Government finally attempted to save its face by setting up an Indian agent, who announced to the public that he had leased the communal lands at Guru-ka-Bagh and that the police were no longer necessary to protect him. In this manner the Government withdrew behind cover of an Indian tool, and the Akalis took possession of their land. Over 1,300 men, of whom 60 per cent were ex-soldiers, had been wounded and many had died under treatment or in prison. The number of prisoners totaled 5,605.

Throughout last year the S. G. P. Committee reclaimed Gurdwaras and brought them into order. Almost every Sikh had by this time become an Akali. Akalis and other Sikh leaders were continually arrested on the flimsiest excuses. In the vast mass, the Akalis did not depart from the method of non-violent civil disobedience. A group of sixty-one militant Akalis, however, known as the Babbar Akalis, were arrested and charged with conspiracy to "wage war against the King"—meaning, of course, King of England. The trial is still in process.

During the early winter of last year the Maharajah of Nabha, a Sikh prince ruling a small native state in the Punjab, was forced by the British Government to abdicate. His crime, ostensibly, was his sympathy for and support of the Akali movement. Each day after his forced abdication Sikhs went to the Gangsar Temple in Jaito, Nabha state, and prayed for him. The British authorities, who had taken charge of the affairs of Nabha, forbade this, and finally closed the temple. To the Sikhs this was an act of desecration, and each week Jathas of twenty-five Akalis left Amritsar pledged to reclaim the temple. Each was arrested on the Nabha frontier. Then the Government declared the S. G. P. Committee an outlaw organization and arrested all its members and other prominent Sikhs. Since that time four S. G. P. committees have taken the place of the first one, each one being arrested. Even now a committee operates regularly. The Akali volunteer army was likewise outlawed and its chief members imprisoned. The entire student body and teaching staff of the Khalsa College in Amritsar met a similar fate.

In reply, the Jathas grew from twenty-five in number to 500. On February 21 of this year a Jatha of 500, followed by 5,000 to 10,000 devout Sikhs, marched for two weeks through the peasant districts of the Punjab on its way to Jaito. The country traversed is very backward; each night the Jathas halted, called councils which were attended by 25,000 to 30,000 people, and explained the meaning of their movement and the meaning of the Indian national movement.

According to the official statement of the S. G. P. Committee, published throughout the Indian press, the massacre at the Gangsar shrine in Jaito was deliberately prepared by the British Government. In the immediate vicinity of the shrine, declares the committee, and concealed behind some buildings, the authorities erected a special barbed-wire inclosure to serve as a trap into which the Akalis were to be driven and beaten. The scene leading to the temple looked like a European battlefield. The road leading to the shrine was inclosed by a barbed-wire barricade on the one side and on the other bullock carts chained together. Behind the carts, villagers, armed with clubs and drunk with liquor which had been freely supplied them, were stationed in three rows. According to the statement of Pundit Malaviya, organizer and founder of the great Benares Hindu University, in a speech before the Central Legislative Assembly in Delhi, and according to the statement issued by the S. G. P. Committee, these villagers had been recruited from the surrounding villages, one from each family, on the threat of confiscation of land and expulsion from the state of any family which did not send one representative. A platoon of infantry, two detachments of cavalry, and sappers and miners were ready to receive the Jatha. Lewis guns were fixed at various places. And, more significant still, a trench had been dug around the temple, filled with water, and then strewn with grass and twigs to give it a deceptive appearance.

The Jatha realized its fate as it approached, but it was under a sacred pledge. In a calm and devotional mood, and singing hymns, it advanced. The English commander gave a signal with a flag, and fire was opened. The Akalis did not waver, but marched forward, with hands upraised and with voices raised in a mighty religious hymn. As their comrades fell about them they picked them up and marched on. Realizing that to stop them meant to kill the last man, the cavalry surrounded them. Some thirty Sikh women in the procession, one whose baby was killed in her arms, attended the wounded; upon their refusal to withdraw they were lashed and beaten. The dead and wounded lay for twenty-four hours without any medical assistance. Some of the dead bodies were piled on pyres, drenched with kerosene oil, and burned. Others were finally loaded on carts like so many sacks of grain, and taken to the fort where the prisoners were detained.

Since the Jaito massacre five more Jathas of 500 have reached Jaito, only to be arrested. As they leave Amritsar on their long march the streets and housetops are jammed with people crying "Sat Sri Akal." Each night they rest and educate the peasants. Crowds of people wait for hours along the routes, ready to offer them, free of all charge, food and drink.

The Akali epic is not yet ended. It has again raised India from the depression which followed Mahatma Gandhi's arrest. It has ceased to be purely one of religious reform. It is a social and political movement led by men who prefer martyrdom to surrender. Almost every Sikh now claims the honor of being an Akali, a name drawn from the deep wells of Sikh persecution which means one who is pure in spirit, "the Deathless."

The next article in the series on New Morals for Old will be Virtue and Women, by Isabel Leavenworth.

In the Driftway

ONE of the readers of a New York City daily wrote a letter to the editor recently complaining because he had noticed that the coffee-and-spice establishments which for years have made fragrant the old streets below Brooklyn Bridge were planning to move into roomier quarters out in the Borough of Queens. If this is true, the Drifter also wants to share in the complaint, for almost the nicest smells of Manhattan Island emanate from those streets.

* * * * *

AND while he is at it the Drifter wants to make another complaint that when most people talk or write about the smells of New York City they have in mind only the bad ones. Doubtless there are bad ones, but the Drifter maintains that the delightful odors of the metropolis far outnumber the objectionable ones. Theodore Dreiser has just written a book on "The Color of a Great City." The Drifter is thinking of writing a sequel called "The Smells of a Great City." There will be a chapter in it on the coffee-and-spice district.

* * * * *

OF course tastes in smells vary as they do in other matters. The Drifter would doubtless classify as delicious some odors which other people enjoy only mildly, or even find distinctly repugnant. For instance, the Drifter is inordinately fond of the odor of fresh asphalt. He loves to linger where they are putting down pavements, drinking in the perfume of boiling tar and new asphalt. Another favorite is bone fertilizer. A good many years ago the Drifter remembers there were several blocks along the waterfront of Baltimore where open sacks of bone fertilizer, fragrant and enticing, lined the sidewalks beside the dingy old warehouses. Some day the Drifter is going back to Baltimore. He will not disturb Mr. Mencken and his widely reputed wine cellar; he will make straight for the waterfront and those rows of bone fertilizer.

* * * * *

BOSTON, too, the Drifter loves, because of the smells of its hide-and-leather district. The Drifter leaves the Fenway and Commonwealth Avenue to others; he sniffs around the hide streets until it is time for his train to go.

* * * * *

BUT to return to New York. The coffee-and-spice district east of Broadway and below Brooklyn Bridge is, of course, only one of the regions of delightful odors. There is another coffee district—that where the green berries arrive—over on the Brooklyn piers at which the steamships from South and Central America dock. In order to get samples of the coffee the buyers plunge small metal tubes into the sacks, bringing out a few berries and also leaving a sizable hole. After a sack has been plugged several times it is fairly leaky, with the result that bushels of fragrant green coffee are scattered over the docks. Then, of course, there are the streets where fruits and vegetables are sold at wholesale, the molasses wharves on the North River, Italian districts with wonderful odors of cheese, the beguiling smells of East Side bakeries. But wait a minute! The Drifter does not wish to give away the material for "The Smells of a Great City," but rather to advertise it so insistently that some publisher will compel him to write the book.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Nordic Honor

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Nation is always interested in tales of oppression or injustice. Here is a tale that includes oppression, injustice, and all the other sins of tyranny.

There was an Armenian student, Mike Mugerdichen, attending the Colorado School of Mines at Golden. He is a naturalized American citizen, a property-holder, and, incidentally, a war veteran and a member of the American Legion. He committed the sin of falling in love with a local girl, a Nordic blonde, the daughter of a local mogul, by name Duval. He wrote a letter to the president of the school, Dr. Alderson, stating that he was going to marry the girl. The storm broke. The irate father assaulted Mugerdichen and pummeled him severely. Alderson advised Mike to withdraw from the school for a few days and when he did so refused to let him reenter or to give him any credit for the semester's work that he had completed. In addition to this persecution by the school, three attempts to murder Mugerdichen have actually been made—once by a mob of students and twice by revolver bullet, sources unknown. Mugerdichen keeps a little store on the Lookout Mountain Road in which he sleeps, and twice this shack was riddled with bullets. The first time he was warned and was not at home when the visitors called, the second time he was wounded slightly in the foot and narrowly escaped with his life. I saw the bullet holes and the bullets that Mike had been able to dig out of the walls. This was attempted murder, for at least three out of the dozen fired passed through the wall at the level of the bed.

These facts are extraordinary, but the attitude taken by the townspeople and students is even more extraordinary. Most of them are indifferent; they say complacently that "they" are just trying to scare Mike. Some commend Duval, saying that it serves "the damn foreigner" right for chasing an American girl. Only a few protest. The town authorities refuse to give Mugerdichen any protection, although he has appealed to both the sheriff and the district attorney. Duval is still a respected citizen and Alderson is not criticized, although he could have prevented the whole trouble had he so wished.

If lynch law is not the law in America, since when has every man been authorized to appoint himself jury, judge, and executioner? If lynch law is the law, as it seems to be, what crime did the man commit? I am one of those "damn foreigners" and such actions are still strange to me, so I would be much obliged to you if you could answer those questions.

Austin, Texas, June 1 WILLIAM F. ELLIS

Shoes, Eggs, and The Nation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I can hardly afford The Nation and I can't afford to be without it, and, above all, we can't afford to see The Nation go the way of the Freeman.

Last year I had to cut down, so I cut down on the highest and took the Liberator. Now I see you offer The Nation and the Liberator for $5.50, so I am going to make the effort. It seems like exploiting you to take advantage of this, but what is a fellow to do?

Last week I took some eggs over to Emigrant. Got a pair of work shoes for $6 and it took just forty dozen eggs to pay for them. Now, the labor expended in producing that pair of shoes, including the labor on the raw material and all, translated into wages, would buy perhaps twenty dozen eggs—the rest going for rent, interest, and profit.

And that's what is the matter with the American farmer.

Emigrant, Montana, May 30 J. F. M.

Financing Freedom

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The comment and discussion in this town about the action of Charles and Albert Boni in withdrawing "La Bas" at the threat of the district attorney and Mr. Sumner have taken many angles. It is admitted that the Boni brothers are new publishers, and also, in the world's wealth, quite poor.

Do their critics realize that to go to trial costs a great deal of money? Do they realize that if there should happen to be a conviction and an appeal were taken the cost of stenographer's minutes is large, the printing of the case and the briefs is expensive, and that even if the higher court finally says the conviction is improper and should never have been obtained all the large expenditure of money is not repaid by the state?

Do you remember the case against Harper and Brothers and Brainard for "Madeleine," in which the defendants were convicted, but on appeal to the Appellate Division the judgment of conviction was reversed and indictment dismissed? If Harper and Brothers and Brainard had been unable, financially, to appeal, the conviction would have remained against them. While many people would be sympathetic in a fight like this, how many would get together and raise funds so that the defendants could really have a proper defense?

I have had that lesson brought home to me in the case of the play "The God of Vengeance," now on appeal. Though a great many people stood up for the play in every way, yet the trial and the appeal are being financed by me. Assuming that I should win on appeal, the fact would remain that if I could not have financed myself the conviction would remain.

Only by the cooperation of individuals and groups who are in favor of freedom can these battles be fought. It is too much to ask the individual to bear the entire brunt of an attack by the State with its unlimited funds and by societies like the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice.

New York, June 1 Harry Weinberger

An Offer to Central Europe

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Some time ago, animated by a variety of apparently misguided altruism, I wrote a note for insertion in The Nation begging persons in Central Europe who found it difficult to secure American periodicals to communicate with me. I desired to send them what magazines I could and also, for cultural purposes, to correspond and exchange ideas on topics of mutual interest. I was rather surprised at the paucity of the response and at the very much smaller number who acknowledged even my first sending of magazines.

Will you insert this note for me? Surely there must be half a dozen Europeans who would like to exchange intelligent ideas with a foreigner and get American periodicals in the bargain!

Beltsville, Maryland, May 1 T. Swann Harding

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I wish to apply to the readers of The Nation with the following request. I am much interested in English literature (modern of course), but it is impossible for me to buy books, as, first of all, it is quite impossible to obtain books in Lithuania and I have no means to buy American editions. Therefore, I would like to ask the readers of The Nation who have books by modern American writers, as, for instance, London and Sinclair, which they have read to send them to me. I am prepared to send in exchange Russian or German books. My address is Kovno, Lithuania, Poste-Restante.

I hope that I may find people who will answer my appeal and I thank The Nation in advance for printing my letter.

Kovno, Lithuania, May 2 B. E. Birga

Dreams

By ROLFE HUMPHRIES

He thought that he had buried her
  So deeply, deeply underground
That her dead body would not stir
  Nor her stopped mouth make fluttering sound.

And then he flourished like a tree,
  New leaves of grace began to show,
And all his friends rejoiced that he Could have, at last, his chance to grow.

But what they could not see or know
  Was that the fiery sap which fed
His brilliant daily strength, would go
  At night down to its old dark bed.

Thus, sensitive in sleep, he found
  That on occasions he would feel
In that unconscious underground
  A palpable, direct appeal.

In an environment that suits
  A readjusted buried soul
She keeps on tugging at his roots
  Like an unkind, aggressive mole.

Books

An American Career

Alfred E. Smith. By Henry Moskowitz. Thomas Seltzer. $3.50.

THERE is no "Al" Smith myth. There couldn't be. Too many thousands have seen and heard the man. Too many millions in the most populous State of the Union have seen and felt his works. He is real—flesh and blood. No press agent, no propaganda, no newspaper connivance has had much part in making his career.

Yet it is high romance—in the most approved American tradition. Horatio Alger couldn't have done better. "Al, the Newsboy," or "From Newsboy to Governor!" A poor lad in New York's slums. His father dying at an early age and leaving the boy to support his widowed mother. He leaves school, sells papers, works in a fish market, wins favor in his district, enters politics, is elected to the Assembly, "saws wood" there until he knows the game, and begins to climb steadily, surely. He becomes Governor of the largest American commonwealth, and by all odds the most complex and difficult to govern. He is a superb executive. Even in an adverse political landslide he runs over a million votes ahead of his ticket. At the next election the voters overwhelmingly return him to office. At the national convention . . . One pauses and puts down the book—unfinished. This is good juvenile stuff if only the realities . . .

But this isn't fiction. Delve into the record. Henry Moskowitz has compiled it. It's a campaign document, of course, but then the facts, the verbatim reports, debates, messages speak for themselves. Here are actions writ into the political and social history of the State. Here is eloquence that rests on simplicity and sincerity. Here is democracy that is not demagoguery. Here is an instinctive, an unwavering faith in the American experiment. Here are works, the fruits of that faith. Here are truthfulness, vision, and courage. Here are decency and kindliness.

No one who is genuinely interested in America and its future can afford not to read this biography, written by a social worker and student of affairs—a realist and idealist. It isn't just an account of the rise of one American named Smith, although it's a good story merely as such. It's an act from the great American drama, a piece of our national epic. And just now it's a challenge.

They have said of him—they have whispered "He's a Catholic," as if a man's race or creed should debar him from any office. It is not for him, but for the voters who cherish the American ideal to accept this challenge. Yet he himself throughout has met its furthermost implications. From the first he has been the champion of the public school—not with empty phrases, though he needed all his verbal equipment—but by raising teachers' inadequate salaries, equalizing the pay for women, and by vetoing the Lusk teachers' "loyalty" bill, so that intellectually honest and independent-minded teachers could continue in their calling without loss of self-respect.

He gave the State local option for Sunday baseball—not the most important measure per se, but considerable in its implications. "I am of the firm opinion," said he, "that those . . . who oppose all recreation on Sunday . . . have no right, in law or in morals . . . to impose their views upon the majority who disagree with them."

They have said of him that he was "wet," and the Republican Party, whose elected President never allowed the Eighteenth Amendment to interfere with previously formed habits, would doubtless try to make this an issue, hoping that the shout of "alcohol" would somehow wash it clean of oil. But whatever his personal views—never hypocritically concealed—his public record is, despite widely held misconceptions to the contrary, a rigid and vigorous adherence to the law of the land. Those who doubt it should read his clear memorandum on his approval of the Mullan-Gage law repeal. Only a fanatic would dispute his logic.

Governor Smith's record of achievements is too long and varied to detail here. But the American people have the duty of familiarizing themselves with it, and a stake in doing so. They will find it as close an approach to absolute zero in buncombe and blather as may be found anywhere in the political game that is so largely fashioned of these two ingredients.

ERNEST GRUENING

This Oil Age

The World Struggle for Oil. By Pierre l'Espagnol de la Tramerye. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

The Oil Trusts and Anglo-American Relations. By E. H. Davenport and Sidney Russell Cooke. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Oil and the Germs of War. By Scott Nearing. Ridgewood, N. J.: Nellie Seeds Nearing, Publisher. 60 cents.

Die Weltinteressen der englischen Petroleumindustrie. By Sydney Jessen. Berlin: Finanzverlag.

WHEN the history of this decade is written, a whole series of events now innocently attributed to miscellaneous causes will probably be summarized as aspects of the race for control of the empire of oil. Americans hardly suspect that their country has an "oil policy"; yet Europeans assume that it was because of oil that the United States so long failed to recognize Mexico, that Mexico was barred from the League of Nations, that the United States still fails to recognize Soviet Russia, that in 1921 she paid Colombia $25,000,000 damages for the rape of Panama in 1903, that she toppled the Tinoco Government in Costa Rica, helped the Leguia Government in Peru with financial advisers and bankers' loans, and denounced the League of Nations mandatory system. An American might add that oil dominates the attitude of the European Powers toward Soviet Russia, Rumania, and Turkey, dictates British policy in Mesopotamia, Persia, and the Caucasus, has something to do with British expeditions into Tibet, determines Japanese-Russian relations, and was not without a bearing upon the British decision to establish a naval base at Singapore, close to the oil-fields of the Dutch East Indies.

Modern war is fought with oil. Aviation is impossible without it; gasoline-driven motor trucks feed the land armies; and the navies have turned from coal to oil. Modern industry increasingly depends upon oil. We are living through a new economic revolution. Fifty years ago the world got along with ten million barrels of crude oil a year; ten years ago it used four hundred million barrels; this year the production will be close to a billion barrels. Fifty years hence this meteoric career of the oil industry may well appear as the dominant motif of our era.

In the kerosene period of the seventies and eighties the United States—or the Standard Oil Company—had almost a world monopoly; in 1898 the Russian oil-fields suddenly leaped to supremacy; four years later our mid-continental fields drove American production far above Russian; and now we produce two-thirds of the world's supply. Within the present century Mexican oil attained superiority to all the other fields in the world combined except those of the United States, and then began a rapid decline; today Persia is producing as much as Mexico did a decade ago and promises to surpass her; and enthusiasts predict a like course for Venezuelan oil, which, like that of South Persia, is British-controlled. Two years ago the experts were bewailing the exhaustion of American oil; we were producing most of the oil, they said, but we had only 14 per cent of the world's reserves. Suddenly, the South California fields were developed, wholly unreckoned in previous estimates; and from threats of exhaustion we jumped into an era of "overproduction." Three or four years ago Standard Oil was fighting the great British oil trusts in every continent in the world, and had a law passed here barring British companies from American oil-fields unless every corner of the British Empire gave American companies equal rights with British; today the Standard has formed an alliance with the British trusts, and is fighting Harry Sinclair in Persia, Russia, and South America. Fiction could hardly be more fascinating and amazing than this story of oil, only half-known outside the oil companies and the banks that finance them, and hardly understood even by the men in the state departments and foreign offices who write the notes that are the outward, polite expression of the bitter oil wars.

Yet oil is only just beginning to have a literature of its own. Francis Delaisi peeked behind the diplomatic curtain in his "Oil: Its Influence on Politics" (Labour Publishing Company) in 1920. His was perhaps an over-dramatized account of the struggle of British and American oil interests, culminating in the smashing British victory in the San Remo agreement. Pierre de la Tramerye gives a fuller and more complete history of oil. His story stops in 1921, with the British, as he thought, "in exclusive possession of 90 to 97 per cent of the future world production of oil." Future production is not to be estimated so certainly; no one, really, knows much about it. And in these last few years the Standard has not been idle. No one, however, has told the story of the rise of oil and of the tremendous world struggle between the British and American trusts more comprehensively and objectively than this Frenchman, who has a pleasant cynicism about British and American trusts and about both governments. It never occurs to him that anyone would doubt or deny that Mr. Hughes does the Standard's bidding.

Scott Nearing's pamphlet gives an excellent brief résumé of the essential facts about oil. He is concerned with the effects of oil on the nations. More oil wars, he thinks, will follow, unless the control of oil is taken out of the hands of profiteers and put into the hands of international groups of producers—a sort of proletarian league of nations. Before that comes, however, oil will find itself controlled by an international alliance of capitalists. The great oil trusts are losing their national character. Stinnes and Sinclair and the Soviet Government seem to be allying in opposition to the British trusts and the Standard, aided by Charles E. Hughes. Persia is the most interesting battlefield today. Our Government has sent financial advisers to Persia; Harry Sinclair is negotiating for Persian oil from the Russian frontier; and the Standard and the Anglo-Persian share rights to a concession, granted in Czarist days to a Russian but canceled by the Soviet-Persian treaty of 1921.

Messrs. Davenport and Cooke are Englishmen, and see through British spectacles. Theirs are the spectacles, however, of the British oil companies rather than of the British Government. They want their Government to sell its interest in the Anglo-Persian, and set the oil companies free to chase profits without concern for imperial policy. Obviously they write from the inside. They have a vivid style reminiscent of Keynes at his best; the story of Mr. Hughes's fight for "American interests" in Mesopotamia, and how he subsided entirely when the British gave the Standard a share, ignoring all other "American interests," is a significant and revealing chapter in the economic history of American diplomacy. "The Oil Trusts" is the completest and most recent account of the world struggle for oil, well documented, and provided with a valuable appendix summarizing the oil resources of the world. The reader can redress the bias of the authors, who hope for a profiteers' alliance between British and American oil trusts to exploit the world. "Are the oil-fields of the world to lie dormant," they ask, "because the native inhabitants above prefer to graze their flocks, or turn a few sods for growing crops? It is not unreasonable to bring the diplomatic arts to bear upon countries with dog-in-the-manger policies which neither develop nor allow others to develop their oil resources." Those pleasant words, "diplomatic arts," used in such a connection reveal the sinister philosophy of Anglo-Saxon imperialism; but doubtless most Americans agree with it.

Dr. Jessen's pamphlet is a study of the interlocking directorates of the British oil interests as of 1920. Its fascinating colored charts provide a valuable graphic appendix to the more comprehensive works of the British and French authors.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

The Disinherited

Sembal. By Gilbert Cannan. Thomas Seltzer. $2.
The Dream. By H. G. Wells. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

LIKE everything else the novel of social discontent grows more complicated as it grows older. Time was when the mere terms radical and conservative were sufficient labels for characters, and the different members of the two groups were lumped together like the good and the bad or the pure and the impure in sentimental romance. Nowadays, however, we know that labels make strange bedfellows; that radicalism, for instance, draws into its ranks people of such diverse aims and characters that only the cohesion natural to a minority holds them together and that, in consequence, the study of the different kinds of radicalism is more fruitful and important than the more obvious confronting of the conservative and disruptive temperaments.

Everyone must have observed, for instance, that in general there are two sorts of radicals: one sort longs for the time when, thanks to the development of science and government, everybody will belong to the cultured and leisure class; while the other insists that in that blessed "time to come" nobody will. One group is interested in the more equitable distribution of wealth in the largest sense, and the other, so it seems at least to an unsympathetic eye, is more interested in the equitable distribution of poverty. The hatred with which the members of this second group speak of leisure, luxury, and wealth (most excellent things in themselves) and the passion with which they hope for their complete elimination seem to make them the modern representatives of the Puritans and to suggest Macaulay's hoary old paradox about those who opposed bear-baiting not because it gave pain to the bear but because it gave pleasure to the people. Having suffered so much and having been so completely deprived of the good things of life that they have lost even the appetite for them, they would strip existence of those superfluities which for most people alone make it worth enduring. In their Utopia labor will be continuous, art prima facie evidence of the crime of leisure, all recreation for some useful end and love—the last refuge of useless, irrational joy—deprived of its non-utilitarian functions by being confined to state-controlled stud-farms. The members of this class, which does exist and must be reckoned with, may properly be called the Disinherited. They have been deprived by the injustice of society of their heritage and they wish to destroy it.

Mr. Cannan's new novel—first of a promised series—has for its hero a young Jew with all the passion and inward disharmony of his race. Born in a London slum, he adds to the bitterness accumulated by a hundred generations of outcasts that distilled from his own experiences of want and humiliation, and the poison so corrupts his life that he is never at peace either with society or with himself. Mr. Cannan's method is sufficiently objective to make it somewhat difficult to say just how he evaluates the character which he so acutely and with so much originality analyzes, but to me his Sembal, a typical example of the Disinherited, seems to be tortured and twisted into a form so completely unlovely as to awaken only a pity tinged with disgust. Contemptuously patronized by a rich relative, Sembal manages to acquire a degree at the University of London, and he develops a "social consciousness" of the most savage sort. All capacity for enjoyment, all susceptibility to the pleasures of society or art is dead or dying of starvation. Because he himself was fed upon bread smeared with an onion he sees no reason why anyone else should have much more, and he looks forward with savage intensity to the revolution that will "eliminate" everything except machinery and the necessities of existence. Once when he was a starving child and was brought for the first time to the house of his patron, where the atmosphere was heavy with wealth, he had vomited upon the floor, and that nausea continues to overcome him always at the spectacle of any pleasure or any comfort. He has, when confronted with any sort of serenity, what Mr. Cannan acutely calls a "nostalgia for the Ghetto" and that nostalgia, it may be remarked in passing, seems somehow related to that temperamental need for suffering, lamentation, and self-torture which makes some of the characters of the Old Testament such unpleasant persons. Volcanic passion he has, and that passion is admirably communicated in a very tense book, but it is a passion which, again like that of the Old Testament, does nothing but consume the man who generates it. Mr. Cannan leaves his hero at the moment when, having failed completely to understand or be understood by his acquaintances among the English radicals, he is on the point of suffering an undesired absorption into the ranks of the money-making wing of his race. Doubtless his career will be developed in the next volume, but at the moment when we leave him even his conservative acquaintances seem to have the better of it: they at least know what they want and get some of it, whereas he knows only what he hates. An analysis of such a character is bound to be a little repellent, but the book is one of undoubted power and importance.

Mr. Wells's new romance tells of a superman who recounts to his friends a dream in which he lived through a life in the present century. This framework permits the apparently needless confusion, stupidity, and cruelty of our times to stand out in high relief. It goes without saying that Mr. Wells's Utopianism is of the sort exactly the reverse of Sembal's; most of the other things about the book also go without saying. One is not surprised to find that Mr. Wells's customary verve is continually in evidence, but neither is one surprised that this, his forty-ninth volume, does not reveal any new side to his mind.

J. W. KRUTCH

A Philosopher of Liberalism

Pan-Europa. Von Richard N. Coudenhove-Kalergi. Wien: Pan-Europa Verlag.

Krise der Weltanschauung. Von Richard N. Coudenhove-Kalergi. Wien: Pan-Europa Verlag.

Adel. Von Richard N. Coudenhove-Kalergi. Wien: Pan-Europa Verlag.

IT is almost an old story now how the World War and the ensuing peace illustrated nothing so clearly as the desperate futility of that liberalism which was the chief note of the nineteenth century in both politics and philosophy. The peace left Europe red and white, and terror, whether communist or fascist, became familiar and expected. Moderates, democrats, liberals were left. But their voices had no power because they had no conviction. These men were the leaders of a cause confessedly lost. The best they could do was to exercise a negative function, to plead, however feebly, against the grossest excesses of the parties of the right and of the left. In their innermost minds they knew that they alone stood for reason, tolerance, peace. Their inner knowledge was without vision; their outer activity was without persuasiveness and even without tangible aim.

This situation has been changed by the efforts of a notable personality, a thinker both intrepid and profound. I do not know the present membership of the Pan-European Union founded by Dr. Coudenhove-Kalergi; I do not think that its immediate numerical membership matters. What is abundantly clear is that Dr. Coudenhove has made a neo-liberalism possible in Europe, that his political vision arises from an ethical and therefore a metaphysical view of the totality of things, that in it are persuasiveness, hope, power.

He dismisses the accusation of Utopianism at once by the final and sufficient appeal to history which proves that every great reform in human affairs began as one solitary thinker's dream. Utopia becomes reality as soon as it is the Utopia of a great number of powerful personalities. We can build the City of God—by building it. The layer of the first stone is a Utopian, of the ten-thousandth as likely as not a "practical statesman."

Dr. Coudenhove rightly traces the present downfall of Europe to causes that, broadly speaking, are philosophical in their character. Christendom existed by and through an identification of the religious and scientific view of the universe. The enlightenment destroyed that identity. The modern world of science and invention, of enormous material wealth and material complications had therefore, properly speaking, no Weltanschauung, no ethos at all, no binding principle, and hence proceeded, under the false guise of democracy, in fact amid the scramble of rival voracities, to destroy itself. Solitary thinkers, Goethe, Nietzsche, socialists and pacifists, sowed the seeds of a new philosophy and a new order. But until material disaster overtook Europe these seeds did not germinate. War and wealth ruled; a false notion of honor, both personal and national; on the one hand complete cynicism, on the other a faith in discarded myths.

What is needed, then, to rebuild this falling world is first its grounding in new ethical conceptions: the substitution of human honor for the feudal honor of the tyrant and murderer; the recognition of form and power in place of the Manichaean antithesis of body and soul; the notion of virtue as consisting in the attainment of the highest specific beauty through action, the greatest possible heightening of life and love. I shall not go into the details of Dr. Coudenhove's philosophy. It will suffice, after this statement of some of its fundamental concepts, to add that he is an absolute pacifist, a socialist, and yet an undeviating believer in aristocracy—in the necessity for qualitative leadership.

"The aristocracy of feudalism is in decay," he writes; "the aristocracy of the spirit is barely emerging. The interregnum is called democratic; it has been in fact the empire of the pseudo-aristocracy of money." He welcomes the Russian experiment in so far as it illustrates the political creative power of a small body of intellectual aristocrats, and finds the union in leadership of Lenin, son of the minor landed nobility of Russia, and Trotzky, Jewish intellectual, reformer, and internationalist, symbolic and prophetic of the world of his vision. In that Europe of the future, of the immediate future, he hopes, the wisest children of the old aristocracy, stripping themselves, as he has done, of title, power, arrogance, will unite with the pacifist, prophetic, internationalist sons of Israel, to heal the present wounds that afflict both the body and the soul of mankind. From this union there can arise a polity that can be truly noble, since it will blend the paganism of Goethe with the teachings of the Jew Jesus—it will both love beauty and practice goodness.

In the realm of practical politics Dr. Coudenhove's ideas are definite and fruitful. What he sees actually emerging in the present world is the federative tendency of states. The British Empire is a federation, so is the Soviet Republic, so will Pan-America ultimately be. The salvation of Europe must come by ceasing from internecine warfare and adopting the federative idea for itself. Hence within Europe the immediate aim must be the reconciliation of Germany and France, in Central Europe of the Germans and Czechs. Dr. Coudenhove is himself a German and hopes to see a neutralized Vienna the capital of the new Pan-European federation. But he stands, as few men do, above nations and races, he stands at the pure center of human thought and effort. His voice is one of the most heartening of our distracted age. The robbers and warriors of the world will call him an unpractical fool, the myth-mongers a blasphemer, the anti-Semites a traitor to his blood. These accusations are, of course, but the marks of his creative and prophetic character. We need not despair of Europe while an increasing number of men and women hear his voice and work in the spirit of his teachings.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Prepare! Prepare!

Days of Delusion. By Clara Endicott Sears. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

IT was a lucky prophet who foretold the end of the world in the year 1843, for that year was signalized by a comet of remarkable brilliancy. William Miller, of New York State, had a system that foretold the exact date of the second advent, and that date was presaged by the famous reign of fire, or falling stars of 1833, and confirmed not only by the comet of a decade later, but by the exceptionally wonderful solar haloes of that year.

The system itself was pure bosh. As one critic put it:

> Behold how clearly it is shown by four methods of calculation that the world is doomed to destruction in Anno Domini 1843! The calculation and results will surely be undeniable if days in prophecy are always to be computed as years, and if a time signifies 360 years, and if the assumed references are correct, and if the dates are all right, and so on to the end of the chapter of contingences.

In a word, William Miller was a prophet who was not afraid of keeping off the premises. He supposed this, and he supposed that. In spite of the age of Methuselah he was willing to suppose that a day meant a year, and that the prophet Daniel was not looking around at contemporary events but looking forward into the far future. So Miller propounded the theory that by adding up such dates as the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and the setting up of the "abomination of desolations," or Papal Civil Rule, anyone could arrive at the date of the end of the world as 1843. There are three other ways of bringing about the same calculation. But what is a calculation between friends, so long as they follow Mark Twain's prescription for writing history: "First get your facts, then distort them to suit yourself"?

Now Miller gained his followers not only because Yankees were fond of figuring, but also because they were fond of the very antithesis of arithmetic, namely, allegory. They could turn to the Millerite "Midnight Cry" and behold great wonders in the heavens, such as the Beast with Seven Heads, and the Great Red Dragon, the latter in turn having seven crowns, signifying the successive forms of Roman government—senatorial, consular, imperial, and so on. H. G. Wells's "Outline of History" cannot hold a candle to this easy way of learning history, for Miller's charts throw light not only on the past, but on the future. Thus "the Great Red Dragon's tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven and did cast them to the earth." Now as the said dragon was a sign of the end of all things, and as the stars of heaven fell to the earth in 1833, ergo, let sinners beware, and let the Saints prepare their ascensions robes.

"Days of Delusion" is called "a strange bit of history." The Millerite craze was certainly that. Convinced by the prophet's calculation, stirred by the pictures of horrible beasts, and hypnotized by the Millennial Harp—which sounded the alarm of "the waking up of nations, Gog and Magog to the fray"—sober and thrifty Yankees flocked to the camp-meetings and literally sold their farms for a song. Some even gave away their goods, others smashed their furniture, and all seemed possessed to get rid of all earthly possessions save the ascension robe, which the best people considered the only appropriate garb for the coming event.

Such were the Yankee notions of the early forties. How the people were worked up to them may be seen from a sample sermon of Miller's chief spokesman, Elder Joshua V. Himes:

> My friends!—the Day of the Lord is at hand!—and when it cometh you and I shall pass into another state of being—a being of eternal glory or eternal torment! Believe it! Believe it! It cometh suddenly, in an instant of time, all things continuing as they were up to the very instant of the bursting in of the Lord upon the world. You are gazing along the sky—you see a lightning light along it—it is the Lord! You are speaking to your wife or your child by the fireside—an awful thunder breaks upon you—it is the Lord! You are sleeping in your bed—you hear a fearful crash—it is the Lord! You are awake in an hour of midnight darkness—you behold a fearful stream of brightness blaze upon you—it is the Lord! You are riding in the cars, or upon your horse, or buying in the market, or working in the field, or busied in your garden, or looking over your accounts, or getting bread for your family, or eating it with them, or reading a book—you feel the earth tremble with a fearful shaking under your feet—it is the Lord! You go to the door to meet a mother, a brother, or a friend—you meet the Lord! Awful day! Awful coming!—"Prepare to meet your God!" Prepare to meet His day! Prepare to meet His judgment! Prepare! Prepare!

Clara Endicott Sears gives a most interesting and vivid picture of those troublous times, with their incredible superstitions and the usual aftermath of emotional religious excitement, such as the breaking up of families, bankruptcy, and insanity. Miller's followers were numbered by the thousands. The movement extended from Maine to Georgia, and as far west as Kansas, but the most violent symptoms appeared in Boston and its vicinity. Whittier, the Quaker poet, gave a mildly sarcastic account of the "Fireeaters" who declared that all the saints who accepted the teachings of the prophet and were prepared would enter the kingdom in April next—all others would be burned to a cinder by an avenging God.

"Days of Delusion" offers much valuable material to a student of the rise and decline of religious cults in America. It lacks, however, a certain historic perspective. Similar adventist views were held a generation before Miller's day by the Campbellites with their Millennial Harbinger. Now the Campbellites were partly responsible for the proud title of our friends the Mormons, or "Latter-Day Saints," as they prefer to call themselves. The latter days seem a long way off. They generally do when business is prospering. But the Salt Lake Saints with their Millennial Star never staked all their money on one number, such as the famous '43, when the Millerite Saints were to ascend with such vigor as to take the roof off their Boston tabernacle.

This book has but a slight historic background. Its merit lies chiefly in its collection of anecdotes. One will bear repetition. Theodore Parker and Ralph Waldo Emerson were approached by a fanatic Millerite. The latter thought it his duty to warn them of the momentous event of which they appeared so unconscious. So he walked up to them in an excited manner and said: "Gentlemen!—do you know—do you realize that the world is coming to an end today?" Mr. Parker said: "It does not concern me, for I live in Boston." And Mr. Emerson answered: "The end of the world does not affect me; I can get along without it."

WOODBRIDGE RILEY

Opium

The Ethics of Opium. By Ellen N. La Motte. The Century Company. $1.75.

FOR many years Miss La Motte has made an intensive study of the opium situation from its international aspects, until today she has become an authority on this difficult and highly complex subject. In this, her most recent book, she presents the problem as it exists today in the producing and consuming countries of the world. She reviews the producing countries in which opium is raised—India, China, Persia, and Turkey. It is Indian opium which supplies the so-called "opium-consuming countries" of the Far East, where it is sold through licensed shops under the control of colonial governments, and consumed either by eating or smoking. For each of these colonies she gives careful and accurate statistics as to consumption, the revenues derived from this consumption, and compares this opium revenue with the total revenue and expenditure of each country. The whole presents a striking collection of data, drawn from official documentary sources. This careful attention to detail, with footnotes citing authority for each statement, gives the book a unique value and makes it of great importance to anyone who wishes to become familiar with the opium problem. We see opium used to enhance the revenues of colonies, and Miss La Motte shows us to what extent the roots of this traffic strike deep into the economic strata of these colonies and why it will be difficult to eradicate them.

Country by country, with relentless clarity and definite statement, the whole situation is laid before us. We see Persia, a country which produces the richer opium used by the manufacturer to make into morphia, with her opium revenues pledged as security for a foreign loan; we see Siam, a consuming country, so bound by treaties that she cannot levy import duties on opium and so tax it out of the country; we see China, the helpless victim of a century of exploitation, still unable to free herself from outside interference, and now raising opium again in sheer despair of ever improving her condition. If, as most of us believe, the only way to end the opium evil is to strike at the source, i.e., production, this book presents a clear exposition of what production means to all these Oriental countries; the reasons for maintaining this production at a high level, and the obstacles—such as financial interests—which make efforts to reduce this output a most difficult question.

No one interested in the drug problem in America can understand our domestic difficulties without some understanding of the situation in the Orient. The two are interlocked. Production, to satisfy the Orient, means an overflow which leaks out into the West.

Miss La Motte has confined her researches to the Far

East, and has not gone into the question of the manufacture of alkaloids in Europe or America. And though this question of alkaloids is one that affects us, we must first understand what is going on today in the Far East. Here the question is presented clearly and precisely. And, curiously enough, although full of statistics, the book makes anything but dry reading—an achievement difficult to attain.

STEPHEN G. PORTER

A Survey of Human Logicality

The Psychology of Reasoning. By Eugenio Rignano. Translated by Winifred A. Holl. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.50.

WHILE readily interested in intelligence as a going concern—much as we accept the benefits of science without insight or enthusiasm for the "pure" research from which all such blessings flow—we remain indifferent to speculations as to its nature and source. Just what measure and manner of a rational creature man is by nature and has taught himself to become by the schooling of experience and the uninviting discipline of logic is a most pertinent and by no means unprofitable inquiry. Professor Rignano's treatment of the problem is attractive and comprehensive. Reasoning, he maintains, is inherent in the biological situation; it is an evolutionary mechanism for meeting needs. Consequently, its psychology derives from the prelogical stages of need-meeting responses. With them it shares an affective determination. The emotional drive inheres; pain and pleasure teach; interest follows desire; men do and think about what they care for; feeling spurs will and sets the pace and trend of intelligence. Life registers and memory trails as disposition; attention selects and makes experience what the organism by original or acquired nature attends to; curiosity is the affective name of the intellectual instinct. The rest is elaboration.

The steps are fairly clear. To emerge from the limitation of the present, sensory, immediate stimulation; to reach the stage in which "out of sight" is not "out of mind" is already a fair, even a far, advance. Habit or decision is held in suspense; caution and doubt arise. But chiefly under the affective push of curiosity, of prying and trying, of error and chance-success, the embryonic logician bungles through. He reaches human estate when he experiments in thought instead of with things, solves situations in his mind's eye or on paper, anticipating—more significantly—broadening his control and reach of behavior. This step focuses upon the essential mechanism—the symbol: the part for the whole, the idea for the thing, or in the quantitative evolution from fingers to stones, to tallies, to numbers, to x's and y's, and all the mysteries of higher mathematics. This aspect of the procedure has been challenged: Can one by taking thought add to one's mental stature? Is deduction an ingenious lifting oneself up by one's bootstraps? The psychological answer is "yes" and "no." Making the implicit explicit, the vague clear, the meaningless significant, the chaotic orderly, is helpful and each in its metier confers the benefit of control; and tools are amazingly useful extensions of the hands that alone can fashion and use them.

Yet the more intricate and the more engaging phases of human rationality appear only when the data move toward and in the shifting sphere of socialized human problems, facing the psychological battery of affective forces. The mystic, the aesthetic, the consoling; prejudice, prestige, established interests, cherished goals: all divert the mind on convictions bent from the straight and narrow path of logic. There is abundant logical weakness: sophistry, fallacy, specious shuffling, hasty generalization, feeble analogy abound without limitation of time or place. From Athens to Boston, or Boeotia to Main Street, the same practices persist. But humanity is fortunately diverse, and there is a saving minority; and the critical voice of truth is not quite lost in the wilderness, nor yet broadcasted by radio; also the types of men divide according to their logical predilections.

Professor Rignano's survey proceeds eclectically, yet ever suggestively. It includes an excursion into the pathology of reasoning by way of the dream with its characteristic departure from canonical or experiential logic, toward the extravagance of the paranoiac, the flightiness of the maniac, the confusion of the stricken, and the incoherence of the degenerating brain. In such aberrations he traces his chief principle of interpretation, sending the spotlight upon the affective process; the distorted thinking of the unbalanced mind is due to loss of emotional poise. Reasoning in its decay as in its origin plays a second part to emotion, though the lines and the plot follow the idiom of thought. We rationalize conduct not only to secure the prestige or the solace of rationality but for the ready articulation of the urges that keep life going. The emphasis is timely and fits the temper of modern psychology. Reasoning is a compromise between the claims of reality and the invitations of desire; it applies to the integral calculus and the paranoiac delusion. "It is a mad world, my masters," or at least a foolish one, because the human mind is and will remain imperfectly rationalized, and that because it is too heavily emotionalized. Yet there is no reason for despair or dismay or even depression. Thinking is far more interesting and the human scene more diversified because of the twin rooting of human thought in psychology and logic.

JOSEPH JASTROW

Books in Brief

The Education of Ernest Wilmerding. By Edward Chichester Wentworth. Covici-McGee Company. $2.

Like "Bunk," this book was written by a successful business man to criticize industrialism. Unlike "Bunk," it is amateurish, labored, and prosy. To convert a radical in Chicago of the 1880's seems to have required endless abstract discussion, heart-searching, and recourse to William Morris. Ernest Wilmerding's readers are spared neither the agony nor the uplift.

Deutsche und Englische Gedichte. Von Friedrich Michel. Deutscher Gesellig-Wissenschaftlicher Verein.

This little volume is the final memorial to a man whose singular beauty of character endeared him to many of the best men and women among his contemporaries on two continents. Michel was a friend of peace and of mankind, of freedom and tolerance, of art and thought. The testimony to the fineness of his spirit is to be found not only in the record of his public activities, but in the grateful memory of hundreds whom he befriended and encouraged in the hours of their need. His poetry, which is better represented in his volume "Asraklänge" than in this posthumous volume, suffered like most German-American poetry from uncritical facility and imitativeness. But at least half a dozen times—"Jetzt Nicht—Noch Nicht," "Ich," "Am Glück Vorbei"—he succeeded in achieving both poetic concentration of substance and perfection of contour. These verses of his will have to be included in any adequate collection of German verse written in America.

Realities and Shams. By L. P. Jacks. George H. Doran Company. $1.50.

Wisdom unites with humor and both with an incisive yet gracious style to make these essays pleasant reading. And not merely pleasant but very salutary to those of us—and that is to say most of us—who have fed our spirits with causes and beliefs which by Dr. Jacks's tests are not realities but shams. Neither the roots of life nor the hope for a new world lies in mass voting, the political state, or in a League of Nations which is a league of political states. These things the author criticizes from a fresh and undogmatic standpoint.

International Relations Section

Is Austria Rehabilitated?

By HEINRICH KANNER

(The League Council, at its June session, refused to free Austria from League supervision, warned it that further economies were necessary, but appointed a commission to go to Austria to study the advisability of increasing its budget.)

Vienna, May 16

TWO years ago the League of Nations set up a rehabilitation program for Austria. The Austrian Minister of Finance, Dr. Keinböck, has deviated from the program; and the General Commissioner, Dr. Zimmermann, appointed by the League to supervise the execution of the program, has protested, so that the question goes to the League Council for decision.

Meanwhile the Finance Minister can claim a certain outward success for his policy. The latest figures surprisingly show that the deficit has vanished from the balance-sheet and that since November, 1923, Austria has actually been operating with a surplus. The League program did not anticipate such a result until the end of the second year of rehabilitation—the end of 1924.

But has the permanently balanced budget which was the aim of the Geneva program been attained? Strictly speaking, one cannot call a budget permanently balanced except after a considerable period of years, and since the entire rehabilitation program covers only two years, and for only fourteen months are the accounts available, it is too early to do more than guess at the prospects.

The balance was reached chiefly by enormous increases in the income of the state. The estimated income seemed improbably great; but the reality has exceeded the improbability. The actual income is 25 per cent greater than that required by the rehabilitation program. On the other hand, the limitation of expenditures has remained from 3 to 4 per cent behind the program; 92 per cent of the deficit was wiped out by increasing income, and only 8 per cent by economies. That is the doubtful point about the success of the rehabilitation. All taxes, duties, prices of state monopoly products, and similar charges have been tremendously increased, and the longer these burdens last the harder they bear on the entire population. Hence all the common necessities of daily life have gone up in price at a rate which has amazed even pessimists. Thus, without fiscal inflation, the old vicious circle threatens to set in again. Already the workers, pointing to the rise in prices, are demanding increased pay. The bank employees have conducted a costly three weeks' strike, and won part of their demands. The factory clerks and workers are still negotiating with their employers; a few firms have already had strikes. The government employees, postal, telegraph, and telephone workers are already looming on the scene, and if their demands are granted the newly won balance of the budget would be endangered. Then, if the state repeated its method—increased taxes—prices would rise again, and new wage increases would be called for. The same rule holds in private enterprises; higher wages mean higher production costs, and so higher prices. This was more than a technical deviation from the rehabilitation program. If the program had been followed there would have been more limitation of expenditures, more employees would have been dismissed, and more offices sacrificed; and thus consumption would have been decreased. The hardships of those discharged would have tended to lessen demand and to lower prices. The endless spiral would not have been set in motion, and the budget might have been balanced without causing such a rise in prices as to make it impossible to regard the balance as permanent.

Furthermore, the finances of the state can hardly be set right unless the economic position of the nation is sound. The Vienna Stock Exchange has been passing through a crisis which in greater or less degree affects every part of the economic organism. The rehabilitation led to a general rise in values, which brought much foreign capital into Austria. New industries were founded; the capital stock of old stock companies was increased. Stocks were inflated. In the winter the public showed itself incapable of absorbing all the new stock. Some of it remained in the vaults of the banks of emission and of the banking syndicates, depressing all stock prices. The business of the Stock Exchange stagnated, and the Government, never oversympathetic to mobile capital, took measures which accentuated the collapse of business. Speculators looked about for more profitable fields and thought the falling franc a good opportunity. The newly rich who had made money out of the fall of the mark and the krone, but knew little of finance and less of politics, thought that they could force the franc to follow the same route as the Central European currencies. They failed, and in order to cover their losses in francs they threw masses of Vienna stocks on the market. There were no Austrian buyers. But some of the foreign capital invested in Austria was alarmed and withdrew its aid, called in its credits, and sold its paper. Panic followed; in the midst of the rout the Government interfered, provided money for the banks to buy paper, and finally mastered the situation, at least temporarily.

Ordinarily stock-market fluctuations merely effect rearrangements of wealth within a country; what one citizen loses another wins. But in this case most of what was lost in the speculation in francs was lost to foreigners. Even if the rumored total of these losses be exaggerated they are nevertheless real losses to Austria. And the withdrawal of foreign capital made this country, always poor in capital, still poorer. The legal interest rate was raised from 5 or 6 to 10 or 12 per cent, and the industries which often had to pay 30 per cent and more to the banks are still harder put in the present period of distrust and trouble. The number of bankruptcies, not merely in the stock market but in all branches of industry, is rising. Of course this weeds out the weaker economic organisms, but it is a harsh process.

This decline in Austria's general economic situation naturally will cause a decline in tax payments and hinder the rehabilitation process. But it cannot be denied that public opinion in Austria has taken a decisive turn for the better. The talk of Austria's incapacity for existence which once dominated public discussion has ceased. The old panacea of Austria's annexation to Germany has dropped out of practical politics, especially since Germany has slipped into a political and economic crisis worse than Austria's. Austria still has many problems to solve, but Austria is no longer a problem. The rehabilitation must and will go on. The Finance Minister owes his good fortune rather to the accident of a period of economic prosperity than to effective reduction of expenses. The prosperity has gone, and he must reckon on smaller revenues. Unless drastic economies are made the budget will not stay balanced. The events of recent weeks have proved that the plans of the League of Nations and of its general commissioner were wiser than the opportunist contrivings of the Minister of Finance.

When, in February, 1923, I ventured in the columns of The Nation to criticize the methods of the Austrian Government in the early stages of the rehabilitation, insisting that greater economies would be necessary, the President of the Austrian Republic took the unusual step of sending a protest against my article to The Nation. Heads of states do not usually reply to mere journalists, Dr. Hainisch least of all. I feel it my right to recall, a year later, his attack, and to point out that events have abundantly justified me.

National Minorities in Poland

THE question of the position and rights of the national minorities in Poland has been the object of diplomatic correspondence recently exchanged by the Russian Government and the Government of Poland. In his note of May 10 addressed to the Polish Government, Commissar of Foreign Affairs Chicherin charged that the persecution of national minorities in Poland was in direct violation of the provisions of the Riga peace treaty between Soviet Russia and Poland. The note reads in part:

By Article VII of the Riga treaty Poland is obliged to guarantee to persons of Russian, Ukrainian, and White Russian nationality the free development of their culture and language, and religious freedom. Materials and facts in possession of the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs show that all guaranties provided by the treaty of Riga in relation to the national minorities are systematically violated by the Polish authorities. . . . The wholesale persecutions of national minorities have become so systematic that the press of the national minorities is making an apparently paradoxical demand for the complete repeal of those articles of the constitution by which the national minorities are guaranteed equal rights with the Polish population. The reason advanced for this demand is the fact that these articles . . . serve only to mislead the national minorities as well as public opinion abroad. . . . On more than one occasion prominent representatives of the central authorities of the Polish republic have declared . . . that the true master of Poland is the Polish people alone, while in its relation to the non-Polish population Poland is bound by international treaties and its constitution only to insure their security and their peaceful and free development.

Thus a full third of the citizens of the Polish republic . . . are declared to be limited in their rights as compared with the privileged Polish population. . . . It is easy to imagine the influence of such statements made by the highest authorities upon the middle and lower administrative authorities, especially upon the police. . . .

It would be impossible to give a full account of the persecution and mockery to which persons belonging to the national minorities are subjected. . . . The police terror which is maintained in the White Russian borderland and in Eastern Galicia keeps the population of these provinces in constant fear. Moreover, violence and oppression show no signs of subsiding but, on the contrary, they are becoming wholesale and regular. After the elections to the Diet the Polish authorities made a great number of arrests as a form of repression directed against the national minorities for their participation in the elections. . . .

On April 12, 1923, a squadron of the Twenty-fourth Uhlans regiment under the command of Antoniewicz arrived in the village Buchnow, in the district of Tarnopol, for the purpose of punishing some of the people who participated in the election campaign. . . .

In December, 1922, a punitive expedition of 300 soldiers with machine-guns was sent to the Krupitsk village in the Dubno district. The soldiers and the police subjected the people to a terrible beating. A contribution of 300,000 marks was demanded from the village. . . . (The note goes on to cite a number of similar instances.)

The police authorities declared quite openly that they had detailed instructions to look after all election workers of the national minorities and the latter have been threatened with arrest. Afterward these threats were carried out. . . . A number of political trials and interpellations by deputies of the national minorities in the Diet furnish documentary proof of the extent of the terrible tortures practiced in the police stations and in the cells of the secret service. . . .

In their attempts to Polonize the eastern borderlands and Eastern Galicia the Polish authorities resort to the method of billeting troops among the civilian population. The Polish soldiers stationed in these provinces are mostly natives of central Poland and they look upon the provinces as barbaric countries conquered "with their blood," the population of which may be treated without respect. . . . These Polish soldiers give little heed to the obligations assumed by the Polish Government in relation to the national minorities. . . .

The colonial policy of the Polish Government in the eastern borderlands and in Eastern Galicia is carried out also through the method of so-called settling. The free land in these provinces is granted to ex-soldiers and officers of the Polish army. The settlers form a close body of men hostile to the native population. This policy leads to acts of revenge on the part of the native peasants . . . who, of course, pay for their acts in a most terrific manner. The atmosphere of mutual hatred breeding murder and arson is a result of this policy of the Polish authorities.

The practice of the Polish authorities in regard to the orthodox church in Poland proves that the principle of non-interference in the affairs and life of the church and of religious societies provided by Paragraph 2 of Article VII of the peace treaty is no more than a paper provision. In reality, violence, confiscations, destruction of religious monuments are everyday occurrences in the practice of the Polish authorities. These facts have become so appalling that even the White guard émigré press which is in sympathy with the principles upon which the present Polish state is based systematically records with bitterness and dismay the instances of unheard-of persecutions against the orthodox church in Poland. . . . (The note goes on to describe a number of confiscations and destruction of churches and church equipment without regard to the artistic and archaeological value of some of it.) . . .

The colonial policy of the Polish Government in the provinces of White Russia and Eastern Galicia is not limited to settling these lands with Polish ex-soldiers and to open repressions against the national minorities. The Polish Government is attempting to subject to its influence the intellectual life of the national minorities as well. Everywhere Ukrainian and White Russian schools are being closed down with the result of growing illiteracy. In the district of Novogrudok the village public schools have all been closed down except one. In the province of Grodno only one school remained out of the 153 which had existed there before. In the province of Vilna only thirty-six schools remained out of 200. In the provinces of Polessia and Volhynia all Ukrainian schools were shut down. . . .

In the schools and children's homes children of orthodox parents are brought up in the Roman Catholic faith and sent to Catholic churches. This is taking place in the province of Kholm, in the district of Rovno, etc. The demands of the representatives of the national minorities in the Diet to preserve and enlarge the school system in the White Russian provinces and in Eastern Galicia are left without any reply.

A similar attitude has been assumed by the Polish authorities toward the press of the national minorities. Frequently Ukrainian and White Russian newspapers are confiscated for printing news which has already appeared in the Polish press. . . . The systematic confiscations of the newspapers of the national minorities has compelled the latter to issue one-day publications which are, however, subjected to the same fate. Even books published by the clubs of the deputies of the national minorities in the Diet are being confiscated. During a short period of time the following newspapers have been closed down: White Russian Bell, Our Future, New Life, People's Will, Our Banner, Free Banner. In 1923 the following books issued by the White Russian national club were confiscated: "What is Liberation from a White Russian Viewpoint," notwithstanding the fact that practically the whole text of the book had previously appeared in the newspapers and that the incriminating parts, as pointed out by the prosecution, had been eliminated. The report of the first trial of White Russians in Bialystok was confiscated . . . for its "general tendency" and its "criticism of the state." . . .

It would occupy too much time and space to enumerate the methods of persecution and oppression of the national minorities by the Polish authorities. It is sufficiently evident that in all fields of the national life of the White Russians and Ukrainians within the borders of the Polish republic the Polish authorities have openly demonstrated their unwillingness to carry out the obligations which Poland took upon itself by the peace treaty of Riga.

In its note of July 29, 1922, the Government of the RSFSR drew the attention of the Polish Government to the fact that it had been ignoring the provisions of Article VII of the Riga treaty. Today the Union Government is compelled to remind the Polish Government that strict observance of Article VII of the Riga treaty is an indispensable condition for the establishment of the neighborly relations which are necessary for both peoples. . . .

The Polish reply to this note, which was published in the Moscow press of May 27, reads as follows:

The Polish Government regrets to be compelled to declare that it cannot recognize the contents of the aforementioned note as a basis for discussion. Without taking up the specific accusations made in this note where Article VII of the Riga treaty is used as a pretext, the Polish Government rejects them emphatically as an attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of the Polish republic. The Polish Government also resents strongly the unwarranted and, in diplomatic relations, unheard-of criticism of declarations made by the President of the Polish republic and higher Polish officials in matters which do not concern the relations between Poland and the USSR.

Besides, the Polish Government cannot help but express its surprise that the Government of the Union takes upon itself a defense of civil liberties and religious freedom among the national minorities in Poland when, at the same time, on the territory of the Union, the citizens both of the national minorities and of the majorities of the several allied republics are deprived of these liberties.

In view of the above the Polish Government is compelled to declare that in future all groundless and inadmissible representations of the Soviet Government with reference to Article VII of the Riga treaty will be left without any reply whatever.

The Polish Government assumes the liberty to point out to the Soviet Government that normal relations between Poland and the Union, which the Polish Government wants in no less degree than the Soviet Government, may be reached not through the presentation of groundless pretenses but only through the loyal and strict observance of all mutual obligations provided by the Riga treaty.

In answer to this the Soviet Government declared in its note of May 23:

The Union Government emphatically denies the allegation that the note of May 10 is an attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of the Polish republic. That note was based upon the fact that the Polish Government has not been loyal in carrying out Article VII of the Riga treaty. . . . The unheard-of persecutions of the language, schools, and religion of the Russians, Ukrainians, and White Russians cited in the aforementioned note of May 10 are based upon material, still far from exhausted, in the possession of the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs. These facts are not denied in the note of the Polish Government, which serves only as an additional proof of the accuracy of the representations made by the Union Government.

The contention of the Polish Government that the interference of the Government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in behalf of the violated rights of the national minorities in Poland which are guaranteed by the above-mentioned Article VII of the Riga treaty is an interference in the internal affairs of the Polish republic is contradictory to the text and spirit of Article VII, which gives the Union Government the formal right to protect the rights of the national minorities through demands upon the Polish Government for the exact observance of the article.

At the same time the Union Government indignantly rejects the groundless statement of the Polish Government that on the territory of the Union the citizens both of the minority and the majority are deprived of civil liberties as well as of the freedom of religious service.

The Polish Government is well aware that the Soviet constitution as well as the practiced national policy of the Union Government guarantee the fullest freedom of national and cultural development to all peoples living on the territory of the USSR. This statement of the Polish Government, which has no legal ground in the treaties between the two countries, is an undisguised interference in the internal affairs of the Union.

The declaration of the Polish Government that in the future it will pay no attention to pretentions which the Union Government may advance on the basis of Article VII of the Riga treaty must be regarded by the Union Government only as proof that in the opinion of the Polish Government not all articles of the Riga treaty are to be observed. The Union Government takes note of this opinion.

The Strength of the Russian Communist Party

AT the thirteenth convention of the Russian Communist Party held in Moscow during the last week of May the representative of the Central Committee, M. Stalin, made public the figures (summarized below) showing the numerical strength and the strength by organizations of the ruling party and its influence in the various mass organizations of the working population:

At the time of the twelfth convention the Russian Communist Party numbered 485,000 members. At present there are 600,000 members, including those recently accepted as a result of the membership drive which was initiated after the death of Lenin. Up to the day of the convention the number of new members admitted was 128,000. Since there have been about 80,000 more new members on the list for admission during the succeeding two weeks, the present numerical strength of the party is put at about 680,000 members.

Of the total membership on May 1, 1924, there were 55.4 per cent workers, 23 per cent peasants, and the rest, officials and others. The percentage of workers has increased during the succeeding weeks, since the newly admitted are chiefly persons engaged in factory work.

The Union of Communist Youth had 317,000 members last year. At present the membership has increased to 570,000. Of this membership workers comprise 41 per cent, peasants 40 per cent. Forty-seven thousand members are students of professional factory schools.

The trade unions have a membership of 5,000,000 as against 4,300,000 in the last year. In the twelve basic industries 92 per cent of the workers are organized in the unions.

The consumers' cooperatives had 5,000,000 members last year, and increased their membership to 7,000,000. However, as M. Stalin points out, these figures must be taken with reservations since the statistics in this field have been rather confusing. The actual number of members is probably somewhat less than those quoted. The influence of Communists in the cooperatives is shown by their strength in the central and local managements—amounting to 86 per cent in the leading cooperative organs. Among the workers of the cooperatives 26 per cent are Communists.

In the army the number of Communists is 52,000. The Communists comprise 18 per cent of the commanding force of the army.

During the last year there has been a considerable growth in social and cultural organizations. The number of such organizations at present is over 300. Chief among these is the organization of physical culturists which has a membership of 375,000. The centers of this organization are mostly the factory committees and factory workers' clubs and the peasant mutual aid societies in the villages. Other important organizations are those of the workers' correspondents with a membership of 25,000 and village correspondents with a membership of 5,000. In the provincial centers of these organizations the Communists comprise 29 per cent of the membership.

The "Pioneer" organization (Communist scouts) increased its membership from 75,000 last year to 161,000 in 1924. In the industrial provinces this organization is made up of 71 per cent of children of factory workers and 7 per cent of children of peasants. In the autonomous provinces children of workers make up 38 per cent of the organization. In the agricultural provinces 36 per cent of the organization are peasant children.

The participation of Communists in the government offices and in industrial management is shown in the following figures: In the leading government offices the number of Communists was 83 per cent in 1923 and 86 per cent in 1924. In the office staff of the industrial trusts the number of Communists has grown from 6 per cent in 1923 to 10 per cent in 1924. In the leading organs of the trusts, syndicates, and big enterprises Communists constitute 52 per cent of the staff against 47 per cent in 1923. Among the directors of the big industrial enterprises there are 61 per cent Communists against 31 per cent in 1923.

In the soviets the Communists are represented as follows: In the village soviets—7 per cent as against 6 per cent in 1923; in the volost (county) soviets—48 per cent (39 per cent in 1923); in the ooyezd (district) soviets—87 per cent (80 per cent in 1923); in the city soviets in provincial centers—71 per cent (78 per cent in 1923).

'Sconset Moors Summer School, Nantucket Island, Mass. JULY 13 - SEPT. 21

Speakers

Alexander Meiklejohn
Hendrik Van Loon
Sinclair Lewis
Horace M. Kallen
Everett Dean Martin
Oswald Garrison Villard
Floyd Dell
Gutzon Borglum
Carl Van Doren
H. W. L. Dana
Bruce Bliven
Herbert Adams Gibbons
Raymond Lull
Herbert B. Swope

Golf, Tennis, Ocean Bathing

Frederic C. Howe, Director

Insure Your Summer Vacation

The progressiveness, genius and gambling spirit of the insurance man enable you to insure yourself against the loss of your time, your health, your jewels—you can even protect yourself against the rain on the 12th of August. But can you protect yourself against dullness? Can you insure yourself against the bore at the summer hotel who insists that you make a fourth at bad bridge; the gentleman traveler from Little Rock who sits next to you in the club car and outlines the status of the minor league; the middle-aged lady on the club veranda whose specialty is the waywardness of the younger generation? There are times when you would pay well to escape such boredom. We offer you insurance against it in the form of a special three months' summer subscription to The American Mercury for $1.35.

The American Mercury

Edited by George Jean Nathan and H. L. Mencken and published by Alfred A. Knopf.

The subscription rate is five dollars a year; Canadian postage fifty cents, Foreign postage one dollar additional.

THE AMERICAN MERCURY, 730 Fifth Ave., New York.

Please send me a three months' subscription to THE AMERICAN MERCURY, starting with the July issue.
I enclose $..... Check or Money Order.

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

CITY ..... STATE .....

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 9, 1924 No. 3079

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 29
EDITORIALS:
La Follette the Wrecker 32
White Indians 33
Everest Wins 33
Radio-Convention Year 34
AN UNCONVENTIONAL CONVENTION. By Oswald Garrison Villard.. 35
THE MACCABEES OF 1924. By Hendrik Willem van Loon..... 37
DEMOCRATS ARE DIFFERENT. By William Hard..... 38
TO W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS. By Scudder Middleton..... 39
CONVENTION NOTES. By Art Young 40
HERE ARE LADIES. By Ernestine Evans 41
NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
Virtue and Women. By Isabel Leavenworth 42
SAN PEDRO. By Mary Reed 45
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 46
CORRESPONDENCE 47
BLAKE. By Harold Lewis Cook 49
BOOKS:
England's Labor Rulers. By Sidney F. Wicks 49
Byron: 1824—1924. By William Ellery Leonard 50
Toward a Social Psychology. By Ruth Benedict 51
A Northern Mystic. By J. W. Krutch 51
A Latin-American Crusader. By E. Montenegro 52
Stage Left. By Arthur Moss 53
Not the Least of These United States. By E. C. Lindeman 53
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
A Bandit Caliph. By Emil Lengyel 54
An Anglo-Italian Agreement in Jubaland. By George Glasgow 55

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY IRITA VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

McADOO AND SMITH, as was expected, prevented any Democratic nomination for the Presidency for the first thirty ballots. As we go to press Newton D. Baker, John W. Davis, and Franklin D. Roosevelt are all being talked of as compromise candidates, with Senators Ralston and Glass ever in the background. For the choice of Davis the third-party leaders were earnestly praying. He would set the seal of conventional conservatism upon the Democratic campaign and would draw heavily from the middle-class business men who now favor Coolidge. One thing is clear: The great forces controlling the Democratic Party have no reason to dread anything the convention may do. Stocks boomed in Wall Street on the second day, "because," said one of the leading financial writers, "it is now plain that nothing will be done at the Garden which is of a radical nature." No, and therefore the convention for all its progressive tinge will advance not at all the hour of genuine reform. It will send out no flaming apostle bent on rescuing the machinery of the government from the masters of the United States, who, as Woodrow Wilson declared in his "New Freedom," "are the combined capitalists and manufacturers of the world." It will hardly choose a standard-bearer now who, like Wilson in 1912, would go before the country pledged to destroy the "invisible empire" which "has been set up above the forms of democracy."

DRAGGING RELIGION INTO POLITICS is the crime of which the Democratic convention is accused, but it was the Klan which first took the religious and racial issues into politics. The Democratic politicians have especially had to take note of them because the Klan has become such a menace in certain Democratic States as not only to threaten the supremacy of the elected civil governments where it does not own them, but to add to the already existing race war one of religion. Every argument made in the Democratic convention was of pure expediency. Four years from now, it was said, there will not be a single Klansman remaining or anyone who will remember that he was once a member of the hooded order. If you denounce it you advertise and strengthen it, so why not ignore it altogether? Fortunately, the feelings of the delegates were too deeply stirred and the result was really a sound defeat for the Klan—it was a bad defeat for it to do no better than it did. The one thing lacking in the Madison Square Garden debate was a recognition of the commercial character of the whole enterprise. It is being kept alive chiefly to line the pockets of its conscienceless organizers who take their percentage of the $10 membership fees of its dupes. No; if the price of speaking out about this monstrous defiance of law and order and decency and public freedom is the injection of a religious issue into politics, let that come. If the country founded by people in search of religious liberty cannot still fight for it, we are surely in bad straits.

AT LAST! Secretary Fall, Harry Sinclair, and the two Dohenys have been indicted, the Dohenys for bribery, Mr. Fall for accepting a bribe, and all four for conspiracy to defraud the United States. The indictments, of course, rest upon the evidence which Senator Walsh uncovered in his long and arduous investigation; but why we should have had to wait nearly six months after Doheny's confession that his son took $100,000 in a suitcase to the former Cabinet officer in New Mexico is difficult to understand. The unpleasant fact is that the Administration has not lifted a finger to stop the looting except when, as, and if forced to do so by the action of persistent senators. There is no question here as to the essential facts. Mr. Doheny and Mr. Fall have confessed; if they escape it will be only because they cannot be forced to testify against themselves. These things remain uncontroverted: While Secretary of the Interior in the Harding Administration Mr. Fall secretly transferred the navy's oil lands to Messrs. Doheny and Sinclair; he received $100,000 as a "loan," still unrepaid, from Mr. Doheny and, upon retirement, a lucrative job from Mr. Sinclair. While Wilson was still in office Mr. Doheny hired his son-in-law, Mr. McAdoo, for an even larger sum, and Mr. Sinclair bought the prestige of the Roosevelt name by hiring the brother of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy at a salary far beyond his value.

THE STATE OF MAINE did not get much attention at the conventions, but it has a governor who deserves a little limelight. Percival P. Baxter has a way of doing things that brings a response from the heart. Some were indignant when he set his flag at halfmast for the death of his old dog; most of the country probably felt that the tribute was sincerer and worthier than many a halfmasting for worn-out "statesmen." A few months ago Governor Baxter refused to waste time celebrating "Navy Day," and now he has objected to "National Defense Day" in terms which should be seconded by all the little dark-horse governors in the country. We like such talk as this:

> With circumstances as they are I think it unfortunate for us to make a show of our military power, even though it be for "defense" only, for by doing so we may be placed in a false position and may cause our neighbors to distrust us. . . .
>
> This nation should lead in the movement to settle our differences with other nations through the proposed world court instead of by resort to war. A national mobilization of the armed forces well might be regarded by other nations as a threat or at least a warning. It would afford them, should they seek it, an excuse for similar mobilizations. The race for supremacy thus might be begun anew, with another and far more terrible war as its result.

CABINETS COME AND CABINETS GO—but British imperialism goes an forever. The Labor Party's Cabinet has just announced that it will under no circumstances renounce the Sudan, the vast hinterland of Egypt where British capital is developing cotton fields destined to rival our own Southland. "Independent" Egypt had hoped that the advent of a "Labor" Government would bring a change. In vain—and perhaps Egypt will become a sore again. Meanwhile Irak—the uneuphonious name given to the Arab state set up in what was not so long ago known as Mesopotamia—is also feeling the steel beneath the British glove. Irak was "mandated" by the League to Great Britain, and soon thereafter the faithful Feisal, son of the puppet King of the Hedjaz, and ex-king of Syria, was established in power there with an Arab parliament made to order. The British, readers of The Nation will recall, had such difficulty in collecting taxes for Feisal that they used airplanes and bombed whole villages, killing men, women, and children with magnificent ruthlessness. Possibly memories of this persisted; at any rate the Iraquois—as the French called them—for a long time refused to sign the treaty which the British prepared for them. Finally, after a threat of abolition of the parliament, they voted it. But still the difficulties of British rule persist. For the Arabs of Irak now announce that they do not want Mosul.

AT MOSUL IS OIL. The British clashed over Mosul with the French when they were dividing up the spoils of the war at the peace conference. Mr. Hughes rained notes on the British until the British oil companies granted the Standard Oil a share of the Mosul pickings. The Turks have steadfastly refused to admit that Mosul belongs to Irak, and have more than hinted that they intended to sell the oil concessions of Mosul all over again without heeding the Anglo-Franco-American allotment of "rights." The Lausanne Conference nearly came to grief over Mosul oil and a new Anglo-French conference has just broken up because of inability to agree about Mosul. Mosul was mandated to England by the League of Nations along with the rest of "Irak" as defined in the Treaty of Sévres, and nominally England has been negotiating all along in the interest of Irak. Actually the interest of the British holders of an old Turkish oil concession and the British holders of a new oil concession from "independent" Irak probably has more to do with it. At any rate the Arabs of Irak have announced that they do not want Mosul, which leaves the British moral shirt-front—the Anglo-Saxon imperialism always wears a moral shirt-front—rather obviously spotted. What moral grounds will the British next discover to explain the presence of their soldier boys and their airplanes in the neighborhood of the oil-wells of Mosul?

CANADA, LIKE AUSTRALIA, South Africa, New Zealand, and India, signed the post-war treaties with Germany, Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey. But when the Turkish treaty was revised at Lausanne the Dominions were not urged to attend. Lord Curzon signed for the entire British Empire. The Canadian Government, on being informed, replied that it had no objection to not being represented, but that it would be bound by the treaty only to such extent as the Canadian Parliament might decide. The Canadian Premier, in discussing the matter, referred to the British connection and to the possibility of affiliation with the United States in terms which stirred a minor tempest in the imperial British teapot. The British Empire, after all, is a fragile structure, resting upon understanding rather than upon treaty, and it would take a prophet rather than a constitutional lawyer to define the relations of the Dominions of the Empire. Increasingly they are asserting themselves in the truculent manner common to the young of this post-war generation. Canada recently signed the halibut treaty with the United States without inviting Mother England to hold the pen, and the Irish Free State has appointed its own envoy to Washington. The Peppers and Lodges, who are so eager to suppress the separate representation of the Dominions in the bodies which elect the judges of the World Court, might well reflect—if they are capable of reflection—upon the question whether it is to America's interest to discourage or encourage this tendency to independence.

CONTROVERSY OVER THE RESPONSIBILITY for the war leads to a demand which has been growing and will grow. The Allies must follow the example of Germany, Russia, and Austria and open their secret archives. Germany, of course, has always wanted it; Stresemann and Marx recently repeated the demand, believing that such publication would remove from Germany the stigma of sole responsibility for the war. Why not publish them? We have learned how doctored was the Russian Orange Book; we have proof that some at least of the contents of the French Yellow Book was falsified, and we know that the Brtiish White Book was carefully edited. Why not have the whole story so that historians can set to work in earnest instead of spending their time in wars of their own? A small group of Frenchmen have long urged it and recently the semi-official Temps joined them. "As time goes by, the more urgent and easier it becomes to publish the quantity of other diplomatic documents still buried in sealed files. . . . We want it cleared up, but it must be complete, and we shall not allow a false illumination." Poincaré might well have hesitated to take such a compromising step, but Herriot should have no reason for hesitation—pre-war documents will not inculpate him. And as for England, such a service would seem one of the first and easiest for a Labor Government to render.

OF THE TWENTY REPUBLICS to the south of us six are under the military control and eight others under the financial dominion of the United States, according to an article in the July number of the Atlantic Monthly by Samuel Guy Inman. The six countries with American troops on the ground are cited as Cuba, Haiti, Santo Domingo, Panama, Nicaragua, and Honduras. Those under what is so far only an economic vassalage are Salvador, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Guatemala, Costa Rica, and Mexico. This situation The Nation has been calling to public attention for the last half dozen years. Mr. Inman mentions three ways in which we are increasing our grip on Latin America. One is by funding all outstanding loans in a given country and replacing them with one floated by American bankers. This eliminates European creditors and influence, and at the same time obtains for us—the participating bankers see to that—more or less of a stranglehold on the fiscal policy. A second method is through taking over the job of arbitrations between Latin-American republics, thus crowding out the League of Nations or European countries. The third way is through naval missions, such as those to Brazil and Peru. The only Latin-American republics not dominated by United States bullets or bankers or both are Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Uruguay, Paraguay, and Venezuela.

OUR GOVERNMENT has never sent an educational mission to Latin America, says Mr. Inman, and has given no assistance to unofficial undertakings of that sort. On the other hand the Department of State "is always sure of the right to do anything that comes under the formula: 'protection of American lives and property.' Since American lives seldom are in danger, American property naturally gets first place," he remarks. He sees our imperialistic advance not only as injustice toward our neighbors but also as an avenging fate overtaking our own democracy:

> Some day we shall realize that the whole rotten mess of investigation now being played with at Washington runs directly back to the mental attitudes and the combinations involved in the policy of "cleaning up" our next-door neighbors—a phrase which may seem to have moral significance to the average innocent citizen and official, but which, for the privileged few, takes on the more modern significance of "cleaning out." No one objects to legitimate business with our neighbors. On the contrary, it is vital to all concerned. But the continuance of this dollar diplomacy, with its combination of bonds and battleships, means the destruction of our nation just as surely as it meant the destruction of Egypt and Rome and Spain and Germany and all the other nations who came to measure their greatness by their material possessions rather than by their passion for justice and by the number of their friendly neighbors.

WHAT CAN BE DONE ABOUT IT? Mr. Inman sees a possibility of successful opposition to our imperialistic orgy in the League of Nations, in the pan-Latin movement (exemplified by the entente between Italy and Spain), and in the proposed Latin-American league. For our part we have scant hope in the first two. The chances of the second depend upon the power of the nations to the south to modify their strident nationalism and to abandon sterile politics for constructive action. Fortunately, this is coming to be seen clearly by the more thoughtful Latin Americans. The Argentine writer, Manuel Ugarte, in his book "The Destiny of a Continent" shows his appreciation of the fact that to thwart the imperialism of Uncle Sam the Latin Americans must beat him to it in the development of their countries. Likewise José Vasconcelos, formerly Minister of Education in Mexico, as the Living Age reports, wrote lately to the exiled president of the University Federation of Peru:

> Our culture is all in our heads. It does not externalize itself in our surroundings. In Peru, in Mexico, in Chile, foreigners build the railways and the bridges, work the mines, administer all the important enterprises. The natives live on politics, on the incomes of their landed properties, or on miserable government salaries. This is why we have never succeeded in becoming truly independent nations. We have devised fictitious sovereignties that serve chiefly as an excuse for idling twenty or thirty days each year to commemorate battles fought for nothing, and constitutions that achieved nothing. . . . We are vain, but we lack pride. We fancy ourselves the finest people in the world, and yet we are not ashamed to live like parasites in a country where foreigners are developing the natural resources and carrying out all the constructive enterprises.

CHICKENS DO COME HOME to roost. Of all our imperialistic aggressions in the Caribbean nothing has been quite so flagrant or far-reaching as our invasion of Haiti. It is a stench that cannot be aired abroad without embarrassment to any American present. Hence we are always glad when somebody takes off the lid, for there is nothing more likely to bring sober self-analysis than to be shamed when company is present. At the Pan-American Conference in Santiago Haitian representatives, although denied a formal opportunity to state their case, nevertheless succeeded in getting the floor to the obvious discomfiture of the delegates from the United States. Now Dantes Bellegarde, Haitian minister to Paris, has made it equally unpleasant for the American delegates at the sessions of the League of Nations Associations. At a meeting of the political commission he presented a resolution reciting that without ever having declared war upon Haiti the United States has been in forcible occupation since 1915; he demanded immediate withdrawal. The American delegation succeeded in sidetracking this resolution for one of polite inconsequence, but every time the lid is raised it is harder to keep the mess from smelling to heaven.

"IN THE NATIONAL ELECTIONS Frenchmen turned their backs upon the 1,325,000 war dead of France. . . . A ragtag and bobtail of Defeatists and Reds has been raised to power by Frenchmen"—thus the once respected New York Evening Post, now issued by the owner of the Saturday Evening Post as a sort of suburban edition of the Philadelphia Public Ledger. The French elections annoyed the gentleman who had been invited to lunch with Premier Poincaré, and the peppery editorial expressed his partisanship with magnificent gusto. "A Black Sunday for France," that editorial of May 13 was headed. In June a group of Italian-Americans met in Carnegie Hall to protest against the murder of Matteotti. The passionate Post changed its tune. "Active partisanship in this country with respect to the internal policies of any other is out of place," it said, "Our foreign-born citizens," it patronizingly added, must learn to control their emotions. They must, to put the matter succinctly, "learn to be like the native American in this." Well, well! Like the gentleman who wrote about the "ragtag and bobtail of Defeatists and Reds" in France?

La Follette the Wrecker

HOW shall we protect the home and fireside, yes, the country, from this man La Follette, whom certain reckless insurgents are about to nominate for the Presidency, thereby jeopardizing the chances of so noble and elevated, so gifted and intellectual a patriot as Calvin Coolidge? We confess our bewilderment, our sense of discouragement. Since 1908 his platforms have regularly been thrown out of the Republican conventions as seditious. He has been denounced as a wild-eyed radical, a pro-German, a disloyalist. A committee to investigate him nearly drove him from the Senate. He has been pilloried and sent to Coventry, and yet he survives. Our daily press assures us that only the "lunatic fringe" of the country is for him, but there was a majority of 375,000 of the lunatic fringe which voted for him in his own State two years ago. And now he is, despite all his radicalism, all his destructive theories and acts, to be run for the Presidency by the discontented, the down-and-out, the discouraged, and the disappointed.

Let us examine the extent of this man's wrongdoing as set forth in the platform laid before the Republican Convention in Cleveland and indignantly spurned by it. The merest glance at it shows how it plans to strike at the very foundations of our national prosperity—it opposes the Mellon tax plan, would increase inheritance taxes, and would tax excess profits, besides favoring the soldier bonus, thus setting its judgment against Mr. Mellon, who has assured us on his word of honor, as one of the richest men in America, that if his proposals are not accepted there will not be enough loose capital available to carry on the industry of America and further to develop our resources. More than that, the La Follette program calls for the repeal of the Esch-Cummins railroad law and the fixing of railroad rates upon the radical and revolutionary basis of actual prudent investment and cost of service. Then it takes the final plunge of declaring for public ownership of railroads. True, it would sugar-coat this pill by asserting that this must be done with "definite safeguards against bureaucratic control." But we all know what it would mean if the railroads of this country were withdrawn from the control of the combination of capitalists who manage our banks, our public-service corporations, our oil companies, and our mining corporations.

Further to camouflage the menace of these proposals the La Follette platform speaks of collecting the foreign-loan interest and recovering the war stealings—as if to do the latter would not in itself unsettle a good many businesses and disturb many happy and prosperous members of our business world. Again, it would promote cooperation between producers and consumers and thus commit the grave injustice of wiping out in part that large class of invaluable go-betweens, the middlemen. It would further revoke the oil concessions granted in the administration of that noble citizen and soldier in the faith, Warren G. Harding. While it appears to favor super- and water-power systems, to which big business is now in its wisdom turning, it masks behind that its proposal for public ownership of all water-power, another abominable scheme to put the government into private business. Almost worst of all is its declaration in favor of a reduction of the tariff. That is, of course, conceived simply and solely for the purpose of unsettling business and striking a blow at the vested manufactures of the country, built up by the sweat of American labor's brow and the skill of its capitalist directors. Then the Wisconsin wreckers would lay ruthless hands upon the federal-reserve and farm-loan systems, on the excuse of democratizing them in the interest of the farmers. Further to bid for the farmer vote, the La Follette platform promises to protect farmer organizations, to aid them in their collective bargaining, and to reduce freight rates.

When we come to labor questions the full extent of this demagoguery is apparent. La Follette actually proposes to take the workmen's child out of the mills and factories in which it is so much better employed than running around the streets and getting killed by automobiles. Just when so many New England mills have established Southern branches or moved their whole plants to the South to escape the harsh and unjust child-labor laws of New England, comes this other deadly blow at industry, for, though the pending amendment only permits Congress to legislate on the child-labor question, interference with the personal liberty of children over twelve years of age to work as many hours a day as they see fit at any wage would inevitably follow. Again, it is a sop to labor to promise to abolish the injunction in labor disputes, that proved and efficient safeguard to our social structure. From this point it is but a step to the direct nomination and election of Presidents, the federal initiative and referendum, and the nation-wide referendum on war which Mr. La Follette has plainly borrowed from another wicked disturber of business, William J. Bryan.

When it comes to the foreign part of the La Follette policy he is plainly still pacifist, pro-German, unpatriotic, and disloyal. He actually wishes to revise the Treaty of Versailles on the pretense that it should be made to conform to the terms of the armistice to which the United States attached its word. Mr. La Follette would further abolish conscription and reduce armaments. He would strike at the safety of every farm in Iowa and Nebraska by curtailing the $800,000,000 now spent annually for the army and navy. Then Senator La Follette shows his hatred of the war-making branches of the government by desiring to promote treaties to outlaw war and he denounces the all-wise policy of our recent administrations in Washington, both Democratic and Republican, in creating opportunities abroad for American investments and then protecting them by our troops and our ships, by speaking of "the mercenary system of degraded foreign policy . . . which has at times degraded our State Department and its high service as a strong and kindly intermediary for defenseless governments to a trading outpost for those interest- and concession-seekers engaged in the exploitation of weaker nations. . . ."

Fortunately only vapid idealists, silly sentimentalists, and subversive journals like The Nation may be counted on to defend such wickedness. The sound common sense of the American people will surely rally to the defense of our Morgans and Garys and Sinclairs and Dohenys and Mellons and prevent this threatened assault upon our established customs, the priceless liberties of the men of business who have made us great and strong. Yes, upon our Government itself.

Everest Wins

TWO young men are dead on the side of Everest. Thousands of feet above the uttermost limits of endurance for plant or animal, in a region as lifeless as the frozen mountains of the moon, they lie. Their bodies are no more than rigid fragments of the icy peak that rises above them, tiny monuments to a courage greater than human strength, more lasting than human breath. No one will ever know what misstep or treacherous foothold ended the climb of Mallory and Irvine. They were seen from the last camp "going strong" at about 28,000 feet. The summit was still a thousand feet above them, but they carried oxygen and the weather was fair. And then—they failed to come back. The weather changed, and Norton, the leader of the expedition, stricken with snow-blindness at a lower camp, refused to allow any of the men to venture up beyond the highest camp in search of them.

Thus the Everest epic ends, for this year at least, in tragedy and defeat. Like some voracious she-deity, guarded by mysteries of cold and wind and snow, the mountain demands of the desperate pilgrims toward her summit an offering of human life in return for their ultimate defeat. And still the pilgrims return, to struggle, and die if need be, in the hope of reaching that unfriendly shrine.

The expedition this year was equipped for victory. The trials and experiences of two years were in the packs and in the minds of its members. They were ready to try the chances with oxygen and the faint chance without. If their defeat has proved anything it is the hopelessness of reaching the top without oxygen. Norton and Somervell made the attempt and were forced to turn back at about 28,000 feet by the unendurable exhaustion that makes every motion at that altitude an agony. They left the highest camp, pitched in a rocky basin at 26,700 feet, in the early morning. With the temperature far below zero and the face of the mountain in shadow, they struggled slowly up over ledges of rock and patches of snow. But they were too near the thin breathless spaces beyond all air. Somervell's own words, printed in the New York Times of June 26, tell best of the end of their effort:

> At about 27,500 feet there was an almost sudden change. A little lower down we could walk comfortably, taking three or four breaths for each step, but now seven, eight, or ten complete respirations were necessary for every single step forward. Even at this slow rate of progress we had to indulge in a rest for a minute or two at every twenty or thirty yards.
>
> At a level of somewhere about 28,000 feet I told Norton I could only hinder him and his chance of reaching the summit if I tried to go any further, as an intensely sore throat added greatly to the misery of my fight. I suggested he should climb the mountain, if he could, by himself, and settled down on a sunny ledge to watch him do it.
>
> But Norton himself was not far from the end of his tether. From my seat I watched him slowly rise—but how slowly!—and after an hour I doubt whether he had risen eight feet above my level. He realized that a successful issue to the fight was impossible and after a little returned. We agreed reluctantly that the game was up. . . . So, with our heavy hearts beating over 180 to the minute, we returned and retraced our steps, but slowly, for even a downhill movement at this level is rather hard and breathless work. . . .
>
> There is nothing to complain of. We established camps; our porters played up well; we obtained sleep even at the highest altitude, nearly 27,000 feet, and we had gorgeous days for the climb, almost windless and brilliantly fine, yet we were unable to get to the summit. So we have no excuse. We have been beaten in a fair fight—beaten by the height of a mountain and by our own shortness of breath—but the fight was worth it, worth it every time, and we shall cherish the privilege of defeat by the world's greatest mountain.

They rested in camp awaiting news of Irvine and Mallory, who had set out on the day they turned back hoping to "reinforce the feeble summit air by artificially provided oxygen"—but Irvine and Mallory never came.

The case is not yet proved against the chance of success with oxygen. The climbers seemed to be moving without difficulty at the height at which their predecessors had been forced to turn back. An accident rather than exhaustion or impassable obstacles must have ended their experiment while it was still in the making. And it is certain that other young men, as brave and foolish and eager as they, will shoulder tanks of oxygen and try that terrible summit in another year.

It was an idiotic death to die—nothing won, nothing proved, no purpose served. Simply a form of glorified suicide—deliberately dashing frail human bodies against the breast of a frozen goddess until they slip and fail and break and then freeze to eternity against the blank ice walls of their defeat. An idiotic death to die; but a death that makes the ordinary processes of living somehow lose color and meaning and the very look of life.

White Indians

WHITE Indians. The phrase clutches at our imaginations. Darien—in whose jungle depths the white Indians live hidden away from exploiters and curiosity-seekers. The word stirs our memories; recalls four centuries of history—of courage and cruelty, of lust for adventure and for gold. The "Forbidden Country" they call it in the Canal Zone, just beyond which it lies, stretching away to the Colombian border. A rain-drenched, steaming labyrinth of trees, vines, and grass, growing dank and lush out of oozing mud and scum-covered water. An almost unknown and unexplored wilderness next to the ten-mile foothold of Yankee civilization, with its twentieth-century machinery, its stately procession of the ships of all nations, its luxurious hotels, its motor cars, its American efficiency, its army-disciplined inhabitants. Yet this jungle of Darien was once almost the center of the world's hopes; it was the best-known and the most important region of the New World; it was the stage for one of the most stupendous and intense struggles for gold that men have ever waged. What a procession of heroes and scoundrels, of dreamers and cutthroats it has known! Columbus, Balboa, Pizarro, Drake, Morgan, Sharp, Patterson ——

And now a party under Richard O. Marsh has penetrated this almost forgotten region of Darien, which has gone back to the Indian from whom the conquistadores and the buccaneers wrested its riches. He found the name "Forbidden Country" justified, for although it is doubtless an exaggeration that Europeans can enter it only with danger to their lives from the natives, still it is made plain to outsiders that they are not wanted. Stephen Graham, who recently crossed the isthmus through Darien, reports that it is hard to tempt the natives out of their jungle to do a day's work; they do not want a phonograph or a five-foot shelf of books. Mr. Marsh found similar distrust of the European's advances. According to his account, he finally won the confidence of the Indian chief of Darien by helping the sick. He found an epidemic of smallpox among the natives, and he and his party not only did what they could to combat it directly, but later he made his way along the coast to a wireless station near the Colombian border. From there an appeal was sent to President Porras of Panama, and the latter dispatched doctors and medicine to stop the epidemic. After that the Marsh party found the way opened. They were taken to the villages of the White Indians, and saw and talked with a large number of these persons, the characteristics and origin of whom are so far almost unknown to science. Not only that, but the Marsh party was allowed to take several White Indians with it to be brought back to the United States.

But the party did not escape the usual toll of the Darien jungle. Of the twelve whites and thirteen blacks that constituted the original expedition only three whites and four blacks were with it at the end. Death, sickness, and desertion gradually decimated the original party. It is the jungle and not the Indians that to the white man is the most forbidding element of the "Forbidden Country." But perhaps we will know more of this "Forbidden Country" now that a beginning has been made. The almost fabulous exploits of three and four centuries ago make the exploration of Darien akin to a pilgrimage. No other spot in the Western Hemisphere is more soaked with history and romance.

Columbus, on his last voyage, came fumbling along the coast of Darien, searching still for the way to the East, searching with an uncanny instinct at this narrowest part of the Western Hemisphere, searching where 400 years later a way was miraculously opened. Balboa stalked his way across the isthmus in 1513, and from a peak on the west coast of Darien was the first European to gaze upon the Pacific Ocean. Pizarro, who was with him, crossed the isthmus again a few years later to voyage down the coast for the conquest of Peru. It was partly to transport the vast treasure of the Incas, and partly to carry out of Darien the gold which was mined there or stolen from the Indians, that the historic Gold Road was built across the isthmus. By use of lash and sword and torture the Indians were compelled to hew a way through the jungle from Panama on the Pacific to Puerto Bello on the Caribbean, and to pave it with blocks of stone. With monkeys and parrots screaming in the trees above, mule teams and Indians bore gold and silver plate, pearls and other gems through the jungle to satisfy the fury of the Spaniards for vast and sudden wealth.

Parts of the Gold Road are still to be found in the jungle of Darien, though Puerto Bello is a ruin. This great storehouse and port of the Spaniards was sacked by that most ruthless and invincible pirate Morgan. Before his coming the coast had been harried by Drake, who in his ship the Golden Hind preyed with great havoc upon the Spanish treasure fleet. After many other wanderings Drake finally returned to Darien to die. In a leaden casket somewhere along this lonely land his body lies under burning tropical suns today.

Perhaps the white Indians are descendants of those long-ago adventurers—the offspring of Spanish conquerors or English buccaneers, a link between the sixteenth-century discoverers and our own age.

Radio-Convention Year

CONVENTION orators, like the good little boys of another age, used to be seen and not heard. You sat in a gallery, watched the speakers gesticulate, and wondered what on earth they were talking about.

All that was changed this year. Few saw, but millions heard. To the uttermost corners of Madison Square Garden, whence the speaker on the platform looked but an ant in an ant-hill, the amplifiers carried every scrape of an oratorical throat. It was impossible even far from the convention halls to escape the conventions. Through the open windows of The Nation's office intruded the roars and squeaks of the loud-speakers of Vesey Street's four radio dealers. Millions must have paused in their noon-day walks through city streets to hear the speeches which blared forth from every radio store. In hundreds of thousands of farms men and women who had never dreamed of seeing a presidential convention sat, while the crops went untended and the bread unbaked, ears glued to the receivers, listening even to speeches which bored the sweating delegates in the halls. America was holding its first radio conventions.

The technique of the radio convention is in its infancy. A few of the speakers may consciously have modified their manner, but most of them forgot the larger audience in the air and spoke to the delegates in the halls. Something will have to be done, before another Presidential year, to teach politicians the art of radio-oratory and of radio-demonstration. It was exciting enough, for the privileged few, to see the delegates march like crazy schoolboys about the hall, jigging their standards as they danced; it was anything but thrilling to the radio-hearers. A dull, confused blah emerging from a radio horn, punctuated now and then by a second of silence followed by the urbane voice of a professional radio-announcer reporting that "the McAdoo delegates have been demonstrating for forty-seven minutes; the Canal Zone has just joined. This is the Democratic National Convention, Madison Square Garden, New York City, speaking"—that was anything but effective politics. Somehow or other, the ingenious minds of the party strategists will have to work out a technique of demonstration as interesting to hear as to see. Even the ear-splitting fire-engine sirens of the Al Smith demonstrators sounded, through the air, like little more than the murmur of the sea in a sea-shell.

Billy Sunday tactics will not do over the radio. The speaker who is most impressive when the eye aids the ear may be least impressive to the ear alone. The man who stands still and keeps his voice within limits may bore the delegates, but he is better heard afar than the Fourth-of-July orator whose arm-waving stirs the crowd that sees him into tumults of enthusiasm. The radio-listener, moreover, is lonely; there is no mob presence to sweep him out of his Yankee cynicism. He is an onlooker, not a participant, and is more likely to turn off his instrument with a smile than to thrust his fist into the solitary air and cry "Hurray for Cal!"

Novelty will wear off; there may not be so many radio-listeners four years hence, and those who do listen may be more impatient and less attentive. Or—will the inventors go so far with radio-pictures that the circle will be complete, so that conventions will not only be heard but seen too, by a whole nation, "over the air"?

An Unconventional Convention

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THRILLS in a party convention? After Cleveland it seemed impossible. But Saturday, June 27, 1924, will long stand out in the memories of professional convention-goers like myself. For that afternoon we were treated to the spectacle of what a convention can and ought to be. We were thrilled; we were stirred to our depths by two genuine debates staged as if for the purpose of demonstrating that if one could only get rid of the familiar flummery and foolishness and boorishness and the days of sickening, meaningless "oratory," we could have a quadrennial political gathering that would be worth while. All because men and women suddenly rose up after days of utterly degraded and demoralizing vaudeville performances to declaim with passion about two big subjects. True, they were less debates about party principles than about party policies. It was a battle over the simple question as to whether a political party should say what it meant and mean what it said. It is, of course, an indictment of any party that such a question should have to be discussed, but it is so clearly the nature of the political beast to use platform language in order to conceal its thoughts that it stirred us profoundly to have the old cut-and-dried formalities disappear, to find a convention which had got beyond its bosses and dared to take up questions which aroused it instead of being dominated by the historic expediency of the American political gathering.

Parties, when no longer young and reforming, would, if they could, invariably and exclusively use euphemisms—it was my old teacher Barrett Wendell who once told us that euphemism is to language what the fig-leaf is to art, and politicians usually have more nakedness to hide than any other group of men. In this case the politicians had to expose their secret troubles while seeking to hide them. The issues were too burning, the feelings too intense, the outrage too flagrant to be passed over for harmony's sake. So we had the amazing spectacle of a party quickened and galvanized into genuine vitality by the power of two issues which to many of the protagonists involved deep and sacred principles. Yes, as a case-hardened reporter, I admit that I would not have missed that night session for a great deal, and that I got thrill after thrill as though I were the veriest tyro, in hearing men and women say out loud that they would prefer to have their party wrecked and wracked and ruined rather than have it, as Wendell Phillips used to say, silent in the presence of a sin that threatens the very fundamentals of our American life. It was worth days of exhausting heat and still more exhausting platitudes, of hypocrisy, and of hours and hours of driveling laudations of politicians, nine-tenths of whom are now holding higher office than their abilities entitle them to. To see men and women fight like William Pettangall of Maine, Mrs. Carroll Miller of Pennsylvania, and that most amazing Georgian, Andrew C. Erwin, who evoked the most spontaneous and enthusiastic ovation of the convention, was nothing short of a treat. Mr. Erwin is a poor speaker and he was at first misunderstood. But soon that great gathering realized what he was about—"I've been trying," he explained, "for years to get you Yankees to look into this Klan business"—and what it meant for a Georgian to take the stand he did. So, like all American crowds, it applauded a brave man as he deserved to be cheered. For once some of the standards were "trooped" to good purpose, a worthwhile parade was formed, and the audience let itself loose.

Yet that plain ocular demonstration that courage pays in American politics, that our people are longing and thirsting for bravery and independence in public men, and that any man who is ready to risk everything, yes, perhaps even his life in Georgia for his convictions is a certain winner, passed over some of the politicians' heads. We were treated once more to whining appeals not to disrupt the party, to remember the innocent but misled members of the Klan whose motives are so good and so high and so patriotic that they have to express them by skulking around at night in masks and nightgowns and discriminating against equally worthwhile or better Americans who happen to be Negroes, or foreign-born, or Catholics, or Jews. The crowd's sympathies were nearly all one way, and besides the men and women of principle the Catholic bosses and senators fought as if to show us what they could do all the time in this country if they only engaged themselves with issues, with genuine reform, with sound political principles, instead of devoting their lives to miserable schemes to placate a voter here and a voter there.

Yet the Klan won by four and a half or five votes. But of what avail is that victory? How ridiculous to tell the country that the Democratic Party did not name the Ku Klux Klan in its platform when speaker after speaker got up and called that abominable society by its correct designations! Mr. Bryan and his Klan allies may really feel that they saved the day and protected the party from disruption. That is ridiculous. Every one of the millions who listened to the proceedings over the radio knows that the heart and soul of that convention were opposed to the Klan and not only wanted it described, but actually described it as it is. If the Klan voters are going to vote in accordance with the attitude of the two conventions, they will vote the Republican ticket because the decadent Republicans side-stepped the issue without debate. The mere technical language of the Democratic platform ought not to hold the Klan votes. They belong in the Republican camp. I hope they will go there, and I believe that their seats in the Democracy will be more than filled by those who will come to take their places and to give their allegiance to a party that is not afraid to talk out in meeting. Mr. Bryan's victory? Well, it was worthy of that great fundamentalist. The futility of the man, the confusion of his talk, his terrible lack of sound political and moral education were never so demonstrated. He is now a pathetic figure, so pathetic one hates to speak of him. Age is beginning to tell upon him, and when he dragged religion, yes, even Jesus Christ himself, into the debate in order to keep the Democratic Party from saying what it meant, he was incredibly sad. Bryan hissed and booed in a Democratic convention! Who would have thought it possible?

Then we had the League of Nations fight, and in this Newton D. Baker undoubtedly distinguished himself—I say it with the more pleasure because I have no admiration for the man himself. Exhausted by days and nights of sleepless labor, his was a marvelous physical achievement. He stirred the delegates so that, as I sat among them, I saw men and women in tears all around me. That was real oratory, though dangerously near the verge of hysteria, dreadfully overemotionalized and accompanied by gesticulations and contortions which revealed the terrible nerve strain the man was under. In more than questionable taste was his assertion that the spirit of Woodrow Wilson looked down from alongside of God's throne and spoke through his, Baker's, lips. And I for one could not forget as he told of having seen hundreds of dying American soldiers in France, dying with a prayer on their lips for someone to build a permanent temple of peace upon their sacrifices—that this same Newton D. Baker was one of the men who sent these youths into a needless and fruitless war; that it was he as well as the others of the Cabinet who planted hate and bitterness in their hearts; that it was he who, in the last analysis, was responsible for the torturing of the conscientious objectors; who consented to the crimes of a military court against the Negro soldiers of the 24th Infantry, now being released by Calvin Coolidge; that it was he who forswore and denied his pacifism and liberalism from the beginning to the end of the war.

But if I could not weep with this man, I could freely and cheerfully admit the fervor and conviction with which he spoke and the logical correctness of his position. His party ought to favor the League of Nations or be against it; it has now resorted to a subterfuge which leads nowhere and will probably be followed in 1928 by a failure to mention the League at all. As things stand, tactically Baker went too far; the Republican newspapers are already harping upon his declaration that defeat for his long-drawn-out and bitterly worded amendment meant the disavowal of Woodrow Wilson by Woodrow Wilson's party. Nor was it wise to denounce so unreservedly as traitors and quitters the men who differed with him on this issue. But here, too, we got a thrill; we had a real debate; we had a speech which stirred the emotions, which tore passion to tatters, which made the delegates think and ponder and weep. And having thought and pondered and wept, whether because of their own volition or because of the cracking of the party whips, they voted two to one against Newton Baker—one wondered if those who wept were allowed to vote. And so the League of Nations is laid on the shelf. The referendum agreed to cannot come to pass in years, if ever, and no one will be happier than the Democratic senators in Washington, for those who are on the inside tell me that there are not over five senators who are really heart and soul in favor of the League. The rest give it lip service because the party tells them to. Probably we shall hear a hundred speeches about the Klan to one about the League in the coming campaign.

All of this, I repeat, made up for the dreary wasted days, days thrown away because the Committee on Resolutions did not at once realize that it could not prevent these issues from coming up on the floor, and that it was worth infinite things to the Democratic Party thus to wrestle with itself and its beliefs. What a contrast that was to the sickeningly dull and dead Republican convention in Cleveland! If those who were present at both had to decide which party merited by vitality and vigor and character the award of the highest offices in the government, the vote would certainly be overwhelmingly for the Democrats. Yet fundamentally we have not gotten anywhere. The platform is barely progressive, not really liberal and not radical in its reasoning or its proposals. The dead hands of expediency and compromise rest upon it; it would have been far better to have enunciated principles and let it go at that. True, economic issues have entered into the platform in unusual degree; there are actually many proposals in it which a few years ago would have been denounced as purely socialistic, such as government supervision of the coal industry, the oil resources, etc. It was amusing to hear everyone assent to the proposal that the government go into the business of manufacturing cheap fertilizer for the farmer when we know how that plank would be denounced in a La Follette or a Socialist platform. At least we are moving toward a recognition of what a role economic issues are playing in our modern life. But I repeat there is no realization of the underlying fundamentals. How one did long for a single straightforward unequivocal stand on a matter like free trade and protection, similar to the admirable promise of immediate freedom for the Philippines and the promise of a popular referendum on war (though the latter was weakened by the weasel words "except in case of invasion").

Upon the minor incidents I have neither space nor time to dwell. It is a pleasure to record that the women have stood out better in this convention than in Cleveland—but no one could have stood out well against such a background as that afforded by the convention of the fit-to-rule. If one Democratic woman delegate in cowardly and unworthy manner changed her vote, but not her beliefs, on the Klan issue, it nevertheless appears that the majority resolution would have carried had she stood to her guns. As a whole, the speaking of the women was far finer than at Cleveland; they seemed of a higher grade. But what a terrible indictment of our public-school system is afforded by such a convention! Out of the sixty or seventy speakers we had to listen to not more than six attracted by the refinement of their voices, the form of their addresses, the charm or the correctness of their diction. In this respect Franklin D. Roosevelt shone. His speech was admirable; his spirit was fine and his courage in rising above his great physical misfortune is surely beyond all praise. Were he physically strong it seems to me that he would be the ideal compromise candidate for the Presidency from the Democratic point of view. As it is, the struggle between McAdoo and Smith is going on as I write, and at this hour no one knows the outcome or can guess when the bosses and leaders will get together and put the delegates out of their misery by sending word who is to be the candidate—unless, indeed, the convention once more takes the bit into its teeth and proceeds to think for itself.

Fortunately, we are not confined to the choice between the Republicans and the Democrats. At Cleveland on July Fourth there will come a happening which will give those free men and free women who are tired of election by disgust and nomination by exhaustion to vote for one who, whatever his faults may be, is a devoted public servant of constructive mind, who at last realizes that the time has come to cut loose from that which is the Democratic Party and that which is the Republican Party It is now Robert La Follette's move, and the politicians, yes, the country will do well to watch it.

The Maccabees of 1924

By HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

THE convention has been hot and it has been tedious, but all this the local press has commented upon with a great display of industry and sarcasm. The Garden looked like the inside of a box of very cheap candy. Mr. Bryan looked more than ever like a deacon. The delegates at two o'clock of the fatal Sunday morning looked like frayed pumpkins, but these events, too, have been duly chronicled in the columns of the newspapers of this and all other countries.

Remains to take the mass of material, boil it down, cook it, let it evaporate, cool it off in a cauldron of cogitation, and present to the learned students of The Nation what one might call the essence of the great democratic experiment which we have just attended.

Speaking exclusively as an historian and remembering the high duties of our office we beg to offer the following facta bruta as gleaned from ten days of almost unbearable heat and ditto boredom.

We have kept a daily log of all conventional events for some of the more popular news-sheets of the land. It was staccato work, and we are not sure that ten years from now we shall point to those essays with that pride which ought to follow all literary endeavor. But we remember that upon one occasion we compared the Democratic Party (as we might have compared the Republican Party) to our late but not lamented cousin the Dinosaur. That amiable reptile which ruled this world for many million years came to a very sad end. I am no ornithologist and I may get my facts slightly mixed, but as I remember the life's history of the Dinosaur the beast first grew so large that it could no longer walk and then it grew so large that it could no longer swim and finally it grew so large that it was obliged to wallow through the mire if it desired to move from one place to another, and in that condition of decrepitude it fell a victim to the fury and the ambition of those agile mammals who ever since have been the undisputed masters of this pleasant planet and who have relegated the remnants of the Dinosaur to such museums as can pay a high price for an occasional tooth or rib of this exceedingly rare prehistoric creature.

Our political parties, dinosaur-like, have increased beyond the point where they can either walk or swim. Soon they will be destroyed by their puny rivals who now are hiding in the bushes of Wisconsin or behind the high walls of the labor-union Palazze and Roman Catholic basilicas.

For those who have ears to hear and eyes to see the future development of our political system is both clear and simple. We are going the way of all flesh. Yea, we are going the way of Europe! For almost a century we have had two parties. There was very little difference between the two. One was in and the other was out or vice versa. Children were born Republicans or Democrats and old men died Republicans or Democrats. It made very little difference. Our country was large. It was rich. And we could do without government just as we could do without art or literature.

All this has been changed and will change even more rapidly during the next ten years. Our statesmen seemed to have a constitutional aversion to those elementary textbooks of political economy used by freshmen students in our academies and universities. As a result they are about to lose the support and cooperation of the workingmen of this country.

Surely no one will ever accuse Brother Gompers of having been the leader in a dastardly attempt to upset the established form of business and government. If we are to have a labor party (and we are sure to have one before another four years) it will be the result of Republican and Democratic ignorance. There is no longer any reason why a self-respecting plumber or carpenter should vote the Republican or Democratic ticket. There is every reason why he should cast about for a candidate who represents his own true interests.

The farmer has already left the old machines and is rapidly making for parts unknown in an old broken-down flivver of his own. But such flivvers, as many philosophers have observed these last six thousand years, are apt to get somewhere just when they were supposed to be ready for the junk-shop. The bucolic Lizzie may come to grief. But personally I doubt it and I recommend that venerable if somewhat ramshackle chariot to all students of current politics.

But most important of all, the development of the last olympiad has brought us to a crisis in our national history which will make itself felt for many centuries to come. I refer to the unavoidable formation of a Catholic Party.

Madison Square Garden this last week has been a fine laboratory for the study of this interesting phenomenon.

The Ku Kluxers were out in mass-formation.

"Very well," said the Catholic, "this is a game which two can play as well as one." And they called upon their own auxiliary troops and filled the Garden with an assembled collection of Tammany henchmen, and they packed the house with a variegated assemblage of ward-heelers and yeggmen and other gentry of the under- and semi-underworld who raised a hullabaloo that lasted almost two hours, and which showed the Scotch Presbyterians what the Irish Catholics could do.

Heaven forbid that I should blame the Smith managers. War is war and politics is politics and there you are. On the one hand the Ku Kluxers organize to defend the rights and privileges of that great and glorious Yahveh who led their ancestors into the wilderness of a new continent that there they might build a Kingdom of Righteousness and defy the Pope of Rome. Turn about is fair play. The Pope of Rome is not without friends in the land. Some twenty million people pay close attention to the words of the Pontifex Maximus. To them he is a very Holy Man. When the rumbling thunder of Yahveh's wrath threatens to strike him they will rush to his defense. This is eminently right and as it should be. But it means that henceforth we shall have a Catholic Party, a political party, membership to which is based upon certain religious convictions. This may be regrettable, but it cannot be helped. Vous l'avez voulu, Georges Ku Klux! It is the result of your own folly! You have invited the boll-weevil of denominational hatred into this fair land of ours. Try and get him out again if you can.

Alas, pretty speeches will do no good. The creature is obstinate. He has come to stay. Nothing short of a general conflagration will ever drive him out of our landscape.

But enough of this. I had better leave further entomological comparisons and similes alone and return to the earth, sweltering underneath the hot sun of late June. The Democratic Convention might have averted this disastrous discussion which is bound to lead our country into grave and terrible difficulties. Why and how and for what reason it preferred not to do this, I do not know. What worries me is the immediate consequence of this folly. We shall undoubtedly have a Catholic party. And the formation of such an organization will in turn be followed by a more intensive cult of Ku Klux bigotry.

During the last ten days I have talked to a good many people who come from the realm of the hooded knights. And they have confirmed me in my suspicions that this movement is something more than a mere religious movement. It is the concrete manifestation of the spiritual ambitions of those embattled natives who are engaged in a most holy fight for certain principles which they hold sacred.

The Ku Klux Klan is a class institution. Its ideals are those of the Anglo-Saxon middle class of half a century ago. It recognizes John Calvin as its God and William Jennings Bryan as His prophet. It loves virtue and hates sin. It suspects good manners as a manifestation of moral weakness. It regards beauty as a direct invitation to sin. If it could do so it would legislate us all into church every Sunday morning of our lives. It has banished the rum demon. It will now go after the infamy of the cigarette. It knows very little and has no desire to know more, since it suspects that book learning inevitably leads to atheism.

Tolerance it denounces as evidence of a flabby spiritual faith. It holds that the many references to the Promised Land and the chosen people, contained in a certain ancient Jewish book, were fulfilled when the first white settlers crossed into the territory of Kansas and descended into the valley of the Missouri River.

Please understand me. I am not blaming these good people. They are only doing what every other people ever since the beginning of time has done when it saw itself surrounded by certain forces which it failed to understand but learned to fear. A German or a Frenchman or a Swede under similar circumstances would do exactly the same. I am stating facts. I am not preaching a sermon. The natives of the vast Middle West fear for those things which to themselves are most desirable and therefore most sacred. They are fighting to preserve something which has already been doomed by history. They are throwing themselves bravely into a lost cause. They are the Maccabees of the year of grace 1924.

May the Goddess of History be merciful to them.

Democrats Are Different

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

YES, indeed, after looking at the Republicans in Cleveland and the Democrats in New York, this writer has to say that Democrats are different from Republicans with a difference that is not merely superficial.

Among superficial things may be counted their platform utterances. In platform utterances each party tries to nestle as close to the other as is possible and still leave room for enough short-arm jabbing to make a fight.

Even on tariff the Republicans claimed in their platform at Cleveland that now by means of the so-called "flexible provisions" in their McCumber-Fordney tariff law they will revise the tariff to fit "the actual differences in the cost of production in the United States and the principal competing countries of the world." Thus on tariff the Republicans creep toward the Democrats.

Meanwhile on the League of Nations the Democrats creep toward the Republicans and say in their New York platform that while they adore the League they will not by any means embrace it until the banns have been blessed by the whole American people in solemn referendum assembled.

On point after point throughout both platforms the effort to sleep on the same plank is more notable than any whimsical effort to become and to remain complete fell opposites.

Yet a deep difference between the personalities of the two parties does in fact exist. Their respective bosses are different and their respective progressives are different.

The Republicans tend to be grown-up and hard-boiled and cynical. The Democrats, of whatever age, tend to be youthful and romantic and day-dreamy.

A Democratic boss like George E. Brennan of Illinois gets infinite joy and humor out of all the absurdities, and even out of all the play-boy villainies, of politics. He perceives politics not only as a high emprise but also as a child's comic game. He does not thereupon despise it. On the contrary, the more comic and ridiculous it is, the more he loves it.

An hour with George Brennan, even in the midst of the tightest struggles of a convention, is an hour of laughter. Nothing can make George Brennan old. If age ever seems coming an inch or a millimeter over him, some awful rogue recoils from some harmless act because of some religious scruple and George Brennan laughs himself back into youth.

A labor grafter once defended a hold-up strike on a public-school building to George Brennan on the ground that children ought to go to parochial schools anyway. George Brennan rocks with the delightfulness of that situation. He thoroughly believes the Catholic religion and yet he has the human-comedy salt in him to chuckle: "You see how seriously our religion is taken by us Catholics."

Consider, on the other hand, an hour with the top Republican boss, Mr. William M. Butler of Massachusetts. It can safely be said that there is no excess of the play-boy spirit in Mr. Butler. The frivolities of human nature have no appeal to him, in so far as his conversation reveals him. Nor does he get any apparent appeal from human nature's ridiculous idealisms and moonshine madnesses. He in no way apparently thinks that human nature is either funny or sublime. He thinks it just common good straight work-aday uninspired stuff out of which spindles and dividends and wages and homes and water-mains and electric-light connections and children and the whole continuous identical round of repetitional human existence are made.

With the Democratic progressives, on the other hand (and in a degree which the Republican progressives never in their conversation exhibit), human nature is just too beautiful and sublime for words.

The outstanding Republican progressive, Robert Marion La Follette, and the outstanding ex-Republican Farmer-Laborite progressive, Henrik Shipstead, can look at the protestations of the League of Nations and yet, nevertheless and notwithstanding, still look at the League itself with a cynical and suspicious and malevolent eye.

Not so can any outstanding progressive Democrat. The League says it is for noble purposes. It says it has beautiful ideals. Then the heart of even the most drastic progressive Democrat—of even Burton K. Wheeler—begins to go out palpitatingly and devoutly toward the League.

Those two extreme but charming young men, Mr. Wheeler of Montana and Mr. Shipstead of Minnesota, are a really highly competent illustration of the difference between the Democratic temperament and the Republican temperament.

Let the Republican and Democratic platforms be what they may. Let the Republican and Democratic conventions be what they may. Let all these outward appearances of inward grace or disgrace be what they may. Let us look for a moment at the temperamental—or even spiritual—differences back of them.

The great outstanding feat of Mr. Wheeler in Washington has been to expose certain moral iniquities prevalent—or asserted to be prevalent—in the town. The great outstanding feat of Mr. Shipstead has been to deliver a set and even so tremendous speech proving—or tending or trying to prove—that Mr. Andrew Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, on behalf of our bankers, of whom he is one, has been paying an unnecessarily high rate of interest on short-term federal securities.

Republicans are realistic, hard-boiled, matter-of-fact. Democrats are imaginative, warm-hearted, matter-of-fancy, and matter-of-castles-in-Spain.

Sometimes they make the castles come true, as they did in the marvelous line of new, adventurous, and yet workable and useful laws in the first Woodrow Wilson Administration.

Yet since they idealize everything, they idealize even their own party. The Republicans tend to see everything in a harsh dry light.

Thereupon realistic progressive Republicans tend to separate themselves from realistic reactionary Republicans. Both factions in the Republican Party tend realistically to perceive their incompatibility.

The progressive Democrats and the reactionary Democrats are saved from that division by their happy human optimism and idealistic playfulness. They are the Christian Scientists of politics. They think it is so; and sometimes amazingly and thrillingly it is.

Meanwhile, if any new independent or third-party movement gets going and becomes really important in the United States it will be out of the element which once was by drastic financial realism Federalist and then by drastic tariff realism Whig and then by drastic anti-slavery realism Republican and now by drastic realisms of one sort and another defiantly and outrightly Farmer-Laborite in a profusion and with a vehemence which the Democrats are glad they do not rival.

They are glad indeed. They, meanwhile, by their common capacity to imagine happiness and harmony even when it does not exist, remain the one continuously fighting fondling family in American political history.

What they have been for a hundred and fifty years they still are in their convention in New York. The division between our parties is not superficial. It is superficial only in the words of policies. The resemblances between the two parties are only in platforms. With absolutely identical platforms they would still go in diametrically different directions.

The Republicans would realize and split. The Democrats would idealize and unite. So the one forever is change through action; and the other forever is change through faith. They are not superficial things. They are the two sides of human life.

To W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

By SCUDDER MIDDLETON

The race that wheedles mercies from its God
Shall be the beggar always at His door;
It shall debase itself before the rod,
And live among the shadows ever more.
But when, with growing pride in self, it stands,
Asking no favors of the clouds or men,
To it God reaches down His mighty hands,
To it are all tomorrows given then.

You know those hands! Beyond the cottonfields,
Beyond the creaking tree, the faggot's flame,
Your eyes have caught the vision of a race
Rising by greater truths than pity yields.
And you have made it dream, speak out its name—
Proud of that ancient ebon of its face!

Convention Notes by Art Young

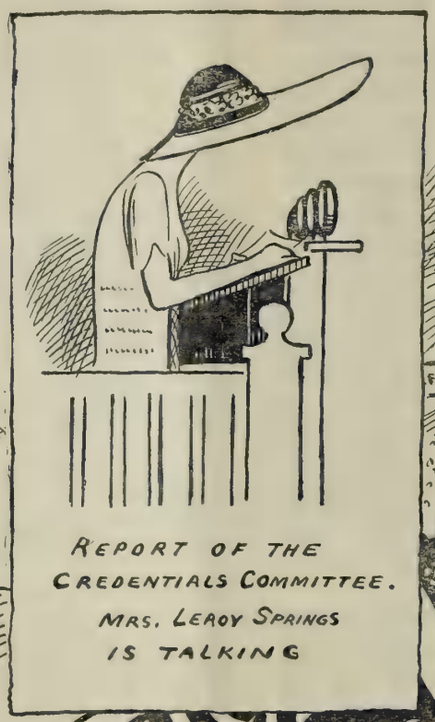
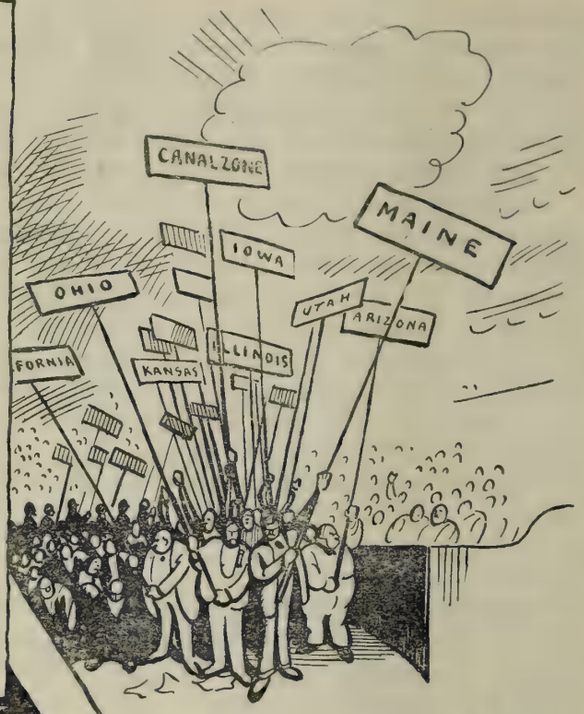
Wall Street reads the platform



REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE. MRS. LEROY SPRINGS IS TALKING



Grand March

Mr. Phelan gesturing like a hypnotist

The side lines

Democracy Militant

Southern Candidates Underwood

Carter Glass

Well that's over.

Here Are Ladies

By ERNESTINE EVANS

SUFFRAGE had been in the oven four years. I opened the oven door to see how the cake was getting along. I took a turn round the Waldorf, milled through headquarters of half a dozen presidential candidates, drew women delegates into corners for iced tea or breakfast, saw old friends. How was the cake getting on? I visited the headquarters of the Women's Democratic Club. I talked to the vestals of the National Woman's Party booth. I visited the brisk headquarters of the National League of Women Voters, whose membership is something over five-hundred thousand and something under two million. I called on Mrs. Emily Newell Blair's bustling, clucking headquarters, down the hall from the National Committee itself, and on the Committee of Nine. I went to the Garden. There, broiling in the sun, and shrilling above the noise machines, and fire sirens, and Tammany shouts, was evidence a plenty that women are no longer outcasts from the national quadrennial debauch.

Suffrage does rather better in the Democratic than in the Republican oven. I quote a famous political journalist. "My God," he swore, "these Democratic women are twice as voracious as the women at Cleveland." What he observes is that the Democratic National Committee, four years ago, at the behest of Mrs. Elizabeth Bass, then chief of the Woman's Bureau of the Democratic Party, made the fifty-fifty arrangement by which the national committee of the party should be composed of one man and one woman from each State. The Republicans at Cleveland finally followed suit. Four years of being "had in" has made the tone of the Democratic women more assertive. Four years from now the Republican women will be just as "bad" or just as "good" as the Democrats. There will be the same testy disputes about tickets. The unhappy Democratic gentleman who sought to pacify the lady delegates with single tickets for the Garden discovered that the ladies, like himself, were politicians. They, too, had their little entourages that must be "taken care of." "Are you taken care of?" "I'll see see you're taken care of." These sentences are a buzzed refrain wherever even lady politicians are gathered together. The taste of patronage, however petty, is like the taste of blood. The right to appoint a sergeant-at-arms—the men find—is a right not lightly abdicated by the women delegates who discover they have it. With the women, however—and it is a gay difference—getting their rights is still a matter of principle rather than a matter of personal power. Witness Miss Mary Archer at war with National Committeeman Guffy from Pennsylvania over tickets. There is a touch about her of a woman with a cause, in spite of the sound of ordinary squabbling.

The second day of the Garden Party a rumor broke in the newspapers that the woman's story of the convention would be the concerted move by certain old machine politicians to "get" Mrs. Emily Newell Blair of Missouri, vice-chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and by virtue of that office the leader of the Democratic women of the country. Mrs. Blair, like Mrs. Bass before her, believes firmly that the Democratic Party, if it were wise, would make a dead set at the women. The women are, after all, the only fresh mass of voters in the country, and concessions might allure them. Like all politicians the Democrats would rather make concessions to those who fill the party chests with funds than to anything so vague as probable voters. The women don't yet feel financial responsibility for the party. Cordell Hull, who has spent much of his time the last four years worrying about party debts, would probably admit that women were amiable at helping gather little sums for the party, but very slow at getting up a fifty-fifty Dutch-treat attitude in their organizations. Mrs. Blair, I am sure, has pointed out to him that women haven't very much money, and hardly at all the habit of spending it in politics, but still it is in the matter of money that you find the greatest rub against the women.

The fight, or rumored fight, about Mrs. Blair simmered to nothing. After the convention she will probably be re-elected, and she will accept office if the party candidate pleases her. Her reelection will mean that the Democratic Party still feels, besides not wishing change and ruction on the eve of a campaign, that Mrs. Blair's type of woman in politics is still the ablest on the scene. She is a Missouri woman, politically an enemy of the State machine and of Jim Reed, is the wife of a lawyer and mother of two children, a clubwoman and a suffragist. Mrs. Blair is distinctly a voice at the Democratic court, explaining gently what the organized woman's movement in America wants and has passed resolutions about. Her political strategy will be the gradual rapprochement between the organized women with their reform policies and the Southern Democrats who stood out so long against the child-labor amendment. She personally cares for the social legislation which the League of Women Voters backs. The other women mentioned for her job would be less acceptable to non-party women. Miss Marbury is not known for her idealistic stands. Western women don't care for any wet. Mrs. Kellogg Fairbanks gets along better with men politicians than with the rank-and-file clubwomen whose psychology is a specialty of Mrs. Blair's. Mrs. McMillan of Tennessee is considered personally ambitious.

Scraps of conversation give a sort of dada picture of woman's place in politics. A young reporter from Philadelphia came to Doris Stevens for an interview. "Do you believe it is right for women to use more than the vote and to vamp politicians in trying to get what they want into the platform?" "What do you mean, vamp?" said Miss Stevens. "Why, you find men vamping men in politics." The reporter fled.

"I think," said a woman reporter, "that I will report this convention the way the men did the women at Cleveland. I will describe the clothes of these men from all over America, the strange cuts of their coats, their unaesthetic figures, their shiny hair, their lack of it."

A member of the platform committee said to me: "The women who spoke to the platform committee were brief and to the point. Even Mrs. Pennypacker, lengthier than the rest, describing the millions of conservative Democratic women who want the World Court, said more in less time than any man who addressed us."

A woman delegate said to me: "I hope we never change. So far, I have yet to hear a woman who wants to talk more than fifteen minutes. We have some loud speakers that put radio to shame, but long speakers we haven't got. Did you see how that group of women rustled when Chairman Walsh got up to speak? They were remembering how he was asked to speak forty minutes in Buffalo at the convention of the League of Women Voters, and he spoke an hour and a half. Men talk too much. And men's appetite for speeches isn't normal. They seem to have a tapeworm for oratory."

In the midst of one of the demonstrations, when chaos was at its most idiotic, an old-time suffragist turned to me. "I do not want to be borne round on the shoulders of any delegates. I do not care for whooping, but it gives me pleasure to see so many women making fools of themselves. I cannot tell you how tired I used to get of self-conscious women afraid to whoop it up and get a passion for rumpusing out of their systems."

One of the women most important in the convention, an old, old Democrat, took me aside. "This convention is all right, but the one I'm really interested in is the one of July 4 at Cleveland. I had rather be a Democrat than a Republican, but somewhere there must be a party that will really stand for something new, something better for this great sprawling country of ours than what's here."

Another woman, very hot, and not even amused at the strange ritual of noise and perspiration before her, inquired: "Did I spend seven years fighting for suffrage and earn the right to be part of a convention that wastes days over an issue of whether men shall parade the street in nightshirts and astonish with fireworks, Judas and the Pope and 'Old Black Joe'?"

The McAdoo celebration was on. One of the McAdoo women just stood and yelled. "Don't she look like a macaw callin' for her mate?" muttered a one-time committeeman whose malignant glances indicated that he had another candidate in mind.

There you have it. On the scene women mix easily in the vulgarity and jounce of the convention. Individually the women delegates seemed to outrank the men in, let us call it, respectability. Behind the scenes, the organized women proceeded with dignity and dispatch to urge reform measures. They were annoyed by the injection of the Klan issue and the political jockeying. They moved with an assurance they did not have four years ago. But no one can tell whether women are going to be a new force in politics, or whether politics is merely going to be a new occupation for women.

New Morals for Old
Virtue and Women

By ISABEL LEAVENWORTH

IN the turmoil of discussion regarding present modes of sex life one can discern a pretty general approval of just one element in the whole situation: the ideal by which the good woman has for so long been controlled. It is commonly held that if changes are to be made they should be in the direction of persuading men, and also the few women who have been at fault, to be just as good as our good women have always been.

It seems to me most unfortunate that the majority of people hope to improve matters through an extension of the feminine ideals of the past. In the established scheme of things one finds a peculiarly gross form of immorality, an immorality incommensurably greater than the dreaded evil of promiscuity; and it is only as an element in this total scheme that woman's ideals have any significance. According to the present system there is a standard of conduct set up for women which is to constitute virtue. This standard is a combination of specific positive commands and, more especially, of specific prohibitions. There are certain things which no nice woman will do—a great many things, in fact. She must learn them by heart and accept them on faith as the Pythagoreans must have had to learn their curious list of taboos, a list running from the taboo against eating beans to that against sitting on a quart measure. This ideal of virtue does not apply with equal rigidity to men; quite different things are expected of them and accepted for them. It is obvious that two such conflicting ideals by the very nature of their combination will produce a class of women who do not live up to the standard of virtue set them as members of their sex. This class is not merely an excrescence but an integral part of the situation created by the total sex ideal of society. The function of women of this class is to make possible for men the way of life commonly considered as suited to their sex and to make possible a virtuous life for the remainder of womankind. In fulfilling this function such women lose, in the eyes of society, their moral nature and forfeit the right to live within the pale of social morality. They are considered unfit for normal social intercourse and are denied those relationships and responsibilities which ordinarily serve as the basis for moral growth. From all normal responsibility toward them society regards itself as released. That which is personal, the inner life, the character, the soul—whatever one prefers to call it—having been sacrificed, supposedly in the service of the social scheme, one is to treat what is left as of no value in itself, but merely as an instrument to be used in the service of man's pleasure or woman's virtue. The prostitute is to society that one thing, defined by the purpose which she serves, and that is all she is, all she is allowed to be. The depersonalization, the moral non-existence, one might call it, of a large number of women is, then, implicit in the social system currently accepted; not a punishment meted out to those who fail to act in accordance with the social scheme (though it is as such, of course, that society defends it).

It is curious how many people feel that a choice between the present system and any other is reducible to a choice between different degrees of promiscuity. Promiscuity would be an evil, but it does not in itself involve this particular immorality. The worst evils in the present situation are due not to the "lower" half of the double standard but to the doubleness itself.

It is true that the ideal of womanly virtue is only one element in the conventional system of sex morality. But, like a Leibnitzian monad, it reflects the whole universe within itself—the universe of sex mores. It is in no real sense any "higher" than the ideal by which men have lived. They are warp and woof of the same fabric. According to this ideal it is woman's prime duty to keep aloof from evil. This sounds commendable enough. And it would be at least innocuous if one could interpret it as meaning that woman should hold herself aloof from some imagined evil that would become existent were she to embrace it. This is not, however, a possible interpretation of the varied collection of prohibitions which it is her duty to respect. Their import is clearly enough that she is to keep aloof from evil which is already existent, which is an acknowledged part of her background. She is to shun all of those vulgarities, coarsenesses, and immoralities which are to enter into the lives of men and for which, one is forced to conclude, the "other" women are to provide. And from this other class of women she is, of course, to keep herself absolutely separate, distinct. I recently heard an elderly Boston lady make a remark which expresses the horror commonly aroused by any conduct which endangers the distinction between the two classes. "Do you know," she said, "I heard that a young man of our set said he and his friends no longer had to go to girls of another kind for their enjoyment. They can get all they want from girls of their own class." Much the same attitude is revealed in the frequent remark that the young girl of today appears like "any chorus girl" or like any "common woman." The horrid picture is usually rounded off with the comment that you simply can't tell the difference any more between the nice girl and the other kind. One can imagine that this might cause considerable inconvenience. Each of the two classes of women has served a special purpose and it is, to say the least, disconcerting for a person not to know which way to turn when he knows very well which purpose he wants fulfilled.

The precautions which a good woman takes to preserve her purity are indeed legion. There are places where no nice woman will go, situations with which she must have no immediate acquaintance, people with whom she must not associate; there are various embodiments of evil, in short, to which she must not expose herself. That these evils should exist, that they should be tolerated as meeting certain needs in the lives of men and be made possible by other women—all this the average good woman swallows without repulsion, or, more commonly, ignores. She is aroused to a state of true indignation only when her own moral exclusiveness, or that of her kind, is threatened. The same woman who accepts with a good deal of equanimity the fact that men she associates with also associate with "gay" women would be considerably upset if these men were to attempt to associate with both kinds of women at the same time. Why is the average woman so upset if a man of her acquaintance makes "improper advances"? Is it that she is horrified to find that he is willing to indulge his irregular sex desires? No. She is outraged because he thinks she is willing to indulge hers, because he holds her virtue too lightly. Sex evils, coarsenesses are then to be part of the good woman's environment in the intimate sense that they often enter into the lives of the men she accepts as friends, even of the men with whom she is to have the most personal and supposedly ideal relationships. Her sole function is to turn her back on these evils.

The acceptance of this situation is implied in the ideals which are passed down to girls by the good old-fashioned parent. Do the mothers who insist that their daughters shall not go with boys on certain occasions and at certain hours unchaperoned expect boys to refrain from seeing any girls except on occasions thus carefully timed and adequately supervised? I doubt it. Whatever their expectations may be, it is certain that they would rather that the good girl should cling to protection, letting the man seek gaiety where he may, than that she should take the chance involved in seeking gaiety by his side. They would rather have what they consider the evil sex element taken care of by men and by women whom they need not meet than to risk any slip in conduct on the part of their own daughters. Purity purchased at such a price may be purity in some magical sense, similar to that secured in the ancient mysteries by passing through fire or going in bathing with sacred pigs. Purity in any moral sense it certainly is not. It is simply a social asset, like physical beauty or pleasing accomplishments, so tremendously valuable to woman that for it she has been willing to pay any moral price, however degrading. Its non-moral character is revealed in the common assumption that any man can, without injury to himself, pass through experiences or be placed in situations from which, since they would pollute her, every good woman must be guarded. This assumption, so obviously insulting to women, is at present complacently accepted by them as something of a compliment.

William Graham Sumner in his remarkably unemotional and objective treatment of social customs devotes some pages to a description of the houses of prostitution established and run by the cities of medieval Europe "in the interest of virtuous women." In this connection Mr. Sumner for once indulges in terms of opprobrium, judging the custom as "the most incredible case" illustrating "the power of the mores to extend toleration and sanction to an evil thing." The inmates of these houses were dedicated entirely to this special function, wore distinctive dress, and were taboo to all "good" women whose virtue, according to the scheme of things, they made possible. Authority for such a custom can be found, as Sumner points out, in Saint Augustine, the reformed rake. "The bishop," writes Sumner, "has laid down the proposition that evil things in human society, under the great orderly scheme of things which he was trying to expound, are overruled to produce good." Is not this the position taken by people who hold that it is better to have prostitution in order to provide for the assumed sex irregularity of men than to risk the loss of a woman's "virtue" through the removal of those conventions and taboos which prevent her from coping with the situation herself and making her own moral decisions?

It is hard to follow the mental processes of those persons who, while deploring the increased freedom allowed women and the tendency to judge them less severely, still claim belief in a single standard for both sexes. In so far as woman's virtue consists in aloofness from the evils which the double standard implies it quite obviously cannot be adopted as the single standard by which all members of society are to live. Even aside from this consideration it would seem to be as undesirable as it is impossible to extend to men the traditions and restrictions which have for so long governed women. Does anyone really wish to have grown boys constantly accompanied and watched over by their elders? Does anyone wish that the goings and comings of men should be as specifically determined as those of women have always been? Should we look forward to a day when a man will be judged as good or bad on the sole basis of whether or not he has ever had any irregular sex relation?

One would think that the suspicions of even the most uncritical might be aroused by the rigidly absolute and impersonal nature of women's sex ideals. The notion of purity as lying in the abstention from a particular act except under carefully prescribed circumstances has all the marks of a primitive taboo and none of the characteristics of a rational moral principle. The ideals of woman's honor and chastity have without doubt been built up in answer to human wants—the defense which is invariably given of customs, good or bad. Probably those sociologists are not far wrong who hold that they have developed as a response, in early times, to the sentiments of man as a property owner; later, in response to masculine vanity and jealousy, though these motives have, of course, been idealized beyond all recognition. We need not be surprised, then, to find that they bear no relation to an interest in woman's spiritual welfare and growth, an interest to which society is only now giving birth with pitiable pains of labor. To follow an ideal which almost entirely excludes sex interest as something evil is to condemn one of the richest elements in personal experience. And this ideal has regulated not only woman's sex experience but has demanded and received incalculable sacrifices in all the phases of her life, mercilessly limiting the sphere of her activities, smothering interests of value and nourishing others to an unnatural state of development, and warping her character to satisfy its most exacting demands.

Not only is it undesirable that men should attempt to follow such an ideal but it is quite obvious that as long as they accept it as adequate for women they are prevented in innumerable ways from developing intelligent principles for their own guidance. For one thing, they will come to look upon the sex element in most of its forms as a moral evil. Experience tells them, however, that it is, in their own case, a natural good. Thus they are led to accept a distinction fatal to moral integrity and progress. The sex element is admitted to the life of the average man by the back door; once within, it has fair run of the establishment though it is always looked on askance by the other members of the household. Sex interests are to be recognized and indulged but divorced from all that is "fine" and "ideal." They are considered desirable though immoral and so are to be tolerated just to the extent that they are divorced from those elements in society—the family, the home, and good women—which are supposed to embody virtue. It is not realized that virtue, far from being a rival of the other good things of life, is to be attained only through an intelligent interest in good things, and that to divorce moral from natural good is to deal a death blow to both. We cannot wonder that at present sex interest so often expresses itself in the form of dubious stories, coarse revues, and degrading physical relations. While the "good" woman who considers sex somehow lowering is apt to develop a personality which is anemic and immature, the man who accepts the conventional scheme of life develops a personality coarse and uncoordinated.

I do not mean to say that there have been no elements of value in the ideal of purity by which some women have lived. It is undoubtedly true that unregulated and impersonal sex desires and activities quarrel with more stable and fruitful interests in life. But while the most valuable experiences of love are, in general, to be found in more lasting relations, it does not follow that society should prescribe for every one of its members a particular line of sex conduct and attempt to see, through constant supervision, that its prescriptions are carried out. The sacrifice in terms of freedom of activity and experience is too great and the living flower of personal purity cannot be manufactured by any such artificial methods.

The sex relations of an individual should no more be subjected to social regulation than his friendships. There is indeed a closely related matter for which he is immediately responsible to society—that is the welfare of any children resulting from such relations. The two matters are, however, quite distinguishable and no one could hold that the effort which society makes to control sex relations is to any extent based upon concern for possible offspring. If this were so, one would not hear so much condemnation of birth-control measures on the ground that they "encourage immorality." No. It is personal experience which society would like to prescribe for its members, personal virtue that it would like to mold for them. But virtue is not a predetermined result, a kind of spiritual dessert that anyone can cook up who will follow with due care the proper ethical receipt. Experience cannot be defined in terms of external circumstances and bodily acts and thus judged as absolutely good or bad. Sex experiences, like other experiences, can be judged of only on the basis of the part which they play in the creative drama of the individual soul. There are as many possibilities for successful sex life as there are men and women in the world. A significant single standard can be attained only through the habit of judging every case, man or woman, in the light of the character of the individual and of the particular circumstances in which he or she is placed.

From the changes taking place in sex morality we may, with sufficient wisdom and courage, win inestimable gains. Certainly we should be grateful that young people are forming the habit of meeting this old problem in a quite new way—that is, with the cooperation of the two sexes. In the interest of this newer approach we should accord to girls as much freedom to live and to learn as we have always given to boys. The old restrictions, imposed upon girls alone, imply, of course, the double standard with all its attendant evils; imply the placid acceptance of two essentially different systems of value; imply the preference for physical purity over personal responsibility and true moral development. We should encourage the daughters of today in their fast developing scorn for the "respect" which our feminine predecessors thought was their due—a respect which man was expected to reveal in the habit of keeping the nice woman untouched by certain rather conspicuous elements, interests, and activities in his own life. In so far as there is something truly gay in these aspects of life, something which men know at the bottom of their hearts they should not be called on to forego, there is much that women can learn. Most people today hold in their minds an image of two worlds—one of gaiety and freedom, the other of morality. It is because gaiety and morality are thus divorced that gaiety becomes sordidness, morality dreariness. Not until men and women develop together the legitimate interests which both of these worlds satisfy will the present inconsistency and hypocrisy be done away with and both men and women be free to achieve, if they can, rich and unified personal lives.

San Pedro

By MARY REED

Los Angeles, June 18

No member of the I. W. W. has ever, in word, act, or thought, cast any slurring remarks upon the victims of the terrible naval disaster, or has in any way threatened to dynamite the morgue. The daily press is using these slanderous lies to incite violence.

A PLACARD bearing these words hangs over the wrecked I. W. W. hall in San Pedro. Across the street the remains of a bonfire show all that is left of the furniture, and a piano lies in pieces on the curbstone. Nine-year-old Lena Milos is in the hospital suffering from burns by scalding coffee which was thrown on her after she had been knocked down and told: "We'll fix you so you'll never perform for another entertainment." Sixteen men, women, and children are recovering from injuries inflicted during the raid. Nine more were seized on their way to the entertainment and taken by a crowd of hoodlums to Terminal Island and beaten up. Andrew Kogas, proprietor of the hall, who refused to drive out the I. W. W.'s, was beaten, and his son was burned across both legs. Steve Rodin's house across the street was searched for guns, and he himself was beaten up, and his porch was used as a watch-tower by two men with guns pointed toward the hall. Tom Sullivan, Robert Bigelow, Leonard Green, Herbert White, and two others were taken to a distant canyon and tarred and feathered. One was made to drink a pint of castor oil.

The class-struggle has long been bitter in San Pedro, the port of Los Angeles and center of the oil-fields. Illegal arrests of members of the I. W. W. and Workers Party are a common occurrence. Pressure is brought to bear to get men dismissed from their jobs, and then, being out of work, they are arrested for vagrancy, which is the usual charge against reds. Over a year ago, during the harbor strike that tied up the port, more than 700 men were arrested and jailed and the chief of police announced that "none of that constitution stuff" would go in San Pedro. Every few days scare headlines involving the I. W. W. are run by the newspapers, especially the Los Angeles Times. But when six members of the I. W. W. charge that they were tarred and feathered, it gets tucked in on the fifteenth page.

Every pretext has been used to accuse the organization of violence, but never did such an opportunity offer itself as the disastrous explosion on the S. S. Mississippi in San Pedro harbor. What could be easier than to say that the Wobblies were rejoicing over it, and planning to blow up the undertaking house where the bodies of the forty-eight dead sailors had been brought? What could impress good patriots more than to have the place guarded by twenty-two naval guards and four patrolmen? The "citizens" were prepared—the same citizens who had swooped down on the I. W. W. headquarters in hooded gowns on March 17. This time about a dozen of them were in sailor's uniforms. The crowd formed near the American Legion hall and marched more than a hundred strong to the I. W. W. headquarters. Strange as it may seem there were no policemen at the hall, as there had been at every other meeting and entertainment. When the mob approached, one I. W. W. member ran and found a policeman, but was told: "You'll have to call the station for that." Another went to the police station. But the entire force had just been called out to the other end of town.

Tom Sullivan, chairman of the meeting, a small and very earnest man from the oil-fields, describes what happened then as follows:

I called the entertainment meeting Saturday night, June 14, at 8:20. We had just pulled off two small sketches when the raid started. All I remember is, they started to break the windows. Evidently there were four committees in the raiding party: one for breaking windows, one for breaking furniture, one was a sapping committee, with guns, brass knuckles, and gas pipes, and the other was men on the outside waiting to nab us when we came by.

They pushed in the front door and all the windows, and forced people out the back door, where they had a fire to burn people on the way out. I stood at the doorway and tried to make them let the women and children out first. The leader of the sapping committee came and deliberately pushed Lena Milos into the coffee that was cooking on the stove at the back. Then I was hit on the head and pushed out the back door myself. And as I was going out, kind of dazed, I stepped on quite a few women, and tried to pick some of them up, but they seemed to be too heavy for me. I have a faint recollection of the Bigelow girl grabbing me and saying: "Tom, my mother's inside." The fire had started, but we both went in, and the place seemed to be empty except for Mrs. Milos and the wrecking crew. I took her out toward the door, but four sailors took her away from me, and I got a blow from the leader that knocked me unconscious. . . .

I woke up in Bob Bigelow's lap in a big truck with open sides and a big tarpaulin over the back, and I said to Bob: "Where are we at?" And Bob said: "Tom, we're gone." Then the Bigelow girl stepped to the truck and asked me: "Have you seen Bob?" I told her: "Bob is in the truck with me." Then Mrs. Bigelow, his mother, tried to climb into the truck, but they would not let her in.

Then we started on our way, with two cars ahead and fifteen behind. We passed the Sixty-fourth Street Security Bank in Los Angeles, and went up Center Street and out to Santa Ana via Franklin. We went through Wilmington and passed two policemen there, but they turned the other way. We figured we were headed for the Mexican border. . . .

We got to a place in the country, and they had to open a fence to drive in. We reckoned it was about twelve miles beyond Oliver. Two men took each man out. They walked us about fifteen feet. Then they all got around us —about ten sailors and ninety civilians—and told us to strip. We stripped naked. After we were stripped, they asked a few questions about the army, and how we'd like to join, and kidded us along. Nobody answered. Then the leader said: "Well, search their clothes, and take what money they've got and we'll turn it over to the Salvation Army." I had $70. I can positively identify the man that took mine. He lives in Watts, where I've seen him a dozen times. Then he took us each aside separately and asked us questions. I was the fourth. He asked me: "Do you belong to the I. W. W.?" "Yes." "Are you proud of it?" "Yes." "Where were you born?" "San Francisco." "Will you give up the organization?" And I told him: "No, not at no tar-and-feather party. If I ever give up my card I'll give it up at the membership meeting and explain to the members why I've given it up." So then he said: "Who's got all the cards?" So one man brought all the cards up, and they looked them over by the light of the fire they had built. They found my card, and they found in my pocket the minutes of the previous meeting, and one of the leaders come over to me and said: "We found these on you, didn't we?" "Yes, sir." So he asked my name, and I told him Tom Sullivan; so he said: "You are the one that calls all these meetings together. Well, you are one man we are looking for." He asked the rest of them the same questions. One man in the bunch, the biggest one, denounced the organization and said he'd give it up if they'd let him go. So they questioned him and made him promise he'd never carry another I. W. W. card, which he promised, so they told him to put on his clothes, so he put on his clothes, and they asked him how much money he'd had, and he said "$5.10," and the man dug down in his pocket and handed him $5.10. They let off one other they identified as being a Mexican prize-fighter, because he had fought for a sailors' benefit once. And they let one other go because he had an A. F. of L. card besides his I. W. W. card.

So then they come back to me and asked me what good the I. W. W. ever did me, so I just spoke about fifteen words and started to explain the organization, when he said: "'We'll give this fellow a double dose," so they led me out in the middle of a big ring they had formed. There were two men. Each had a pillow full of feathers. They each cut their pillow right in two, and then each took a tarred brush in hand dipped in a five-gallon can, and started on me, one in front and one in back. Then they threw feathers all over me, head to foot. I started to walk away, and they called me back and said: "We promised you a double dose," and I went through the same thing again. Then the leader said: "Walk ahead of me." So I walked a few feet and I turned round and said: "Where am I going?" And he said: "Never mind where you are going. Go." And I refused. He had a gun all this time right behind my back, and he told me: "You are going to hell," and I said: "Shoot and have it over with. You've gone so far, let's finish it up." And he shot, but he must have shot up in the air because he did not hit me. So I just lay there and waited for the other boys to come along.

When they got done tarring and feathering the rest of the boys, they took all our shoes and all the clothes they could use and saturated the rest with tar. All I had leaving the place was one coat, naked. We walked seven miles in our bare feet. Several autos passed us, and we hollered at them, but they refused to hear, until a man come along with a big Mason button. His name was Roy Massingale. He and two others were in a coupe for three, but piled us all six outside and in, and we got it all smeared with tar. He took us to Oliver, where he went up to a farm house himself and got six gunny sacks to cover us up with. Then he went to a restaurant, but had to pound on the door fifteen minutes before he could get a man waked up. He ordered coffee and something to eat right away, and said he would pay all damage to the restaurant by our sitting in it with tar and feathers. He was headed for Los Angeles, but said he would take us to San Pedro. But then a rescue party came with Mrs. Molina, and she took us up to her home and cleaned us all up. . . .

Last night (Monday, June 16) between five and six Jack Walsh and White and myself were in the hall and two sailors were outside looking in the window, and we recognized them as raiders. I recognized one as the one in the truck who said to me: "I am going to make you eat up the American flag." We saw an auto drive up and five officers in it, and the three of us went out, and I says to them: "Will you people arrest one sailor who was in the raiding party?" The first one said: "Well, we're neutral." Then the officer in the back seat said: "That's what we're up here for. Let's go get him." The sailor was running up the street, but the officers went after him and got him. The officer that started the arrest said: "What did you try to run away for?" The officer driving answered the question for him, and said: "That boy did not want to run away."

Jack Walsh and I went along with them. When we got in the station the same man that drove (he had a mustache) went up to the desk and winked and said: "This man wants to make a charge against this gob." The officer at the desk asked: "What charge?" And I said: "I positively identify this fellow as one of the raiding party on the truck." And the officer in charge told me I had to have a warrant from the prosecuting attorney's office before he could lock him up. The arresting officer (who had claimed he was neutral) then said to the sailor: "Come on, Buddy, let's drive out of here and go back to where we came from," and went out with him, winking at him.

Before we went out, Sergeant Weber (he used to be a sergeant in the army) threatened my life in the presence of Police Captain Hagenbaugh, and told me that the next party would be a hanging party, and he'd see that I was on it, too. (Signed) T. SULLIVAN

At the I. W. W. meeting on Wednesday, plans were made to hold a memorial mass meeting with ex-service men as speakers, in memory of the sailors lost in the Mississippi disaster.

In the Driftway

UNTIL the other day the Drifter was very much in sympathy with the recent criticisms of Northwestern University which have come from his comrades, the editors of The Nation. But now he is somewhat shaken by the fact that the authorities of that militarized institution have just bestowed the honorary degree of Doctor of Literature upon The Nation's own William Hard. That offsets in the Drifter's eyes many LL.D.'s awarded to Calvin Coolidge and Warren Gamaliel, Nicholas Murray, the Kaiser, and other great and good men. The Drifter wishes that every one of The Nation's readers could know Bill Hard, as all Washington calls him, as he does. If they did they, too, would say that Northwestern had done itself particularly proud. For this man Hard is, to apply an outworn, old-time phrase, a "real character." In other words, he has a rare individuality, as well as an amazingly original way of putting things in type. He is so individual, so original in his processes, that sometimes the Drifter wonders why Bill Hard has not been lynched—he is in himself such a traitor to our most cherished American belief that we must, if we are loyal, reduce every living soul to one model that shall feel and talk and sleep and eat and drink and think just like everybody else. The truth is, Bill Hard has succeeded in winning for himself a special place in the affections of all sorts and kinds of people. The Drifter knows that his colleagues get letters declaring that Bill Hard has "fallen" for the social game. But the Drifter merely smiles at that, as at the complaints that Bill Hard's views and those of The Nation differ. That is one reason, the Drifter believes, why he is so welcome in the columns of The Nation; it is not afraid to present differing views, And when you come right down to it, the Drifter has to confess he does not know whether Bill Hard is a reactionary or a wild radical; he is a genuine human being with a most picturesque and graphic style, deep sympathies, and rare intuition. The Drifter would like to have bestowed three times as many honorary degrees upon Bill Hard as were this year garnered by that nonsensical economist, the Hon. Andrew D. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury.

* * * * *

NOW that he is on the subject of personalities, the Drifter cannot forego the opportunity to express his regret that Henry T. Finck, for more than forty years the music critic of the New York Evening Post, has voluntarily left that once brilliant daily. Finck calls himself seventy years of age, but it is a transparent lie, for his heart of youth can never have grown so old. A joyous child he always has been and will be, perennially with passionate loves and passionate hates, now championing Wagner in the days when to do so was to write oneself down a conceited, affected jackanapes, now abusing Brahms and living to repent that in considerable degree. Strange how few of us are capable of championing more than one radical departure from the beaten paths! Of course, Finck loved too dearly both his Paderewskis and his Geraldine Farrars to be an ideal critic —but them he loved so ardently and so faithfully! For many, many years the sole reviewer of musical books for The Nation, Finck served it well in numerous other fields. Seventeen books stand to his credit, running from music through "Romantic Love and Personal Beauty" and gardening to "Girth Control."

* * * * *

YES, Henry T. Finck, too, has personality, individuality, character—whatever you choose to call it. He is a living example of what absolutely full self-development does for a person, for he has been "Expressing Henry" all his life (except when he has palmed off some of his able wife's music criticism as his own). Which reminds the Drifter how the second edition of the Evening Post once nearly failed to appear. Accustomed always to absolute freedom from the copy-desk blue pencil, or any control by business office or managing editor or owner, Finck naturally was bitterly outraged one day when he came back from lunch to find in the first edition in utterly garbled form a musical criticism he had sent up in the morning. His shrieks of pain, his outburst of rage that after thirty-five years his virtue should thus be outraged by this mishandling of his copy brought a half-dozen editors to his side. A posse comitatus started with Finck for the composing-room to find the guilty man, since no editor had even glanced at the copy. The composing-room protested its innocence and to prove it produced Finck's unaltered manuscript. Comparing it with the printed page Finck made the startling discovery that the newspaper in his hand was not the Evening Post but its rival the Globe and the guilty criticism not his but a rival critic's! The Drifter has the authority of six eye-witnesses that alcohol played no part in this transaction, and that Henry Finck never in his life went downstairs so fast as on this occasion or amid such shrieks of laughter.

* * * * *

SO the Drifter wishes Henry Finck years of joy and happiness and as much of the red wine of his new home on the Riviera as is good and proper for him. Some day the Drifter may be ready to give up wandering the world o'er and writing for his special corner in The Nation. When that day comes he hopes he will take with him as much love and affection as does Finck. But he fears that if he is to accomplish this some one else must be

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Mythical Cohesion of the Jews

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I point out a few trifling deviations from the verities in Miss Wallerstein's The Jewish Babbitt? There are just two things that make a Babbitt forever impossible: suffering and learning. A Babbitt is possible to America because in this land of great, natural plenty one may survive and wax fat without either. But the Jew, the eternal Christ of the world suffering for the sins of the people, has covered Europe with his blood and his tears these twenty centuries; and the rosters of the City College of New York will show what value fathers who earn a terrible and precarious existence in sweat-shop or rag-bags, widowed mothers who earn scant and bitter bread through ten hours of daily scrubbing still lay on learning.

The abiding wonder to me, as to other patient observers, has been that there should be so little cohesion among a people so ringed about with dislike and persecution. So far from "Jews employing, so far as possible, only Jews," experience and statistics show that they bend slightly backward and employ, as far as possible, only Christians. The largest construction company in New York, for instance, with a Jew at its head, makes it an iron-clad rule to employ no Jews.

I would the Jews had some of this mythical cohesion. Then they might preserve some of the color and poetry and tradition of their race and their race life, and so make their unique and characteristic contribution to the stream of our common life in America. So terrible is the social pressure put on them, so great the contempt in the life around them for everything Jewish, that the passionate wish, often of the immigrant, invariably of his children, is to be "a real American," more American than the Americans, if possible.

Miss Wallerstein says she and Abraham Levy are relatives and she does not know which regrets the fact more. May I suggest that while Miss Wallerstein has the compensatory advantages of having "put her stuff across," Abraham Levy has only the dismayed grief of one who has been treacherously wounded in the house of a friend?

New York, June 2 DOROTHEE MEIROWSKY

The Real Jewish Babbitt

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Miss Wallerstein in her recent article on The Jewish Babbitt betrays a sad lack of knowledge of conditions among American Jewry. What appears in the distance to be a militant Jewish Ku Klux Klan is in reality a mirage. She mistakes a blatant small class of "professional Jews" who believe the essence of Judaism to lie in the combating of anti-Semitism for the vast majority of American Jewry. True, Jewry is suffering from a virulent siege of Babbittism with extremely serious complications—but not of the type described by Miss Wallerstein. The truth of the matter is that American Jewry is not "rampantly Semitic." With a few exceptions it is amazingly un-Jewish, even anti-Jewish in sentiment. The American Jew—always excepting the race-conscious communal worker who assumes the burden of Jewish activities—is not 100 per cent Jewish but is simply sedentary, self-complacent, eagerly adapting himself to American standards—the true Babbitt.

Miss Wallerstein envisages a Jewish Ku Klux but in reality she sees the white hoods of the Shomrim (watchmen) guarding the socialistic colonies of Jewish pioneers in Palestine. And it is the pioneers and idealists in Palestine with whom Hallinan unconsciously sympathizes, for their aim is to re-establish the right of the Jew to live as a Jew, not as a cultural hybrid.

Toronto, May 27 L. G.

Jews Must Stick Together

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read Miss Wallerstein's article The Jewish Babbitt and must confess I have failed to grasp what she wants to say. That all the Jews are not ideal men and women? That we have Babbitts, bigots, corrupt politicians, criminals, literary censors, profiteers, snobs in our midst? If she followed the Yiddish radical dailies, which are the dominant force in the American Jewish press, she would be aware of the fact that all the types she objects to are very vigorously fought by the Jewish radicals. But when she speaks of the Jew Klux Klan, one is compelled to say that it is a very strained metaphor, unless she really believes in the existence of some "Elders of Zion," as her mysterious hints would lead one to think.

Where is there a Jewish organization which would resort to violence or social ostracism to enforce religious conformity? A conclusive answer to this question is to be found in the "Jewish Almanach" for the year 1917, published by the Jewish Community of New York. It appears that the total number of pews in all synagogues and prayer-meeting rooms of New York City on the two most important Jewish holidays was just sufficient to accommodate 42 per cent of all adult Jews. In other words, 58 per cent of the adult Jewish population of this city were not churchgoers. Moreover, 77 per cent of all Jewish children received no religious instruction.

It is true that since the World War a Jewish nationalism has grown up among the Jews of America, including Socialists and radicals. But this movement originated as one of organized self-defense against anti-Semitic aggression. When you daily come across advertisements reading "Clerk (or stenographer) wanted, Christian," "Private room for rent in a suite of law offices to Christian attorney," "Accountant wanted; state religion and salary expected," "Apartment to let to Christian family," is it not natural for Jews to cling to their own race? The parallel between the Poles, the Czechs, and the Jews does not hold. The Jews have not had, nor are they likely ever to have, the power to limit the number of Gentile students in universities. But an American university president did propose such a scheme. The other day it was reported from Budapest that the Hungarian students of the medical school pointed out to the professor of anatomy in the classroom four of their Jewish fellow-students whom they proposed to kill in order to provide Jewish corpses for dissection, the reason being that the Jewish community provided for a funeral in every pauper case. It was not a ghastly joke; it was meant in all seriousness, as if it were a case of rabbits who were to be killed for scientific experiments. Faced with this recrudescence of medievalism many of the thinking Jews who had gone through life as internationalists and assimilationists have been forced to the conclusion that the Jews must stick together for mutual protection against militant anti-Semitism. Apparently in her associations among the Jews Miss Wallerstein has not come across this type of Jewish nationalist.

New York, May 23 ISAAC A. HOURWICH

Common Clay

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I cannot see that the above correspondents disagree with my article on any fundamental point, but I do feel that they misunderstood it. I simply pointed out that Jews were made only of human clay, that they had their jingoes just as any other nation has, and that liberals should cease to idealize Jews just because they are an oppressed race. I cited the instances of the Poles and the Czechs, not to prove that Jews would do the same, as Dr. Hourwich assumes, but merely to illustrate the fact that suffering and oppression do not make heroes. The case for Jewish freedom rests not on the virtue of the Jew, but on his existence as a human being, and I urged liberals to fight his fight on the latter ground rather than on the former. Incidentally I mentioned the Jews who resent Jewish Babbittry, of whom Dr. Hourwich seems to think I have never heard.

Now, jingoism emphasizes national interest as against national ideals. The hundred-percenter has little of the Declaration of Independence or the Bill of Rights in his philosophy, but much of America First. So, too, the Jewish jingo has little of Jewish religion or idealism, as all the above writers point out, but he clings to the protection of Jewish interests. This seems to me perfectly compatible with the breach between Jews as we know them and Jewish ideals, and hence I do not feel that there is any issue between the above letters and my article. In fact, Dr. Hourwich himself speaks of this breach at the same time that he asserts that nationalism is growing among Jews.

Dr. Hourwich explains the nationalist spirit which my article described. But his explanation rather establishes the fact than overthrows it. Indeed the anti-Semitic attack which he describes has had quite the same effect on Jewish nationalism that the "attack" of Germany had on French nationalism, or the "attack" of Russia on German nationalism, including even the Social Democrats. They, by the way, correspond closely to the one-time internationalists who, Dr. Hourwich says, have been converted to Jewish nationalism.

I further cite Dr. Hourwich's letter as an answer to Miss Meirowsky. The suffering of the Jew, contrary to her statement, has rather aroused his jingoism than otherwise. In fact, perhaps the worst thing that anti-Semitism has done to the Jews is to increase their jingoism and mob-mindedness, just as the war increased them among the peoples involved.

New York, June 23 BERTHA WALLERSTEIN

Contributors to This Issue

WILLIAM HARD, HENDRIK VAN LOON, and ART YOUNG, together with the Editor of The Nation, are contributing special campaign comment to The Nation.

ERNESTINE EVANS is a New York journalist of wide experience who is particularly conversant with the recent political activities of women.

ISABEL LEAVENWORTH is an instructor in philosophy at Barnard College.

MARY REED, formerly on the staff of The Nation, is now living in Los Angeles.

SIDNEY F. WICKS is on the staff of the Manchester Guardian.

WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD, poet and author and professor of English at the University of Wisconsin, is a frequent contributor to The Nation.

JOSEPH KRUTCH, The Nation's special reviewer of fiction, contributed an article on Modern Love and Modern Fiction in the issue of June 25.

RUTH BENEDICT is a member of the faculty of Anthropology at Columbia University.

E. MONTENEGRO has been the New York correspondent for several Chilean journals.

ARTHUR MOSS is an American writer living in Paris.

E. C. LINDEMAN is the author of "Social Discovery," recently published by the Republic Publishing Company.

Blake

By HAROLD LEWIS COOK

Blake was the child who saw
God at his window-pane.
He frightened Blake and then Went away again.

Blake saw angels in
A tree at Peckham Rye,
Like stars upon the branches
They flamed before his eye.

Blake was a madman to
The men of his day;
They never saw the Lord
Or Heaven his way.

It is a queer thing:
Though I am wise and sane
God does not come to stare
Through my window-pane,

Nor anywhere in London
Do angels stand in trees,
Though I have knelt down yearning
For visions like these.

Books

England's Labor Rulers

J. Ramsay MacDonald. By Iconoclast. Thomas Seltzer. $2.50.
England's Labour Rulers. By Iconoclast. Thomas Seltzer. $1.50.
Margaret Ethel MacDonald. By J. Ramsay MacDonald. Thomas Seltzer. $2.50.

IT is necessary to read these three books together in order to gain an adequate understanding of the significance of the British Labor Party. They reveal the fact that a labor party must be something more than a mere federation of trade unions negotiating first with one party and then with another. A political party which seriously faces power must be shaped by a conscious philosophy, stimulated by intellectuals, and fired by spiritual ideals; a party which rises above the class war, with a national ideal and an international vision. These books should be pondered over and taken to heart by every labor leader in America.

Iconoclast has done his work well. His books have the essential virtue of books and speeches—they are interesting. They are intellectually exciting and reveal the romance in politics. Iconoclast is too much of the born publicist to be able to make a cold-blooded estimate of things. Believing that we live by admiration alone, he has thrown himself into the task with uncritical zeal. The result is a picture that cannot be used as a textbook, but which illumines the subject and gives to the reader the right "feeling" about the British labor crusade. His terse descriptions of fourteen labor leaders satisfy the craving of the American to know human facts about the Labor Government. The men shown here, men with hands gnarled in boyhood days in factory and pit, with minds enriched by secret study, with wills disciplined by long years of public service, with hearts fired by a passion for social righteousness—is it not a proud thing for Great Britain to have produced men such as these? What is the secret of England that she calls such men to her service?

Iconoclast's study of J. Ramsay MacDonald, although cast in the orthodox form of biography—"From Log Cabin to White House," as it were—is really a quest for MacDonald's secret, and if that secret eludes him it is because a man who cannot baffle his biographer is not a great man. But Iconoclast delves to the heart all the time. Whether writing of MacDonald's mysterious boyhood, his struggles in London, his marriage with Margaret Ethel Gladstone, his historic words in the House of Commons in August, 1914, his patient bearing of the cross of hatred, his call to the soul of England in 1923, Iconoclast hovers in fascination about the ultimate secret. Because of that we forgive him for that attempt to reproduce an "H. G. Wells" conversation in the chapter headed Some Questions. What is the unifying element in MacDonald? He has physical beauty and intellectual ruthlessness; he loves romance and reverences logic; he is a shrewd politician and a knight in shining armor; an orator in public, but reticent in private; a proud Scotchman, but a lover of all peoples; a Socialist, but a fighter of revolution; impatiently inclined to domineer, yet bending patiently to circumstance; treading a lonely path, yet drawing men after him. The unifying element in all this is—J. Ramsay MacDonald. The baffling secret is the secret of all genius, the hidden creative fire of the world, the mysterious forge where the sword Excalibur is shaped. MacDonald draws his strength "from the deeps" and deep calls unto deep. He has a listening attitude. In the chapters The Sling and the Stone and The Secret of the Scot, Iconoclast shows why the British folk recognize in Ramsay MacDonald a great prime minister. It is because they do not entirely understand him. The Englishman has always loved the mystery of the Celt.

Some facts stand clear. By his stand during the war Ramsay MacDonald preserved the most precious heritage of the British race—he saved free speech. Of equal importance, we now see that his staunch defense of parliamentary institutions saved democracy in England and shattered the Bolshevik menace. He was not a pacifist in the negative, anemic sense of making pledges about a purely hypothetical future; he loved peace as the essential condition of an adventurous crusade for a clean, sweet civilization. That is why ex-soldiers (who had been long enough in the trenches to overcome hatred) formed his bodyguard at the last election.

Each one of these books, and supremely Ramsay MacDonald's biography of his wife, reveals a vital factor in the power of the Labor Party. Its choicest leaders have dedicated themselves to the faith that the ethics of the Carpenter of Nazareth are the only permanent foundation of an industrial order. John Wesley as well as Keir Hardie has had something to do with this. Philip Snowden's father, the Yorkshire weaver, gave young Philip the passion of the Sermon on the Mount. From the ranks of Wesleyan lay preachers came Arthur Henderson. Vernon Hartshorn first proclaimed his gospel in a pulpit. C. G. Ammon wrote a book called "Christ and Labour." Frank Hodges worked as a lay preacher after he left Ruskin College. In similar work in Durham, Benjamin Spoor won his spurs. In the story of Ethel Margaret MacDonald this religious faith, transmuted from emotion into the practical activities of social service, is tenderly revealed. It is the story of countless golden lads and lasses in England. She turned from pottering about among ecclesiastical activities and the placing of lilies on altars to serving the children of the slums.

MacDonald's story of his wife is a piece of literature. It must live. The soul of Margaret Ethel MacDonald goes marching on in the labor ranks. Those women were poets who laid flowers on her "memorial seat" when Ramsay MacDonald was called to power. The women of America are idealists. They need the power revealed in this book.

Iconoclast does justice to the work of the intellectual in creating the Labor Party. Trade unions are naturally conservative; the intellectuals gave to them the philosophic adventure of ideas. They gave to discontents a disciplined body of science and a star-theory by which to steer. Mr. and Mrs. Webb are the architects of the New Jerusalem of Labor. Noel Buxton, Charles Trevelyan, Lord Olivier, Brigadier General Thomson, Lord Haldane—they are adventurers all—the Elizabethan Captains of the Intellect. Ramsay MacDonald and they have no dim apocalyptic vision, they have shown how the shining turrets and towers of the city of God may be built foursquare above the slums of our civilization.

SIDNEY F. WICKS

Byron: 1824-1924

Byron in England. By Samuel C. Chew. Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.50.

The Political Career of Lord Byron. By Dora Neill Raymond. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

SAMUEL CHEW'S book is one chapter in the adventures of Byron's spirit among mankind, chiefly after his adventures in the flesh had ended; and the book itself is one of the last of these adventures. The making of it must have been a most exciting adventure for Mr. Chew, assuredly now America's most enthusiastic and erudite Byron scholar. He has explored Byron not alone as he lived on in the minds of Hazlitt, Macaulay, Arnold, Swinburne, Browning, Meredith, Morley, and their kind and found their praise or blame often amusingly implicated with their likes and dislikes of individuals or with the tendencies of their own day; but he has left his study-chair at Bryn Mawr to rummage, with enormously developed acquisitive instincts, in libraries and private collections on either side of the sea, through musty volumes and pamphlets, files of old magazines and newspapers, scrap-books and private letters—and I surmise his notes must have weighed at least two thousand pounds. The book orders and integrates all the important critical pronouncements, yet skimps interpretation of the ups and downs of Byron's fame—presumably because so many of the judicially selected citations deal precisely with this outstanding phenomenon. But much of the new material is cultural history, the adventures of Byron's spirit with imitators, tricky booksellers, forgers, dissenting ministers—a diverting tale of rascals and fools that seems to negate any essential differences of taste, common sense, and morality between cultivated England and the untutored land of my own far slighter study some years ago, "Byron in America." Mr. Chew himself says his book is, aside from its exhaustive bibliography (53 pages), largely a contribution "to the age-long history of the curiosities of literature and the calamities of authors."

These calamities include twenty-nine futile continuations of "Don Juan," besides imitations innumerable, of which the only one to become even a literary memory was the "Fanny" of the American Halleck; they include the free use and freer misuse of his personality in a number of novels from the notorious "Glenarvon" of Caroline Lamb to the "Bendish" of Maurice Hewlett; and an apocrypha consisting of ten books, ten shorter poems, one prose satire, and two collections of letters. And not the least of the calamities was the prejudicial influence of most of this work on Byron's own reputation: it used to be taken seriously enough for serious review—Poe more than once reviewed such stuff himself—and Byronism in both England and America by the sixties had very nearly damned Byron, when Tennyson's tea-table muse wooed scribblerdom elsewhere.

Mr. Chew has got together a really huge mass of entertaining, significant, and otherwise inaccessible information, for the accuracy of which, however, his own solid reputation must be our sole guaranty.[1] His notes must have offered a bewildering problem in arrangement, perhaps incapable of satisfactory solution, though I think I should have tried to separate more consistently and explicitly the adventures of Byron's spirit among the intellectually respectable from its adventures among the intellectual underworld. His design has apparently limited his interpretative comment, as, for instance, an easy resolution of the famous opposing judgments of Swinburne, who stressed Byron as a whole, and Arnold, who maintained he was best in selections: the one was thinking of creative energy, the other of artistry. And why does he tell us to forget "the ancient scandals"? Byron is not only a world-poet but a world-personality, and none knows better than Professor Chew, the astute critic of "Astarte" and the 1922 volumes of Byron's "Letters," that they are not scandals but human problems full of pathos and awe for wise men and women.

It is the personality, rather than the poet, whom Miss Raymond, with a zest of phrase and sweep of narrative art as intriguing as Ethel Mayne's in her "Biography," brings home to our imagination and our critical intelligence. A spirit as complex and a life as full as Byron's offer the student many leitmotivs—friend, husband, lover, critic, letter-writer, swimmer, sinner, traveler, satirist, poet, politician. Miss Raymond has chosen the last with heartening and instructive emphasis on the politician in action. For Byron with Milton and the less great Blunt is the only English poet who has followed through political thought to consistent political conduct in public affairs. If Byron had been essentially the rhetorical type of mind that some have thought, the mind whose ideals of the new freedom and of a world made safe for democracy ethically culminate and conclude upon achieving the right words, then his eloquent rhymes or trenchant letters about Washington and Bolivar, the rights of Ireland and India, the predatory imperialism of England, the oppressions of the Holy Alliance would never have furnished forth the career Miss Raymond records. Even the early speech in the House of Lords, in defense of the frame-breakers of Nottingham (the I. W. W.'s of that day), might have been set down to forensics or a perverse penchant to shock. But no rhetorician would have risked money, time, life itself as Byron did in his whole-hearted and practical cooperation for the liberation of Italy and of Greece; and ears dulled by long repetition of his verses or offended by apostrophes now out of fashion will experience, I think, an authentic thrill if they will listen again to Byron the poet after reading this book on Byron the politician.

The story of Byron in Greece has never been so well told. Byron with the sword of freedom in his hand was the one indubitable realization in the flesh of that reiterated romanticist doctrine, most musically proclaimed by the young Coleridge and the young Shelley, of the poet as in his highest function liberator and reformer of states. But all the bright colors and triumphant parade were absent. Instead—the squat plaster headquarters in a sordid little seaport of the Levant, the gray skies and the filthy marshes, the dissensions and duplicity of the Greek leaders, the ragged soldiery, the hopeless disorganization in the economic and financial as well as military energies in that "land of lost gods and god-like men" he had come to help, the motley knight-errantry of the Philhellenes—Englishmen, Italians, Germans, who soon found that their reading in Homer and Sophocles and Plato was a quite inadequate preparation for the task of driving the Turks out of the Morea. Byron, with sword forward in air against the sunrise, leading a charge up some fiery slope—that was the vision of his admirers back in England; perhaps a dream of his own as he said goodby to Teresa. "Dis aliter visum." Yet only in the dispiriting miseries and stifling confusions of Missolonghi did Byron find for the first time a worthy challenge to his dignity, patience, good sense, manhood. He was the one realist among the Philhellenes, seeing all the problems in their naked difficulty; and he was the one genuine idealist with the long, faithful look ahead to the big issue.

The "Noctes Ambrosianae" of Blackwood's in June, 1824,

[1] But, if I may say so, George Lunt (p. 200), whose "Grave of Byron" is correctly listed in the Bibliography, was not an Englander but a New Englander; and Andrews Norton's once celebrated study (p. 219) appeared not in the Atlantic Monthly, but in the North American Review (1825), the little slip being due apparently to some furtive and pesky reminiscence of the Atlantic Magazine, with which Norton's friend Bryant was connected in the late 1820's.

prophesied that Byron would still be remembered a hundred years after. In June, 1924, the sun shines on a glacial boulder on the hilltop of Cologny overlooking clear, placid Leman, whose simple legend was only last month unveiled—À Byron.

WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD

Toward a Social Psychology

Psychology and Primitive Culture. By F. C. Bartlett. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

SOCIAL psychology has most often concerned itself with formulating schematic systems of social development, and there is a growing recognition that it has perhaps been overhasty. It is at least reasonable to doubt whether we shall have illuminating schematizations of society as a whole till we are wiser about the cultural fortunes of any one society, and we seem to be on the point of making up our minds to a great amount of preliminary labor with concrete data.

It is, therefore, a hopeful step which Mr. Bartlett has taken in this book. He has set himself to the study of actual conditions in primitive society, believing that light will thereby be thrown on the subject of human behavior, modern as well as primitive. It is not in the contrasts between the two, but in their samenesses that he finds special significance for his purpose. We have every reason to believe that there have been no fundamental changes in the human mind since the dawn of pre-history. Modern man handles the material with which his civilization presents him very much as primitive man handles his; the difference is in the character of the traditional material.

The greatest virtue of Mr. Bartlett's work is its awareness of diverse cultural orientations and the part that these play in determining human response. Man's actions and motives are in every society overwhelmingly part of the traditional fabric of his own particular social group; and this is very nearly as true today as it was at the dawn of history. To look for the explanation of behavior, then, wholly in the realms of individual psychology, as is customary in the standard works, and as Frazer, for instance, has done in the field of primitive studies, is to ignore the mountain for the frost-formation on its rocks. The institution of modern monogamy and its outlawed adjuncts is not so much elucidated by analyses of the original nature of man, nor by classifications of the instincts, as by the historical fortunes of this arrangement and its antecedents in the cultures from which ours derives; and by comparisons with the diverse schemes which obtain in many other human societies. We can never go back, even in origin theories, to a pre-social individual, and to attempt to postulate such a being in theories of behavior in society of today is indefensible. Man is always not merely a man, but a man of a social group. His responses have been conditioned from birth by the character of the culture into which he was born.

It is encouraging to those who hope to achieve some understanding of human behavior through the study of these cultural patterns to find this position in a book of this character. Nevertheless, it is a dull book, and its own individual contributions are of doubtful value. In its leading discussion of the forms of man's social reactions, it adds one more to the recent output of fundamental classifications of human types. Such schemes, if they are shrewd and well-documented, have a justification in themselves apart from their claims; but this has not even the trappings which might win us to it. Mr. Bartlett calls these fundamental responses by the rather clumsy phrase of "social relationship tendencies" and finds that they are three: primitive comradeship, assertiveness, and submissiveness. He discusses these in their bearing upon the manner in which a migrating people spreads its culture among people with whom it comes in contact, balancing the results in hypothetical cases where the migrating tribe was either friendly, aggressive, or subservient. He considers them also in relation to the folk-tale, though he is able to do no more than assemble from primitive mythology illustrations of the various sorts of dispositions. In his discussion of the diffusion and elaboration of culture, he lays these fundamental responses aside entirely. The total result is a rather cursory collection of notes, for all Mr. Bartlett's attempts to achieve consecutiveness by abstracts and recapitulations.

Nevertheless, the book is encouraging. The descriptive material on which it is based is of the highest order, and it includes such American monographs as that of Professor Boas on the Tsimshian and of Dr. Radin on the Winnebago. If as a whole the book is tantalizing, it is because it is able to suggest an approach to the problem of human behavior the possibilities of which we are just beginning to explore.

RUTH BENEDICT

A Northern Mystic

The Philosopher's Stone. By J. Anker Larsen. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

FROM Hamsun, Nexö, and others we have come to expect of the Northern novelist at least an aesthetic participation in the simple paganism of the life which he describes, but the spiritual kinship of J. Anker Larsen is less with the Viking than with the mystics of the Spanish cloister. Against a background of people and things which has been made familiar to us by a long line of translations, he tells a strange story of a search for that God who is conceived as existing not in, but above and in opposition to, the gods of nature, and he puts himself with his tortured mysticism and a certain prurient emphasis on "purity" among the febrile saints.

That his book has power and originality there is no denying; moreover, it won the Gyldendal prize and received high praise from Knut Hamsun; but so completely is everything subordinated to the thesis—the need of the modern world to establish through the Mystic Way a contact with the unseen—that to judge it is to judge mysticism itself. If those tortured eccentrics who find in brief ecstatic glimpses of an unknown world the only escape from the filthiness of normal life are indeed prophets, then "The Philosopher's Stone" is a very great book; but if they see not into heaven but only into the depths of their own neurotic temperaments it is merely a strange document, and I must confess that my interest in it was as a description of one of the varieties of religious experience rather than as a work of art. The power which its author has of sketching character and of describing incidents might, if differently used, raise him to the very first rank, but as the story proceeds his preoccupation with the thesis grows more and more complete until it becomes impossible to judge the book as an objective work.

Early in his dreamy childhood Jens Dahl, hidden in a barn, caught sight of a girl whom he knew and who was a part of his world of childish dreams in the act of being tumbled by a peasant. It would seem that this incident furnishes the real key to the book, for from that moment on the vision of a comely face distorted by passion haunts the boy; sex becomes for him the symbol of absolute evil; and his whole life is an effort, not always successful, to escape from it. Nearly four hundred large pages swarming with characters and incidents carry him through various adventures in frustrated love and religion and bring him at last to suicide, but none of his motives is very clear except his fear of love. Like all the more tortured and febrile mystics, his God and his good are vague but his Devil and his evil are concretely represented in bodily desire. Often he is tempted; sometimes he "falls"; but he never seems to realize that an action which is undoubtedly nasty when he performs it may not only seem different but may be different for another. There is something in the very manner in which he uses the words "innocence" and "purity" which make him seem to the pagan or to the rationalist hopelessly corrupt. Actually the whole importance of the book's thesis will turn upon an answer to the question, "Did Jens hate sexual passion because he was a mystic or did he become a mystic because he hated sexual passion?"

The first terrifying experience of the little boy was probably not an unusual one, for it often happens that children see things not intended for their eyes. Then the whispered nastiness of the school-yard is suddenly connected with some person near to them and the world is poisoned because they cannot achieve that reconciliation of passion with ideality which can be made only through the medium of personal emotion. Physical desire is beautiful only in oneself. The power of idealizing it and of accepting it as a valuable part of life comes only at the time when it is needed. If a child is brought suddenly face to face with a fact which he has no means of comprehending the shock may be the beginning of a lifelong inability to accept life and of a perpetual sickness of the soul. Then, since sexual feelings are forbidden by disgust to express themselves through normal channels, they must make for themselves an illusory satisfaction, and the result is the mystic vision which is characterized by the exalted ideality of passion without the conscious intervention of sex. Whoever cannot accept sex cannot accept life, and finding the world one in which he cannot live he creates another.

Thus, though I recognize fully Larsen's powers and though I am ready enough to sympathize with his desire to escape from mere materialism, I believe that I understand too clearly the pathological character of Jens's experiences to accept them as a very valuable contribution to the spiritual life. Christianity is perhaps dead, having passed through humanitarianism to materialism, but if the modern world needs (in the words of Larsen) "a religious sense" that religious sense has expressed itself in more fruitful forms not incompatible with the acceptance of the world in which we live. Though Larsen never seems to realize it, knowledge and experience may be just as innocent as ignorance, and whoever believes in the supreme importance of intangible things is as religious as man need to be. In the language of art and, sometimes, of science, we express our sense of man's relation to things more important than his bodily needs, and when we recognize these things and this relationship we are lifted as far above the earth as man's spirit may safely go.

J. W. Krutch

A Latin-American Crusader

El Destino de un Continente. Por Manuel Ugarte. Brentano's. $1.

DENUNCIATIONS of the most bitter character against the United States are not sporadic literature in the countries to the south; but Ugarte has made a fresh appeal to his race by refraining from hatred and blind prejudice, by conjuring up the sentiments of patriotism and solidarity, exerting himself at the same time not to arouse the xenephobia and boxerism of the masses. On the contrary, Ugarte says: "To show contempt for the United States is rank folly; to hate them would be an inferior sentiment, conducive to nothing." And in his preface: "No one admires more than I do the greatness of the United States, and seldom will you find anyone with a clearer notion of the necessity of our getting together with them in the development of our future life; but this must be done upon an equitable basis."

Like Dr. Ingegnieros, another Argentine writer, Ugarte sees in the greatness and superior development of the United States the very reason for fear. Both see well enough the weaknesses and shortcomings now handicapping the peoples of their race, but nevertheless they call upon them to organize and resist. Ugarte's main reason for this is that he does not believe that the absorption of a people by another of an alien blood does good to either of them. He thinks legitimate certain expansive movements known to history, such as that of Piamonte in spreading its rule over Italy, of Prussia over Germany, etc. He does not even fear a military conquest of Latin America. What he does fear is the economic absorption that sucks out the life-blood of a country, leaving only the empty shell to its people to rejoice in.

> In olden times imperialism was satisfied with no less than a general levy of the inhabitants of a conquered territory to make them serve as slaves; later on, it took possession of the land, leaving the people a certain autonomy; today it contents itself with taking hold of the sources of wealth, leaving the land and the inhabitants to themselves.

In the main this volume is a diary of the journey made by Ugarte in 1913 from Buenos Aires to Mexico, Cuba, and the United States, with stops on the way back in every one of the Central and South American republics. Later Ugarte went to Uruguay and Brazil, and in 1917 he made a second visit to Mexico at the invitation of President Carranza and the National University. Everywhere he went he met with the more or less open hostility of the American diplomatic representatives and, with the exception of Mexican officials on his second trip to Mexico, by the evasiveness of the Latin-American governments, who were frankly afraid to displease their powerful neighbor.

We, the Latin-American peoples, believes Señor Ugarte, are an entity and must have a policy of our own. Pan-Americanism is inimical to our best interests, and the Pan-American Union is a kind of Imperial Cabinet, with the American Secretary of State for its metropolitan Prime Minister. The Monroe Doctrine should be repudiated by us in so far as it pretends to establish a sort of guardianship of the United States over the rest of the Americas. Ugarte believes that today, as a century ago, Bolivar's aspirations toward a united America of Spanish blood should be maintained. To this end, a reversal of economic as well as of international policies among the separate republics must be effected. Foreign loans have been the means by which Wall Street has mortgaged nearly every government in every Latin-American country; those debts must be paid off through economy and honesty in the public administration, and not in the way now done, by contracting a larger indebtedness. National industries should be encouraged, for there is no real wealth where the raw product of a country has to go to foreign manufacturers to come back as the finished product, taxed by custom duties, plus the cost of the double transportation, plus the profit of the merchant and the manufacturer. For the same reasons Ugarte recommends the building of railroads linking the neighboring republics, the creation of mercantile marines under their own flags, and free introduction of products that are exchangeable.

The astounding fact is that this book has been written and published with confidence after the events of the last five years, when the United States has become in fact the arbiter of the destinies of America and perhaps of the world. But to doubt the high-mindedness of the motives prompting Ugarte's attitude, is to ignore the Quixotic vein still running generously in the Spanish race. What Ugarte asks of the United States seems simple enough, in theory. That the Washington Government and the people behind it should not be made the battering-ram for the selfish interests of bankers, miners, industrialists, or any other private individual or corporation looking for profit in South America, appears only fair. That the American Secretary of State should not reserve for himself the right to decide who may and who may not become a candidate to office in any of the minor Latin-American republics, would not seem an intolerable demand to any American citizen well removed from those countries. Nevertheless, these two propositions are at the core of the whole contention which has been involving the United States and the peoples of the Caribbean for the last half century.

E. Montenegro

Stage Left

The New Theatre and Cinema of Soviet Russia. By Huntly Carter. London: Chapman and Dodd, Ltd. 25/ net.

HERE is, unquestionably, a most important book on the theater. The author undertakes to acquaint the Western world with what really has taken place in Russia, theatrically speaking, since the revolution. The only other volume in English which has made any pretense of considering this subject is Oliver Sayler's "The Russian Theatre Under the Revolution." Mr. Sayler's book falls far short of its pretentious title. When he was in Russia and wrote his volume the revolution was still in the early phases of consolidation and the theater had not yet caught up with events. Mr. Carter, on the other hand, has been on the scene for several years and has been a close student of the amazing development which has taken place since 1918.

The Soviet Government, as soon as it could turn aside for a moment from complete concentration upon the desperate business of national defense and stabilization, directed its attention to the needs and purposes of the theater as it saw that institution. To Western Europe and America the theater of Russia is represented by Stanislavsky's Moscow Art Theater, Balieff's Chauve-Souris, and Tairoff's Kamerny Theater. In Russia, these organizations are regarded as running from extreme reactionary right to mild progressivism. As the more advanced groups present plays which are largely bound up with revolutionary politics and propaganda, it is obvious that they cannot get out across the Russian frontiers into other countries. That is our loss. For the theater today in Russia is for the most part as advanced and radical as the government itself. As the government is the government of the workers, so the theater is the theater of the workers.

Practically the whole Russian stage is under the control of an Extraordinary Commission headed by Lunacharski, the Commissar of Education, and divided into three main groups, Right, Center, and Left. The Right, which, like the others, enjoys state supervision and subsidy, is under the guidance of Stanislavsky, the Left answers to Meierhold, and the Center is Lunacharski's particular care. A few small groups remain outside this state organization. However, as their attitude is communistic, the government does not interfere with them. Whether this state regulation will eventually benefit or harm the theater is hard to tell at this stage of the game. According to Mr. Carter, theatergoing seems to be widespread and enthusiastic, and production has increased to a staggering degree.

Meierhold's extreme Left company and its associate groups are most truly representative of the revolutionary development of the modern Russian theater, in the opinion of Mr. Carter. For twenty-five years, since he first broke with Stanislavsky, Meierhold has always been in the forefront of revolt in theatrical production. About twenty years ago he was allied with Vera Kommissarzhevskaia. Then he joined the Tairoff group. Finally, feeling that even the Kamerny Theater was not abreast of the day, Meierhold again revolted. He is set against all of the old beauty and color. The theater today, he believes, should be expressive of this machine age. He uses no scenery in the old sense of that term. On his stage are scaffoldings, ladders, and wheels, all resembling modern industrial forms. The actors wear the blue denims and overalls of the factory. For lighting, just intense shafts of plain white light are thrown on the stage from the sides by powerful reflectors.

Of these matters, and, in fact, of all phases of the Russian stage and cinema, Mr. Carter's book is a thorough and comprehensive analysis. It is exceedingly well documented with photographs and drawings. The author has obviously gone to a tremendous amount of trouble in the cause of accuracy. Mr. Carter's style is, however, unhappily tiresome. In his anxiety to prove his various theses, he is repetitious to an exasperating degree. If it were not for the interest and importance of the subject matter, "The New Theatre and Cinema of Soviet Russia" would be hard reading. As it is, no critic and no dramatic artist in the Western world who pretends to an understanding and knowledge of the revolution that is going on in the Russian theater can afford to miss reading it.

ARTHUR MOSS

Not the Least of These United States

Rural Texas. By William Bennett Bizzell. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

TWO types of rural survey are now in vogue: minute studies of local communities or differentiated factors within local communities and broad-gauged attempts to envisage mass-phenomena. Mr. Bizzell's volume falls within the latter type. He attempts to evaluate the elements which combine to form the agricultural processes of our largest commonwealth. Mr. Bizzell is not merely a life-long resident of Texas but his position as president of the State Agricultural and Mechanical College provides him with peculiar vantage-points. His leadership within the State, moreover, rests upon a consistent liberalism as a consequence of which his volume cannot be used as convention literature. Exploitation of natural resources, inadequate educational facilities, decline of the rural church, an antiquated constitution, farm tenancy, rural child labor, the incipient evils of industrialism—all of these negative elements are frankly faced but they are faced with the attitude of one who believes in the possibilities of correction and improvement. The total impression is that of a man who sees wholes as well as parts, of a sympathetic student who is incapable of cynicism.

The mere detailed facts of agricultural production are not proper subjects for criticism. What one wishes to know is the meaning of facts in terms of human purposes and social development. That peculiar type of farming which goes by the name of "ranching," for example, presents a series of problems which are alien to ordinary rural regions. During the last decade wages and salaries increased in Texas to the extent of 149.9 per cent and capital investment in manufacturing increased 106.6 per cent, while rents and taxes increased 303.9 per cent. Some meaning lies hidden in a set of facts of this sort; but what is it? White farm owners and tenants are equally divided, but there are more than twice as many Negro tenants as Negro owners. More than 67 per cent of the people of Texas live in rural areas, but 96 per cent of the telephones are used by city dwellers. Divorce is generally assumed to be an urban disease, but only two normal States (Nevada excluded) exceed the divorce rate of Texas. These illustrations have been selected at random for the purpose of indicating that social diagnosis must go beyond statistical analysis. One wishes that Mr. Bizzell had drawn more fully upon his personal convictions so that psychological hypotheses might have forced his facts into the mold of problems.

One of the most arresting agricultural facts connected with Texas relates to farm organizations. The Farmers' Alliance and the Farmers' Union, the two consistently radical farm organizations, originated in Texas. It is also true that a more effective alliance between farmers and laborers exists in this State than in any other. The cities of Texas are notoriously conservative, but the farmers represent a tradition of revolt. In the election of 1860, for instance, the Texas vote was given neither to Douglas, the regular Democratic candidate, nor to Breckinridge, the rump candidate, but to Bell, who was Samuel Houston's personal candidate. Perhaps the answer to many of the perplexing questions suggested by Mr. Bizzell's book may be found in the statement: Texas is too large to be regarded either as an economic or a social unit.

E. C. LINDEMAN

International Relations Section

A Bandit Caliph

By EMIL LENGYEL

SPANISH Morocco, the sorest spot along the Mediterranean, is to have a new caliph. Primo de Rivera, Spain's military dictator, is quoted by l'Homme Libre as having selected Raisuli, "Sultan of the Atlas Mountains," as the future head of Spain's African possessions.

Mulai ben Mohamed Raisuli possesses all the qualifications which make a good dynasty builder. Upon his command, his court-scientists discovered that he was a descendant of Mohammed the Prophet. He has been the most successful cattle thief and bandit of the Atlas Mountains and a specialist in kidnapping. His most famous exploit was the kidnapping of Ion Perdicaris, a wealthy American, which won him a pile of gold—paid by the Sultan of Morocco—the governorship of the Tangier district, and a place in American history when John Hay, Secretary of State, put the alternatives to the Sultan: "Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead." But for the strenuous opposition of Raisuli himself the second alternative would have been vastly more acceptable to the Sultan. The kidnappings of General Sir Harry A. McLean, commander of the British expeditionary forces in Morocco, and of Walter B. Harris, correspondent of the London Times, were financial and diplomatic successes that paved the way toward the realization of his ambition.

By the selection of a "strong man" as the native chief of the Spanish zone Primo de Rivera admits his inability to pacify Spain's Moroccan possessions. At the same time this step marks the culmination of a number of humiliating reverses in the Moroccan campaign which has cost Spain, in addition to tens of thousands of lives and hundreds of millions of pesetas, a loss of diplomatic prestige.

The very fact that Spain had accepted a mandate from the great Powers over the territory known as the Spanish Moroccan zone had been considered by contemporary observers as a grave blunder. Had the motives of the donors been analyzed their magnanimity in extending to Spain an invitation to participate in the partition of Morocco would have aroused suspicion. Unmindful of the potential consequences Spain accepted the mandate, which her military leaders were inclined to consider as a compensation for the loss of their Cuban and Philippine possessions. Soon it developed, however, that the great Powers did not confer a favor upon Spain by letting her "conquer" the mandated territory. As it is a comparatively barren stretch of land with practically no means of communication, it has no commercial value for the invaders. The residents of this territory are mostly fierce native tribes which have considered the invasion of the Europeans as an encroachment upon their rights. Mentally, these tribes are in no wise inferior to the conquerors. Racially, they mostly belong to the Hamitic branch of white humanity mixed considerably with the blood of the Negroes of the African continent. In their impenetrable mountain retreats Berbers, Arabs, and a number of other tribes are living. When taking up the struggle against the European invaders they had the invaluable advantage of being thoroughly familiar with the map of their rugged country, while the Spanish conquistadores had only a vague idea of its topographical peculiarities.

Another handicap of Spanish colonization in Morocco has been the inefficiency of their army of occupation and the lack of colonizing ability on the part of the Spanish administrations. While the French Foreign Legion in the adjoining part of Morocco has been making a steady advance, coming to terms with the natives, if possible, or crushing them by sheer military superiority, if necessary, the Spanish army leaders have consistently applied the method of the iron fist without recourse to the alternative of peaceful penetration.

Despite all efforts of the Spanish military caste, for which the conquest of Morocco was a "question of honor" calculated to counterbalance the evil effects of the Cuban and Philippine defeats upon their reputation, the Spanish army has suffered one reverse after the other on African soil. The disaster at Anual in 1921 was one of the greatest catastrophes that have befallen the Spanish expeditionary forces. Whole battalions, excellently equipped with long-range cannon, tanks, and all the other blessings of a superior European civilization, were swept off the slopes of the Atlas Mountains and the swampy regions of Melilla. The immediate result of the defeat at Anual was that the Spanish Government instituted an investigation with a view to determining the responsibility. Discontent with the conduct of the Moroccan campaign grew louder in Spain but, due to Spanish conditions, popular indignation could not be vented either in the press or on the speakers' platforms. The so-called law of jurisdictions, passed in 1905, made the "defamation of the army" subject to prosecution by court martial. The army officers have wielded a formidable power which they exercised through semi-sovereign organizations, their juntas. Although, internally, these juntas have been rent by dissension and intrigues, they have put up a solid front against intervention from the outside.

The interference of the Government with the juntas was the primary motive of the revolt of the officers and of General Primo de Rivera's pronunciamento of September 13, 1923. The officers found that the civilians had become too troublesome and that they had asked many unnecessary questions.

As a consequence of the advent to power of the dictator, European public opinion anticipated a speedy end of the guerrilla warfare of the native tribes in Spanish Morocco. They thought that Primo de Rivera would simply chase the Moors out of the country into the Sahara Desert. Preparatory to a more intensive campaign in Morocco, additional troops were concentrated in Africa. Expenditures for the upkeep of the army increased. Spain's foreign debt rose to the impressive figure of twenty billion pesetas, while there was a shortage of money for the construction of the most indispensable railways and waterways in Spain itself. Despite all this feverish preparation news of the much-heralded victory did not come. When at last the news did come from Morocco in a roundabout way, due to the rigorous censorship to which the newspapers in Spain are subjected, it told of a defeat which was as disastrous as that suffered at Anual under the old regime. It told that the tribesmen of Abd-ul-Kerin of the Rif made a holocaust of Spanish soldiers in the Wad Kert region. More recent reports mention new defeats at Sidi Messuad, a place whose name is associated with sad memories in the Spanish army.

The dictator's Moroccan policy, in its international aspects, has been equally unsuccessful. Spain has long kept a wistful eye on Tangier, the possession of which, Spanish statesmen thought, would give her a privileged position on the North African coast. When Primo de Rivera took control of the Government, he made some significant remarks which were interpreted as meaning that Spain had an exclusive right to Tangier. It was all the more surprising therefore that on December 18, 1923, the representative of the Spanish Government signed a provisional agreement in Paris which assured the supremacy of France in that important Moroccan seaport. According to the agreement, an International Legislative Control Commission takes charge of the administration of Tangier. The commission consists of twenty-six members, of whom only four are the representatives of Spain. The administrator of the port will be a Frenchman, who holds office for six years.

Concerning Spain's aspirations for the possession of Tangier, it is openly charged that the aggressive attitude of the Spanish militarists was responsible for the frustration of her long-cherished hopes. Rivera's bombastic talk about a "Latin bloc," comprising Italy and Spain, involved the possibility of their antagonistic attitude toward England as well as France, and the danger, in case of war, of the Latin bloc shutting the Mediterranean across the Balearic Islands (Gibraltar being in English hands, the Straits could not be closed either by Spain or Italy) brought England and France together in settling the Tangier problem. The supremacy of Spain in Tangier would have furthered the ends of the Latin bloc to the disadvantage of France and England.

Having come to grief with his Moroccan campaign and with his ambitious plans concerning Tangier, Primo de Rivera decided upon invoking the aid of Raisuli, the most powerful chieftain in the Atlas Mountains. Raisuli's candidacy for the dignity of the caliphate is interpreted as a step toward the vindication of the rights of a "subject race" in Spanish Morocco. It is appreciated, however, that real results cannot be obtained unless both the Spanish Government and Raisuli are sincere in their desire to pacify Morocco.

A serious difficulty which Raisuli's elevation to the caliphate has encountered is the opposition to his appointment by military leaders in the French part of Morocco. They are afraid, according to opinion in Spain, lest Raisuli may pacify the Spanish zone so thoroughly that it would not need French intervention at some future time. While the Moroccans are fighting in the neighboring zone with the bungling Spanish army, the French can push forward their front lines. The Spanish assert emphatically, and the French deny no less emphatically, that when the present task is finished the French Foreign Legion will cross the boundary line separating the two protectorates and will occupy Spanish Morocco. Liberal-minded Spanish statesmen have often voiced their conviction that Spain's services in the protectorate are needed by the great Powers only until the French have finished with their present job. This is one of the main arguments of the Spanish liberals in favor of a speedy evacuation of Morocco by the Spanish army.

Primo de Rivera's unexpected gesture in demanding the appointment of Raisuli as caliph is far from meaning his readiness to evacuate Morocco. It is the hopelessness of the situation on the Moroccan battlefield which compelled the dictator to make advances toward the natives with a view to having them participate in the administration of their own country.

The career of Mulai ben Mohamed Raisuli would be rounded off by his appointment to the caliphate. Formerly cattle thief and outlaw, he is now the most powerful sheik in the Atlas Mountains. His popularity is not overshadowed by that of any of his lesser rivals. The reports of his death which reappear almost every year in European newspapers, and the numerous offers he receives from moving-picture concerns to star in their productions, show that this picturesque ex-bandit stirs the imagination not only of the natives of Northern Africa but also of the inhabitants of other continents.

An Anglo-Italian Agreement in Jubaland

By GEORGE GLASGOW

London, May 29

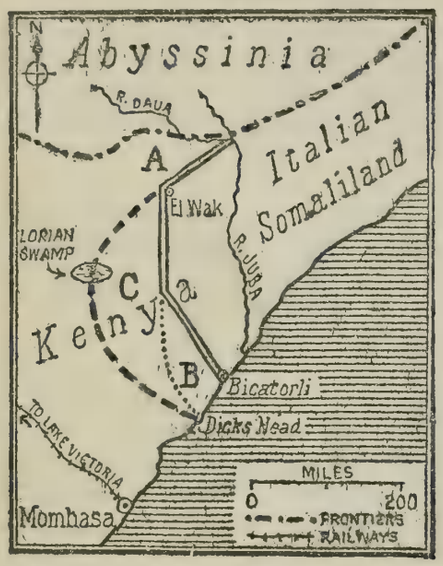
THE British Foreign Office announced on May 23 that as the result of direct negotiations between Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and Signor Mussolini it has been decided to conclude an agreement regarding Jubaland on the lines laid down by Lord Milner and Signor Scialoja in April, 1920, and that Italian experts would come to London at an early date to settle the terms with British experts.

That announcement marked the end of a controversy which has irritated Anglo-Italian relations ever since the armistice. The announcement of the success at last reached was of course deliberately delayed till the eve of the Royal Italian visit to London so that the maximum diplomatic capital could be extracted from it. The convention which will give the exact form to the agreement will be drawn up in London by the expert conference; but the principles of it have now been laid down.

The settlement is the direct outcome of an offer which was sent from London on April 3, to the effect that Great Britain was now willing to cede the Milner-Scialoja line in Jubaland as a full and final redemption of the British promise made in the Pact of London of 1915. Before the present Government came into office the Jubaland settlement was held up because of the British Government's refusal to divorce the two questions of Jubaland and the Dodecanese. Soon after the present Government was formed Mr. Ponsonby made a statement in the House of Commons that an early settlement of the Jubaland question could not be expected because Italy wanted to exclude the question of the Dodecanese from the negotiations.

The new British policy is simply an acceptance of the Italian desire for a Jubaland settlement on its merits, and without reference to the Dodecanese. The question was originally launched by the Pact of London of 1915, as a result of which Italy threw over the Triple Alliance and entered the war on the Allied side. Article 13 promised that in the event of Britain and France receiving territorial additions in Africa as a result of Allied victory, Italy might claim some equitable compensation, particularly as regards the settlement in her favor of the questions relative to the frontiers of the Italian colonies of Eritrea, Somaliland, and Libya, and the neighboring colonies belonging to France and Great Britain. As a step in the fulfilment of the Pact of London, the Treaty of Versailles, Article 119, transferred to the Allies all Germany's colonial rights for their disposal.

Since the armistice certain exchanges have taken place between Britain and Italy, during the course of which Italian claims have expanded. During the Paris Conference of 1919 Lord Milner, on behalf of the British Government, made an offer to Italy of a corner of Kenya Colony. (See the double line on the map.) It is important in the British view to keep the tribes under Italian jurisdiction quite separate from those under British jurisdiction. The Milner line was purposely drawn through desert country away from the wells. The Somaliland and Kenya tribes are in any case inclined to fight over the possession of the wells; they would be the more inclined if a new frontier were drawn which made it necessary for one or the other to cross the frontier for water.



In answer to the Milner proposal the Italian Government of Signor Scialoja suggested the expansion of the frontier so as to include the strips of territory marked A and B on the accompanying map. It was understood in April, 1920, when the Scialoja claim was made, that the British Government was willing to concede the strip B, and every British Government since then has informally maintained this position. The Italian Government at the same time dropped its claim to the strip A. Signor Mussolini made a further claim for a slice of territory (marked C on the map), which included the Lorian Swamp, which claim was refused on the following two grounds:

1. That if the claim were conceded the Kenya tribes would have to cross the frontier to obtain their water at the Lorian Swamp, and any conflicts that might arise would become not merely an inter-tribal affair but an international affair between Britain and Italy.

2. One of the main trade routes for Kenya passes through the territory C.

Hitherto both the British and Italian governments had wanted to interlock the Jubaland and Dodecanese problems, the British because of their interests as a Mediterranean Power and of their sense of the injustice done to Greece by the Italian occupation of the islands; the Italian because Signor Mussolini had revoked the promises to Greece, such as that of the Venizelos-Tittoni agreement, as a lever for exacting satisfaction elsewhere, especially in Jubaland. Early this year, however, Italian diplomacy began to regard the existing Italian hold over Rhodes as more attractive than any possible British concessions in Jubaland. This change made it easy and inevitable for Mr. MacDonald to give up the Dodecanese aspect of the question and to offer Italy the Scialoja (but not the Mussolini) line in Jubaland. This offer has now been accepted, and one European problem has been wiped from the slate. The question of the Ægean Islands, however, is left suspended and it is hoped that Italy will now settle with Greece.

SIX BORZOI NOVELS

SANDOVAL
by Thomas Beer
"A jewel of a book."—James Branch Cabell. "The best novel of the season."—Ernest Boyd, New York Times. 3rd Printing. $2.00

A MAN IN THE ZOO
by David Garnett
By the author of "Lady Into Fox." "Certain to enchant."—N. Y. Times. "A perfect story."—Laurence Stallings, N. Y. World. $1.75

AN ISLAND CHRONICLE
by William Cummings
"A book of great charm, unusual, individual, intensely human and has real literary quality."—The Baltimore Sun. $2.50

JANE—OUR STRANGER
by Mary Borden
The season's best in London. "A picture brilliantly and vividly drawn."—Rose Macaulay in the Daily News (London). 3rd Printing. $2.50

THE PHILOSOPHER'S STONE
by J. Anker Larsen
"One of the greatest novels of the century if not of all ages."—Brooklyn Eagle. "A modern epic."—Ernest Boyd, New York Tribune. $3.00

COUNTRY PEOPLE
by Ruth Suckow
"When you finish you feel you have grasped everything that life contains."—Harry Hansen, Chicago Daily News. 2nd Printing. $2.00

BORZOI BOOKS
ALFRED A. KNOPF
730 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK
BORZOI BOOKS

Midol

headache toothache neuralgia

Does not affect the heart
Non habit forming

For Headache

General Drug Co.
94 N. Moore St., New York

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 16, 1924 No. 3080

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 57

EDITORIALS:
- The Disintegrating Democrats 60
- Forty Years Ago 61
- The Greatest Power in the World 61
- Exit 62

AN HONEST CONVENTION. By Oswald Garrison Villard 63

THAT MAN LA FOLLETTE. By William Hard 65

THE AGONY OF THE DEMOCRATS. By Hendrik Willem van Loon 66

THESE UNITED STATES—XLVII. VIRGINIA: A GENTLE DOMINION. By Douglas Freeman 68

NATIONAL FORESTS AND THE NORTHERN PACIFIC. By Edward Richards 71

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 73

CORRESPONDENCE 73

AFTER WINTER. By David Morton 76

BOOKS:
- A Fireside Puss. By Llewelyn Powys 76
- "The Fierce Year of Failure." By Charles H. Wager 77
- José Rizal. By Maximo M. Kalaw 77
- A History of Democracy. By Hubert Harrison 78
- The American Scene. By Alice Beal Parsons 78
- Daumier. By William H. Scheifley 79
- Acorns. By Gerald Hawes Carson 79
- Musicians Militant. By Henrietta Straus 80

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Leon Trotzky—Down but Not Out. By Louis Fischer 81
- Private Trade in Soviet Russia 84

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR — IRITA VAN DOREN, LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE has the sympathy of the entire nation in the loss of his sixteen-year-old son. The tragedy is the keener because Calvin Coolidge, Jr., stood just on the threshold of manhood and because from the first there was so little that medical science could do. Death came with appalling suddenness. The boy had been playing lawn tennis, and a blister developed on one foot. Blood poisoning set in, and nothing could stem it. A son of the President is not more important than any other boy to those who love him, but as the holder of a high office is inevitably the subject of sharp criticism for his public acts, so also in his personal grief he is rightfully the recipient of that common sympathy which is one of the best growths of our gregarious modern society.

THE EDUCATION OF ANDREW MELLON continues. Secretary Mellon's own Treasury Department has just released a batch of figures dealing with the income-tax receipts in 1922. When Mr. Mellon announced his famous tax plan last December it included a provision reducing the maximum surtax from 58 to 25 per cent. Explaining this, Mr. Mellon asserted that 10 per cent was probably the highest productive tax rate. Anything higher, he said, drove wealth into tax-exempt securities, and thereby reduced the tax yield. It is true that much capital has escaped taxation by investment in tax-exempt securities, and The Nation has repeatedly expressed the hope that Congress would find a way to plug this hole in the tax-collector's bag. It is not true that the hole is so big and so obvious that high surtaxes defeat their own purpose. Mr. Mellon argued, throughout his campaign for lower surtaxes, that the number of millionaires—indeed, the number of incomes over $300,000—had steadily declined from 1916 to 1921 because of increasing investment in "tax-exempts." When Senator Couzens asked for the figures for 1922 the Secretary replied that they were not available. We have them now. The net income of persons reporting incomes over $300,000 jumped to $365,000,000 in 1922, as against only $153,000,000 in 1921; the number of incomes over $300,000 was 537 as against 246; the number of persons reporting million-dollar incomes was 67 as against 21. On these increased incomes the surtaxes will be paid, and the Treasury will profit by it.

IS HENRY FORD TEACHING CALVIN COOLIDGE about conditions in Europe? Mr. Ford will be remembered as the gentleman who said that "history is bunk" and then proceeded to prove it by inventing history that unquestionably was bunk. His most celebrated historical invention was the Jewish protocols, which depicted the malign efforts of the mythical Elders of Zion to rule the world. A more recent invention of his has not attained the notoriety which it deserves. Mr. Ford, or at least his Dearborn Independent, has discovered the cause of the bob-haired bandit's banditry, and, presumably, of Leopold and Loeb's sadism. It is all a part of the process of revolutionary recruiting. "By bold and boastful confession of the present rulers of Russia," this ingenious fiction-writer asserts, "it is known" that "the most expert criminals of the world, most of whom are now officials of Soviet Russia," regularly held up trains and robbed banks "for the purpose of recruiting the revolutionary treasury." Thus, he says, the soviet revolution was financed. Now our stupid American police, faced by an alarming crime wave, plug along in the conviction that these are mere ordinary crimes, whereas perhaps, not to say obviously, they are but "part of the operations of the Treasury Department of the World Revolution." This, we submit, shows that Henry Ford's inventive mind has not lost its edge since the first "Tin Lizzie" astonished a complacent world.

"AN AUTHORIZED SPOKESMAN for the President" is the pleasant cloak with which the Washington correspondents disguise their weekly interviews with the President. It has obvious advantages—for the President. An "authorized spokesman" can be disavowed; it is not necessary, if the President change his mind, to cry "liar" in the fashion of the late Theodore Roosevelt. The "authorized spokesman" this time had been disturbed by reports that Mr. Coolidge might feel disposed to recognize Russia after the election. The American Government, he said, is today further from recognition than it was six months ago. Russia, it seems, is still a land of horrors. Whether Mr. Ford, or that other bogyman, Charles Evans Hughes, LL.D., told the "spokesman" we do not know, but it seems that Russia is in a bad way. The crops are bad, the Government is bad, and business is bad. Worst of all, the Government is not helping the profiteers. It has, the "spokesman" asserts with horror, been guilty of "failure to take foreign trade out of the hands of the Government and place it under private control." Speculators have been punished, he reports, and the grisly old stalking-horse of "revolutionary propaganda in the United States" (financed by the bandits?) is solemnly trotted out of its stable. It sounds like the State Department reports of the imminent fall of the Bolsheviks in 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, and presumably like its reports for decades to come.

MORE SINISTER MEANINGS, however, can be read between the lines of the "authorized spokesman." He made it plain enough that we were using our non-recognition as a weapon, attempting to force Russia to abandon government control and give private profit-seeking enterprise a freer chance to make money. The old slogans of the weakness of the Soviet Government and of revolutionary propaganda are still muttered, but without the air of conviction; the essential complaint is the plea for private profits. Another sinister paragraph "presumes" that France will show the same concern as the United States for private property-rights. This, coming on the heels of reports that Herriot was planning French recognition of Russia, is significant indeed. France owes us money and wants liberal treatment; and France knows how to take a diplomatic hint. This hint, however, does not exhaust the offensive role of our State Department. China and Russia recently negotiated a treaty of friendship, which included certain arrangements regarding the Russian Embassy in Peking and the Chinese Eastern Railroad in Manchuria. Promptly our bolshevik-eating Secretary of State got busy. The Powers, which had held the embassy in trust since the departure of the Kerensky representative, refused to surrender it; and Mr. Hughes protested against the railroad arrangement. He still stubbornly refuses to recognize the seven-year-old Government of Russia; he hints to France that she had better not recognize it; he tries to keep China and Russia from friendly relations—all this in the name of the United States. We call it dirty work.

RUMANIA HAS NATIONALIZED ITS OIL WELLS. It is a limited measure of nationalization, including a degree of compensation to former owners, but it cuts into the profits of the speculators who bought out the old German oil concessions in days when Rumania's future was uncertain. Our Mr. Hughes is indefatigably on the job. Witness this dispatch, which speaks for itself:

Special to The New York Times.

Washington, July 6.—Peter Augustus Jay, the American Minister at Bucharest, has been ordered back to this country to report on the oil situation in Rumania.

It was made clear that the diplomat had not been directed to sever his relations with the Rumanian Government. At the same time the officials indicated that the State Department wished to be fully informed as to the restrictions recently imposed upon American oil companies and therefore it was desirable that Mr. Jay report in person.

MEXICO HAS COMPILED a list of 350 isolated cases of Mexican citizens killed in our border States during the years 1915-21. The list, it is explained, is incomplete but typical. Together with claims for damages, including losses to commerce and the killing of several hundred Mexicans, during the occupation of Vera Cruz in 1914, this list will be presented to the Mexican-American Claims Commission which is about to meet in Washington. It is a healthy thing for a nation which throbs with front-page indignation whenever an American profiteer is shot in China or imprisoned in Mexico, to get acquainted with its own record in dealing with aliens. We seem totally to have lost the capacity to see ourselves as others see us. Claims like that of Mexico may help us to see the other side of the looking-glass. If Japan should really carry through the threatened boycott of American goods; if Soviet Russia should really enforce discriminations against citizens of countries which, like the United States, discriminate against her; if Italy and Poland and Argentina should force American travelers to undergo the kind of humiliations which we impose upon visitors to our shores, it would do us good. The minority of Americans who travel abroad has already learned to regret the high American visa fees, because European countries have properly retorted by charging Americans five times as much for their visas as they charge other people. When Americans abroad have enough such difficulties they will spread the news at home and, perhaps, promote a decenter attitude toward aliens here.

BANK CIRCULARS are always entertaining, and frequently instructive, reading. The comments of the National City Bank on the discussion, apropos of the bonus, of the injustice of conscripting men, not capital, are particularly illuminating. "The right to call upon [the nation's] citizens for military service always has been recognized," the bank says, but "there is danger of governmental authority and management breaking down if extended. . . . Outside the field where military discipline is practicable and under conditions where millions of individuals are to be stimulated to unusual efforts, financial rewards have been found to be the most effective means of obtaining results." In other words, business is business, even in war time. Conscript men, mobilize industry for the next war, but do not forget that although ordinary men will fight and die for nothing, business men won't even carry on as usual without their "financial rewards."

MR. GOMPERS, we are glad to note, refuses to be a catspaw in the attempt to ruin the workers' movement in Porto Rico. We commented recently on the union of the two old parties against the Socialists (with whom one of the old parties had been working) and their dispatch of a letter to Mr. Gompers urging him to depose Senator Iglesias as head of the American Federation of Labor of Porto Rico because Mr. Iglesias is also leader of the Socialists. The idea of breaking up the Socialist movement, which polled a fifth of the votes in the insular election of 1920 and is the chief hope of raising the degraded standard of living in the island to something approaching our own, emanated chiefly from John W. Weeks. The Secretary of War has had no time to ferret out the war grafters and is himself in a most compromising position in regard to two notorious frauds, but he has an abundance of leisure for helping his investment-banker friends to preserve medieval labor conditions in our colonies. Fortunately, though, Mr. Gompers has seen through the skilful attempt to use his anti-radical prejudices to undermine Senator Iglesias. In replying to the leaders of the Unionist-Republican alliance he declares his "absolute confidence in the integrity of Santiago Iglesias to serve the people of Porto Rico," adding that he cannot express "the same estimate of your . . . conduct."

"RECOGNIZING THAT AN INDUSTRY should assume responsibility to its workers with regard to employment and should bear the burden of the hazards of unemployment"—thus begins the significant clause of an agreement to enforce which the New York cloth hat and cap makers of New York City have just gone on strike. The workers in the garment trades are forcing their employers to stabilize and regularize their industry. In European countries the state has taken the lead in establishing unemployment insurance funds. In this country the Jewish workers have given the movement its drive. That industrial statesman, Sidney Hillman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, established unemployment insurance in his industry in Chicago; thence it spread to Rochester; and a rapid strike has just led to acceptance of the principle in New York City. The cap-makers have it in St. Paul and are introducing it in New York, and Governor Smith's mediation commission recommends further study of it for the ladies' garment industry. Some day the efficiency experts will wake up and discover their work being done by the unions.

TOO MANY SO-CALLED PEACE SOCIETIES reveal a disappointing flabbiness in war time. However admirable the sentiments they may have expressed in days of quiet, as soon as the guns begin to shoot their characteristic slogan is "No one can hate war more than I do, but ——." The English Peace Society was no exception. One may therefore interpret it as a sign of grace that it has just elected as its president such a man as Edward T. John. Its new head is a sturdy Welshman who was for some years a Liberal M.P., but is now one of the leaders of the Labor Party in the Principality. In his inaugural address Mr. John made the ingenious suggestion that the total expenditure upon armaments should be restricted to the proceeds of the super-tax, while the death duties should be exclusively devoted to the provision of an adequate sinking fund. Thus both the capital cost of past wars and the entire cost of present war preparations would be placed upon the broad shoulders of wealth, with the result that pacifism would rapidly become really fashionable. Too adroit a scheme, no doubt, but it is surely wholesome to emphasize the cost of war. Mr. John, who is one of the most persistent advocates of Home Rule for Wales, further predicted that if the Welsh people once acquired self-governing powers equal to those of the Irish Free State they would refuse to give any aid to war preparations.

SOMETIMES the much-abused technicalities of the law prove beneficent—even to a poor newspaper editor. Ernest Judet, editor of the Eclair of Paris, was tried last year on a charge of giving information to the enemy during the war. He was acquitted, but, as he had previously been a fugitive from justice, court costs of 53,000 francs, which his absence occasioned, were assessed against him, although he had returned voluntarily to face trial. Last month, on appeal, the court reduced the 53,000 francs to the more modest sum of 64 francs—an amount within even an editor's means, at least on pay day. In taking this action the learned judges held that, according to the niceties of the law, the expenses incurred because of Mr. Judet's absence from the country when the prosecution was begun meant only the cost of the ancient custom of sending a trumpeter to blow a loud brass summons outside of the last known address of the accused. We commend this simple and inexpensive technique to the American courts as superior to our method of issuing scores of papers to be served by gumshoe detectives. Its efficiency is attested by history, the Good Book assuring us that Joshua, with the sound of a trumpet, caused the wall of Jericho to "fall down flat." But perhaps our learned judges would object that this brass blast would sound too much like some of their decisions.

TERENCE V. POWDERLY died in Washington the other day almost unknown and forgotten. Forty years ago he was a power in American life. For fourteen years he was master workman of the Knights of Labor, leader, in his prime, of 700,000 organized workmen. Few labor leaders retain their leadership, like Samuel Gompers, into old age; most suffer the proverbial ingratitude of democracies. Powderly outlived his movement. Not many labor leaders today know his name; most would be surprised to hear that a Labor Party candidate had been thrice elected mayor of Scranton, as Powderly was in 1878, 1880, and 1882. Labor does not honor its past; labor papers are born and die whose editors never suspect that Boston had a labor daily in the sixties. The Knights of Labor gave way to the better organized and less vaguely idealistic Federation in the early nineties; Powderly took a government job and became a Republican Party orator—and the news of his death sounds like a moan from a musty encyclopedia.

IT IS REFRESHING to turn from a Washington of half-baked politicians and incompetent chair-warmers to a man in the government service who was a master of his craft, who because of his knowledge, his skill, and his dependability was leaned on and retained in office by administration after administration. Such was Alvey A. Adee, who has just died in harness after having served the Department of State since 1869—as its Second Assistant Secretary since President Cleveland appointed him to that post in 1886. Meanwhile showy men higher up have come and gone: men who made public speeches, got their photographs in the newspapers, and—came to Mr. Adee when they wanted to know something. Mr. Adee held himself aloof from partisan politics, and as a skilled linguist and a master of the detail of diplomacy he was invaluable alike to Democrats and Republicans. He was the recognized authority on international etiquette and usage, and was relied upon to put into final form important state papers. On several different occasions he was Acting Secretary of State. He was a type common abroad but almost unique in the upper posts of our own government—a permanent official who supplied the continuity between administrations. All this Mr. Adee did for a salary at the highest of $4,500 a year, while glorified office boys were receiving five times as much in the business world to sit in easy chairs and look important.

The Disintegrating Democrats

THE deadlock of the Democratic Convention has been far more significant than appears on its face. Even the most superficial observers have seen that the struggle went much further than the rivalry of two men and that Mr. McAdoo's cry that it was a renewal of the old contest between Wall Street and the progressives of the Democratic Party was beside the mark. Wall Street, as we have repeatedly pointed out, is bitterly hostile to Mr. McAdoo and ardently opposes him wherever it can. But there is much more to the struggle than this. The real revelation of the convention is after all the growing contest and antagonism within the party which leads one to wonder whether it is not the Democratic Party rather than the Republican which will be the first to collapse. It is easy to assume that the party of Coolidge and Harding, and of Borah, Norris, and La Follette will disintegrate first because of the never-ceasing progressive ferment within its ranks; but what has happened in New York makes one believe that the process of disintegration is even further along among the Democrats.

It is true, of course, that in certain States the Democratic Party is already virtually dead—Minnesota, for instance; Wisconsin, and North Dakota. There its failure to identify itself with agrarian reform, to make the cause of the farmer its own, has reduced it to the condition of the Republican Party in Florida or Mississippi. These are, none the less, local phenomena. What Madison Square Garden has been registering is the cleavage of the party along graver lines. The Nation from its earliest days has stressed the fact that there is little hope of making a really progressive party out of the Democracy as long as it is tied up with the South. Mr. Wilson achieved much and gave the party a forward-looking program, yet his experiment lasted hardly long enough for him to prove that the South could be held in line for really progressive social policies—its hostile attitude on child labor is suggestive enough. Again, there is the clash between the Catholic part of the Democracy, particularly strong in the large cities, and the bigotedly Protestant members of the party North, South, East, and West. Then there is the conflict between the "wet" cities and the "dry" countryfolk. The opposition to Governor Smith by no means related solely to his religion—the delegates from New England and Middle Western States saw in him not merely a Catholic but a "wet," and more than that a member of Tammany Hall. When we enter the economic field the explanation of the growing lukewarmness of the party in the matter of tariff reform is clearly enough found in the rapid industrialization of the South. Where there are factories in large numbers there is always a belief that the government should regularize profits by means of tariff wars. No one can deny the growing clash of interest between the farmers and the manufacturers.

Whether these differences are reconcilable remains to be seen. We cannot quite follow our distinguished staff contributor, Hendrik van Loon, in his suggestion that we may be witnessing the birth of a Catholic Party in America. If that is to come to pass it is still some distance off—may the day never arrive! But as the power of the local organizations in the great cities grows there can be no doubt that Catholic influence will similarly increase. Tammany Hall was never so well intrenched or on such good terms with the national leaders of the party as today, and George Brennan of Chicago, the Catholic leader of the Democracy in that city, is rapidly becoming a dominant factor. To keep such a diversified party with such conflicting interests alive and united might well tax the genius of really great leaders. It becomes almost impossible when in addition to the lack of outstanding leadership there are no real principles to differentiate the party from its chief rival.

Some of these causes of the cleavage in the Democratic Party apply equally to the Republican. The latter is, for instance, not united on the question of prohibition. But that is only another reason why the two older parties should fuse at an early date. Many reactionaries, like Mr. Frank A. Munsey, are already admitting that there is no longer sufficient difference between them to keep them apart. What we need, as The Nation has so often pointed out, is a new alignment, a new division along the lines of progress and those of conservatism. What count now are economic issues, not the purely political; and this not only in America but all over the world. The La Follette convention had earnestness and vigor and life because it had clear-cut economic views and desires, not strikingly radical ones, by any means, but sufficiently advanced to make its deliberations contrast extraordinarily with the lifelessness of the Democratic and Republican conventions. Those parties are tied to the past, to the dead past, and no honest and intelligent observer of their gathering could feel else than that they needed some revolution to reinvigorate them, to give them a purpose and a program. They must clean their Augean stables; men must come to the front inspired by something more than mere office-seeking or office-broking. Those who are alarmed by the arrival of a third party and desire the continuance of the two-party system should use their utmost efforts to bring about a union between what is left of the Democratic and Republican machines. There would then be two genuinely opposed parties.

It is our earnest belief that the coming campaign will take us far along in this direction. Party ties sit more lightly upon the electorate than ever before in our history. Multitudes will leave the Democratic Party because of the record made in this last convention, some because they are outraged by the failure to denounce the Klan by name, others because of their disappointment in the defeat of Governor Smith, still others because of the conflict of interests and aims. So far from opposing the coming of the La Follette movement, the older parties ought to welcome it. Heaven knows they need the stimulus of its existence! They ought to be taught that the masses will no longer swallow the old bait; that the name of a party no longer has in itself the power to conjure personal allegiance. If that lesson can be driven home by the election, if millions of votes can be piled up for Mr. La Follette and the cause for which he stands, we may expect to see such a wreck of the Democratic Party, at least, as will make it either seek a new birth or transfer its fragments to its old rival, between which and it there exists today not a single fundamental difference, not a single consistent variation in principle.

Forty Years Ago

THE present Democratic Party looks back enthusiastically to its resurrection forty years ago, when Grover Cleveland was nominated and elected. It is surprising to thumb over the platform of 1884 and discover how vividly it emphasizes issues which are thrown in our faces in the declarations of this year 1924. The corruption of the Republican Party and the reduction of war taxes are given as prominent a place in the platform of 1884 as in that of 1924. There had been an era of unexampled graft and fraud during the previous decade of Republicanism, and this was the best ammunition of the Democrats forty years ago as it is likely to be in the present campaign. One reads in the platform of 1884:

> The frauds and jobbery which have been brought to light in every department of the Government are sufficient to have called for reform within the Republican Party; yet those in authority, made reckless by the long possession of power, have succumbed to its corrupting influence, and have placed in nomination a ticket against which the independent portion of the party are in revolt.

Yet despite such similarities in the platforms of 1884 and 1924 there are greater differences. The most outstanding one is the increased importance of economic issues. More than half of this year's Democratic platform relates to economic questions, beginning with the tariff and taxation and going on to agricultural relief, the railroads, Muscle Shoals, the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board, reclamation, conservation, highways, mining, the merchant marine, inland waterways, flood control, the improvement of navigation, the enforcement of anti-monopoly laws, corporate regulation, the treatment of labor, and child welfare. Turn from this formidable list to the platform of 1884 and one finds there scarcely half a dozen slight declarations on economic topics. Taxes and tariff are present; like the poor, we have them always with us, and perhaps our unwillingness to do anything adequate about either is one reason why the poor are likely to remain with us.

But beyond tariff and taxation there is little of an economic nature in the platform of 1884. There is a vague reference to the merchant marine (forty years has not made this more coherent). There is a declaration against "sumptuary laws." There is a statement favoring a stable currency. The only inland waterway that the Democrats of 1884 could envisage was the Mississippi River, and apart from favoring its improvement the platform is silent on the subject. Railroads are mentioned only in connection with a vigorous denunciation of the Republicans for having given to them most of the public lands. It is interesting how this great question of the disposition of government land has now almost ceased to be an issue, most of the land having long since been recklessly disposed of. In place of public lands to give away, we now are obliged to turn our attention to reclamation and conservation—matters then undreamed of. Striking also is the absence in the platform of forty years ago of vivid concern over the growth of corporate power. Although one finds a sentence favoring whatever "will tend to the equitable distribution of property, to the prevention of monopoly, and to the strict enforcement of individual rights against corporate abuses," the declaration concludes with a pious assertion that "the welfare of society depends upon a scrupulous regard for the rights of property as defined by law." Nothing more.

The phrase "child welfare" would hardly have been understood in 1884, and although the declarations of the Democratic platform on labor in 1924 are unsatisfactory and inconsequential, those of 1884 were even more hesitant and meaningless. "We favor the repeal of all laws restricting the free action of labor, and the enactment of laws by which labor organizations may be incorporated, and of all such legislation as will tend to enlighten the people as to the true relations of labor and capital," said the platform of 1884.

Yes, the Democratic platform of this year presents a striking contrast to that of forty years ago in its recognition of the importance of economic issues; in that way it is abreast of the times. But although it recognizes these issues, it proposes little that is vital or progressive toward their solution. There the Democrats are almost as palsied and fearful as the Republicans. For anything hopeful in this direction we must turn away from both old parties toward the forces that are gathering under La Follette.

The Greatest Power in the World

THE British in India are faced with an enemy stronger and more baffling than all the armies of Christendom, an enemy that is wholly immune to machine-guns and cannot be held behind bars. Their enemy is a power of human personality so direct and simple that the subtleties of governmental policy do not touch it, so flaming and fanatical that violence and physical force are weak in its presence. It can be likened to the faith that sent the early Christians singing to a ghastly death, or the Quakers to persecution and exile. Government departments—especially colonial offices—find it extremely difficult to believe in this sort of power and impossible to understand or deal with it.

In India the effect of Mahatma Gandhi's leadership has been much more than the development of a clever technique of passive resistance to unjust authority—the weapon of a weak people. He has worked a psychological miracle. To a people of rather unstable nervous disposition, mystical and brooding and easily swayed, he has brought integration and strength. Unlike most radical leaders and with a wisdom beyond political expediency, he has as far as possible left the roots of the people undisturbed in the customs and religion that have nourished them. And he has made his revolution grow out of these roots. Where mass movements in the Western world deal largely in gestures of violence and in the outward manifestations of solidarity and independence, in the Indian Nationalist movement a process of inner regeneration keeps step with the progress of outer rebellion.

In recent issues of The Nation we have described the amazing development of the Akali struggle which has combined a fight against corruption and the dominance of British influence in the sect itself with a strong Nationalistic opposition. We have printed the story of the Jathas, processions of unresisting, unarmed men—India's fighting men—marching to possess their sacred grounds and the shrines of their faith, and falling dead by hundreds before the guns and clubs of the British defenders of order and property.

An even more impressive spectacle is the present movement among the Hindu passive resisters to override and abolish the caste restrictions which have held men apart even in the Nationalist ranks. For many years in the common struggle caste lines have been growing less sharp; but the vast class of "untouchables" has stood as a mocking symbol of the slow growth of Indian democracy. The untouchables are the lowest caste in the Hindu community. They may be degraded and ignorant; they may be educated professional men. In either case they are confronted with a system of restrictions and taboos to which they must submit. There are streets they may not walk through, offices they may not fill, acts of submission they must perform. And all forms of social intercourse are prohibited with members of the higher caste, who will not even touch their humble brothers. Gandhi has always opposed this separation although it is obvious that an actual change in practice yould involve a social upheaval as profound as the Russian Revolution.

A beginning has been made, however, and as usual the power of British authority is on the side of the old order, in spite of a formal opposition to the caste system which has brought no actual change in all the years of British control. The movement to end the stigma of untouchability has developed inside the ranks of the higher-caste Hindu passive resisters. These young revolutionaries deliberately broke the sacred taboos. The consequences are described by C. F. Andrews, whose remarkable letters appear in the Manchester Guardian and the New York World:

> The young high-caste Hindus with their untouchable fellow-countrymen endeavored to enter the public street which leads to the Vaikom Temple. The police intervened and arrested them. At their trial they pleaded guilty of attempting to break down the barrier of untouchability. . . . They were sent to prison with six months' imprisonment each.
>
> Others immediately took their place, and these were in turn arrested. . . . But when the stream of those who were eager to court imprisonment appeared to be continuous the state government authorities suddenly changed their mode of procedure. They barricaded the road and left a police guard to prevent anyone from getting over. This was immediately answered by a hunger-strike on the part of those who were endeavoring to enter the prohibited area. At the end of the day six of the passive resisters fainted. They had remained in the blazing sun uncovered and had refused to take either water or food. The news of this was cabled throughout the length and breadth of India. Mahatama Gandhi telegraphed at once: "Omit fasting; but stand or sit in relays with quiet submission till arrested." His order was immediately obeyed, and the deadlock still continues. The police continue to keep guard; the passive resisters continue to offer themselves for arrest. . . . Already the patience and forbearance of the passive resisters has had its effect upon the Brahmins not merely in Vaikom but in every part of India where their privileged position had been acknowledged.

If the fight against slavery in the United States had been born among the slave-owning aristocrats of the South, if they had submitted to arrest and faced death to make their black brothers free and equal, we would have something like an American parallel to this movement in India. But the Indian movement is even more impressive since the power of religious dogma stands back of the social and economic interests involved. As we watch the effort for equality and human happiness grow and flower under the whip of oppression and foreign dominance, and as we watch it droop in the countries able to dominate and oppress, we sometimes feel that the best fate we could ask for a nation would be the tempering and wisdom that comes from failure and long endurance.

Exit

THE retirement of Brander Matthews from the professorship of dramatic literature at Columbia University rings down the curtain on an interesting drama in the history of American education. His appointment, a generation ago, brought to Columbia an impressive element of that quality which was in time to make it the most worldly of the universities. As an undergraduate, he has told in his memoirs, he read the Greek and Latin dramatists without once having it impressed upon him that they ever wrote for the stage. But he had gone into the world and had come into close touch with the theater and with journalism. He had polished his French by conversations with Coquelin and had begun the studies which made him the first American expert in the modern French stage; in England he had been associated with a brilliant period of the Saturday Review and had been forced to define his own Americanism by becoming aware of it against a British background. Called to his professorship, he glittered on his city campus, a wit among the scholars, though also a scholar himself. He was enough of a pioneer to do battle for international copyright and for simplified spelling, to stress in all seasons the need and advantage of the study of American literature, and to point out, perhaps in too many seasons, that literature and plays are not the same thing. Now that he is retiring, though he leaves no single professor quite equal to taking up his full task, he leaves many in many universities who are engaged in it.

His attitude toward the stage is typical of his whole career, and of its influence. All the smart young playwrights, said some one a decade or so ago, were "brandered by the same Matthews." From him they learned to distrust closet dramas, the bastards in blank verse and unwieldy acts and scenes which pretended to the throne of literature in an unpropitious time; learned to study the tricks and devices of the actual stage and to think in terms of audience and box office. Professor Matthews, and his followers after him, liked the "well-made play," and they, if not he, made it a fetish. Such a program was tempting, particularly so long as there was a contemporary dearth of plays which had any real literary merit. It fortified the playwrights and critics in their instinct to see a necessity as a virtue. The plays of his earlier years as a professor could not be read, but some of them could be played; it seemed therefore the part of wisdom to examine them not as masterpieces but as theater-pieces. When later a new age of drama dawned, the followers of Professor Matthews were some of them not ready for it. They kept on talking about Pinero when there was a Shaw to talk about.

To put it briefly, Professor Matthews came upon the stage of American education at a time when the drama to have depth was expected to have dulness. He helped to banish dulness, but he also helped to bring it to the surface, to make it alert. That is no longer all the drama needs. It must, as it lately shows a tendency to do, find its depths again. His influence will have been most useful if it proves to have made it more difficult for drama to be dull.

An Honest Convention

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Cleveland, July 6

FOR President: Robert M. La Follette. Twelve hundred delegates to this Convention for Progressive Political Action and nine thousand spectators have ratified this nomination with an enthusiasm so earnest, so spontaneous, so sincere that the most callous metropolitan correspondents have recorded the proceedings with complete respect and also, be it gratefully recorded, with complete fidelity to the truth. So the man from Wisconsin, hated, despised, abused, and derided; the man whom some of his associates tried six years ago to drive out of the Senate as a pacifist and pro-German, has received the highest compliment which could be paid to him short of the Presidency itself. Moreover, no one could survey the group assembled here and not feel that the honor was a far greater one than if it had come from the Republican or Democratic party. Here were no political bosses, no ward heelers, no Harry Daughertys, no Tom Taggarts, and no Henry Cabot Lodges—just twelve hundred plain people come together under labor-union auspices to take their stand and say: "God helping us, we can do no other—if we would keep our self-respect and be true to our Americanism."

The Senator

The spirit of it all could not but impress. There was no such hysteria, no such wild and passionate singing of hymns, no such outbursts of rage, and no such delirious enthusiasm as marked the Roosevelt Progressive convention of 1912. There were moments when this convention was exceedingly tame, yes, dull. It lacked the presence of a magnetic leader; there was less of the revivalist meeting about it than might have been expected. But these delegates knew what they wanted and whom they wanted. They brought with them—the bulk of them—a profound loyalty to Robert La Follette and a quiet determination which in the long run ought to mean more than the high tide of political passion which surged about the popular but self-seeking leader of 1912, only to subside utterly when he detached himself from it four years later. True, many of these railroad brotherhood delegates still long to vote for William G. McAdoo—grateful memories of what he did to improve their conditions of living when Director General of Railways block their understanding of the gravity of the scandals which have lately become associated with his name. But the bulk of the delegates—all of those outside of the brotherhoods—came to give their whole-souled allegiance to Robert La Follette, and were quite willing that he and his friends should run the convention. They were interested in what he had to say to them, but he might have said varying and different things, for these men and women represented a conscious craving for something else than the self-seeking and hypocrisy and prostitution of the two old parties. They were not asking how few they were or how many, or how rich or how poor. They were there to protest; to give proof of their belief that a way can be found out of the thraldom of the American electorate to two corrupt and debased political machines, a way by which the electorate can record its positive wishes instead of being eternally compelled to reprobate the party in power only by putting out one set of scoundrelly politicians and putting in an even more rascally lot.

This gathering was not even a cross-section of the whole labor movement. Only one colored man sat in that large audience, and in no sense did the women play the part that should have been theirs. The embattled farmers were but sparsely represented—as Senator Frazier put it, they are "broke" and could not come. Only one or two representatives of the liberal intelligentsia who are ready to fight the people's battles hand in hand with labor were allowed to reach the speakers' platform. Yet for all this, the convention stirred one's faith in democracy. Coming as I did from the stupid exhibition of the Democratic convention, it was like entering green fields and pastures new. It seemed impossible that this was the same hall in which only three weeks ago man after man had stood up and lied so wantonly and so impiously about the Republican Party and its Calvin Coolidge as to make one wonder why the roof did not fall upon them all. Sincerity, earnestness, honesty—these were the qualities which ruled this protestant convention. Other qualities might have been helpful, too. But here was the search for truth which makes men free; here was a refusal to remain longer in bondage to a dead and festering past; here was the ambition to lead and to find new ways to serve. And so those who beheld, even when they were there for reasons of duty alone, were compelled to respect when they could not sympathize. Not one newspaper man present, so far as I am aware, tried to poke fun or to ridicule or to distort. The usual references to the "wild-eyed and long-haired fanatics" are in the editorial pages but not in the news columns.

La Follette's convention it was, of course, ready to obey his slightest wish. People said it was steam-rollered. Yes, undoubtedly. But what relief after Madison Square Garden to find leadership and a clear-cut program; to find a definite job done in a definite way! Moreover the steam-rollering was not for ulterior purposes, but to expedite business. It did not choke off debate altogether, and the resolutions committee went beyond the La Follette platform in the resolutions that it reported—one resolution, offered from the floor, was overwhelmingly adopted. There might well have been more debate on the platform, but the net result was far beyond expectations. There were rocks and reefs in sight at the beginning upon which this new political craft might have been wrecked or torn its bottom out. Indeed, the first day it looked as if it would be impossible to avoid striking one or two shoals, yet the convention ended with a harmony and satisfaction that gratified everybody. True, there was great disappointment that the convention itself was not allowed to nominate the Vice-President from the floor; the choice was left to "Bob" and the National Committee. Though there was considerable feeling that if the convention had left anything more to Robert La Follette it would have stultified itself, the final belief was that more had been achieved and more easily than was to have been expected when the delegates representing such varied groups and opinions first assembled.

There were the Socialists, for instance. It looked for a time as if they would not agree to La Follette's proposal to defer the organization of a third party until later and to run as an independent. There were many ardent Socialists who felt that this was abandoning their party and its principles; that it meant giving up all that they had been able to hold on to after the war-wreck of their party. Yet the necessary sacrifice for the sake of advancing the liberal cause and of recognizing the leadership of Robert La Follette was forthcoming. It was a memorable event to see Morris Hillquit standing up to announce the adherence of his party to what may really spell the end of the organized Socialist Party in the United States. Of course, there will be those to ask maliciously what becomes now of the class struggle, and to gibe at the Marxians for striking hands with the bourgeoisie. But it seemed to most of us who observed it an extraordinary piece of political wisdom and selfless patriotism. The tremendous ovation which Morris Hillquit received showed clearly enough that the delegates realized the significance of the sacrifice which the Socialists were making in behalf of a united liberal front. The Farmer-Labor Party, too, fell in line, and when it became evident that the Ku Klux Klan issue was not to be brought up, the success of the meeting was assured. While I myself feel that it would have been better for the convention to have taken a position on the Ku Klux Klan, not merely because it would have meant hundreds of thousands of votes for the ticket, particularly in New York, but for moral reasons as well, the leaders took the position that the situation in Cleveland was unlike that facing the older parties. They were founding a new movement, not speaking for an organization which, like the Democratic Party in the South and the Republican in Indiana, is at death grips with the Klan organization at various points. Moreover, the leaders wanted nothing done that would detract from a realization in the country that this movement concerns itself primarily with economic evils and secondarily with Mr. La Follette's candidacy. This argument may be sound. It does not apply, however, to the convention's inexcusable failure to advocate the recognition of Russia.

Morris Hillquit—Socialist

The unity achieved here is all the more remarkable because it cannot be said that the message which Robert La Follette sent to the convention was a forward-looking economic document. It had fine passages and was admirably read by Robert M. La Follette, Jr., in his first public appearance, but embodied no new economic ideas. It seemed to many of us that it was harking back a long way to return to the enforcement of the Sherman anti-trust act and to call for the criminal prosecution of those who indulge in monopoly or trade agreements. Our economic and industrial situation has gone far beyond the imprisonment of a few trust heads and the dissolution of a few more trusts so that their individual parts may wax greater than ever by arriving at the same result in other ways. We cannot return to the era of small businesses if we would. It would have been far more effective had the Senator confined his statement to two foolscap sheets of typewriting and put in the forefront one or two of his planks, such as the government ownership of all water-power and superpower undertakings, and government ownership of railroads. These are the planks of which Wall Street is really afraid; they are the weapons with which the defenses of the enemy may most rapidly be breached and entered. But Mr. La Follette's form of expression is always lengthy and he has to fight in this way—with what effectiveness our readers may judge as they ponder upon the extraordinary return to political favor of a man who was a greater social and political leper during the war than even Ramsay MacDonald himself. La Follette is what he is, and the convention thanked God for him, and put off the forming of a new party until next January to oblige him. Everybody felt that the need of the hour was to build at once around this man's candidacy, to use it as a test of the extent of the popular dissatisfaction and the public's readiness for a liberal advance, to make him the rallying point for the millions who desire a better and nobler and juster America and then, out of the enthusiasms engendered by the campaign, to lay the cornerstone of a third party.

The whole fight over whether the convention should build a party now or later seemed to me to be splitting hairs except in the case of the Socialists, where there was so much at stake. In the coming campaign the various dissenting groups will be welded together by State campaign committees; those groups will learn to know and to respect one another, and win a sense of comradeship and a solidarity which can come only out of the heat of an electoral battle jointly risked and jointly borne. By November there will be a machinery created ready at hand if it is to be made permanent after the method of the older party organizations. And if it is then decided not to weld it into a rigid political form there will still remain an enormous body of enthusiasm, great cohorts of men and women inspired by the sense of fighting unselfishly the economic battles of all. That is the priceless thing which liberals are going to gain from the candidacy of Robert La Follette.

Some of the speeches were indubitably dull, but there were several notable utterances. Peter Witt stirred the audience in high degree by his passionate appeal for a new dispensation, by his caustic references to the war that was to safeguard democracy and not only did not safeguard it here, but so gravely jeopardized our liberties and rights and put back democracy for decades. There is a man for you; there is one of Tom Johnson's boys who has not sold his soul for political office like other sons of Cleveland and Ohio. Then Mrs. Harriot Stanton Blatch most effectively gave us the link with the past and the woman's message which the occasion demanded, while William Pickens, himself a brilliant Negro graduate of Yale, brought to the convention a message from last week's Philadelphia convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to the effect that the colored man is beginning to see that his hope and his future do not lie with Democrats or Republicans, but with the new alignment in which labor, both colored and white, in true and united brotherhood, must bear the brunt of the fighting. Then came the most thrilling touch of all. Max Swerin, a student of the University of Chicago, came forward to offer a resolution which the Chairman did not wish to entertain lest it open the gates to a flood of additional resolutions more or less extraneous. Mr. Swerin asked that the convention censure that precious bit of Prussianism and militarism, the coming mobilization day on September 12. His courage and eloquence overbore points of order, cries of "sit down" and "shut up," the hesitancy of the Chairman to let him speak on. Without the aid of the amplifier he made the delegates and the galleries hear—I saw the galleries flash into united applause when he declared that he made his appeal against this preparation for and incitement to the next war, this effort to militarize the spirit of the country, on behalf of the youth of America. He won his fight. His resolution of censure adopted by the delegates will go to John W. Weeks as the expression of as earnest and fine a body of American men and women as were ever brought together under a convention roof, and so superior to the puppets of John W. Weeks's party as to make them seem of a different tribe, if not of a different people.

What lies before the new party in this campaign? Who can answer? A myriad factors will enter into the struggle. Much depends upon the outcome of the Democratic Convention, much upon the progress of events. Astoundingly optimistic this group is; the number of States carried in conversation here is amazing. I would make only one prophecy: The size of the La Follette vote will astound the country, and by fall the professional politicians will be taking the movement so seriously as to concentrate their fire upon it. The rest is on the laps of the gods. The greatest hope that I have is based on the fact that, unlike the Roosevelt Progressive Party, this movement has come from underneath, out of the ranks of labor, from those men and women who are among the worst exploited of our countrymen.

That Man La Follette

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THIS writer takes a most special pleasure in pointing out to his readers that he has been right all along in saying that Robert Marion La Follette is not a modernistic or futuristic or cubistic statesman.

William Z. Foster, head of the Communist Workers Party in America, agrees with this writer on this point.

Mr. Foster came to Cleveland to see the La Follette convention there last week. A doorkeeper, recognizing him, would not let him into the hall even as a spectator. He retired to a hotel. This writer happened upon him in the lobby. "What did you think of the La Follette message to the convention?" said this writer.

This writer, if he may be permitted for a moment to express his own view of that message, wishes to say that he thought the main burden of it splendid. He thought it splendid because it contained nothing but the antique.

It said, in sum, that all would be well in the United States if only we would all desist from conspiracies in restraint of trade and would all compete with one another without conspiracies leading to monopolies. Adam Smith could have done no better.

This writer, being an infatuated individualist, applauded heartily.

He applauded particularly heartily because La Follette's message was delivered to the convention so superbly by La Follette's son, Bob, junior.

That young man has his father's fire along with a comfortable amused humor which his father, if he has it, keeps carefully concealed within the recesses of his most intimate family life.

Young Bob captivated the convention. He read with such spirit! He smiled with such charm! He was the perfect picture of youth as gallantry and as fun.

He could have got many votes in the convention if he had announced himself as a candidate for Vice-President on the ticket of La Follette and La Follette.

Yes, this writer liked that message.

He admits that in the course of it La Follette indorsed the Wisconsin State Republican platform, which approves public ownership of water-power and which also approves government ownership of railroads as "the only final solution of the transportation problem."

He admits further that Oswald Garrison Villard approves government ownership of railroads not only as the final but as the immediate solution of the transportation problem.

He notes, however, that public ownership of public utilities—such as water-power and railroads—is thoroughly consistent with the highest and most active individualism in industry itself, that is, in all manufacturing and merchandising.

He notes further that it can be—and, of course, is—claimed for public ownership of public utilities that through providing an absolutely neutral and impartial service of transportation and of power it will actually stimulate individualism in industry.

He hopes it may. He certainly sees clearly that La Follette hopes it may.

In fact, he contends that it is perfectly clear from La Follette's message to the Cleveland convention that in the mass of working life—that is, in all working life outside of the relatively narrow area of the public utilities—La Follette is not only an individualist but an intense and aggressive individualist.

His key sentence was: "To break the power of the private monopoly system over the economic and political life of the American people is the one paramount issue of the 1924 campaign."

But how break it?

By transforming the private monopoly power into a public monopoly power?

Not at all.

How break it? By enforcing—says La Follette—the criminal as well as the civil sections of the anti-trust laws.

Well, the criminal sections exist. Who can maintain that sections which exist, of a law which exists, should not be enforced?

La Follette's central proposition in this campaign, really, if one cares to put it that way, is simply law enforcement.

(Wayne B. Wheeler and Gifford Pinchot, when you go to the polls, do your duty! Sherman wrote a law, as well as Volstead.)

So that's that. La Follette's principal stand in 1924 is on the Sherman law of 1890.

Note now, however, the charming gap between the temper of La Follette and the temper of his various and different followers.

His followers in the Cleveland convention adopted a platform in which they demanded (among other things) that "a direct route from the farm producer to the city consumer" should be provided through the creation of "a government marketing corporation."

This would mean that the government would come along and buy an egg or a cabbage from a farmer and convey it "direct" (with the well-known directness of all governmental operations) to the wife of the workingman in her city kitchen.

A nice broad sweeping idea! But does it occur, does anything like it occur, in La Follette's long comprehensive message to the Cleveland convention?

It certainly does not, and, in fact, the contrary of it occurs. The utmost play that La Follette in his message gives to the government in relation to the farmer is that the government should "aid" the farmer to organize and develop a "national cooperative marketing system"; and then La Follette immediately describes that system in the following two phrases:

One. "Under the control of the farmers themselves";

Two. "Free from interference by the government or its agencies."

"Free from interference!"

Dear fellow-citizen, you who are supporting La Follette, if you think that La Follette will lead you into a bureaucratic heaven where the government will wipe your nose and pin a rose on you all the time, you are grossly deceiving yourself.

William Z. Foster is not deceived. He is a good socialistic, communistic, governmentalistic, bureaucratic person. "How did you like it?" said this writer to him.

Mr. Foster said: "The La Follette message is the most reactionary document of the year."

Sure! It will be equally despised by the Russian Soviet Republic and the United States Steel Corporation. They are modern. This backward-looking writer liked it pretty well.

The Agony of the Democrats

By HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

Madison Square Garden, Monday, July 7

THE Western Union and Postal Telegraph have provided us with a liberal supply of free writing paper. I shall steal some and try to keep a running diary of what is happening or about to happen. I hope that this is the last day, for I am about ready to quit. It is beginning to be lonely in the press gallery.

This morning I met a man who is in the Undertakers' Supply Business. I said to him: "What in Heaven's name are you doing here?" "Well," he answered, "it is this way. I used to be a newspaper man. But when Munsey spoiled our job I went in for business and I have done quite nicely so far. But I still know the game and six of my friends are sick. Just down and out from this show. I am doing their stint for them. On carbons. Six at a time. They doctor it up a bit and send it out as their own stuff. Fine idea. Isn't it?"

There is more truth than poetry in this merry statement. Many people have been taken ill, and no doubt it is the air. I notice that ten minutes or so after you get to the Garden the bronchial tubes begin to show signs of distress. After half an hour the discomfort turns into a very unpleasant pain. A ride on top of a bus will remove the complaint. All the same I am convinced that a cubic inch of Garden air on the morning of the twelfth day would contain enough bugs to keep all the Rockefeller Institute men happy for the rest of their natural lives.

In this atmosphere we sit and take ballots. I have lost count. All I know is that we are taking ballots. When a ballot has been taken Chairman Walsh takes his little hammer and plays woodpecker. "Peck . . . peck . . . peck," with fine regular intervals, "peck . . . peck . . . peck. The total number of delegates present is umtedee. The total number of votes necessary for nomination is umtedoodle. None of the candidates having obtained the necessary number of votes the clerk will now call the roll." Then the clerk gets up and reels off: "Alabama umptedoo votes." Then from the floor of the convention comes a small voice (or a gruff voice, or a woman's voice, or a kid's voice): "Aalabam umptedan votes for Toodledoodle!" There is a faint clapping of hands. A bum in the gallery howls: "Toodledoodle oiiiil. . . ." The Chairman asks the visitors to remember that they are gentlemen. There is loud laughter. The clerk reads: "Arkansas, umpteding votes." Then from the floor of the convention comes a shrill voice (or a gruff voice, or a woman's voice, or a kid's voice): "Arkansaw casts umptedong votes for Blah-Blah!" There is a faint clapping of hands. A bum in the gallery howls, . . . etc., etc. Convention without end! World without end! O Lord, deliver us from this plague! . . . "California, wah-wah votes." From the floor of the convention. . . .

The Lord does not answer our prayers. California is actually casting votes for some one or other. I look around for moral support. But the other trained seals are gone. They have done their little job. They have written their seven or eight articles as per contract. By this time they are after other fish in more pleasant waters. Their seats have been taken by those Tammany henchmen who think that they are doing the cause of true religious liberty some good by howling down the friends of McAdoo. It is a strange world. Brother Smith, supported by New England Calvinists, standing as the champion of tolerance in a hall packed with the camp-followers of Tammany, professional Irish, red-faced and blatant, giving a fine display of that dull obstinacy which goes by the name of "loyalty to the Chief"; rowdies; pickpockets; the flying army forever at the disposal of a New York ward boss; a motley crowd of overfed young roughnecks, in trick clothes and dinky straw hats, friends of the doorkeepers, who say: "Sure, Mickey, you are a nice fellow. You don't need a ticket. Go right in and make yerself at home and don't forget Al."

They are not forgetting Al. Nor will Al ever forget them. In years to come he will look back upon this episode in his life when he was mighty near the front entrance of a certain house on F Street, Washington, D. C., and when his friends in sheer exuberance of good Hibernian feeling dug a neat little grave and dumped their hero into it with the full benefit of that clergy which is present in such large numbers that the hall sometimes looks more like an Œcumenical Council than a mere political convention.

These are harsh words, but I am trying to keep within those bounds of decency prescribed by the editorial rules of a family journal. By nature, by education, by instinct, by everything I ever had, have, or hope to get, I am against the principles of the Klan. They are the francs-tireurs of peace. No! They are much worse. The franc-tireur, even if he placed himself outside the law of nations (such as it is) fought in the open. I beg his pardon for having mentioned him in connection with the cowardly horde of hooded bullies. And anyway I am too tired and too disgusted with this whole performance to write straight English or make an attempt at elegance. Let me try and state in a few plain words what I have got to say.

The main issue in this meeting was the position of the Klan. No government can hope to survive that allows a secret society to establish a state within a state. This is no great and new truth evolved during the hours of boredom of the last week. The Greeks knew it. The Babylonians knew it. Noah would not stand for it in the Ark. It is as old as the hills. Older even. I have looked upon the bright faces of the "diligates" from Texas and Missouri and by a private process of necromancy I have not wished them well. I have once more been forced to gaze upon the smug countenance of William Jennings Bryan, and I have tried to remember the dictates of my grandmother who taught me that one must respect age. It is the only thing I can find to respect in the famous delegate from the State of Florida. In short I have sat here and I have detested the works of the Kleagles as whole-heartedly as any of my neighbors, and let us state, in honor of our much-abused fraternity, that not one newspaperman in a thousand has a good word to say for the noble Knights of the Bed-Sheet. And then to discover that the other side is every way as stupid, as bigoted, as despicable in its methods; to find, from actual experience, that the Clan-na-Gael is not a whit better than the Ku Klux Klan, that every appeal of the Kluxers to mob-spirit is immediately offset by a similar move on the part of the Irish-Catholics, who have established a regime of Schrecklichkeit in the galleries—all this is a sad blow to a hopeful young mind which still believed in Santa Claus and was convinced of the ultimate victory of righteousness.

For eight days I have listened to fine flights of oratory denouncing the wicked sins of the Republican Party, promising the Kingdom of Heaven if only the Democrats were given a chance. . . . Given a chance, indeed! They were given a hundred chances right here and failed miserably.

Last Friday or thereabouts I found the lord of The Nation's domains eating an apple in the press gallery, and he spake thus: "I have got to go to Cleveland. Art Young has gone back to the country. Lewis is chasing Injuns in Saskatchewan. Bill Hard is somewhere. I wish that you would stay here and report the final break. It must come some time. And it would be nice if the readers of The Nation were given a first-hand description of that momentous and historical occurrence." I said that I would stay. I now renig on the promise. If the readers of The Nation are curious about the rest of the Democratic Convention of the year of grace 1924, I refer them to Victor Hugo. He has left us a fine description of how life is lived in the sewers.

These United States—XLVII*

VIRGINIA: A Gentle Dominion

By DOUGLAS FREEMAN

VIRGINIA buried her beloved at Appomattox, as her sons stood by, very ragged. All that she was, all that she hoped, all in which she had taken pride she told herself she had interred there. But it was spring for her sons, plowing-season, and they were hungry. They tramped back home and fortunately found in the reclamation of stumpy fields and neglected meadows an outlet for their grief. They thought of the past as seldom as they might and talked of it scarcely at all. It was five years before they had the farm in order, ten before they had any leisure, twenty before they possessed any money, thirty before they were measurably prosperous as their fathers had been in 1860. After the Spanish-American war—they never knew why—they could paint the house and buy a new surrey and take the wife to town for her shopping twice a year. By 1905 they began to argue whether it would not be possible to send the girl as well as the boy to college.

Since then there has been plenty. The village no longer looks as though its solitary street were a streamer of crape on the door of the landscape. The countryside is not quite trim, as yet, but has brightened immeasurably. The "Eastern Shore"—which comprises the two counties between the Chesapeake and the ocean—has become one of the richest agricultural communities in the United States. The Shenandoah Valley is white with apple blossoms almost as soon as the snow is gone. The section beyond the New River, "the gre-e-at Southwest," as its residents proudly style it, finds double wealth in its coal mines and in its export cattle, fattened on a very luxuriant blue grass. The people of the "Southside" counties, between the James River and the North Carolina line, are improving yearly the quality of their tobacco, and if they succeed in raising the early cotton they have planted experimentally they will rival the Carolina farmers, whom they now envy. Cooperative marketing is slowly taking hold, though eyed doubtfully by some bankers and vigorously fought by rich warehousemen. The breeding of stock has improved so much that the scrub, Pennyroyal bull now belongs with the bear that has disappeared from the mountains and the deer that has been killed in the swamps. Enough has been done to furnish abundant themes for the writers of booster-literature and to pile up statistics that sprain the backs of the graphs official bureaus delight to draw. Virginia's sons and their sons after them have done a brave, clean job since Appomattox.

The Mother herself, Virginia, went straight from Appomattox to the old house that typified the civilization that had perished. She climbed to the second-story bedroom; she pulled down the blinds and through the darkness of reconstruction sat in her mourning. She would put out the Southern flag on May 30 and go down to the porch when the veterans passed by on the way to reunions; she never missed a session of the U. D. C. and tended a booth in the old-fashioned bazaar that was held to raise money for another Confederate monument. She went to church and sat very quietly in the ancestral pew, though perhaps she could not bring herself to say Amen at the end of the prayer for the President of the United States and all others in authority. Sometimes she walked in the garden. But her thoughts were still of the war between the States. She could not forget and she had no desire to forget its triumphs and its agony. Her face has been turned to the past. Without pose or ostentation (those who are noisy have simply married into the family and do not understand), without making a fetish of her veil or a spectacle of her tears, Virginia has been "in deep mourning."

While the Widow has been lamenting in the front chamber upstairs, her daughters have been receiving new callers in the drawing-room and her sons have been paying court in strange parlors. Society has changed vastly during the great lady's widowhood—has changed so much, in fact, that she is beginning to doubt herself ever so little when daily she replies to a daughter's mention of a visitor's name with her emphatic, "Why, my dear child, I never heard of him; who was his grandfather?"

Names and blood still count in Virginia, but lack of them handicaps a man less in acquiring social position than possession of them aids him in preserving it. A few who have ancestry and no money keep their place; many who have money and no ancestry make their place. Even in Richmond, where the doors of the Monday German once were unlocked only for those who had as many quarterings as an officer in the bodyguard of a Bourbon, the daughter of the rich newcomer always is invited after two or three years and, a little later, her mother and father. "He's rich" is now an apologia for many shortcomings. Now and again there is scandalized squawking when a nobody wins the heart of an old aristocrat's daughter; but the girl seldom loses caste and the boy may gain. Where a great lady rules, why should not there be matriarchy? Nothing better illustrates the slow effacing of the old hard lines than that unless a union is hopeless the station of man and wife in a few years becomes that of the more distinguished of the two, be it that of the man or that of the woman. The old mercantile aristocracy of the cities died with the industrial era to which it belonged. Not one name in ten that appear in the list of those who entertained Lafayette, or were the familiars of John Marshall, or even of those on whom Jefferson Davis called when visiting in Virginia cities after the war is heard now at social functions. Many of the greatest lines are near extinction. General Robert E. Lee had three sons and four daughters. There survive only one grandson, two granddaughters, one great-granddaughter, and one great-grandson. This is characteristic. Cynics have affirmed that if two or three families of great planters had not been inexhaustibly prolific and had not intermarried early and widely, genealogists would have to despair of proving descent from early colonial times, except, of course, for the goodly host of those who possess, or think they possess, some of the blood of Pocahontas.

In rural Virginia the old aristocracy still clings to a few of its ancient seats, such as Shirley on the James and Mount Airy on the Rappahannock, but elsewhere it has perished or migrated and has had no successor. Nowhere in the South is the passing of the old order more manifest than in certain of the older counties, lower Hanover or King William, for example. Some of the old mansions remain, though fire has claimed more; but these often are habited by people ignorant of the history of the houses in which they dwell. One gets almost the impression that plague or an approaching army had driven the natives before it and that after years of decay another race has moved in.

* Reproduction forbidden. Quotation limited to 300 words. Copyright, 1924, The Nation, Inc. All rights reserved.

With the lesser aristocracy and the middle classes the change has not been so great. Where the family was numerous it often happened that some of the sons went to the cities while the others remained at the "home place." Twenty years ago fully half the urban population in this way had kin in the country. Now the ties have been broken —one reason, this, for the sharpened legislative antagonisms between town and country. In the social life of the farmers much depends on the extent to which the old families have held on. There still are districts where some of the planters do not call on neighbors who are as prosperous as themselves but do not have a like background. Elsewhere the rural church has worked for democracy in the leveling of the old barriers. Even the aliens who occasionally settle in the counties gradually are made welcome in the homes of the neighborhood if they are well-behaved. Usually, however, there is one generation of something very much like probation: after that the son goes where the father might not. Conditions in the country on the whole are destructive of the aristocratic tradition. It is hard to be socially exclusive where neighbors are few and solitude wears down pride as well as nerves.

An element fast increasing in some parts of rural Virginia is that of the city-dweller, the son or grandson of a planter, who buys himself a country home which he uses part of the year. In northern Virginia, around Leesburg and Middleburg particularly, and in the beautiful foothills between the homes of Jefferson and Madison, are numerous colonies of these reformed burghers who spend on the land the money they make in trade. Sometimes these men attempt to figure in the political life of the county, but more frequently they consort with their kind. They are welcomed by the small farmer, who sells them his produce or his labor at prices well above the market, but they are jealously eyed by the larger planter, whose sun they dim and whose colored farmhands they hire at prices the "practical" farmer cannot pay. Not infrequently some wealthy man from the North or from the West, with a liking for the historical and with a desire to found a family, will purchase one of the large and famous estates and will make a theatrical attempt to lead the life of which he has read in a levant-bound life of Washington. Where taste and tact are sustained by patience and a purse some of these efforts to recreate the spacious style of the eighteenth century do not fail altogether of their purpose. Where any of the essentials is lacking the outcome is comical.

The last of the great social raconteurs, Captain W. Gordon McCabe, is dead. The great foil for his wit, Major Robert W. Hunter, preceded him a full ten years. The "old Virginia gentleman" is very rarely seen. Even his conscious imitators are no longer numerous. Not often does one hear, as at old court days, the orator who climbs vocally skyward, after the fashion of the preacher reading the hymn in Tom Sawyer and then suddenly drops to the lower register with an inflection for which there is no better name than the colloquial "curling." The old-time lawyer, the fabled country doctor, the kindly old "mammies," the dignified house-servants live now only in the stories of Thomas Nelson Page and his school.

One type there is that still links the great Widow with her past. It is a type seen often in Virginia cities and every Sunday in the country. On Franklin Street in Richmond, of a Monday afternoon, one may observe a dozen exemplars. They are the little old ladies, dressed inconspicuously in black, who trip to the Woman's Club, hear a program, sip their tea, and then, grasping their handbags tightly, trot home again. Some are widows, but most of them are the unmarried daughters of well-to-do business men of the last generation. They grew to womanhood in the seventies. Men were scarce then. Thousands of the young Virginians who should have been wooing them were moldering bones on the battlefields of the war between the States, or else, if spared, had given up hope in the Old Dominion and had sought a livelihood where cities were not in ashes and farmers' fields were not burrowed with trenches. Many of the young women of that day married men not worthy of them. Many others had no lovers. They stayed on in their fathers' houses until their parents died and then they went to reside with kinspeople or had a spinster cousin of like temperament come to live with them. They use the old furniture and read the old books and adhere to the old fashions and think the old thoughts. They are given to charity, they write regularly to all their relatives, and they know what is happening in the homes of all their friends. To sit for an hour with one of these women and to hear her talk of "Pa" and of "Ma"—for they cling to the eighteenth-century pronunciation—is to agree that the women are the great social conservators. Virginia society in its distinctive sense would have breathed its last long ago but for the little old ladies.

Numerous as the changes in society have been during Virginia's widowhood the essential quality of social life, which is the fundamental characteristic of the people, remains precisely what it was when General Lee was its incarnation. That quality is consideration for the feelings of other people. A man may be fairly sure in Virginia of a courteous answer to his inquiries and of a friendly reply to his greeting. Whether a mountaineer on the side of a wretched little clearing or the inheritor of a great name chatting over his first editions, the average Virginian displays an inherited thoughtfulness for the sensibilities of another. He dislikes to say unpleasant things or to touch a sore spot, and he is equally anxious not to have his own bruises handled or his own feelings hurt. All this sounds very much like boasting that lacks the very quality it describes; yet there is no understanding Virginia, and her people's courtesy, their reserve, and their sense of values unless one realizes that an atmosphere of good-will and friendliness is prized above industrial advance or agricultural progress.

Consideration is certainly one of several explanations of the comparative amity between employer and employee in Virginia. Their relationship rests on the first law of the South—that a white man is a white man and must be treated as such regardless of his station. A certain deference, a noticeable restraint in manner, is to be observed in the bearing of the manager to the workers. There is little swearing or shouting and, more often than not, the deliberate use of "Mister" when the operative is addressed. Carelessness in these matters or neglect of the consideration the employee demands as a white man would cause him to quit his job instantly and would lead to a strike as readily as any difference over wages or hours would.

Consideration enters into the treatment of the Negro to an extent that may not be credited by some readers. The Virginia Negro is the blue-blood of his race and has behind him nearly a century more of life on the continent than have most colored people of the cotton belt. Many Virginia Negroes are the descendants of seventeenth-century slaves; perhaps the majority date their American "line" from around 1750. After that date Virginia did not willingly import any blacks. From 1800 onward there was a rather steady southward movement of slaves. The manner, the bearing, and the intelligence of the Negroes of Virginia so definitely exhibit the benefits of their longer residence in America that it is surprising no ethnologist has studied them. They have advanced splendidly in many ways. Stephen Graham found them, as Olmstead had sixty-five years before, indisputably the most prosperous of their race in the South. They have their social strata, their clubs, their fraternal organizations, their vigorous churches, their stores, their doctors and dentists, and even their banks, though these last, it must be admitted sorrowfully, are entirely too prone to fail. In education they are zealous and persistent. They have not yet been allowed in the rural districts properly trained teachers, suitable school-buildings, or a session of decent length; but in the cities they have all these and have made the most of them. In one Virginia town, not long ago, it was discovered that a larger percentage of beginner-pupils among colored girls than among white boys was continuing through to graduation from the high school. But the colored people have more than physical aids to self-help. They have the moral support of nearly all the whites; and though the point of contact is of course the point of friction, they understand and are understood far better than is generally believed in the North. It is commonly said in Virginia that if the State were free alike from the racial involvements of the North and from the troubles of the Gulf States the two races could live side by side through the centuries and have no strife. Lynchings are rare and are a humiliation to the white people. Justice at the law is meted out to the colored man—justice with consideration.

In politics, too, there is consideration, perhaps too much of it, in fact, but less justice. The State has been unswervingly Democratic since the Civil War, though prior to that time it was often contested hotly by the Whigs. The disfranchisement of the Negro under the constitution of 1902 has not led many white men to change their politics. A few manufacturers and bankers have concluded that their economic interest lies with the Republicans. An occasional seeker after place and an infrequent tuft-hunter goes over. Now and again protestants abstain from voting or even support a Republican candidate when the Democratic nominee is notoriously feeble. In the southwestern counties, where slavery was never seated and where few Negroes have settled, the Republicans are in the majority and are fought with weapons of many forgings. Many State offices go to the exacting and hungry Democrats of this district, the Ninth, to strengthen them in their warfare with the "heathen." Elsewhere in Virginia men accept the Democratic Party as they do their religious affiliation—chiefly by inheritance. Perhaps unjust tax laws may force a political uprising. Otherwise it seems probable that for the next ten years whatever is done for progress in Virginia must be begun within the Democratic ranks. The primary must take the place of the general election. The equivalent of the bi-partisan system must be sought, as far as may be, between the factions of the Democratic Party.

These factions follow the world-round cleavage, so old that it might be called geologically political, of conservative and liberal. In the factional war the peculiar quality of the people, that same good-natured consideration, makes it difficult for liberals to get results. The conservatives, who form the State Democratic "machine," are generaled by those who want office and will work for it. The liberals suffer from a lack of leadership because those who are qualified for office do not as a rule desire it and will not bestir themselves to win it. Then, too, the conservatives have a disconcerting way of conquering their conquerors. With the single exception of former Governor Westmoreland Davis, father of the very excellent Virginia budget law, every liberal who has defeated the machine in recent years has been won over to the conservatives or else has been silenced by the consideration they have shown him. The directors of the machine, furthermore, are cautious. The Juggernaut car is not used for political joy-riding. They seldom attack unless they are assailed or find their political structure endangered. Their success is usually not difficult, for nine times in ten it involves nothing more than defeating the bills the liberals introduce.

Besides, when it is hard put, the machine can mobilize most effectively for government of the cities by the counties, through the courthouse "rings." Every county in Virginia has a clerk of its court, a sheriff, a treasurer, and one or more commissioners of the revenue, the officers who assess taxes. These are all elective. They work together. They are sociable and friendly as a rule; they know virtually everyone in the county. They lend money and give advice. They are almost the only officials in the county who are permanently employed, and they are well paid by a vicious system of fees that liberals vainly have sought to destroy. Naturally the county "ring" has a community of interest. As the members of the "ring" or their deputies are moving about constantly, and as politics is as much their sport as it is their business, they are always recruiting their ranks, reclaiming deserters, and disciplining the unruly. With their kinsfolk, their debtors, their friends, and their henchmen these engaging gentlemen muster a vote definitely ponderable in a State where the franchise is the privilege of the few and is not exercised by all of them.

Here is the skeleton in the great Widow's closet. In order to exclude the Negro from the polls the framers of the present constitution of Virginia set chevaux de frise of qualifications in the voter's way. He must reside in the State two years, in the county or city one year, in the precinct thirty days; he must apply for registration in his own handwriting and must be able to explain a section of the constitution if asked to do so; he must pay a poll tax of $1.50 six months in advance of the election in which he wishes to participate. This last requirement is the stake on which the slow-footed are impaled. Nobody ever seems to remember from year to year when the six months begin or end. The newspapers diligently print "boxes" and occasionaly "streamers" of warning. Organizations remind their members. The unions suspend those who do not qualify. But the indifferent citizen is negligent, pays his tax too late, and if he goes to the polls in resentmnet of some political outrage is told he is not on the book. There must be hundreds in Virginia who have not had a voice in choosing a candidate since the constitution of 1902—a curious sunset document of another age—became operative. Thousands who are able to vote may reason that the candidates are all decent men or that it is no use wasting one's time in voting against the machine's favorite, who is certain to win. Personalities in campaigns are barred by unwritten law. Consideration shows itself in a sharp reaction to the side of a man who is too vigorously assailed, either by his opponent or by the newspapers. The result is that a State of 2,300,000 does not poll in the average Democratic primary more than 150,000 votes. In the general election the number will not exceed from 200,000 to 230,000. The counties rule even as they are ruled by the county "rings." The "green terror" of which Joseph Caillaux writes so speciously in France does not fall very far short of reality in Virginia. It is all a political curiosity—a people too considerate of office-holders to overcome the phalanx office-holders are careful to muster. Of course, consideration is not all. Qualification is a barrier. Indifference is a killing obstacle in the way. Pride in the past, a belief that a State which has been well governed heretofore will be governed equally well in the future—this enters largely.

What does the future hold? The Widow will not take off her weeds until all those who have memory of the war between the States, even as children, have gone with the elders. As long as there are a dozen Confederate veterans in Virginia they will meet in annual reunion. Their daughters will erect more monuments. Their sons will read Confederate history and will teach it to their children. Their grandsons in their first school-speeches will call the roll of great Virginians. The influence of General Lee will remain in splendid potency. All this is certain. But for the rest, is Virginia ever to be "great again" in General Lee's own words? Great in agriculture she can be, though never among the first dozen States. Great in commerce she may be, if the Hampton Roads are utilized by American shippers. Whether she is great in achievement, great in the bearing of intellectual leaders, great in service to the country as one of the few States that remain predominantly of British stock—whether she ever is great again in this fullest sense depends on her ability to make her superb history dynamic through the new educational movement that is the hope of every progressive Virginian. In 1860 Virginia had the most adequate system of colleges in the United States, with the largest attendance per 1,000 of population. She must have for the future a system not inferior to the best. Her public schools must be in kind. Her history must be for inspiration rather than for contemplation. It is not enough to say: "We have Abraham to our father."

National Forests and the Northern Pacific

By EDWARD RICHARDS

IN spite of political appearances and campaign utterances, oil is not the only natural resource, belonging to the nation, which has been attacked. In 1921 an attempt was made to undermine the present effective and efficient control of the national forests. At that time several bills were introduced into Congress providing for what seemed on the face of it a harmless change in the administrative control of the Forest Service. These bills called for the transfer of the Forest Service—including all of its resources in the way of appropriations, personnel, etc., as well as of all the national forests under its care—from the United States Department of Agriculture to the United States Department of the Interior. Secretary Fall was Secretary of the Interior at that time and if these seemingly harmless and apparently unimportant bills had passed, there is every reason to believe that much of the nationally owned supply of timber contained in the national forests both in the United States and in Alaska would have gone the same way as has the oil of Teapot Dome and the California Oil Reserve. Only the extreme alertness of those interested in the welfare of the forests of the nation, followed and headed up by the energetic action of the technically trained foresters who knew the situation and understood what was going on, prevented the passage of these bills by arousing public sentiment against them.

Now it is not realized by the general public, especially in the East, that the national forests contain anything that is worth having from an economic point of view. Most people think of them as a kind of park system similar to the Yellowstone Park—a nice place to go to for a trip. Beautiful scenery, big mountains, blue lakes, speckled trout make up the mental picture of the national forests in most people's minds. But for a moment let us glance at the facts concerning these national forests. Take their size and number. Including the two Alaskan forests there are 148 of them, covering in all slightly over 245,000 square miles. To make this area seem more real, it may be said that it exceeds by a considerable margin the total area of the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, and Virginia, and the District of Columbia. Much of this huge area is not covered by actual forest growth, a considerable part of it being grazing land and high, barren mountain tops, but even with these deductions the large size of the national forest property can be seen. Or take the quality of forests which they contain. On parts of this area stand some of the very finest virgin forests that ever grew on this continent. In Alaska, for example, the forests of Sitka spruce are as fine as or finer than any spruce forests on earth, while in the Northwestern States the stands of Douglas fir and yellow pine now found on the national forests are in many places second to none. Nor is the grazing land wasted, for in the year ended June 30, 1921, these lands supported a total of 2,050,715 cattle, 78,871 horses, 3,177 hogs, 7,412,412 sheep, and 43,190 goats, for which grazing fees were payable to the Forest Service of $2,415,-618. In addition to the timber and the grazing, the water-power available in the national forests and the recreational values in the form of fish and game, camping grounds, etc., show the worth of this great national resource. And for upwards of twenty-five years these properties have been not only set aside for the people of the United States as a whole, but have been cared for with a zeal and a devotion to the public welfare on the part of the United States Forest Service that is beyond all praise. Great strides have been made in preventing forest fires, in improving the grazing, in seeing that the timber, whenever cut, is removed in such a way that new forest growth comes in afterward, and in opening up the country by establishing roads, trails, camping sites, and other facilities for the public. In a nutshell, the policies of Roosevelt and Pinchot, of managing the national forests for the permanent public use of the citizens of the United States, have been faithfully put into actual practice.

The most immediate assault upon this great national resource does not, however, come through legislative channels but as an outcome of a land grant made in 1864, sixty years ago. This grant was made to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for the purpose of enabling them to construct a railroad from Lake Superior to the Pacific Coast, and consisted of all the odd-numbered non-mineral sections of public land (a section equals one mile square) in two strips each forty miles wide, one on each side of the main line of the railroad throughout its entire length, or a strip totaling 80 miles in all. This 80-mile belt was known as the "primary limits" of the grant. Outside of this 80-mile strip were two ten-mile "indemnity strips." The purpose of the latter was to afford the opportunity for the railroad to acquire sections in them in place of any odd-numbered sections in the primary limits classified as mineral, reserved, settled upon, or otherwise disposed of. Under an act of Congress passed in 1895 an amazing area of land was classified as "mineral" in four land districts in Idaho and western Montana. The work in each district was done by a board of three commissioners. Usually all but one were non-resident political appointees without mining experience or the other qualifications needed to perform the duties of the position efficiently. In these four districts about 3,800,000 acres of land were classified as mineral. It would be unfair at this late date to charge actual or constructive fraud in the classification; but the undeniable fact remains that the classification as made was remarkably favorable to the railroad company. In this connection an actual examination of a map of the whole area shows a surprising number of sections, odd numbered and therefore due to belong to the railroad, but situated on the bare rocky tops of mountains, which have been classified as "mineral," when to date no mineral deposits worth speaking of have been discovered on them. When it is realized that in exchange for such practically bare rocks, when classified as "mineral land," the railroad company has had the right to select timber and agricultural land which was classified as "non-mineral" in the first indemnity limit, the questionableness of the administration of the whole land grant gains considerable force. This is, however, only supposition and deduction—yet very reasonable withal—as no general, comprehensive investigation has been made of this aspect of the grant. But on other points the facts are available and are quite clear.

The total area of land actually due to the railroad on a gross acreage basis was about 44 million acres. To date the actual title to only a little over 40 million acres has been passed to the railroad, leaving an alleged deficiency of about 3,900,000 acres. In part satisfaction of this shortage the railroad company claims the right to select about 3,000,000 acres of lands which were set aside about twenty to twenty-five years ago by the Government for the national forests. Much of this reserved land contains excellent timber and the whole of the area has been protected from fire and improved by the building of roads, trails, telephone lines, etc., at government expense as part of the national forests from the early years of this century to date. During the period these lands have been reserved by the Government and protected from forest fires, the value of all timber stumpage has greatly increased throughout the United States, so that they are now estimated to be worth about $30,000,000. The question of the relative rights of the Government and the railroad company is at issue. The matter was taken to court on one feature of the case and finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States. The railway company is giving out the impression that the case decided by the Supreme Court covers all the controversial matters. The Forest Service contends that the Supreme Court decision covers only one point and that there are many questions in the grant which as yet have not been the subject of judicial determination, and that these important questions may now be considered by Congress with a view to settling them in fairness to the United States and the railroad.

The heart of the matter seems to lie in the broad purpose of the original grant, and not in any one or more detailed parts of it. In 1864 the Northern Pacific Railroad Company desired to construct a railroad to the Pacific Coast. The Government was willing to have such a road built and so the two parties each agreed to perform certain specific things; in other words, a contract was entered into between them to secure the construction of the railroad. It is the claim of the Government that the railroad has repeatedly and flagrantly violated the terms of its contract. For instance, take one specific item. The Government claims that the agreement included the construction of a railroad, as part of the main line of the system, from Wallula, Washington, to Portland, Oregon, a distance of 225 miles, and also that this line was never constructed by the railroad company. Again the railroad failed to build 1,507.21 miles of road within the time limit set by law. Besides these points a large number of other instances can be cited where the Northern Pacific has either failed to observe the terms of its grant or else has greatly profited at the expense of the Government through errors and mistakes. But these are details, while what is needed is a review of the case as a whole. The kind of question that should be raised is general rather than specific. Such items as the total cost of the road as compared with the total value of the land actually given to the railroad is of interest here. The actual cost of the construction was not to exceed $70,000,000. While the gross receipts from the sale of lands from the time of the grant to June 30, 1917, including the railroad's own estimate of the values of lands received but still unsold at that date, was $136,118,533.14, or only slightly less than double the cost of the road. It is these big, general questions that need attention rather than the details. The original grant was made to enable the railroad company to sell the land and so secure the money needed to build the road. The facts seem to show that the company sold only part of the land, realizing nearly twice as much in cash from the sale as was needed originally to construct the road—it subsequently had largely to be reconstructed.

The Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, supported by President Coolidge, has now urged upon Congress an immediate investigation of the whole of the Northern Pacific Railroad land grant, in order to save the national forest acreage that has been threatened. Such an investigation should certainly be made and unless some entirely new facts are brought forward, it should prove beyond any shadow of doubt that instead of the Government owing the Northern Pacific Railroad Company nearly 3,000,000 acres of national forest land, the company has already been overpaid and is entitled, in equity, to an accounting for values received in violation of the terms of the grant.

The Forest Service contends that under the terms of the grant the railroad company was required to sell all lands in its possession after July 4, 1884, to settlers in lots not exceeding a section in area at prices not exceeding $2.50 per acre. It also claims that not less than 25,000,000 acres have been sold by the company since that date and that in such sales no preference has been given to settlers and no attention paid to either the area or price limitation. In a very similar case involving about 3,000,000 acres of land claimed by the Southern Pacific Railway Company under a very similar land grant the Supreme Court held that the $2.50 per acre was binding. In that case Congress took over the land, allowed the company an average of $2.50 per acre, deducted from the gross amount any money already received by the company in sales which it had made and provided for paying the company the balance due it.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter notices that the editorial department is agitating the question of the prefix of women's names. Should Mary Smith, after standing up before the altar with William Brown, call herself Mrs. Brown, according to the older dispensation, or adopt the fashion of some modern feminists and continue to pass herself off as Miss Smith? The editorial department states that, although believers in the new mode have banded together as the Lucy Stone League, the woman under whose name they have united did not follow their method. Lucy Stone after her marriage refused to answer to the name of Mrs. Blackwell. But she did not call herself Miss Stone; she used the title Mrs. Stone.

* * * * *

THIS, the Drifter thinks, is the more desirable method, because it preserves the maiden name but indicates the annexation of a husband. The Drifter's feminist friends—some of them, at least—insist that it is nobody's business but her own whether a woman is married. Granted. But the Drifter is a realist—or thinks he is. He cares little for theoretic rights, much for practical realities. In the world in which we live it is a practical convenience to know from a woman's name whether she is husbanded or husbandless, and the increasing insignificance of the male makes it less reasonable than ever that a woman should object to admitting the ownership of such a trifle. By letting it protrude from a pocket she proclaims the possession of a handkerchief. Why, then, conceal a mere husband?

* * * * *

NO, the Drifter sees no gain in obliterating the distinction between married and unmarried women. Rather would he create such a distinction for men. As a matter of fact, even some decidedly advanced women prefer to be known by their husband's name. As one of them put it to the Drifter: "Why prefer your maiden to your married name? You at least choose the name of your husband, while that of your parents is thrust upon you."

BUT for economic or other reasons women are doubtless destined more and more to stick by their maiden names. Hence, the matter of prefixes is important. Perhaps it will be resolved by discarding all prefixes: Miss, Mrs., and Mr. None is necessary and all are reminiscent of a bygone era of ceremony and aristocracy. In fact, American newspapers have already made a start in eliminating prefixes. Their custom now is to refer to John D. Rockefeller, not Mr. John D. Rockefeller. When using only the last name it is Mr. Rockefeller, not just Rockefeller, but the latter usage is perhaps not far off. Indeed, it has already been adopted by the labor press—and by other papers, too, when the man in question is a laborer and without the halo of John D.'s money. In England, on the other hand, newspapers are still sticklers for the older and more formal etiquette. It is always Mr. John D. Rockefeller.

* * * * *

THE more the Drifter thinks of it, the more he is inclined to conclude that the prefix before names is on the way to the scrap-pile, and it may be that the revolt of feminists against their married names will be the deciding factor. Even old fogies like the Drifter may live to see the day when Mary Smith after marriage will not fight to be called Miss Smith in preference to Mrs. Brown, because by common usage she will be known as Mary, as Mary Smith, or as Smith, according to circumstances and the degree of intimacy that exists between her and the person who is speaking.

* * * * *

EITHER that or the Spanish method. For it is remarkable that Spain, which is rated as a backward country, has the most progressive system in regard to names of which the Drifter knows. The difficulty of the feminists was solved there years ago. In Spain when Señorita Maria Gomez is taken to wife by Señor Juan Martinez she does not become Señora Martinez, as would be her normal fate in the United States. No, she becomes Señora Maria Gomez de Martinez—a case of addition, not substitution. If she brings into the world a son whom she calls José, he is not known as José Martinez. Oh, by no means! He becomes José Martinez y Gomez, thus retaining the family name of both father and mother, although for brevity's sake he is usually addressed simply as Señor Martinez. Not too complicated and eminently satisfactory thinks

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Tragedy of the Minnesota Star

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation's wise and careful weighing of the forces that went into the defeat of the Minnesota Daily Star (and I would not ignore them) as a free newspaper, was there not one factor omitted?

The Star was founded upon the premise that a newspaper can draw from the financial forces which the paper is founded to oppose. I believe that premise is wrong.

As our cities are organized there are no advertisers who can sign lucrative contracts who do not come directly under the control of the financial interests opposed to liberal thought. With every gain in advertising, the Daily Star threw overboard some of its standards and ideals; and it is noteworthy that its final act of apostasy came just one week before it received a year's contract from the biggest department stores.

Acting upon a fallacious premise, the Daily Star sought to become a competitor of the respectable newspapers, including funnies, sport pages, an urge toward a thick, impressive size, and a thirst for big circulation.

This description does not go for the first months of the paper's life. Those months represent a golden period of journalism in the Northwest, an almost legendary era. This is no exaggeration. Individuals are still talking about that first year, when the paper was incurring a deficit of $7,000 a month, paid out of capital and real assets, and was gloriously free. The circulation at that time was about 40,000. The editorials were never doctrinaire, yet intelligently social. Advertising was subject to editorial control. The news was honest. An editor of a competing newspaper said: "You have probably the most intelligent group of readers ever assembled in the West. I estimate that 80 per cent of yours read editorials, while only about 10 per cent of ours do."

During that first year the Star was virtually an endowed newspaper. It had either to continue as an endowed newspaper and remain free, or bow to the inevitable and become a pseudo-liberal journal. Or it might, by reducing to four pages, eliminating costly features, and attracting loyal, intelligent readers, have developed a style of paper which could live without advertising.

Minneapolis, June 10 M. H. Hedges

A Correction and a Rebuke

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: With reference to the communication in your issue of June 4, The Nation at Northwestern, signed "A Pacifist Mother," permit me to make one correction.

President Scott did not telephone to the library for the issue of The Nation for April 16. Our vigilant reference librarian spotted your uncomplimentary article on Northwestern University as soon as the number came to the library, and, as is our habit, we called it to the attention of the person most concerned, in this case President Scott. I took it over to his office as I was passing that way. The inference that this copy of The Nation was kept away from frequenters of the library is wholly unwarranted, and your publication of the letter in question without going to the trouble of getting the facts is quite in keeping with the practice of some metropolitan newspapers.

We have recently opened a new periodical room to which we invite "A Pacifist Mother." There she will find on open shelves all the current numbers of The Nation, to say nothing of the Student Challenge, published by the affiliated Garrett Biblical Institute, and the New Republic for May 21, which sets some people right as to what to believe in regard to pacifism at Northwestern. It is amusing to see how difficult it is to keep the peace on the question of pacifism.

Evanston, Illinois, June 6 Theodore W. Koch, Librarian

Would It Be a Misalliance?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of May 28, Hanson Lewis argues against the formation of a farmer-labor party, and calls for a third party (though why "third" I don't know, rather than seventh or eighth) not representing "any particular class or group." The history of politics in this and other countries should have taught him that the only parties which ever achieve power are those which are based on specific class interests. A party which represents nobody in particular has no particular reason for existence.

Mr. Lewis thinks that if a coherent party of farmers and wage-workers should win power, it "would be sure to enact vicious class legislation, harmful to the interests of the general public." Inasmuch as the working farmers constitute at least 30 per cent and the wage-workers 50 per cent of our whole population, I should like to know why the remaining minority should be dignified with the title of "the general public." It is even safe to say that half of this small residue would directly benefit by legislation which improved the condition of wage-workers and "dirt-farmers."

False as are his conclusions, however, Mr. Lewis renders a service in the earlier part of his letter, where he raises a question that is too often overlooked or evaded—the question whether or not it is practicable for one party really to represent the interests of two groups or classes so dissimilar as the industrial wage-workers and the tillers of the soil.

Nearly two-thirds of the working farmers are property owners; most wage-workers are not. All farmers are sellers of commodities; wage-workers are not. Most farmers are to some extent purchasers of labor-power; wage-workers are essentially sellers of labor-power.

These antagonisms must not be ignored if we wish to understand the problem—and we cannot solve it if we do not understand it.

But there is more to be said. The two classes have likewise much in common. Both are composed of productive workers—persons who gain their livelihood by creating wealth, as distinguished from those who live by owning the means of production which other folk use. Both the working farmer and the wage-worker are exploited—that is, are compelled by the very nature of our economic system to produce a surplus for someone else as a condition to being permitted to produce a living for themselves. There is a considerable difference in the mode and form of exploitation in the two cases, but to a large extent the beneficiaries are the same.

No, the interests of wage-workers and of working farmers are not identical. But neither are they diametrically opposed. They are divergent, and the question is, Can they be harmonized, and if so, on what lines? It is a question worthy of careful study.

New York, June 10 Algernon Lee

America and Peace

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom recently held its fourth biennial convention in Washington, D. C., and an international summer school in Chicago in the month of May. Delegates from about thirty-eight countries came from all parts of the world to this convention; now we are leaving the United States, going back to our own countries, our minds filled with the wonderful and interesting experiences we have had.

But it must be admitted—if we are to tell the truth—that some of us have been disappointed in our work here. Coming across the sea we discussed our plans. We knew the United States did not approve of the present League of Nations, and we agreed. But we wanted to ask her to come in and help us make it better. We thought the Americans would be tired of war, and rather tired of our European problems, but we certainly believed that the American people stood for peace, and that we would be able to go home with new ideas and the feeling of having the moral support of a great and strong nation.

What did we find?

First of all that the United States has problems of its own as great and quite as difficult to solve as our European questions—problems that we had not realized or understood. And—what bitterly discouraged us—we began to doubt that the American people really were tired of war. We could not help feeling disappointed when we found that to preach the gospel of peace often had the same effect as when you wave a red cloth before a bull; or when we saw that in the free United States, in the country of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, there is only limited freedom of speech and that many people who believe in peace dare not say so for fear of losing their positions.

We certainly were astonished to see a great military propaganda instituted by a small industrial group which owns and utilizes a very influential press—a press, not only badly informed in foreign affairs, but actually untrue and corrupt. This press has told many lies about our league and our members; for instance, we have been said to be financed by the Bolshevists.

But in spite of these disappointments, we are thrilled by the wonderful possibilities of this country. Perhaps the American people, as a whole, are not yet politically awake. But we admire the advanced minority, the few excellent papers, and the splendid and courageous persons and groups.

New York, June 5 LILIAN HOLBY,
Norwegian Delegate, W. I. L. P. F.

The Klan at Work

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of June 18, discussing the Ku Klux Klan, you cite the recent immigration bill as a true sample of Klannishness and for lack of contrary evidence you exonerate the Invisible Empire from all blame in connection with its enactment into law.

It may interest you, therefore, to learn that you are wrong and that the Klan and its "citizens" not only were responsible for the passage of the bill but did, in fact, have much to do with the drafting of the measure and its subsequent introduction in the House.

Whether Representative Johnson (who fathered the measure) is himself a Klansman I cannot say, for I have no knowledge that he is, but I do know that petitions were circulated by the Klan throughout the entire country stating that the measure was in danger of defeat and urging all "100 per cent Americans" to do their utmost to secure its passage.

And I can further state that these petitions when signed were returned to the Klan and forwarded by them officially to Representative Johnson.

The reason I know all this is that I am myself a "citizen" of the Invisible Empire and received the petition before mentioned together with a printed "rider" urging me to foster sentiment favorable to the bill. Being opposed to the measure I destroyed both petition and "rider" and am therefore unable to present graphic proof, but I can say that the organization as a whole did its utmost for the bill and after its passage urged the President (individually, of course) not to veto it. That they were successful is now common knowledge, and in view of this fact I think it but right that the blame (or praise, depending on the point of view) be placed where it belongs.

Since I do not wish to be either expelled from the order for divulging "secret" information nor yet to be arrested as a criminal (membership in the order brands me an outlaw in this State) I must ask you to accept my alias, asking your pardon for violating your rules and assuring you of my support in the gallant fight you are making for tolerance and freedom of thought and expression.

Brooklyn, June 14 A KLANSMAN

Any Change of Address

should be mailed to our Subscription Department at least two weeks before it is to become effective. This will insure uninterrupted delivery of The Nation to you, and will materially lessen the pressure of work in our office. When notifying us be sure to give both old and new addresses and stipulate the exact date upon which you desire the change made.

SUBSCRIPTION DEPARTMENT

The Nation

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK, N. Y.

A limited number of copies now ready

John Brown, A Biography

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

"Mr. Villard . . . has served humanity by making this record."—William Allen White in the Emporia Gazette.

"It at once becomes the standard, and probably final authority on its theme."—London Times.

"Mr. Villard's book is the labor of a master of men. His book is a great production."—Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

"I can only say after reading from first to last its more than 700 pages that I have never encountered anything this side of Gibbon's 'Rome' which has made me feel more the personal power of a single work."—Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

"Perhaps in thus dramatically fashioning his volume Mr. Villard obeyed an instinct rather than acted upon a preconceived plan; that is often the case with great work, where a writer's feelings are deeply enlisted. Be this as it may, the merit and charm are none the less; he has seized well a splendid opportunity and has written one of the great biographies of our literature."—John T. Morse, Jr., Editor of American Statesmen Series, in the Atlantic Monthly.

With many portraits and other illustrations.

In one volume, 8vo. 740 pages. Price $5.00; by mail prepaid, $5.26.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

4 Park Street Boston, Mass.

PLEXO
"TOILET LANOLINE"
—the year-round skin treatment

This wonderful emollient is used with great success by noted skin specialists for pimples, blotches, facial eruptions, roughness, abrasions and chapped lips and hands. It protects the delicate skin surfaces against trying weather conditions and by supplying nourishment to the facial nerves and skin cells effaces wrinkles and restores the bloom of youthful health. "Toilet Lanoline" is especially recommended for cuts and burns and for relief of pain after exposure. "Toilet Lanoline" is a remarkable skin softener and preserver. A delicately scented preparation that is safe for SMALL CHILDREN.

PREPARED BY

PLEXO PREPARATIONS, Inc.
NEW YORK

Sole Agents and Distributors

General Drug Co., N. Y., 94 N. Moore Street

After Winter

By DAVID MORTON

Now these strange dusks that darken over snow
Will trouble me no longer with that look
As though there were yet darker things to know
Than any man may learn from any book;
And I shall have, instead, about me here,
The brown, immediate earth of lovely ways,
And skies that are more intimate and near,
Than any that have arched these many days.

Those frozen twilights that had somehow seemed Too like a wide and hushed eternity,
Will be no more than something that I dreamed,
Something remembered that will make of me
A more importunate lover of this shore,
More eager and more ardent than before.

Books

A Fireside Puss

Under Dispute. By Agnes Repplier. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

"UNDER DISPUTE," Agnes Repplier's last slim volume, offers us another chance of coming at the secret of a style which for two generations has been so complacently appreciated by the conventional reading public of America.

Curiously enough, as I turned over the pages of this small book, a book written in easy and faultless English and containing easy and faultless thoughts, I found myself being constantly reminded of another writer whose compositions appeal, in the same manner, to the favored classes of society—no less a person, in fact, that Mr. St. Loe Strachey, the respected editor of the London Spectator! This refined American Lady-essayist and this perfect English Gentleman-journalist both find themselves profoundly contented with the world as it is, or perhaps, to be more accurate, as it appears to them to be, from the windows of the Athenaeum Club in London and the Acorn Club in Philadelphia.

They both write with considerable literary grace and charm and they both have a habit of adorning their sentences, when any thorny question is under dispute, with an amusing suggestion of suave irony. On no account does either of them indulge in the kind of earnestness which, according to Goethe, alone makes life eternity and which Matthew Arnold used to consider the final test of any real distinction of style. Indeed, if the flames of Hell were, beyond all expectation, suddenly to burst through the earth's crust, I verily believe that the placid periods of these two would remain unperturbed. And yet if the world were in truth the closed garden that they seem to consider it and all of us fruit upon a protected wall, what a pair of unyielding never-to-be cracked kernels would be found at the hearts of these two sunkist apricocks!

Agnes Repplier once wrote a charming book to her cat entitled "The Fireside Sphinx." Sometimes one is inclined to associate her with the subject of her story seeing that for these twoscore years she has done nothing but soothe her readers to sleep with a soft purring without letting them for a single moment suspect that somewhere buried in her cushion-soft pads are hard horn-white claws. One can hardly wonder that the intellectual attitude of this ultra-refined Lady of letters is particularly exasperating to simple-minded realists. For truth to say, she patronizes the United States, patronizes Europe, patronizes the round world itself, and all that doth inherit.

Remembering how, ten years ago, above the sound of cocks' crowing, above the sound of dogs' barking, above the sound of cattle bells tinkling, the calm upper levels of the atmosphere that cloak the swinging earth were suddenly rent asunder by an appalling cry, echoing up from blood-drenched acres to the very throne of God Himself, the tone of a sentence like this becomes peculiarly trying: "The earth is a bad little planet and we hope that other planets are happier and better behaved."

Agnes Repplier's reactions to life were fixed, one feels, by a kind of pinchbeck mental predestination long, long ago, in the Convent of the Sacred Heart. What she really does, as each new event takes place, is to assume a foreordained position, a position which in almost every case is identical with the beliefs and prejudices of the members of the Acorn Clubs of the world, and the Acorn Clubs of the world, whatever else may be laid to their charge, run no risk of incurring, with an institution like that of the University of Oxford, the ignominy of being called "the homes of lost causes." As inevitably as day follows night does Agnes Repplier find a specious justification for the orthodox attitude toward any given set of circumstances. With all the air of a discerning impartial observer she, at every new turn, with the utmost regularity adopts and defends the least enlightened and least philosophic point of view. Courageous, unbiased thinking is not, to use her own phrase, her long suit.

Consider this as an example of her obeisance to popular prejudice: "It is possible for two boys to build up a friendship on the basis of a clean fight. It is possible for two nations to build up a good understanding on the basis of a clean fight. Germany's fighting was unclean from start to finish."

Consider this as an example of her immersion in prevailing sentiment: "The emotional ebb-tide which followed the signing of the armistice was too natural to be deplored, save that it gave to obstructionists their chance to decry the matchless heroism of the war."

Consider this as an example of her agreement with a national complacence of a particularly fatuous kind: "The curious thing about Mr. Lewis's analysis is that back of the contempt he strives to awaken in our souls is a suspicion that Babbitt's herd mind, the mind of many thousands of Americans, is, on the whole, a safe mind for the country."

Even so old-fashioned a Tory as I cannot but feel a certain impatience with "the orderly processes of civilization" as championed by Agnes Repplier. As a minor example of what I mean it is surely a little too much to be reminded of "the grace of human relations" that should exist between mistress and parlor maid!

Rudyard Kipling writes his Recessional. The poem provokes in England an enormous amount of emotional imperialistic unction. This is a state of mind that wins unequivocal approbation from Agnes Repplier. She declares that after reading the poem the English people "dilated generally with emotions which it is good for a public to feel." The emotions referred to being, as a matter of fact, the kind of emotions that it is extremely bad for any public to feel. And could anything be more redolent of a woman's-club chairman attitude toward a formidable genius than her tactful words "brave old hopeful Whitman"?

It may be that quite apart from the pardonable satisfaction felt by the more decorous sections of society at being assured in gentle tones that what they are thinking is the best that could possibly be thought, Miss Repplier's readers have actually acquired a taste for the engaging humor of their favorite author, a humor which, at its best, really has about it a faint flavor of Jane Austen. It must be confessed, however, that it is too often a tame kind of humor, though doubtless of a kind to divert tame minds. The present volume reveals no drying up of the original fount and as one comes upon each passage one can almost see the delighted expression destined to light up, so shortly, the faces of her many refined readers.

LLEWELYN POWYS

"The Fierce Year of Failure"

Manin and the Venetian Revolution. By G. M. Trevelyan. Longmans, Green and Company. $4.50.

THE year 1848, as Mr. Trevelyan remarks in the preface to this volume, "was an ill year for the future of mankind." If it had had a different outcome, if the forces of liberalism had prevailed in continental Europe, if the new nations had "begun their racial life," as Mr. Trevelyan puts it, "on a basis not of militarism and mutual hatred, but of complete opposition to the militarist habit of mind," it is probable that the cataclysm of ten years ago might not have occurred. It was indeed, as Swinburne calls it, "the fierce year of failure" almost everywhere, but nowhere more fierce nor more utterly a failure than in Italy. The story of it has been told for English readers in the most admirable fashion by Mr. Trevelyan. Seventeen years ago appeared the volume dealing with the Roman Republic of Mazzini and Garibaldi, and now we have this lucid, eloquent, and carefully documented account of the attempt of Venice to renew the glory of her republican days.

The later volume naturally lacks the romantic charm of the earlier. There are no figures in the Venetian struggle—are there anywhere in modern history?—quite equal, for splendor and a certain mystical exaltation, to those of Garibaldi and Mazzini. If all revolutionists were of this caliber revolutions would be more popular than they are, though not necessarily more successful. We would not imply that lost causes are more glorious than gained ones. There was nothing sentimental or unpractical about the two great chiefs of the Roman struggle for freedom. Only, when you are of the stature of Mazzini and Garibaldi—and we must certainly add, Manin—there are ways and means by which you are unwilling even to save the state. And this, we think, is the glory of the whole Italian episode. That there was treachery and assassination and unnecessary violence cannot be denied; but that the whole struggle, so far at least as Rome and Venice are concerned, was conducted with farsighted magnanimity cannot be denied either—least of all by anyone who reads Mr. Trevelyan's books. Venice and Rome are, of course, only skirmishes in the long warfare against Austrian and Papal domination, but, as Mr. Trevelyan points out, they are typical and therefore highly illuminating. It is absurd to speak of experiments like these as failures unqualified. For the moment they failed, but men's hopes did not fail, and all the devotion, the sacrifice, the wisdom learned from defeat only served to fertilize the soil out of which a united Italy was to spring.

Mr. Trevelyan calls Manin "the greatest and noblest of the Italian statesmen" of '48, for certainly neither Garibaldi nor Mazzini was in the strict sense a statesman—what the Italians call uomo di governo. His career, while it was full of dramatic moments, was, after all, the career of a man born to rule from a desk, not to lead armies, or to dream in exile. And the revolution of which he was the central figure was what may be called an administrative revolution. It was, in Burke's phrase, a revolution not made but prevented, in the sense that it was all but bloodless. Manin was born in the same year as Disraeli, of a Jewish father and a Paduan mother, and his parents were never married. All his life he was virtually an invalid, though his spirit carried him through amazing hardships; and there are few incidents in the whole story more striking than that of Manin, utterly exhausted from three nights and days without sleep, falling upon his bed at the very moment of victory, and being roused an hour later by his followers to utter in the square of St. Mark these heart-stirring words:

> We are free, and we have a double right to boast of it because we have become free without shedding a drop of blood, either our own or our brothers', for I call all men brothers. . . . We will form one of those centers which must bring about the gradual fusion of Italy into one. "Viva la Repubblica! Viva la Libertà! Viva San Marco!"

And the method of this all but bloodless revolution, a revolution without political wrangling or spying or bomb-throwing, was that implied in its motto: "Let us conspire in the face of day." But this daylight conspiracy had landed Manin, no less, in the prison of the Bridge of Sighs, from which, at the right moment, he was released by his friends, to proclaim the republic in the square of St. Mark.

But this was only the beginning, not the end. Human nature was bound to do its perfect work, and the later history of the republic is the story of the blundering, the cross purposes, the suspicion, the failure to strike at the right moment that seem to be inevitable in such affairs. The fault was not Manin's. It was the fault of his helpers, the fault of his rivals, the fault of his allies; it was the fault of the hour, which had not yet struck. Until at last, Venice was left alone to face her foes. Charles Albert was defeated and had abdicated. The republic of Garibaldi and Mazzini had fallen. All the Veneto was in the hands of Austria. For four months the city was bombarded by Austrian guns, and finally, on August 27, 1849, after incredible sufferings and a high-mindedness and bravery equally incredible, the city capitulated, and Manin went into exile forever.

Manin was not faultless. He was a man of one idea; he was impatient of cooperation, except on his own terms. Like many another great leader, he was convinced that he could save his country and that no other could. But other hands had to complete his work, and to complete it in a direction that he himself had not at first conceived. Yet from his exile in Paris he hailed from afar the new Italy of Victor Emmanuel and Cavour, with these words addressed to the House of Savoy: "Make Italy, and I am with you." He died while Italy was still in the making, but he lies in the Venice that he more than any other man helped to redeem.

CHARLES H. WAGER

José Rizal

The Hero of the Filipinos. By Charles E. Russell and E. B. Rodriguez. Century Company. $3.

CHARLES E. RUSSELL and E. B. Rodriguez have written the first comprehensive book on José Rizal, the national hero of the Philippines. They frankly state that they lay claim to no newly discovered materials and that they use simply the data already unearthed by other writers, especially by Rizal's other biographers, Wenceslao Retana, a Spaniard ("Vida y Escritos del Dr. José Rizal," Madrid, 1907), and Austin Craig, an American ("Lineage, Life and Labors of José Rizal," Manila, 1913). Neither of these works is available in America, as Mr. Russell has said; he might have added, neither is really satisfactory. Retana is too bulky, is not fit for general reading, and has never been translated into English. It is highly controversial in that it endeavors to prove that Rizal was never a separatist, that he loved Spain as much as a Spaniard could, and that his sole objection was addressed to the friars. Austin Craig has spent many years on Rizal, but he has added very little of value to what Retana tells us, and in many instances his treatment is not as soundly critical as Retana's. Neither of them has put the proper emphasis on the value of Rizal as the real founder of Philippine nationalism. To do that it is not enough to know the life of Rizal alone. One must visualize the history of the Filipinos, a people which "existed" through centuries of political stagnation, oppressed by the government and the friars, kept in ignorance and deprived of constitutional liberty, yet naturally intelligent and unfettered by traditions of royalty and hereditary chieftainship—a potential democracy. One must visualize the efforts of the leaders to uplift their people, especially the rise of that great leader who towered over them all because of his intellect, his recognized ability in many lines of human activity, his lofty character, and the supreme devotion to his country which ended in his own death—José Rizal. The life of Rizal must be, in a certain sense, a dramatization of the life of the people. This Mr. Russell has succeeded in making it to a far greater extent than any of the other biographers.

His interpretation of Rizal's literary and scientific works is excellent. He unfolds to us with feeling and understanding Rizal's complex soul: artist, patriot, scientist, philosopher. Perhaps that has been overdone.

> He was one of the greatest ophthalmologists of his time; he was a great ethnologist, anthropologist, biologist, zoologist, linguist; he was sculptor, painter, illustrator, poet, novelist, publicist, engineer, educator, reformer.

Yet, even if we should take away the overexuberant adjective which accompanies many of the above words, the fact that Rizal's mind could branch out into so many lines of activity makes him intellectually interesting. Certainly no one can gainsay that Rizal "had what is seldom found in the men we call great, a union of brilliant gifts and of lofty character." And in addition there stand his supreme devotion and his life sacrifice for his country.

His biographers, however, could have made Rizal more real if they had given due emphasis to some of his human weaknesses, such as his sensitiveness to criticism and his lack of demonstrated ability to lead and organize men. Also, I feel that, in dealing with Rizal's contemporaries, Messrs. Russell and Rodriguez have not done justice to the real propagandist in Madrid and the recognized leader of the Filipinos in that colony, Marcelo del Pilar.

MAXIMO M. KALAW

A History of Democracy

The Irresistible Movement of Democracy. By John Simpson Penman. The Macmillan Company. $5.

DEMOCRACY as a fixed form or a dogmatic definition has lost its attraction for thinking people. Life is expressed in movement, and democracy as a living social force is fittingly conceived by Mr. Penman as a series of social movements which noticeably diverge from the established order after the middle of the eighteenth century in England, France, and America. The immediate political aim of this movement was the establishment of "a form of government based upon the popular will as expressed in universal suffrage." But this could not exhaust its possibilities, as Mr. Penman makes clear. To those who at various times have resisted that movement it has been obvious that the democratic spirit would ultimately lay rough hands upon property, social privilege, religion, art, and literature. So that democracy and conservatism "have always been at daggers-drawing, and one another clapper-clawing."

The crucial test for democracy's supporters comes with revolution, which is the crisis in a series of social changes when it becomes evident that the social forces have outgrown the fixed forms or institutions of society. Under the impact of these developing forces institutions decompose and make way for new structures, which are subject in turn to the ever-recurrent cycle of social forces. Therefore an exposition of democracy in terms of history and matter of fact is more likely to prove fruitful than an exposition in terms of mere theory.

Mr. Penman makes no new contribution to democratic theory: his book is substantially a political history of the three national revolutions whereby the modern democratic forces were first liberated and later institutionalized in new forms. The American, the French, and the English revolutions—the first two involving bloodshed—are followed out to their constitutional and civil results in the collective life and thought of these three nations which have fertilized the rest of the modern world. Under Mr. Penman's hand history lives and has meaning. He brings democracy down to date and concludes with a warning: "Democracy stands at the crisis of its history. The times themselves are critical, and the future of society hangs in the balance between a movement toward socialism and a development of the principles of democracy." This volume will help the thoughtful citizen to make his choice.

HUBERT HARRISON

The American Scene

The Green Bay Tree. By Louis Bromfield. Frederick H. Stokes and Company. $2.

THE sense of life is in this book. It arouses the same sort of blissful expectation with which, when we were young, we used to cross the frontier into Thackeray's or Dickens's or George Eliot's country. This writer, too, sees a world crowded with vivid faces.

He has set his drama of the unlike and mutually destructive Shane sisters, the religieuse Irene, and the beautiful, audacious, kind Lily, against the smoky and pregnant background of the industrial struggle in a Middle Western town which has changed in the lifetime of Julie Shane from a pioneering outpost to an industrial city. He is only a little less interested, it appears, in social history than in the diverse fates of individual souls. That is to say that his equipment as a novelist is unusually happy. Definitely he has essayed the American scene, so poor as yet in chroniclers.

It would be extraordinary if his success were complete, since a given scene becomes material for art only by slow degrees, it would seem, and after many hands have tried it. And Mr. Bromfield has attempted the large canvas indicated before completely divesting himself of the traces of the amateur. "All the while," for instance, does yeoman service when it is needed to complete a rhythm. "The girl said nothing but kept her eyes cast down, fingering all the while the carving on the arm of her rosewood chair"; "By now Irene was sobbing hysterically, clinging all the while to the hand of her mother." But instead of carping one is disposed to rejoice that here is a potential artist in prose who knows that his sentences have rhythm and is concerned to make their rhythm fit his object.

Similarly the orchestration furnished to the main theme by the industrial struggle is adapted with perhaps too neat a sense of its aesthetic possibilities, recalling, at the worst, the musical accompaniment to tragedy in the movies. But again it is possible to count on the fingers of one hand all the contemporary novelists who sense at all a gathering social conflict.

And Mr. Bromfield is far from being an amateur or a sentimentalist in his understanding of people. His sympathies are wide-ranging, embracing equally Lily and the labor leader Krylenko, Hattie Tolliver of the Western border and her daughter Ellen, the virtuoso. Even with Irene he does not yield to the temptation of inventing a scarecrow in order to take pot-shots at his pet aversions.

I do not believe it typical of the alignment in the present industrial struggle to find the "old families" on the side of labor. Julie, Irene, and Lily Shane, unlike as they are in other respects, all instinctively sympathize with labor in its struggle against the new industrial magnates. Rather, in the rare instances in which a member of the local aristocracy aids or abets or even attempts a temperate interpretation of the antics of the "workingmen," he is felt to have betrayed his caste, than which there is of course no greater apostasy.

To this it must be added that the theme of Mr. Bromfield's personal drama, while possibly significant in itself, is not significantly handled. Warped—it would be more exact to say perverted, were it not that the usual significance of the word is so contrary—by her convent inculcations as to the corruption of sex, Irene is made hysterical by the discovery of her sister's unconventional morals. Lily has a flair for life, and no fear of what others may think about her. When she is passing middle age she concludes reluctantly that no individual can flout the moralities by which others live without running the danger of working the damage upon some sensitive and ignorant spirit which she unwillingly worked on Irene. But before she reaches this possibly stultifying conclusion she and those to whom she has given her love have flourished like the green bay tree.

I have said that this theme is without great significance. Possibly this is because coincidently with its development, characters and scenes grow somewhat shadowy and attenuated. Never again does Mr. Bromfield quite attain the vivid charm of his opening chapters, and he is happier in America than in Paris. Or possibly it is because Irene's tragedy, while doubtless of actual occurrence all too many times, arose from so artificial and perverted a view of life that its significance is flimsy. Perhaps the potentialities of this particular theme are not great. So one concludes, searching for the reason why this particularly promising book falls short, only to remember that any theme may be great and that the apparently haphazard tale of any twenty-four hours of any man's life may turn out a "Ulysses," given ten years' devoted work and a touch of mad genius. And, when all is said, this is emphatically a book to enjoy, and to keep close at hand, hoping meantime for a successor.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Daumier

Daumier. By Raymond Escholier. Paris: Floury. 75 francs.

DURING the last thirty years interest in Daumier has gradually grown. It was in 1888 that Arsène Alexandre established the foundations of the artist's fame. And since the publication of his comprehensive monograph other Daumier studies have appeared, especially in France, England, Germany, and America. While the French appreciations left little to be desired in textual exposition, they did not, like those issued abroad, contain abundant plates. Yet for such a subject illustrations are obviously indispensable. Hence the need for Raymond Escholier's admirable volume with its scores of magnificent reproductions, many of them in colors. Unfortunately the author did not indicate whether each work reproduced was a lithograph, a painting, a water-color, or a drawing.

Honoré Daumier (1808-1879) was the son of a glazier-poet. From childhood passionately fond of art and liberty, he naturally joined the dual revolt against oppression and trite classicism. At twenty-three the young artist revealed his talent in La Caricature, a periodical including among its promoters Charles Philipon, Balzac, Raffet, Courbet, Grandville, Decamps, Traviès, and Monnier. This group heaped upon the July Monarchy scorn and ridicule. Particularly effective were the shafts of Daumier, who pitilessly lashed Louis Philippe, his ministers, the judiciary, members of Parliament, of the clergy and the self-satisfied bourgeoisie. Not since Rabelais has a satirist dealt the French judiciary blows so grievous. Excellent, too, are Daumier's symbolic personages, Macaire and Ratapoil. As is well known, "Gargantua," his blunt thrust at Louis Philippe, cost him six months' imprisonment.

Notwithstanding the strict political censorship during the Second Empire, Daumier produced a work varying greatly in theme and quality. In the field of social humor he still retained supremacy. But if we except his studies in Cervantes and Molière, his scenes from antiquity and classic literature are more trivial than M. Escholier seems to have realized. For while the humorist sought only to discredit spurious classicism, his bourgeois in the guise of antique divinities and heroes were frequently mediocre. These themes, even in caricature, required a certain distinction. Owing to the limited demand for caricature after the coup d'etat, Daumier turned to oil painting, the dream of his life. But as this aspect of his work long remained unappreciated at home, his best pictures were mostly purchased at trifling prices by foreign amateurs. It is true that the French, who gradually came to regret their mistake, have latterly done much to make honorable amends. Arsène Alexandre early declared that, save for his bread-winning hackwork in lithography, Daumier would have been a great painter. And the revision of opinion thus started has gone so far that recent critics proclaim Daumier a master of painting despite his four thousand lithographs. Such contemporaries as Delacroix, Corot, and Rousseau esteemed his talent for the brush.

M. Escholier regards Daumier as distinctly a romanticist. To be sure, the famous satirist did ridicule pseudo literary classicism no less than feeble imitations of David's paintings. And being an ardent champion of liberty, he instinctively frowned upon hampering restrictions in aesthetics. But such romantic tendencies, noticeable chiefly in his early career and in his treatment of antiquity, affected very little the expression of his art. His bourgeois temperament—for after all he was essentially a bourgeois—either rejected or dismissed as impossible the fantastic conceptions of romanticism. Rather was Daumier a realist, one of the precursors of naturalism. As caricaturist he exhibits in more artistic form the better qualities of his predecessors. While he was endowed with no supremely original vision, his work covers almost the entire scope of the human comedy. And partly to his influence should be attributed the present florescence of pictorial humor in France.

WILLIAM H. SCHEIFLEY

Acorns

Copy 1924. Columbia University Press. $1.75.

LITERARY beginnings still in the seedling stage are one of the natural, elementary processes of growth which are supposed to be profoundly interesting and significant to the layman.

No apology is due the general public, therefore, by the Columbia University Press and Frank Allen Patterson, Associate Professor of English in Columbia University, for editing and publishing "Copy," a volume selected from the published work of students who have taken special extension courses in writing at Columbia. It is not immediately apparent, however, whether readers generally will find cohesion enough in this mixed book of stories, plays, poetry, and essays, to catch the drift either of Columbia's methods of teaching writing or of the individual authors themselves. But perhaps my apprehensions regarding the casual miscellaneousness of the contents are not justified. The preface promises entertainment and instruction; if it is the reader who is to be entertained, and the authors instructed, the variety of "Copy" is an added advantage.

"Copy" solicits stricter attention than the ubiquitous undergraduate volumes. It is the work of twenty-three mature students, several of whom have already published books of their own. For the most part, these writers have energy and honesty as their conspicuous merits. Most of them do not cater to the ancient editorial formulas for popular success, preferring to communicate their own facts of imagination and understanding with freshness and what natural grace and verisimilitude they can. The preface announces a noble purpose toward the student writers, "to convince them that artistic values are the only objects worthy of their consideration." They have, accordingly, wrought bravely in the spirit of Thoreau's program, "to drive life into a corner, and reduce it to its lowest terms."

The book's high-water mark is "Lion's Courage," a short story by a young Scotsman, G. B. Mackenzie. It is a notably neat and acute episode, a veritable map of timid and mediocre humanity, drawn with pity as well as shrewdness and irony. And so, if Mr. Mackenzie, or Miss Yezierska, or Mr. Haberstad, or any other of the twenty-three continues to observe and think and feel and write, avoiding conscientiously what is merely curious, accidental, circumstantial in life and conduct and character, "Copy" may achieve an unsuspected consequence in illustrating the homely apothegm that great oaks from little acorns grow.

GERALD HEWES CARSON

Musicians Militant

By HENRIETTA STRAUS

London, June 20

THE British women have again taken up the cudgels for suffrage, only this time in musical fields. For one thing, they refuse to submit any longer to being barred, both as players and conductors, from all symphonic activities. And so, applying the lesson learned from political victories, they have begun to fight prejudice with action, as being more potent than logic. The situation is indeed even more absurd, if possible, there than here. Not only have women in England as in America long had recognition as instrumental virtuosi, but there they have, in addition, a very definite record as symphonic players, besides the indorsement, as such, of England's most distinguished conductor, Sir Henry Woods. Moreover, it was Sir Henry who gave them their first big opportunity, for during the war he admitted them to the ranks of his Queen's Hall Orchestra, in which he has kept them ever since. He claims that they have improved the tonal quality of the strings, that they are conscientious and reliable, and that the men play the better for the competition.

In spite of such eminent testimony, however, the Queen's Hall Orchestra remains solitary, among similar London symphonic organizations, in its friendliness toward women orchestral players. Apparently the very ability of the latter has been their undoing, for it was because Sir Henry refused to dismiss them, after the war, from his orchestra that the men closed their musical unions to all women musicians. And it was in consequence of this last action that the women, thoroughly exasperated, formed not only a musical union of their own, but a complete symphony orchestra as well, with a woman, Miss Gwynne Kimpton, as its conductor.

This British Women's Symphony Orchestra, as it calls itself, is a cooperative organization, numbering about sixty members in all. It is managed by a committee of direction of the members, and its aims are "to give regular concerts in London, to work up a repertoire of all the best music, classical and modern, to take engagements for opera, oratorios, festivals, schools, open-air plays, etc., and to develop a scheme of cooperative concerts whereby solo artists may be enabled to give concerts on cooperative terms, sharing risk and profits, instead of, as at present, being obliged to engage both hall and orchestra and to accept the entire risk."

Miss Kimpton, the conductor, is an ensemble player of great experience, and is reputed to be able to play any instrument in the orchestra. She is an authority on quartet playing and its traditions, and is still the moving spirit of the Strings Club, which she founded in 1902, and which encourages, as its name implies, the study of chamber music. The greater part of her career, however, seems to have been devoted to orchestral playing, training, and conducting. During the war she founded the London Amateurs' Orchestra which still exists; in Kent she conducts the Bromley and Chislehurst Orchestral Society; she has started any number of students' orchestras in girls' high schools; and she has done pioneer work in London in giving "orchestral concerts for young people."

The great problem, of course, in presenting a complete women's symphony orchestra was to find sufficient brasses and winds. These choirs have hitherto been in undisputed possession of the male, doubtless by divine right of stronger diaphragms. And, according to Miss Kimpton herself, there are only four women horn players in England. Fortunately, the demand had long been foreseen by such courageous musicians as Mrs. Julian Marshall, Miss Rosabel Watson, and others who, in the face of bitter opposition, have been laboring for years to train girls as players of brass and wood-wind instruments. And it is undoubtedly due to these pioneer spirits that the British Women's Symphony Orchestra, sponsored by the British Women's Patriotic League, and under the immediate patronage of the Queen, was able to make its bow to the public on April 3 at Queen's Hall. To the surprise, and, perhaps, secret disappointment of the many males gathered in the audience, it was feminine to the last trombone. Only a tuba, I believe, was missing. And the consensus of the press was that "without any concessions to gallantry" the new organization "achieved a remarkable measure of success." From all accounts the strings were especially fine, in tone, phrasing, precision, and attack; the wood winds at least attracted no criticism; and the brasses, while "yet to find themselves," did very much better than was expected of them. All the soloists were women, including Lady Maud Warrender, who is chairman of the orchestra's committee and the most distinguished amateur singer in England. Also, two women were represented on the program—Dorothy Howell, who played some piano solos of her own, and Dame Ethel Smyth, who conducted an excerpt from her own opera, "The Wreckers."

Most appropriately, also, it must be admitted, Dame Ethel was chosen to make the speech for this occasion, for no one has championed the rights of women musicians more openly or more militantly than this eminent English composer in her recent article called A Burning of Boats. Indeed, perhaps no musician ever defied the critics so boldly as she did in this same article, which came out in the February issue of the London Mercury. In it she charges that the inferior position which women hold in all the creative arts except literature is the result of masculine conspiracy rather than of masculine superiority. She complains bitterly, if humorously, of the belittling effect of always being labeled a "lady composer." And she passionately cites as a discriminatory case her own "Mass," which, although it won immediate recognition, has been performed only twice in thirty-one years—the first time, thirty-one years ago, and the second, this past March, 1924. One result of this article was the following letter from Bernard Shaw, which I am printing with her permission:

> Dear Dame Ethel [it runs], Thank you for bullying me into going to hear that "Mass." The originality and beauty of the voice parts are as striking today as they were 30 years ago, and the rest will stand up in the biggest company. Magnificent!
>
> You are totally and diametrically wrong in imagining that you have suffered from a prejudice against feminine music. On the contrary, you have been almost extinguished by the dread of masculine music. It was your music that cured me forever of the old delusion that women could not do men's work in art and other things; (it was years ago when I knew nothing about you, and heard an overture—"The Wreckers," or something—in which you kicked a big orchestra all round the platform). But for you I might not have been able to tackle "Saint Joan," who has floored every previous playwright. Your music is more masculine than Handel.
>
> When have the critics and the public ever objected to feminine music? . . . Can you name a more ladylike composer than the beloved and much imitated Mendelssohn? Does the very jolly sugarstick called "A German Requiem" take you in because Brahms dabbed a little black on it and wrapped it up in crape?
>
> You scorned sugar and sentimentality; you were exuberantly ferocious. . . . And now you say we shrank from you because you were "only a woman"!
>
> Good God!
>
> Yours, dear big brother,
>
> G. Bernard Shaw

But in spite of this eloquent combination of defense, encouragement, and wit, the detested "label" still sticks! As for women orchestral players in our own country we find an exception made in favor of "lady" harpists—though the reason why has never been explained. It is not, however, a concession from which to derive much hope, as our British sisters have already proved that "a little leaven" does not always "leaven the whole."

International Relations Section

Leon Trotzky—Down but Not Out

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, June 1, 1924

THE very conference of the Russian Communist Party (May 24-31) which passed a unanimous vote of confidence in its Central Committee and thus apparently proved the complete collapse of the Trotzky opposition to that committee was in effect a triumph for Trotzky.

The conference bruskly brushed Karl Radek aside with a resolution of censure for his "Right tendencies" during the threatened German revolution of last summer—he is probably eliminated from public life as a result—but Trotzky, who had been accused of worse tendencies, of "petty-bourgeois tendencies," was the recipient of any number of compliments and acts of obeisance on the part of the conference. The Central Committee or Ceca (not the Cheka) could have applied the ax to Trotzky as easily as it did to Radek, for during the period between the feverish Ceca vs. Opposition discussion in the winter and the opening of the present thirteenth annual conference the Ceca majority had silenced the Opposition minority and driven it under cover with measures as effective as those of the most efficient steam-roller that functions in American political life. Trotzky himself was not even a delegate. Yet he must have felt that the conference threw the limelight on his great influence and power.

In January Moscow was a hotbed of opposition. Many of the central commissariats were honeycombed with oppositionists. The university students and especially the students of the Sverdlov University (Sverdlovtsi) were almost unanimously with Trotzky. The army, so a resolution of the party meeting of January 18 reveals, was on the side of its commander-in-chief. Large groups of workingmen in Moscow and in the provinces were sympathetic to the Opposition's program. The Opposition had able leaders. Aside from Trotzky, who often, perhaps too often, stayed in the background without defining his policies any too clearly (at the conference he explained that this was due to his poor health), there were Ossinsky, for years a chronic oppositionist; Preobrazhensky, an able economist who had been associated with Bucharin as editor of the Pravda and as author of the "ABC of Communism"; Pyatikov, the chairman of the All-Russian Concessions Committee; Sapronov, a young workingman who had forged his way to the front ranks of the party; Antonov-Avsienko, a fiery, untamable revolutionary, and others.

Luck was with the Ceca machine directed by the Zinoviev-Stalin-Kamenev triumvirate when Trotzky was forced to retire to the Caucasus on account of illness. Ossinsky was kept in Stockholm as the Soviet trade representative, Preobrazhensky was shipped away to the Anglo-Russian conference in London, Sapronov was ordered to Vladivostok, and Antonov-Avsienko to China. Thus relieved of embarrassments, the Ceca proceeded to crush the rank and file of the Opposition. Faithful members of the Ceca were introduced into the army in Trotzky's absence and publicly criticized Trotzky's administration in the War Office. (Now Trotzky must work with a first assistant, whom he did not appoint and who has attacked him in the press.) At the same time Trotzky's protagonists were either transferred to distant posts as in the case of General Muralov of the Moscow garrison, or demoted to figurehead positions as in the case of General-in-Chief S. Kamenev, or summarily dismissed as in the case of Petrovsky, the Dr. Goldfarb of East Side fame.

The commissariats and the universities, particularly the Sverdlov University, were submitted to a rigorous cleansing. The spokesmen of the Ceca majority insisted at the conference that this was one of the regular cleansings of careerists and other undesirable elements which may enter the party from time to time. Nevertheless neither Stalin nor Zinoviev directly denied Preobrazhensky's charge that the cleansing was aimed primarily at the forces of the Opposition. The cleansing was carried out in Moscow and Leningrad, where the strength of the Opposition was likely to be greatest, and in Penza.

So thorough were these and other features of the anti-Opposition campaign that not even Trotzky or Preobrazhensky could get himself elected as a delegate to the conference. Trotzky participated only because he is a member of the Central Committee and Preobrazhensky, who came specially from London, was admitted as an economic expert.

Why, then, if the Opposition had ostensibly been robbed of every vestige of power within the party, was the Opposition issue raised at the conference—raised by the successful Ceca majority? Weeks before the conference it was clear to the Opposition that they were a beaten lot and that to precipitate a new discussion at this juncture would be sheer folly. Trotzky and Preobrazhensky probably had every intention of remaining passive observers of the proceedings. But Zinoviev could not let the matter rest. He invited the leaders of the Opposition to come up on the platform and declare that they had been wrong and the party right. (Krupskaia, Lenin's widow, was the only one who had the courage to criticize Zinoviev for provoking the debate. Life, she said, would prove who had been right.)

Zinoviev was undoubtedly moved by a consciousness of Trotzky's great strength. The lion had been wounded and was therefore more dangerous. Trotzky, he knew, was down but not out.

Trotzky stands head and shoulders in culture, mental stamina, and personality above Stalin and Kamenev, and miles above Zinoviev, whose four-hour opening report to the conference on Russia's international, internal, and intra-party situation was a fine example of voluble mediocrity. Trotzky is the most popular of the Bolshevik leaders. Even those with whom he has tilted lances realize that the Soviet regime could ill afford to lose his support. At the conference each member of the triumvirate in turn stated how anxious they were to work together with Trotzky, whom they had styled "petty bourgeois." Zinoviev went even further. "No one," he declared, "will remember 'The New Course' (a pamphlet in which Trotzky fiercely attacked the Ceca majority) if Trotzky does not insist on his evil ways. . . . We are prepared to make every manner of concession" to the leader of the defeated Opposition. A united party was bending the knee to one of its members.

Yaroslavsky gave Trotzky an advance promise that he would be reelected to the Central Committee. Subsequently Boris Souvarin of the Paris Humanité was granted the privilege of the floor. (He spoke French and Lunacharski translated.) He made one significant statement. "To the world proletariat (and he might have added to all sympathizers of Soviet Russia) Trotzky's name is synonymous with the revolution." The Ceca, no doubt, realized this truth. If, therefore, they could maneuver Trotzky into an admission of error they would weaken his position and strengthen their own.

Zinoviev was challenging him to say: "I was wrong; the party was right." But Trotzky could hardly confess himself mistaken in a struggle on which he had staked his career. His reply was the essence of tact. He knew he was facing a hostile audience. He had to steer clear of the rocks. It will be recalled that one of the most important planks in Trotzky's platform in the great discussion of last winter had been "party democracy." He had charged that the party machine was an unyielding bureaucracy. "The party," he had written in his "New Course," "lives on two floors. In the upper decisions are made. Those who live on the lower merely hear about these decisions." When he appeared before the conference, however, he chose to cite the criticisms of others rather than to make his own. He read from a speech of Bucharin, a member of the orthodox Ceca majority. Bucharin had said:

> I myself have appeared at any number of Moscow meetings and I know how the so-called deliberations in our party are conducted. Elections of the praesidium of the meeting: Some comrade from the district committee appears, reads a slate, and asks, "Who is opposed?" Nobody is opposed and the affair is closed. The praesidium has been elected unanimously.

Elsewhere Bucharin tells how secretaries of Communist groups are generally foisted on the members. Without consulting the group, the district committee presents a single candidate to the group and the usual election takes place. The meeting is asked, "Who is opposed?" and, says Bucharin, "since the members are more or less afraid to declare themselves opposed, it is understood that the suitable person has been elected secretary of the group." Thus Trotzky cleverly pleaded his case against bureaucracy and for democracy—for party democracy, it should be remembered, and not for what he calls the "margarine (Ersatz) democracy" of bourgeois countries.

During the now famous party controversy Trotzky and the Opposition had maintained that the new generation must be permitted gradually to replace the old Bolshevik guard, that this was the best guaranty against the complete bureaucratization of the party apparatus. He supported the same contention in his only address before the conference just concluded. He had also insisted that the Government's economic policy was planless and accidental. State capitalism, intricate as it must be, could not accomplish its purpose of eliminating overlapping competition and waste in industry unless it follows closely a detailed program of coordination. He has demanded more powers therefore for the Government Planning Commission (Gosplan). He repeated the same demand at the conference. In other words, Trotzky insisted that he and the Opposition had been right.

But Zinoviev had also challenged him to say whether in the discussion the party had been right or wrong. Of course, replied Trotzky with considerable sophistication, the party is always right. He recalled Commodore Decatur's and now the Chicago Tribune's motto "Our country, right or wrong," and declared that with much more justice he could say, "My party, right or wrong." (Trotzky's oppositional program may not have been petty bourgeois, but this sentiment certainly is. Stalin, and also Zinoviev, leaning as he invariably does on some statement of Lenin's, countered quite correctly that the party had been wrong in the past and could be wrong in the future.)

This, then, was the substance of the conference debate. The Ceca majority wanted Trotzky to haul down his flag and capitulate. Trotzky, master of tactics that he is, consolidated for himself a strategic position from which, if the opportunity presents itself, he may attack the Zinoviev-Stalin-Kamenev machine and the Ceca majority once more. Trotzky remains a member of the Central Committee, but unless all indications belie the facts he will not participate in the leadership of the party.

Is the Opposition dead? To judge from the circumstance that the 748 delegates were to a man supporters of the Ceca majority, the answer is in the affirmative. But the unanimity at the conference was admittedly machine-made. Yaroslavsky, secretary of the party's Central Control Commission, told the conference that "we must not hide the fact that we have within our ranks a choked and silenced Opposition. It exists in the university centers and waits for Trotzky's word." Trotzky's speech, he continued, had inspired the Opposition with the hope that he would some day gain control of the party. Yaroslavsky pointed out that if in the future there arose an economic situation as critical as the one of last July and August, which precipitated the whole party fight, no one could guarantee that the Opposition would not again make trouble. And Zinoviev, echoing this thought, demanded "assurances that difficulties which can certainly occur in the future will not be exploited to raise a new disturbance against the party."

At this point the few Oppositionists at the conference protested. There is no doubt that the Communists, be they with the Ceca or with the Opposition, are too well disciplined and too much interested in the welfare of their party to do it any harm. If there is a struggle it will take place within the party ranks and not outside of them. Those enemies of the revolution, from the Grand Duke Nicholas to the Mensheviks and Social Revolutionaries who saw in the appearance of the Opposition a sure sign of the crumbling of the red regime, are obviously misled by false hopes.

There is reason to believe that Yaroslavsky has diagnosed the situation correctly. Trotzky will bide his time until the circumstances warrant a new assault on the now impregnable position of the Ceca machine. It is easy to foresee another possibility. At the annual conference of the party a year ago Krassin advocated the recognition of foreign debts and greater concessions to foreign capitalists. He was called a Menshevik and excluded from the Central Committee. Now the Soviet Government is recognizing its debts; Krassin is again persona grata, and the present conference elected him to the Central Committee. Before a year will have passed the Ceca majority may also see the wisdom of Trotzky's program, and then, provided the personal animosities which the discussion has engendered will not have struck too deep a root, there may be peace in the ranks of the Russian Communist Party.

In the meanwhile Trotzky's position in the War Commissariat, where he has been surrounded by enemies, is embarrassing and almost untenable.

CAMP UTOPIA
LAKE ELLIS, WINGDALE, N. Y.
A Vacation Ground for Grown-Ups in the Berkshire Hills
120 minutes from Grand Central
WM. J. PERLMAN, Managing Director — DR. WILL DURANT, Associate Director
Telephone 10 - F4
VISITING LECTURERS
July 12-13: Dr. Alex. Cairns; July 19-20: Prof. H. W. L. Dana; July 26-27: Mr. J. A. H. Hopkins; Aug. 2-3: Scott Nearing; Aug. 9-10: Dr. A. Stone; Aug. 16-17: John Macy; Aug. 23-24: Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Gilman.
Daily lectures by Will Durant: "A Survey of Civilization."

BASH BISH LODGE, Copake Falls, N.Y.
A Camp for Adults
IN THE BERKSHIRES
Less than 3 hours' ride from New York
TENNIS, BATHING, DANCING, ETC.
Rates $30 per Week—$6 per day
Address RUBENSTEIN & LEIKIN
Bash Bish Lodge, Copake Falls, N. Y.
Tel. 31, Ring 4 — City tel. Intervale 2667

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
in the Adirondacks
5 MILES ABOVE LAKE GEORGE
An ideal spot for rest and fun
Rates $25 per week. Accommodations limited to 25
Fare for round trip to Lake George, $12.28.
For booklet, address Lena Barish,
Watkins 1281 — 21 Seventh Ave., N. Y. C.

The Lloyd—on Great South Bay
Bellport, L. I.
Wonderful Location Excellent Table All Sports
Cool, Comfortable, Charming

THE RUSSIAN INN
33 West 37th St., N. Y., near 5th Ave.
LUNCHEON DINNER SUPPER
Unique After Theatre Entertainment
Music and Singers

STUDY AT HOME
Directed by
The University of Chicago
Courses in English, History, Chemistry, Business, Mathematics, Education, Psychology, and 35 other subjects command credit toward a Bachelor degree. Begin any time. Address 57 Ellis Hall, University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

THAT BOOK YOU WANT!
We hold an enormous stock. Second-hand and New, all subjects. On approval. Also Rare Books. Catalogues free, mention interests. Commissions executed. FOYLES, 121 Charing Cross Road, London, England.

STEINWAY
THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

The Spirit of Pioneering

Impatience with present facilities, a restless searching for perfect things—these have driven men to discovery and invention. They possessed the early voyagers who turned their backs on the security of home to test opportunity in an unknown land. They explain the march westward that resulted in this settled, united country. And they have inspired the activities of the Bell System since the invention of the telephone.

The history of the Bell System records impatience with anything less than the best known way of doing a job. It records a steady and continuous search to find an even better way. In every department of telephone activity improvement has been the goal—new methods of construction and operation, refinements in equipment, discoveries in science that might aid in advancing the telephone art. Always the road has been kept open for an unhampered and economic development of the telephone.

Increased capacity for service has been the result. Instead of rudimentary telephones connecting two rooms in 1876, to-day finds 15,000,000 telephones serving a whole people. Instead of speech through a partition, there is speech across a continent. Instead of a few subscribers who regarded the telephone as an uncertain toy, a nation recognizes it as a vital force in the business of living.

Thus has the Bell System set its own high standards of service. By to-day's striving it is still seeking to make possible the greater service of to-morrow.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

CAMP TAMIMENT
Forest Park, Pa.
Lecturers during season
Alexander Goldenweiser, Herman Epstein, Harry Dana, Heywood Broun, Willy Pogany, Clement Wood, Scott Nearing, Margaret Daniels
Also All Sports and Social Activities
Write for Booklet to 7 EAST 15th STREET, NEW YORK CITY

MARX'S COMMUNIST MANIFESTO CIVIL WAR IN FRANCE has now for the first time been published in cloth binding: in the same volume is the by Marx and Engels. Both are invaluable historical documents. Price 60c. postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

WHEN THE COURT TAKES A RECESS
A collection of articles on subjects of current interest which both entertains and offers valuable information to the man who would know his City and its problems.
By JUDGE WILLIAM McADOO $2.00 E. P. Dutton & Co.

NEW ADDRESS: W. BEYER'S BOOKSHOP
From June 1st: 213 West 43rd Street
Just West of Times Square—Broadway
Large stock of German and American books
New and Second Hand

Private Trade in Soviet Russia

THE talk of French recognition of the Soviet Government elicited a new statement from Washington to the effect that such recognition by the United States could not be considered at present, especially since the Soviet Government had given evidence of reverting to the earlier methods of ruthless enforcement of Communist principles. In this connection the present attitude of the Soviet Government toward private merchants is cited as the most illuminating instance. Stories of persecutions and increased activities by the Cheka have been revived in the press; private traders are supposed to be the chief victims of the new terror. It is therefore of particular interest to reproduce here the resolution of the recent convention of the Russian Communist Party, in which the policies of the Soviet Government in regard to internal trade are laid down:

The further development of the state industries, as well as the establishment of an actual economic link between the city and country, demands that the party pay particular attention to the question of the exchange of goods within the country. . . .

Owing to the scattered character of the small peasant households it is for the time being inevitable that they should, to a considerable degree, be served by private trading machinery. However, depending on the system of nationalized industry and transport, on the state organization of credits, the monopoly of foreign trade, and the state organization of the wholesale trade, as well as on the growing system of cooperatives, the party must strive, in an increasing degree, to subordinate the whole process of marketing and distribution to the regulating influence of the state.

The degree in which the state accomplishes its regulating purpose in the market will be measured by its influence in the matter of regulating market prices.

In view of the fact that only the increasing development of trade will create a firm basis for the further growth of industries and the completion of the monetary reform, the convention acknowledges that the fundamental problem of the government in regard to trade at present must be the development of adequate distribution to the broad masses of consumers, particularly the peasants, by strengthening the position of the state's trading machinery and of the cooperatives.

In this task of gaining control of the market no measures of administrative repression should be resorted to; the method must consist in a strengthening of the economic position of state trade and of the cooperatives by concentrating in their hands the most of those products which are necessary for the mass of the population and in coordinating and regulating the activities of these organs.

The policy of lowering prices and securing the great peasant market for the state industries has so far justified itself. As a basis of this policy the needs of the market must be carefully studied and accounted for with the maximum degree of precision, and the satisfaction of these needs must be planned and prepared.

Only by following this policy will it become possible gradually to replace private trade machinery by state trade and cooperation.

In this connection it is, however, imperative to have in view that no measures should be adopted in relation to private trade which may lead toward the decrease or confusion of the general exchange of goods, since such measures would result not in positive but rather in negative consequences for the economic development of the USSR.

The convention indorses the reorganization of the Internal Trade Committee of the Council of Labor and Defense into a People's Commissariat for Internal Trade, and it considers that the main task of the commissariat is so to organize internal trade and so to regulate the activities of state trade and cooperation as to enable the latter to gain control of the market—in the first place to enable state capital to retain and further to increase the wholesale exchange of goods—and to achieve the actual control of the state over the activities of private capital.

For these purposes the People's Commissariat of Internal Trade must be empowered to regulate the whole internal trade, fix and enforce prices, and play a leading part in determining the trade policies of all organizations in which state capital is invested.

A special task of the commissariat is vigilantly to supervise the relations between state economic organizations and private capital in the field of internal trade, to organize such relations on bases profitable to the state and to oppose all attempts by private capital to injure the interests of the state industries and trade or those of the cooperatives, whether openly or by indirection (privileged credit conditions, privileged forms of settling accounts, etc.).

The policies of the credit institutions must be so directed as to strengthen systematically the position of the state and cooperative organizations in their struggle with private capital in the market. Special privileged credit conditions and support must be given the state trade organizations and cooperatives in the outlying districts, where they are waging a struggle against the usurious relations established by private trade capital.

An immediate task is to prepare to carry out the grain-storing campaign as well as the storing of other agricultural products and raw materials for the needs of industry. All leading economic institutions of the union and the State Planning Commission must immediately take up the problems involved in the storing of grain by the state and in preparing those goods which must be dumped on the peasant market in the autumn when the crops are gathered. . . . In so far as the forces of the state and cooperatives prove insufficient, recourse must be had to private trade machinery. But the Commissariat of Internal Trade must see to it that the role of the private capital is actually only that of an auxiliary to the machinery of the state industries and the state grain-storing organizations. . . .

Contributors to This Issue

DOUGLAS FREEMAN is a Virginian by birth and parentage. He was educated at Richmond College and Johns Hopkins and has been active in State and national historical societies. He has been engaged in newspaper work in Virginia almost continuously since 1909 and is at present editor of the Richmond News Leader.

EDWARD RICHARDS is a private consulting forester who has been particularly interested in the national forests and in the problem of conservation.

DAVID MORTON is the author of "Harvest," a recent book of verse.

LLEWELYN POWYS has just published a new volume of African sketches, "Black Laughter."

MAXIMO M. KALAW is at the University of Michigan as exchange professor from the University of the Philippines.

LOUIS FISCHER, The Nation's Russian correspondent, is at present living in Moscow. He has prepared an article, to appear in an early issue, on Russia and the Struggle for Oil.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 23, 1924 No. 3081

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 85
EDITORIALS:
Davis and Bryan 88
Are Negroes "Workers"? 89
Freedom Through Advertising 89
FREEDOM OF THE AIR:
Uncensored and Uncontrolled. By David Sarnoff 90
Radio Control. By Grover A. Whalen 90
Radio—The Fulcrum. By Hudson Maxim 91
THE SEX UPROAR. By H. L. Mencken 91
REVOLUTION—NEW STYLE. By George Soule 93
DAVIS THE DOUBLE-EDGED. By William Hard 94
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 95
CORRESPONDENCE 96
BOOKS:
"He Was an Englishman." By H. K. Dick 98
Teachers in Israel. By Johan J. Smertenko 98
An Unquenchable Spirit. By Stuart Chase 99
A Modernist Primer. By Thomas Craven 99
Confusion Worse Confounded. By Joseph T. Shipley 100
The African at Home. By Melville J. Herskovits 100
DRAMA:
Four Plays from Old Japan. By Ouida Meyer 101
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Russia's Bill of Damages 102
China and Russia Agree 102
A New Famine Year in Russia? 103

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY IRITA VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

RADIO NEVER WEATHERED such endurance tests as during the Democratic Convention, but the broadcasting of those dreary sessions probably established it firmly as a household necessity—and pest. It will have subtler tests in the course of the three-party campaign. Every politician will expect the nearest radio station to give him a full opportunity to stand in front of a receiving instrument and roar his speeches to audiences which would never cross the street to listen to him. It will be difficult for any broadcasting company, however fair-minded it tries to be, to balance the scales justly. Will La Follette's speakers have their fair share of radio-publicity? We doubt it; it will be almost impossible for officials of the big radio corporations to give a new and radical movement its just allotment of time. The question of the "freedom of the air," discussed in this issue by a peppery inventor, the calm executive of the Radio Corporation of America, and the father of New York's municipal broadcasting station will become more and more acute—and much more significant than the present discussion of the right to broadcast an appeal for chorus girls would indicate. Invention proceeds at such a pace as to make any solution tentative. While some governments are still subsidizing cable lines the wireless is rapidly putting the cable into the position of the old-fashioned buggy on a concrete road, and now Marconi announces that the high-power broadcasting stations, built within the last three or four years, are already out of date. Short wave lengths will, he says, replace the long; they can be made to go as far, at greater speed and with less power, and are less dependent upon weather.

SURELY NO GREATER, more spontaneous, or more enthusiastic ovation was ever given to a public man than that accorded to Governor Smith on his appearance at the Democratic Convention. Nothing impressed the visiting delegates and newspapermen more than the esteem and affection in which the Governor is held by the plain people of New York City. They felt that his cause was theirs; Catholics, Protestants, and Jews were alike in hoping for his success. His defeat has only enhanced his popularity because he took it in such excellent spirit. He is a "good sport," and if his recital to the convention of his own achievements seemed to some in questionable taste his auditors were rapturous in their applause. His patent honesty and simplicity, his avoidance of all pretense, win him friends wherever he appears. As far as we can judge he may remain Governor of New York as long as he lives if he wishes to, and if he should desire to enter the Senate two years hence, Senator Wadsworth might as well decide to retire without a contest. Certainly not even Theodore Roosevelt had such a hold on the masses of New York State as has "Al" Smith, and with that he has won the esteem of social workers and reformers to an extraordinary degree.

IF GOVERNOR SMITH emerges from the convention a more sympathetic figure than ever, this is not the case with either William J. Bryan or William G. McAdoo. The latter took his terrible disappointment with poor grace indeed—and gave no evidence of being a generous loser. Much of the delay of the convention was due to his obstinate refusal to see what was plain from the start to every unprejudiced observer—that he could not win. We do not doubt he was sincere in his belief that he was overborne by the evil forces of our big-business masters, but nothing could have been more incongruous than his pose as the champion of progress and reform against the wets and Wall Street when he was upheld by the votes of the Ku Klux Klan and could see nothing queer in being Morgan's or Doheny's lawyer.

MR. BRYAN, too, seems to have received his quietus. When he rose to speak on the night before the nomination the delegates and spectators howled him down. Something of the sort had occurred before during the convention, but he had been able to make himself heard. On this occasion he not only was not allowed to say a single word, but the attitude of his opponents was marked by such bitterness as to amaze onlookers. This was due not only to Bryan's opposition to Smith and Davis, or to his advocacy of the besmirched McAdoo, or to the fact that he made a stump speech under false pretenses during the voting, but to a feeling that he had become a vindictive old busybody.

PUBLIC LIB.

His about-face, after denouncing Davis to the convention, when "Brother Charley" was put on the ticket with him, ought to complete the public disgust. As Clinton W. Gilbert has said, if monkeys had votes Mr. Bryan would be the champion of evolution.

CAILLAUX IS FREE, by the terms of the new French amnesty law—Caillaux, the brilliant ex-premier who was tried and convicted under the Clemenceau regime, not for treason, as many of our newspapers seem to believe, but for maintaining, in war time, belief in a "European policy." Caillaux before the war believed in a Franco-German rapprochement; during the war he believed in a "white peace," and since the war he has, by the curious terms of his sentence, been kept out of Paris and deprived of the right to vote or hold office. Unquestionably he will return to politics, but his personal ambition will stand in his way almost as much as his policies. His influence, however, will be cast for appeasement, and France needs such influences today. Poincaré's sour four-hour speech in opposition probably damaged Herriot's position little, but the press attacks charging him with surrender to England left him very unsure of his parliamentary footing. The Dawes Plan has not yet an open track either in France or in Germany. Germany's acceptance of Allied military inspection helped clear the air, but the rumors that Ramsay MacDonald, to make Herriot's task easier, had altered the proposed method of putting the Dawes Plan into effect, disturbed even liberal opinion in Germany. One thing is plain: The Allies must abandon the pernicious habit of exclusive Franco-British conferences. Nothing will be settled permanently until it is settled by joint negotiation between the interested Powers, with Germany treated as an equal.

THESE ARE TOUGH TIMES for dictators. Mussolini has not yet extricated himself from the backwash of the Matteotti murder when news comes that Primo de Rivera of Spain is also in difficulties. The dictator's chief ostensible reason for seizing power was the disastrous military campaign in Spanish Morocco, for which he blamed the meddling and muddling of civilian administrators. But under a military dictatorship matters have gone no better. The rather fantastic suggestion to buy the peace of the Riff tribesmen by making the bandit Raisuli their caliph seems to have come to nothing, and savage warfare with no quarter on either side has recently recommenced. Even at their face value the Spanish communiqués show a desperate situation, while between the lines is a hint of a disaster worse than that of two years ago. And for the death of every Spanish soldier doubtless ten Moors—men, women, or children—are slain. Press reports say that twenty Spanish airplanes recently dropped 600 bombs on villages south of Tetuan. "The tribesmen are reported to have been absent, either fighting or at tribal gatherings," says a dispatch from Tangier, "but women and children were in the villages."

"IMPERIAL RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT, five-year 5½ per cent bonds, dated December 1, 1916"—so runs the heading of an advertisement in the financial columns of the New York Times for July 14. The presidents of the National City Bank and of the Guaranty Trust Co., representatives of J. P. Morgan and Co., Harris, Forbes and Co., Kidder, Peabody and Co., and Lee, Higginson and Co.; and the vice-chairman of the Foreign Securities Committee of the Investment Bankers Association of America sign this little letter to the holders of Czarist bonds. "It is believed," these intelligent bankers say, "that the rights of holders of these certificates can be safeguarded to the best advantage through the Department of State and this committee." There follows the assurance that "Our Government, as a condition to formally recognizing a government in Russia, will in all probability insist that provision be made by the Russian Government for the payment of these claims." In all probability it will indeed.

THE COLLECTION OF LOANS floated through the House of Morgan and other Wall Street houses seems to be the primary concern of our State Department under the beneficent administration of Mr. Hughes. Nicaragua, under American control, has just repaid in full its railroad loan, and the State Department is now ready to withdraw the marines who have been there since 1912, one year after the first American bankers' loan. Santo Domingo is repaying its loan at so rapid a rate that even our American collector-general of customs begs the State Department to alter the onerous terms imposed upon that poor country in a loan contract negotiated by a so-called government presided over by an American admiral. Meanwhile the banks play both ends against the middle. In the financial columns of the Wall Street Journal we find an announcement of the Russian (Soviet) State Bank, and among its American correspondents is noted that same Guaranty Trust Co. whose president signed the letter to holders of the Czarist bonds.

SOME DAMAGING SHOT has been poured into the midst of Republican complacency by the National Civil Service Reform League. William Dudley Foulke, its president, declares that when the party asserts in its platform that under the present administration there has been steady improvement in the enforcement of the merit system it is guilty of sheer falsehood. This is especially flagrant in connection with the declaration that "the appointment of presidential postmasters has been placed on the merit basis." Mr. Foulke says:

> The Wilson order providing competitive examinations for filling vacancies in presidential postmasterships caused by death, resignation, or removal (about 10 per cent of the total number of vacancies) and requiring appointment of the candidate with the highest rating, was a small though very valuable extension of the merit principle, really eliminating politics within this small area—a nucleus which, if undisturbed and permitted to develop, would in time remove all presidential postmasterships from politics. But no sooner had the Republican administration come into power than this salutary rule for the appointment of the highest man was abolished; there were to be examinations of all presidential postmasters, but the choice of one out of the highest three eligibles led to the manipulation of the eligible lists by the Post Office Department, in cooperation with Republican congressmen and "referees" in such a way as to make these places again mere political spoils, and all this over the heads of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. Foulke also ridicules the declarations in regard to civil service in the Democratic platform, and characterizes as especially dangerous the advocacy of preference, regardless of qualifications, for ex-service men. The La Follette civil-service plank seems to stand expert scrutiny best of all.

IF THE CHURCHES ARE SERIOUS in their intention to oppose the slaughter of human beings in war they are only at the beginning of a long struggle. This struggle will be all the more difficult because of their past support of war, for the sudden stubbornness of a pliable person arouses infinitely more anger than habitual stubbornness. Upon the announcement of the War Department that on September 12 there would be a "demonstration of the plans for mobilization," the Christian Century in a leading editorial vigorously protested and urged the churches to keep faith with their post-war resolutions. The Federations of Churches in Philadelphia and Chicago by resolution requested the War Department to "withdraw this appeal to the nation." Both the magazine and the churches were promptly spanked and put in their places by the Secretary of War. Mr. Weeks warns them that if they persist in such unseemly conduct they will be disobeying the Constitution, an act of Congress of 1792, and the National Defense Act of 1920. All these acts require provision to be made for the national defense, and the Secretary of War insists that anyone objecting to Mobilization Day, as conceived by the master-mind of John W. Weeks, must be opposed to national defense and therefore be pretty much of a traitor. In the absence of Messrs. Palmer and Daugherty, somebody, we suppose, has to see specters and we may be grateful if Mr. Weeks does not try to deport all the peace-loving members of all the women's alliances and Epworth leagues and lock up the churches as centers of subversive Christianity.

ALBERT EINSTEIN brusquely resigned from the Committee on Intellectual Cooperation of the League of Nations a year ago on the ground that "The League of Nations, as it functions at present, not only does not embody the ideal of an international organization but actually discredits such an organization." Later he changed his mind. "I acted mistakenly," he said. "However bad the League of Nations may be in respect to what it has accomplished it is tremendously important in respect to the possibilities which lie concealed within it." This year, being invited to rejoin the committee, he accepted. "It is a good sign of the liberal and generous disposition of the men of the League," he wrote, "that after my harsh refusal of last year they have once more elected me. How happily European conditions have changed since then! Everywhere hope and good-will! Only with us the ice is not yet melted and it is toward this that we must now work." Manley O. Hudson, who sends us this letter, also sends a statement prepared for the American press at the request of friends of the League, in which Mr. Einstein remarks that "Strong in its power to understand and to forget, the League of Nations will rise to its great task of the pacification of the world as soon as all states have become members and the cooperation of progressive men in all countries has been assured." We printed Mr. Einstein's criticism a year ago and we are glad to record his changed attitude today. May the hope and good-will which he reports soon lead to the invitation, not only to Germany but also to Soviet Russia to join the Assembly and Council of the League.

STYLES IN CRUELTY VARY. Bull-fighting and cock-fighting are looked upon with a certain dainty aversion by the non-Latin peoples. Prize-fighting, in spite of the support of George Bernard Shaw, has its squeamish opponents, among them many people who hunt foxes. And now Tex Austin's rodeo—American to its core, with steer-throwing and steer-wrestling and broncho-riding—has divided England into camps of bitter opponents, with the "better people," the liberals, and the polite press, attacking the sports of the round-up as "cruel and unworthy of our race"—to quote from a special article in the Manchester Guardian by Henry W. Nevinson. The leg of a steer was broken on the opening night of the rodeo, and the animal was promptly shot. Other accidents followed; some of them to animals, more to the human participants in the contests. Several men suffered bruises and sprains. A cowgirl seriously wrenched her neck. Another was rolled on by her horse and broke her collar-bone. The royal British sanction for being unhorsed has not penetrated the ranks of the American visitors, however, for the second young woman repudiated the report that she had been thrown. "I have never had too much horse," she announced. The peat track seems to have caused most of the accidents both to man and beast; but the long casualty list has set the country by the ears.

THE RODEO HAS BEEN DISCUSSED in Parliament, in leading articles and columns of news in the press; and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals instituted proceedings against the management—though the case has since been dismissed. Meantime England, while it shuddered, turned out to view the contests at the rate of some 146,000 a day. Is the rodeo cruel? Dragging ourselves rather laboriously out of our national complacency, we must doubtless admit that it is. Certainly the animals taking part in the contests have not even a gold purse to win for their risks and their pains, and we cannot let the glamor that surrounds the skilful daring of the ranches hide obviously brutal facts. But still—well, it is our own American style of cruelty, and so it seems considerably less cruel than most other national varieties.

YOUTH HAS BEEN SO MUCH on top in this age that sympathizers with the under (or older) dog must take keen delight in its defeat by hoary old age in the marathon, the culminating event of the Olympic games. For a man of forty has reached hoary old age, athletically speaking—and some would say mentally as well. Yet in this twenty-six-mile run, up hill and down dale—a feat calling for the stoutest muscle and the most perfect heart—a decrepit old party of forty winters (and winters are trying in Finland) pranced in ahead of the bunch, while third place was won by another ancient lacking only a little of the same human deadline laid down by the redoubtable Dr. Osler. This triumph of the down-and-outs, of Stenroos, the Finn, and De Mar, the American, was the most remarkable aspect of the games, but they were notable also for the showing made by the tiny country from which Stenroos comes. Finland came out next to the United States in the total score by points, and quite ran away with all the long-distance races of the meet. The result has set the correspondents to investigating Finnish training methods. "Their main diet is fish and a kind of maize cake, hard as biscuit," reports one writer. Perhaps this will prove the salvation of our ruined fishermen and deflated farmers, for we foresee an eager public following presently in the wake of advertising campaigns to "Eat More Fish" and "Use More Corn."

Davis and Bryan

OUR opinion of John W. Davis, the man, we have set forth on several occasions, notably in our issue of July 2. It is a pleasure to be able to say of the Democratic nominee for the Presidency that he is a man of unusual legal ability, of much charm, of unquestioned personal rectitude. Should he be elected we should have in the White House a gentleman to recall its best traditions. So far as his personal quality is concerned, his nomination ranks with those of Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson, though he has neither their force nor their insight. In the White House he would be friendly, accessible, and open to advice. An after-dinner speaker of unusual grace, he is especially gifted in council and as an attorney has been much sought after because of his skill in finding the formulas by which to solve many a difficult situation—a quality which will be valuable to his party in the coming campaign. In many respects his party has put its best foot forward in making this choice; it has won the enthusiastic support of such powerful newspapers as the New York Times and World and the Baltimore Sun, and of many men and women in the conservative classes. It now provides active competition for Calvin Coolidge in the field in which he has been supreme—the ultra-conservative business world. Besides that, this nomination brings to the party the hearty approval of the advocates of the League of Nations, which Mr. Davis warmly champions. These are all factors of importance.

His brand of liberalism is that of the philanthropic financier. He will use the words "progressivism" and "liberalism" throughout the campaign, but his more recent professional associations have made it clear that he is irretrievably identified with the business powers that be. Once, years ago, able to go to the defense of West Virginia mine workers, he has become part and parcel of that business world which constitutes the invisible government assailed by both Roosevelt and Wilson. By this we do not mean that he will be controlled by members of the firm of J. P. Morgan and Co. or of any other group. It is his slant of mind and his general attitude toward the privileged which we have in view. Such liberalism as we shall get from him will be the liberalism of the Democratic Party of a bygone generation, for in none of his writings or speeches have we met evidence that Mr. Davis is aware of the deep under-currents in our modern social life or of the profound and far-reaching importance of the economic issues which confront us.

His speeches are attractive, dignified, cultured. But he has gone with the herd since 1914, which explains sufficiently the enthusiastic support of the New York Times and the rise in stocks which followed his nomination. "He is all right for business," was the general Wall Street verdict. What the country needs is far less one who is all right for business than one who is all right for the plain people, one from whose lips we may hope to hear such clear-cut utterances as came in 1912 from Woodrow Wilson. Mr. Davis will not say, or even see, that "our government has been for the past two years under the control of heads of great allied corporations with special interests." He will not announce his readiness to rescue the government from those special interests, to do everything he can to alter that condition of affairs which made Mr. Wilson assert that it had come to pass that the President of the United States had to go hat in hand to Wall Street for orders. He showed his stodginess sufficiently when he was president of the American Bar Association. He never opened his mouth to protest against the flagrant violations of the Constitution by Mitchell Palmer, but he voiced a conventional objection to criticism of the courts for invalidating social legislation.

Even were Mr. Davis more liberal and progressive than he is, we should still prefer to support Robert La Follette rather than the choice of a party whose hopeless decadence has so often been proved. We abate not one word of the editorial which we published last week as to the irreconcilable differences and the hopeless contradictions and cross-currents within the Democratic Party. It has undergone no sea-changes overnight; its business masters are still in control. We would remind our readers that the leaders of the progressive movement in Congress are today, with one or two brilliant exceptions, not Democrats but Republicans. The election of Mr. Davis would give no assurance that the progressive movement would be taken over by the Democracy. It would outwardly rehabilitate the party, revamp some old shibboleths, but a far greater man than Mr. Davis could not cause a genuine rebirth of the party which now does only lip service to the teachings of Thomas Jefferson and is tied to that body of death, the Democratic Party of the South, with its hopeless dominance by the race problem. The seating of Mr. Davis, an attractive, amiable gentleman, in the White House would surely do positive harm by camouflaging the real situation in his party and in the country. It would doubtless delay the inevitable amalgamation of the two great parties, and that political regrouping into conservatives and progressives which the country needs if we are to be capable of thinking along politico-economic lines, if our creaking and cracking institutions are to be remodeled and revitalized. It is just because we so keenly feel the need of this realignment that we shall do our utmost to support the La Follette movement as a long step in the desired direction.

Governor Bryan has been an efficient and liberal Governor of the State of Nebraska. We cannot, however, affirm that he is of the caliber which should have been chosen in this hour. Never before was the candidate for Vice-President so important, for the election may easily be thrown into the House of Representatives and then into the Senate. If nobody obtains a majority next November, the election of a President will devolve upon the House and of a Vice-President upon the Senate. If there should be a deadlock in the House, and if Mr. Bryan should be elected Vice-President, he would, under the Constitution, assume the duties of President on March 4, 1925. Between elections we always vow that the next time we shall pick a Vice-Presidential candidate for other than party reasons or geographical considerations, and always we make the same blunder by leaving the choice until the last moment, when an exhausted convention has no thought except to get it over with and get home. Governor Bryan's nomination was a shrewd and successful political trick to capture the William J. Bryan influence. That, not the interest of the Republic, was the aim.

Are Negroes "Workers"?

"ARE women 'people'?" the suffragists used to ask. "Are Negroes 'workers'?" colored men are beginning to inquire. The labor movement of the United States has hitherto paid scant attention to the race which has most generously contributed to the working class of the country. Latterly the American Federation of Labor has regularly resolved at its conventions to take colored men into the unions, but it has done little between sessions to carry out the resolutions. A few unions, such as the molders and the mine-workers, have been conspicuously fair to the Negro; many have been inconspicuously unfair, and a few have frankly maintained the color bar. The northward tide of Negro migration has drawn unusual attention to the importance of Negro labor; since the stoppage of European immigration the South has served as a reservoir of cheap labor from which Northern capitalists might draw in time of strike or other crisis. Hence the recent action of the annual conference of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has such profound significance that we quote its letter to the American Federation of Labor almost in full:

> For many years the American Negro has been demanding admittance to the ranks of union labor.
>
> For many years your organizations have made public profession of your interest in Negro labor, of your desire to have it unionized, and of your hatred of the black "scab."
>
> Notwithstanding this apparent surface agreement, Negro labor in the main is outside the ranks of organized labor, and the reason is, first, that white union labor does not want black labor, and, secondly, black labor has ceased to beg admittance to union ranks because of its increasing value and efficiency outside the unions.
>
> We thus face a crisis in interracial labor conditions; the continued and determined race prejudice of white labor, together with the limitation of immigration, is giving black labor tremendous advantage. The Negro is entering the ranks of semi-skilled and skilled labor and he is entering mainly and necessarily as a "scab." He broke the great steel strike. He will soon be in position to break any strike when he can gain economic advantage for himself.
>
> On the other hand, intelligent Negroes know full well that a blow at organized labor is a blow at all labor; that black labor today profits by the blood and sweat of labor leaders in the past who have fought oppression and monopoly by organization. If there is built up in America a great black bloc of non-union laborers who have a right to hate unions, all laborers, black and white, eventually must suffer.
>
> Is it not time, then, that black and white labor get together? Is it not time for white unions to stop bluffing and for black laborers to stop cutting off their noses to spite their faces?
>
> We, therefore, propose that there be formed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the American Federation of Labor, the Railway Brotherhoods, and any other bodies agreed upon, an Interracial Labor Commission.
>
> We propose that this commission undertake:
>
> 1. To find out the exact attitude and practice of national labor bodies and local unions toward Negroes and of Negro labor toward unions.
>
> 2. To organize systematic propaganda against racial discrimination on the basis of these facts at the great labor meetings, in local assemblies, and in local unions.

Here is a real opportunity for the Federation.

Freedom Through Advertising

ADVERTISING is the world's best bet for the attainment of international peace, thinks Edward A. Filene, a shopkeeper of Boston town. Democracy is government by public opinion, he has been telling the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, in convention assembled in London, and it is only in so far as public opinion is farsighted, pacific in temper, and well posted in regard to other nations that there is hope of peace. To create this kind of opinion we must have a free press. The revenue from its sales does not support a modern newspaper, Mr. Filene continues. In our larger cities it costs $6,000,000 and upward a year to produce a daily, not more than 20 or 30 per cent of which is derived from circulation. The public would not pay the amount extra for its reading to make up the difference. A publication must receive subsidies, and be tied to the "special interests" from which they come, or it must have advertising—and freedom!

Mr. Filene looks at these alternatives and embraces the latter, gladly, enthusiastically. So should we if we accepted all Mr. Filene says about it. He thinks that a revenue from advertising insures a free press because advertisers want a circulation with buying power, and no newspaper which does not prove itself to be free can long hold any number of such readers. He sees the world headed toward an era of super-competition, with mass production and mass selling at the lowest possible prices. Advertising on a greater and greater scale will be necessary to mass selling. Hence newspapers are destined to grow freer and freer, and universal peace is just around the corner—brought to us by our modern miracle-workers, the advertising men.

A pretty picture, if that were all. Mr. Filene is right in much that he says, but he leaves substantial considerations out of account. In our country and in our day it is practically true that a newspaper cannot live on its circulation, but it is not true in all countries nor has it been true at all times. There is hope that a public may be gradually educated to support some newspapers, at least, mostly or wholly through sales. Mr. Filene forgets that a large part of the enormous expense of modern newspaper production is directly due to advertising. It is a question also if the American newspaper has not become two gregarious in its appeal. Only a fraction of what it prints interests any one reader. This represents a sheer economic waste which may some day be curtailed through greater specialization. Mr. Filene's very insistence on the fact that the advertiser wants a circulation with buying power shows the weakness of the system. To reach the maximum in this direction a newspaper has to cater not to intelligence but to the greatest number of persons with an income a little larger than their sheer necessities require —usually the most materially-minded and unprogressive element in any community.

We accept advertising as the basis of modern journalism, not as a boon but as a necessary—and perhaps temporary—evil. We see hope in the signs that as the world plunges into an era of mass production, mass selling, and mass opinion, there are arising sizable groups to realize both the need and the opportunity of supporting journals whose clear, free, and individual note, like the "still, small voice," transcends the wind and the earthquake.

The Freedom of the Air

Uncensored and Uncontrolled

By DAVID SARNOFF

WITH over five hundred stations, large and small, broadcasting daily programs of music, entertainment, and speech to a radio audience of probably 10,000,000 people in the United States, it is strange that the cry of monopoly should reverberate through the press in any discussion of the broadcasting problem. For there are no gateways in the air to bar the human voice. Mechanically and scientifically no power exists that can permanently block the airways of space. No development in the air, actual or projected, would justify the thought that the vast reaches of air could be confined to the range and power of any one system of broadcasting stations. The danger to free speech in the air comes from another source.

There are two fundamental schools of thought today with regard to the solution of the problem of radio broadcasting, neither of which infringes upon the freedom of the air. It is declared, on the one hand, that the solution of the problem calls for some method of payment on the part of the millions of receivers of radio programs. Broadcasting, they say, must be made to pay its own way in order to stabilize the radio industry. And it is true that the equipment and maintenance of a modern broadcasting station require an ever-increasing investment of capital and effort.

The other school of thought bases its approach to the problem on a different thesis. It is that radio has developed an industry, the success and growth of which are dependent upon an extraordinary service to the public. Without broadcasting, every receiving set in the country would be but a useless piece of mechanism. It is the duty of the industry, therefore, to supply at least the equipment and organization for such a service, and to provide an untrammeled forum in the air.

As the art progresses I believe that radio more and more will become the universal voice. It is the first method of communication discovered by man whereby millions of people can instantaneously and simultaneously be reached with the same thought, the same appeal, the same emotional impetus. Radio gives the human voice a limitless range. Its destiny is to bring light, education, and entertainment even to the remotest home in the country, by a method that no other system of communication has ever been able to equal.

The broadcasting station of the future, in my opinion, will be the bar at which great causes will be pleaded for the verdict of public opinion. It is vitally important, therefore, that the expressions of educators and statesmen should reach the vast radio audience uncensored and uncontrolled. So powerful an instrument of public good should and must be kept free from partisan manipulation. The same principles that apply to the freedom of the press should be made to apply to the freedom of the air. Public interest should be the sole test of admission to this illimitable forum. No political, racial, or color line should ever be drawn.

To tax the public for radio reception would be a reversion, in my belief, to the days of toll roads and bridges, to the days when schools were not free and libraries were not public.

The danger to freedom of speech by radio is not the danger that any one interest will ever be able to monopolize the air. The real danger is in censorship, in over-regulation. If the radio industry is to give to the public the greatest possible service, it must be encouraged, not harassed by government regulation; if the air is to be kept free for the public good, public opinion must determine the fitness or unfitness of those who seek to appear at its bar.

Radio Control

By GROVER A. WHALEN

RADIO broadcasting should be absolutely free in every respect from control by any private corporation, such as the American Telegraph and Telephone Company. It is not free today. A successful broadcasting station must employ at times the use of telephone lines to broadcast from points distant to the transmitting station. This is technically known as remote control. The telephone company has adopted the broad policy of saying: "You may lease our telephone line if you use our station for toll or hire, but if you use any other broadcasting station you cannot lease our lines." Thus this dominant member of the combine, by special concessions of toll service, advertising, increased power, and remote control is enabled to maintain a monopoly of the air, dictating that no other station shall collect toll, shall advertise, shall use high power, or shall augment its service by the use of telephone lines. Is this not a monopoly in radio broadcasting, governed by a self-appointed, private corporation, acting in lieu of the government, even more menacing and more detrimental in its effect on the public and on future radio development than the monopoly of commercial wireless communication and restraint in the manufacture and distribution of radio apparatus against which the Public Service Commission has complained? Broadcasting should be as free as the air through which the sound waves are impelled, except for such government control as may be necessary and advisable.

This is a fundamental proposition incapable of contradiction. It is self-evident.

Government control should be had by establishing in each area comparatively strong stations, such as the municipal broadcasting station which has just been put in operation in New York City, and by cutting out poorer and weaker stations which broadcast inferior programs.

The superstation theory suggested by Mr. Guy E. Tripp, chairman of the board of directors of the Westinghouse Electric Company, is along the lines I have had in mind. The progress of radio is not helped by stations of little power broadcasting programs that are not worth while.

Censorship, at this time, I should regard as unfortunate. The public is the best censor. The radio audience is just as exacting as an opera audience and requires the best in character and quality. Radio so closely touches the home life of the American people that the best, and only the best, must be broadcasted, and the most careful selection must be made from the wide variety of subjects offered. Painstaking study and careful thought are required to prepare and present a properly balanced and generally acceptable radio program.

In the present development of broadcasting, freedom is greatly to be desired, but in any event the exercise of control must be by the government, not by any private corporation or combination of corporations.

Radio—The Fulcrum

By HUDSON MAXIM

GIVE me control of the air that a man breathes, and he shall drop his opinion and adopt my opinion and he shall vote as I vote.

Not only is the air our breath of life, but also it is the why we have ears and organs of speech. Give me control of what goes into a man's ears, and I shall control his organs of speech.

Public opinion goes in through the ears. Give me control of the sources of information to which public opinion lends its ears, and I shall be able to exclude all opposing opinions and shape public opinion to suit myself.

Archimedes said: "Give me the where to stand and the fulcrum, and I will with my lever lift the world." Radio supplies the where to stand and the fulcrum for the Archimedean lever with which he who controls radio may raise or lower the world.

Let the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Anti-Saloon League have control of the evening radio talks to children, and they will be in a position to fill their minds with superstition, and make them into men and women who shall be the pawns of propagandists of blue laws and prohibitions.

Give the control of radio to the scientists and rationalists, and they will be in a position to fill the children's minds with science and rationality, and make them into men and women who shall be governed by reason, and not by superstition, fanaticism, and prejudice.

The private monopolist of radio broadcasting would be in a position to extinguish freedom's last remaining flickering glim that federal prohibition has not yet doused. He would be in a position to wipe out the last vestige of self-government still left by the Anti-Saloon League to the American people. Although the people might still believe that they were doing their own thinking, their own choosing, and that they were voting with their own volition, they would actually be mere pawns in the play.

Radio broadcasting is both the most marvelous mystery and the greatest potentiality that has ever been harnessed to man's use, and it has such vast possibilities of misuse as a club that its possible clubbing use should be most wisely considered before a private monopoly should be permitted to control it.

I distrust the wisdom of allowing radio broadcasting to be controlled by any private monopoly, but I also distrust the wisdom and the ability and the justice of federal control of radio. The solution seems to lie between the devil of private monopoly and the deep sea of perilous paternalism. The government has the right of eminent domain over the air, but the Anti-Saloon League exercises eminent domain over the government.

I must confess that I am puzzled. Perhaps the control of radio should be made quasi-private and quasi-governmental.

The Sex Uproar

By H. L. MENCKEN

IT is the economic emancipation of woman, I suppose, that must be blamed for the present wholesale discussion of the sex question, so offensive to the romantic. Eminent authorities have full often described, and with the utmost heat and eloquence, her state before she was delivered from her fetters and turned loose to root or die. Almost her only recognized trade, in those dark days, was that of wife. True enough, she might also become a servant girl, or go to work in a factory, or offer herself upon the streets, but all those vocations were so dreadful that no rational woman followed them if she could help it; she would leave any of them instantly at the call of a man, for the call of a man meant promotion for her, economically and socially.

The males of the time, knowing what a boon they had to proffer, drove hard bargains. They demanded a long list of high qualities in the women they summoned to their seraglios, but most of all they demanded what they called virtue. It was not sufficient that a candidate should be anatomically undefiled; she must also be absolutely pure in mind. There was, of course, but one way to keep her that pure, and that was by building a high wall around her mind, and hitting her with a club every time she ventured to look over it. It was as dangerous, in those Christian days, for a woman to show any interest in or knowledge of the great physiological farce of sex as it would be today for a presidential candidate to reveal himself in his cups on the hustings. Everyone knew, to be sure, that as a mammal she had a sex, and that as a potential wife and mother she probably had some secret interest in its phenomena, but it was felt, perhaps wisely, that even the most academic theorizing had within it the deadly germs of the experimental method, and so she was forbidden to think about the matter at all, and whatever information she actually acquired she had to acquire by a method of bootlegging.

The generation still on its legs has seen the almost total collapse of that naive and constabulary system. Beginning with the eighties of the last century, there rose up a harem rebellion which quickly knocked it to pieces. The women of the Western world not only began to plunge heroically into all of the old professions, hitherto sacred to men; they also began to invent a lot of new professions, many of them unimagined by men. Worse, they began to succeed in them. The working woman of the old days worked only until she could snare a man; any man was better than her work. But the working woman of the new days was under no such pressure; her work made her a living and sometimes more than a living; when a man appeared in her net she took two looks at him before landing him. The result was an enormous augmentation of her feeling of self-sufficiency, her spirit of independence, her natural inclination to get two sides into the bargaining. The result, secondarily, was a revolt against all the old taboos that had surrounded her, all the childish incapacities and ignorances that had been forced upon her. The result, tertiarily, was a vast running amuck in the field that, above all others, had been forbidden to her: that of sexual knowledge and experiment.

We now suffer from the effects of that running amuck. It is women, not men, who are doing all the current gabbling about sex and proposing all the new-fangled modifications of the rules and regulations ordained by God, and they are hard at it, very largely, because being at it at all is a privilege that is still new to them. The whole order of human females, in other words, is passing through a sort of intellectual adolescence, and it is disturbed as greatly thereby as biological adolescents are disturbed by the spouting of the hormones. The attitude of men toward the sex question, it seems to me, has not changed greatly in my time. Barring a few earnest men whose mental processes, here as elsewhere, are essentially womanish, they still view it somewhat jocosely. Taking one with another, they believe that they know all about it that is worth knowing, and so it does not challenge their curiosity, and they do not put in much time discussing it. But among the women, if a bachelor may presume to judge, interest in it is intense. They want to know all that is known about it, all that has been guessed and theorized about it; they bristle with ideas of their own about it. It is hard to find a reflective woman, in these days, who is not harboring some new and startling scheme for curing the evils of monogamous marriage; it is impossible to find any woman who has not given ear to such schemes. Women, not men, read the endless books upon the subject that now rise mountain-high in all the bookstores, and women, not men, discuss and rediscuss the notions in them. An acquaintance of mine, a distinguished critic, owns a copy of one of the most revolutionary of these books, by title "The Art of Love," that was suppressed on the day of its publication by the Comstocks. He tells me that he has already lent it to twenty-six women, and that he has more than fifty applications for it on file. Yet he has never read it himself!

As a professional fanatic for free thought and free speech, I can only view all this uproar in the Frauenzimmer with high satisfaction. It gives me delight to see a taboo violated, and that delight is doubled when the taboo is one that is wholly senseless. Sex is enormously more important to women than to men, and so they ought to be free to discuss it as they please, and to hatch and propagate whatever ideas about it occur to them. Moreover, I can see nothing but nonsense in the doctrine that their concern with such matters damages their charm. So far as I am concerned, a woman who knows precisely what a Graafian follicle is is just as charming as one who doesn't—just as charming, and far less dangerous. Charm in women, indeed, is a variable star, and shows different colors at different times. When their chief mark was ignorance, then the most ignorant was the most charming; now that they begin to think deeply and indignantly there is charm in their singular astuteness. But I am not yet convinced that they have attained to a genuine astuteness in the new field of sex. On the contrary, it seems to me that a fundamental error contaminates their whole dealing with the subject, and that is the error of assuming that sexual questions, whether social, physiological, or pathological, are of vast and even paramount importance to mankind—in brief, that sex is a first-rate matter.

I doubt it. I believe that in this department men show better judgment than women, if only because their information is older and their experience wider. Their tendency is to dismiss the whole thing lightly, to reduce sex to the lowly estate of an afterthought and a recreation, and under that tendency there is a sound instinct. I do not believe that the lives of normal men are much colored or conditioned, either directly or indirectly, by purely sexual considerations. I believe that nine-tenths of them would carry on all the activities which engage them now, and with precisely the same humorless diligence, if there were not a woman in the world. The notion that man would not work if he lacked an audience, and that the audience must be a woman, seems to me to be a hollow sentimentality. Men work because they want to eat, because they want to feel secure, because they long to shine among their fellows, and for no other reason. A man may crave his wife's approbation, or some other woman's approbation, of his social graces, of his taste, of his generosity and courage, of his general dignity in the world, but long before he ever gives thought to such things and long after he has forgotten them he craves the approbation of his fellow men. Above all, he craves the approbation of his fellow craftsmen—the men who understand exactly what he is trying to do, and are expertly competent to judge his doing of it. Can you imagine a surgeon putting the good opinion of his wife above the good opinion of other surgeons? If you can, then you can do something that I cannot.

Here, of course, I do not argue absurdly that the good opinion of his wife is nothing to him. Obviously, it is a lot, for if it does not constitute the principal reward of his work, then it at least constitutes the principal joy of his hours of ease, when his work is done. He wants his wife to respect and admire him; to be able to make her do so is also a talent. But if he is intelligent he must discover very early that her respect and admiration do not necessarily run in direct ratio to his intrinsic worth, that the qualities and acts that please her are not always the qualities and acts that are most satisfactory to the censor within him—in brief, that the relations between man and woman, however intimate they may seem, must always remain a bit casual and superficial—that sex, at bottom, belongs to comedy in the cool of the evening and not to the sober business that goes on in the heat of the day. That sober business, as I have said, would still go on if women were abolished and heirs and assigns were manufactured in rolling-mills. Men would not only work as hard as they do today; they would also get almost as much satisfaction out of their work. For of all the men that I know on this earth, ranging from poets to ambassadors and from bishops to statisticians, I know of none who labors primarily because he wants to please a woman. They are all hard at it because they want to please themselves.

Women, plainly enough, are in a far different case. Their emancipation has not yet gone to the length of making them genuinely free. They have rid themselves, very largely, of the absolute need to please men, but they have not yet rid themselves of the impulse to please men. Perhaps they never will: one might easily devise a plausible argument to that effect on biological grounds. But sufficient unto the day is the phenomenon before us: they have got rid of the old taboo which forbade them to think and talk about sex, and they still labor under the old superstition that sex is a matter of paramount importance. The result, in my judgment, is a vast emission of piffle. In every division of the subject there is endless and ludicrous exaggeration. The campaign for birth control takes on the colossal proportions of the war for democracy. The venereal diseases are represented to be as widespread, at least in men, as colds in the head, and as lethal as pneumonia or cancer. Great hordes of viragoes patrol the country, instructing school-girls in the mechanics of reproduction and their mothers in obstetrics. The monogamy which produced all of us is denounced as an infamy comparable to cannibalism. Laws are passed regulating the mating of human beings as if they were horned cattle and converting marriage into a sort of coroner's inquest. Over all sounds the battle-cry of quacks and zealots: "Veritas liberabit vos!"

The truth? How much of this new gospel is actually truth? Perhaps two per cent. The rest is idle theorizing, doctrinaire nonsense, mere scandalous rubbish. All that is worth knowing about sex—all, that is, that is solidly established and of sound utility—can be taught to any intelligent boy of sixteen in two hours. Is it taught in the current books, so enormously circulated? I doubt it. Absolutely without exception these books admonish the poor apprentice to renounce sex altogether—to sublimate it, as the favorite phrase is, into a passion for free verse, Rotary, or the League of Nations. That admonition is silly, and, I believe, dangerous. It is as much a folly to lock up sex in the hold as it is to put it in command on the bridge. Its proper place is the social hall.

As a substitute for all such nonsense I drop a pearl of wisdom, and so pass on. To wit: the strict monogamist never gets into trouble.

Revolution—New Style

By GEORGE SOULE

THE recent victories of the needle-trades unions in New York emphasize the function of labor organizations as creative forces in industry. Not one was fought over simple questions of wages and hours. Not one was an out-and-out conflict for power between exploiter and exploited. The chief gains of each battle were greater cohesiveness and better organization of the industry, elimination of economic waste, and constructive measures like unemployment insurance.

It is a dogma of the extreme left that industry is inevitably drifting toward larger units of production and concentrated capitalistic control. A corollary of this dogma is that the only proper course for labor is amalgamation of the unions and a "militant" spirit leading to strikes on an ever larger scale. At every point the workers must refuse to cooperate with employers. Anything of that sort is damned as "class collaboration."

The lefts in the heat of their dogmas apparently have failed to make a realistic examination of the clothing industries of New York. Here the development has been precisely opposite to that which they say is inevitable. Units of production have been growing smaller. The amount of capital necessary to start a shop is so small that the industry has become overcrowded and competition has been intensified beyond endurance. The comparatively large "inside shops" which make entire garments under one roof have been gradually giving way. The jobbers or stock-houses have been encroaching on their market to the retail trade. The small contractors, making up orders for the jobbers, have been encroaching on their manufacturing function. In the cloak-and-suit industry the jobber furnishes the material, and sometimes even the design, to the contractor, who gets the jobber's order through the bitterest kind of competitive bidding.

The result of all this overlapping is manufacture in wastefully small shops, overequipment of machinery and personnel among the contractors, heavy seasonal unemployment, a dragging down of labor standards, deterioration of quality of the product. No amount of union amalgamation or "militancy" would help a situation such as this. The need is not for a simple test of power. It is a problem in industrial engineering.

Likewise the type of trade unionism which thinks of the task of labor as a matter of shrewd bargaining with an employer who can if he will grant any desired concessions, and which concentrates on wage rates and hour schedules to the exclusion of problems of industrial organization, would not have much to offer in a situation such as this. A traditional argument is that seasonal unemployment may be minimized by shorter working hours, and that it should be compensated for by higher wage rates. Such arguments did, indeed, crop up in the recent struggles in New York. But a strike for these objects alone, even if nominally successful, could not have made much headway against the industrial chaos which set the limits to the advantages which the workers might win.

A short strike of the men's clothing workers, conducted by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, brought an element of cohesion into their industry which had been lacking ever since the break-up of the Manufacturers' Association and the impartial chairmanship after the 1921 lockout. A new association of employers was formed and an agreement was made with it. There will be a guaranty of union conditions in all shops. There will be minimum-wage scales based on production—a measure which will tend to deprive the small shops of any competitive advantage. There will be an unemployment-insurance fund, beginning next December, built up by a weekly contribution of 3 per cent of the pay roll, one-half contributed by each side. There will be an impartial chairman to administer the agreement and settle minor disputes. Thus the measures for stability which have been successfully tested in the Chicago market have been introduced in New York, and the industry may be expected to convalesce under a scientific treatment.

The International Ladies' Garment Workers had a more difficult situation, and had been working at it longer. For months before the expiration of their agreement on May 1, they had been endeavoring to bring about a scientific investigation and a remedy for the ills of their industry through cooperation of the big manufacturers, the jobbers, the contractors, and the union. A joint commission formed for this purpose failed to elicit the necessary detailed information on account of the reluctance of the jobbers to help it. The jobbers, though ultimately involved in the disintegration of the industry, were temporarily profiting from the surplus of contractors and were not prepared to cooperate in good faith. When the agreement expired the union presented demands embodying the best remedies it could devise, and threatened to force cohesion in the industry through a strike. This threat led to the appointment of a competent investigating commission by Governor Smith, which heard all sides at length and eventually handed down recommendations embodying much of what the union wanted. The jobbers at first refused to accept the verdict, but another strike threat at the beginning of the busy season, which was now at hand, brought them to terms.

The remedies offered by the commission are more complicated and extensive than in the case of the men's clothing industry. They include a stipulation that jobbers shall order goods only from contractors having agreements with the union, that such union contractors' shops shall have at least fourteen machine operators and a corresponding number of employees in other branches of the work, that a sanitary label shall be used in products of union shops which shall be subject to the Joint Board of Sanitary Control, that jobbers shall be responsible for the payment of wages by the contractors, that an unemployment-insurance fund shall be built up by contributions from the employers and the union, and that there shall be an impartial chairman to decide disputes in the industry during the life of the agreement—one year. Regarding further proposals of the union for stabilization of the industry expert investigators are to work under the Governor's commission with full power to get the necessary facts from all sources. Another committee is to devise a code of trade practices as between the contractors and the jobbers.

The United Cloth Hat and Cap Makers have won an agreement for unemployment insurance in New York, and the International Fur Workers are to have one also if it is found to be practicable in their industry.

Thus the power of the unions is being employed, not in aimless or primitive struggles, not in theoretical "militancy," but in order to revivify competitive trades which have run to seed under the profit motive. If we mean by "revolution" the substitution of social purpose in industry for the chaos of individualistic gain, that revolution is on the way in the clothing industries by the invention of a new technique of cooperation and control, by the formation of new group habits and standards. It is built upon the conscious power of labor and the application of painstaking experiment.

Davis the Double-Edged

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

NOTHING was charminger to the delighted observer of human behavior in this vale of tears and guffaws than the McAdoo delegates in the New York Democratic Convention, who, having wept and prayed and shouted themselves hoarse and worried themselves sick for McAdoo and progressivism, led the march on the convention floor toward Davis and toward what William Jennings Bryan had denounced as an alliance with Wall Street.

George Brennan of Illinois, James M. Cox of Ohio, and other influential individualities, commonly called leaders, or bosses, may have stimulated and facilitated that march. The New York delegation, by seeming to throw itself into the arms of the Klan-denouncing Oscar W. Underwood of Alabama, may have wrenched and frightened the opponents of denunciations of the Klan in Georgia and in Texas into throwing themselves into the arms of Davis. All sorts of influences by bosses, all sorts of influences by intrigues, may be alleged and in part may be proved.

This writer alleges nevertheless, from observation, for instance, of the Georgia delegation, and from observation of the Texas delegation, that not George Brennan, and not Tom Taggart, and not the ghost of Charlie Murphy, and not any other apparition or reality of so-called boss power could go into either of those two delegations and successfully say: "You now vote for Davis because I tell you to."

That sort of thing was totally impossible in large areas of the Democratic Convention in New York. Yet out of those large areas, inhabited by McAdoo delegates, there came a multitudinous support for Davis from ladies and gentlemen who previously had been saying that they would stay in New York all summer and die in their tracks before they would surrender to New York Wall Street influences.

Then they voted to nominate the attorney of the principal Wall Street banking firm.

How can this apparent paradox be explained? That is the chief psychological and political puzzle growing out of the recent Democratic National Convention in New York.

Its explanation may possibly go back to the excesses which marked the beginning of the convention. Among these excesses was a fervent and sincere but quite exaggerated McAdoo denunciation of Tammany and Al Smith and reaction and the money devil all lumped rhetorically into one lump and damned harmoniously and unitedly as the characteristic and essential outstanding product of the sidewalks of New York.

Inquiry, however, regarding New York soon indicated to the delegates that Al Smith, instead of being the tool of big business and the recognized enemy of progress in New York, had promoted numerous pieces of humanitarian and progressive legislation at Albany against much determined corporate opposition to them and was loved by the common people of New York with a personal affection for which there is no parallel anywhere else in all America in the case of any other champion of the common people's feelings and wishes.

This discovery about New York had its weight with the McAdoo delegates. If Smith the monster could turn out to be Smith the popular champion and the popular idol—well, here was wonderland and anything might happen and anything might be believed. Perhaps Davis of New York might be popular too. Perhaps everything was different from what it was thought to be back home.

New York was hated, it is true, by the Southern and Western McAdoo delegates, for the rowdies who in the name of Al Smith invaded the floor of the convention and also the press section of the convention and thrust delegates and correspondents out of their way with unauthorized but untrammeled success. Yet New York had also its softening influence upon the Southern and Western McAdoo delegates by teaching them that the New York democracy had the allegiance of common people even commoner than any that they had ever seen before. This experience may have affected the McAdoo delegates when they threw their tired selves toward Mr. Davis, a resident of New York, and yet miraculously not a Catholic and not (politically) a wet.

A Protestant New Yorker—a politically dry New Yorker—such a man, in spite of being a New Yorker, certainly did not seem to the McAdoo delegates to be so necessarily unpopular as he would have seemed if the convention had not been held in New York and in the presence of the blazing popularity of Al Smith.

Yet there was also a deeper reason. Mr. Davis was against the high tariff. Mr. Davis had denounced the alleged corruptions and extravagances and centralizing tendencies of the Republican administration now in power in Washington. He had denounced them as vigorously as any John the Baptist out in the wilderness of the swamp or prairie States.

The Democratic Party is our one continuous and abiding achievement in American politics. Let a man denounce the tariff as Jefferson denounced it. Let a man denounce alleged corruptions and extravagances and centralizing tendencies at Washington as Jefferson denounced them. Something deep-down, something continuously historic, in the breast of the Democratic Party acclaims that man as a sufficient Democrat.

All details are mere modernisms. The vital proposition is that a Democrat shall be against the tariff and shall accuse the other party of corruption, extravagance, and centralization.

Thomas Jefferson could sit down with John W. Davis and find himself in the strictest and completest accord with him. Davis is in numerous ways eminently satisfactory to New York business interests, not because he is not a Jeffersonian but precisely because he is. He wishes, it is true, to exclude those interests from the benefits of the present high tariff. He openly, it is true, assails the recent depredations committed upon the federal public naval oil domain; and does it as vehemently as Thomas J. Walsh himself could do it. He opposes, it is true, what he calls "special privileges" for the so-called "classes." Then, however, comes the point. He equally ardently backs away, by first impulse, from all alleged "special privileges" for the so-called "masses."

He denounces the multiplication of departments and bureaus for benevolence and beneficence at Washington. He gives no encouragement whatsoever to governmental adventures in the ownership and operation of any business ventures. If he shows no tendencies toward a high tariff, he also shows no tendencies toward government ownership of railroads.

The situation, therefore, in its most condensed form, is as follows:

Mr. Coolidge—so far as he has revealed himself—is essentially in favor of all industrial developments approximately as they are.

Mr. La Follette—so far as he has revealed himself—would bust the trusts and go backward to individualism in general business while at the same time going forward—as it is called—to public ownership of the special central business of railroad transportation.

Mr. Davis—so far as he has revealed himself—is in favor of making the government cease serving alleged private interests through such devices as the tariff while at the same time he gives no countenance to having it serve alleged public interests through such devices as government ownership of railroads.

Mr. Davis opposes both the old governmentalists and the new governmentalists. He is a double-edged sword waving all invaders away from the governmental Garden of Eden. He is an outright test of whether or not there is any room for Jeffersonianism in America today.

In the Driftway

NO publisher has yet whirled up to the Drifter's door in a Rolls-Royce to demand in forty-eight hours the manuscript of the book on "The Smells of a Great City," which the Drifter recently announced (July 2) he was ready to write. The Drifter is not disturbed, though. Indeed, he hopes the publishers will hold off a few weeks longer, in which case he will not have to write the book at all; by that time his friends will have done it for him. At least, that is the present promise, Stanley Alden of North Pownal, Vermont, having already sent in his contribution.

* * * * *

THOUGH it is apparent that the Drifter has followed his nose to signal advantage in New York City, he has yet to smell some of Boston's best offerings [writes Mr. Alden]. Sniffing about the hide streets may be good fun, but has he never discovered Long Wharf, or Salem Street of a Saturday night? Is he unfamiliar with the Cambridge rooming-house odor that every September welcomes back to Oxford Street the returning graduate student; or the clean, oily emanations from classroom and offices of administration that salute students the States over when college reopens in the autumn? Has he sniffed about Baltimore wharves, yet missed the delectable odors of Lexington Street Market of a Saturday morning in spring, when its walks are lined with cullings from the whole Maryland countryside, including the smells thereof? What could be more enticing to the discriminating nose than the scent of geranium leaves newly sprinkled, or the faint aroma of sauerkraut and pickles of a hundred sorts to be had for the smelling all along those market avenues of delight? Has he missed Baltimore when the linden blooms in June? If he is for city smells, let me commend those of the Cowcaddens in Glasgow on a wet day, or of any by-street in an English provincial city such as Worcester or Norwich, where the breweries contribute a sour, pervasive odor like nothing else in this smelly old world.

* * * * *

FOR myself [continues Mr. Alden], I prefer the offerings of rural regions, and can yet recall the thrills I had from discovering the delicious smell of wet bracken on a mist-swept moor, or the spicy pungency arising from sunbaked mesas in Arizona or Colorado when the sage-brush yielded of its acrid strength to the wine-like air of those high places. And here I would waft thanks to that vendor of hot tamales and chile con carne whose wares enchanted my nostrils on a coal-black summer night in Boise, Idaho, when the delicate bouquet of those alien viands drifted to me along with the plaintive sweetness of a guitar thrummed by some languid Mexicano in the placita behind an adobe dwelling. I can smell over again the first coal smoke that drifted to me, a prairie boy, as I used to approach the little Kansas town, my country nose unaccustomed to anything stronger than wood or corncob smoke. How its strangeness set my young heart beating, eager for all the allure of unknown town life! But even that grateful strangeness could hardly vie with the familiar sweet smell of a wet cornfield in late June, or the richness of a wheat-field at harvest time. Then after the wheat had been threshed and hauled to mill, what wholesome, floury odors greeted one at the mill door!

* * * * *

BUT I fancy that the Drifter is too urban to relish these simple delicacies. [He is wrong there, but let him continue.] May I therefore commend to his olfactory nerves the savor of printers' ink in a newspaper office, once smelled, never to be forgotten nor escaped from, as the Drifter knows. May I remind him that there is something to be said for the salutation to one's nose upon opening the door of an old hackney carriage, or upon entering a Pullman berth at night, or when emerging in early morning upon a new-washed deck at sea? Surely in his magnum opus he will not pass by these lowly smells! Let him keep doggedly at his glorious task; I am sure he will nose out perfumes to tickle a thousand delicate noses. He might, even, get a few hints from Cyrano!

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Drafting La Follette

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It looked like any other box, three feet long and two feet wide. The taxi-driver swung the box down from his seat and carried it into 2112 Wyoming Avenue, Washington, and deposited it in the passage. The box looked as if it might contain files of dusty reports.

But they were not dusty. They had come fresh from nearly a quarter of a million hands. The list of the occupations of those hands was in the box, and every industry, every profession—cowboy, ice-man, inventor, the classified and the unclassified—the roll of the people. From across miles, from down in the earth and from the sea appeals for a new leadership met in the box in the passage.

The little committee that had brought the petitions went up the stairs to a book-lined room. Senator La Follette was there and Mrs. La Follette and Bob, Jr., and two friends of years. When Chairman W. T. Rawleigh of the La Follette for President Committee rose to speak for the others, the Senator also rose—there was no other formality. But in the speaker's voice was the fine formality of feeling—so deep that it was like still other words. Chairman Rawleigh was speaking to the friend of his Wisconsin boyhood, the literal log-cabin friend, of whom his father had said: "Watch that boy; we're going to hear from him." In the box down in the passage was the proof of his remembered words.

> On behalf of more than two hundred thousand American citizens. . . . In this crisis we turn to you . . . the one man big enough and strong enough and courageous enough to drive the money changers out of the temple of the government and restore it cleansed to the service of the people. . . .

It was the loud-speaker of the radio, transmitting not one to many, but many voices to one listener.

It came to those who watched that the one thing which Robert La Follette can need is a loud-speaker turned to the people. If his principles and his personality can reach the people undistorted, the people will follow him. Now he was saying:

> I am more moved by this than by any incident of my life. Yet I know that this is no personal tribute. The principles for which we are standing together are greater than any person or any party. When you call for an independent progressive movement, I know that you are right. The two old parties have betrayed the people. . . . I see nothing in either of their platforms on which to build a hope for tomorrow . . . and they have ignored the supreme issue, involving all others: the encroachment of the powerful few upon the rights of the many. . . . This great power has come between the people and their government. . . . We must meet our problem or else lay it upon our children. My friends, from my heart I give you my thanks for your trust in me. I shall answer you and the emergency committee together tomorrow, in Cleveland. Whatever happens, the cornerstone of a new structure has been laid.

There were high moments in the Cleveland convention. There was the moment when the Senator's acceptance came to the delegates. There was the moment when one after another of the progressive groups took the rostrum to indorse him. There was the moment when his platform was adopted, a new statement of liberty in America, every clause cheered in the hall where it had been hissed three weeks before. There were the moments when the representatives of the people came to make their demand for a new day. But there was no more impressive moment than the one in the upper room of his home, where the people sent him their word that they had turned to him. It was a moment prophetic and historic.

Yet the committee left with a jest, which was all serious. Somebody said: "Imagine any nation with a Prime Minister like Ramsay MacDonald trying to go to war with any nation with a President like Robert La Follette."

Portage, Wisconsin, July 10 ZONA GALE

The Perennial Patriot

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wonder if it is realized how ancient is the lineage of the cry of the hundred-percenters, "America for Americans." It might be presumed that had they been makers of records the Indians would be found to have ended every speech with some such sentiment. However that may be, the idea, phrased most concisely, appears in the Reverend Nathaniel Ward's "Simple Cobbler of Agawam." The passage is as follows:

> My heart hath naturally detested foure things: The standing of the Apochrypha in the Bible; forrainers dwelling in my countrey, to crowd out native subjects into the corners of the earth; alchemyzed coins; tolerations of divers religions, or of one religion in segregant shapes.

The volume was published in England in 1647, but Ward was writing as one of the New-English, as he phrased it, in Ipswich, Massachusetts.

Brookings, South Dakota, June 30 WILLIAM H. POWERS

Inbreeding and Degeneracy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wish to call attention to a rather popular fallacy which came out in an article by Charles W. Wood on New York: State of Unwilling Progress in your issue of April 23. He refers to the many isolated communities in upper New York State and attributes the degeneracy and lack of desire for progress to the inbreeding of many generations of American stock.

The conception that degeneracy is due to inbreeding is the fallacy to which I refer. Inbreeding is not detrimental from a scientific standpoint, any more in human beings than it is in animals. All of our finest stocks of domestic animals are the definite result of inbreeding. It is only when the original stock has bad characteristics that inbreeding is detrimental. The great trouble with the isolated communities of New York State, like those all through New England, where many generations of American stock have remained in the same small community, is the fact that these people are the detritus which has been left behind by the wave of Western immigration. Most of the progressive, intelligent, and able members of many succeeding generations have left these communities to seek their fortunes in the cities or in the West. Those who have remained behind have been unfit for various reasons. The resulting inbreeding of this inferior stock has only produced the mean assortment that one would expect from the circumstances.

Conversely, had some factor occurred which had caused the removal of this inferior stock with a survival of physically and intellectually strong, one might have looked for the growth of an unusually able group of people.

CHARLES E. PARSONS, M.D.

Twillingate, Newfoundland, May 15

"The Usual Crime"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Robert Herrick's remarks on "the usual crime" in his article on the Race Problem in the Caribbean, published in your issue of June 11, are excellent, but not nearly strong enough, I believe. The following experience shows how different is the picture in the British West Indies from that painted in our Southern States.

Some years ago when I was on a steamer on my way to Jamaica, I read "White Capital and Black Labor," by Sir Sydney Olivier (now Lord Olivier, Secretary for India in the British Cabinet). The following passage attracted my attention:

> Now the fact is that in the British West Indies assaults by black or colored men on white women or children are practically altogether unknown. No apprehension of them whatever troubles society. I say this as an administrator familiar with the judicial statistics, as a resident familiar with all parts of Jamaica and all classes of its population, as the head of a household of women and girls which have frequented the suburbs of Kingston and lived for weeks and months in remote country districts with neither myself nor any other white man within call. Any resident in Jamaica will tell the same story. A young white woman can walk alone in the hills or to Kingston in daylight or dark, through populous settlements of exclusively black or colored folk without encountering anything but friendly salutation from man or woman. Single ladies may hire a carriage and drive all over the island without trouble or molestation. Offenses against women and children come into the courts: but they are not against white women and children. Whatever may be the cause it is the indisputable fact that Jamaica or any other West Indian island is as safe for white women to go about in, if not safer, than any European country with which I am acquainted.

Lord Olivier had been governor of Jamaica for some years. I happened to be seated at table on this steamer next to the Hon. E. St. John Branch, who was attorney general for the British West Indies, and I asked him what he thought of Olivier's statement. After thinking it over he replied that so far as he could remember no case of assault or attempted assault of a white woman or girl by a Negro had occurred in the courts during his term of office. If I remember correctly, he told me he had been attorney general for seventeen years.

Consider the population statistics of the Island of Jamaica: The total population (according to the 1911 census) was 831,383, of whom 630,181 were black, 163,201 "colored," and 15,605 white. That is to say, there were just fifty black and colored people to one white person. Many of the judges, all the policemen, and all of the troops except commissioned officers were blacks; and there was no such thing as rape of white women.

The Negroes are of the same races as those imported to our country. The slave ships came in general from the same parts of Africa.

What is the answer?

Are we to believe that because of real or imagined ill-treatment here the Negroes have taken to the custom of raping white women, although they do not do it in the West Indies?

Is it reasonable to suppose that if the Negroes do not commit this crime where they greatly outnumber the whites and where there is no danger whatever of their being lynched, they would take to it in a country where the whites outnumber them almost everywhere, where all authority is in the hands of the whites, and where if they should commit such a crime they are almost certain to be caught, likely to be killed without even a semblance of trial, and not improbably under most brutal conditions attended by atrocities such as are seldom found even among savages?

What reliable evidence is there that the assault upon white women by Negroes has ever occurred or been attempted on a scale sufficient so that it might be considered as a likely danger? Certainly the say-so of those who have been implicated in group murders, called lynchings, a say-so which is not given under oath, and not subject to the analysis of cross-examination by legal counsel is not sufficiently convincing.

Can it be that the "usual crime" does not exist and has not existed? (I am speaking, of course, of its existence as a racial tendency, and exclude from consideration sporadic cases of insane degenerates which occur among all races.) If so, it is one of the most despicable lies of all times.

New York, July 1 HUNTINGTON ADAMS

California Blues

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I got sick of your everlasting jeremiads and stopped my subscription to your damned old indigo-mill; but I find I can't do without it and am sending check to renew my subscription. I find by experience that you stand for what is sound and right and don't go pussyfooting around political and social stinkholes. I read that you are out for a third party that will kill the rats that eat the malt that lives in the house that Lincoln built. This is, in the main, my reason for again enlisting under your banner.

Santa Barbara, California, June 30 CHARLES E. STOWE

Contributors to This Issue

DAVID SARNOFF is general manager of the Radio Corporation of America.

GROVER A. WHALEN, until recently Commissioner of Plant and Structures of New York City, was largely instrumental in establishing the New York municipal radio broadcasting plant just opened.

HUDSON MAXIM is famous as the inventor of smokeless powder and other explosives and is a member of the Naval Consulting Board.

H. L. MENCKEN, editor of the American Mercury, contributing editor of The Nation, is the author of many books, among them "In Defense of Women."

GEORGE SOULE is a writer on industrial subjects and a director of the Labor Bureau.

H. K. DICK is a member of the faculty of English at Columbia University.

THOMAS CRAVEN, author of "Paint," is a frequent contributor of art criticism to current periodicals.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS is an anthropologist who has made special studies of Negro types.

OUIDA MEYER is a member of the staff of The Nation.

Books

"He Was an Englishman"

W. S. Gilbert: His Life and Letters. By Sidney Dark and Rowland Grey. George H. Doran Company. $5.

THIS Dark-Grey book about "Gilbert of the Immortal Gilbert and Sullivan" contains many interesting facts, photographs, letters, anecdotes, dates, out of which a biography might very well have been made. The authors show Gilbert in the theater, at home, as lawyer, artist, friend; and yet somehow, perhaps because of the very accumulation of details, they fail to vivify the character of the man who will live a long time in the affections of many because he wrote the "Bab Ballads" and the Savoy opera libretti. What comment there is seems perfunctory, not too discriminating, undeveloped. We should prefer a great deal more criticism, of a different sort, or none. Besides, we suspect that much has been suppressed in compliance with the declared desire > to prove, what is the obvious and first duty of the biographer to prove, that W. S. Gilbert was capable of the most generous appreciation, that the success of the Gilbert and Sullivan collaboration was largely due to his readiness to listen and to change, and that while he had unquestionably a proper idea of the merit of his own work, he never undervalued the work of his collaborator.

Now the Gilbert enthusiast, usually a person strong enough in mind to contemplate his hero as he was, is not going to be greatly reassured by such stressing of a fancied obligation to do a good job in whitewashing. Even the cause of the quarrel with Sullivan, which might possibly have interested some readers, is hurried over in a few sentences. All this arouses the very suspicions that the biographers intend to allay. If Gilbert was unpleasant at times, there is little enough harm in our knowing it. It is clear that Gilbert took himself and his work very seriously indeed, as seriously as ever the captain of the Pinafore did. "He said, and he believed, that the real Gilbert was the Gilbert of 'Broken Hearts.'" Here is attractive matter for speculation.

It would be ungrateful, however, to hint that there is nothing in the book to be thankful for. Two of the "lost Babs" that it restores are good salty fare, "Prince Il Baleine" and "The Three Bohemian Ones." The epilogue to the richly edifying story of the Bohemians goes:

> By strong exceptions Virtue deigns
> To prove how paramount she reigns;
> A standing rule I do not know
> That's been more oft established so.

The letters set out some delectable bits as well, among them this:

> I read the other day of an Irish lady who married a man she didn't like, and when asked why she married him, she replied that she did so entirely that the poor little innocents who (she felt sure) would some day be born to her should have some one to look after them and protect them if she should die during their infancy. I call that subtle.

On our way through the book we learn without amazement that Gilbert admired the Book of Job, but not Jane Austen; that he built his libretti with architectural care; that he approved of the censorship of plays; that at the age of two he was stolen by bandits at Naples and ransomed for twenty-five pounds; that he had an ear for rhythm but not for melody, and a particular liking for Mozart; that he was an admirable conjurer. While all this seems in character, it does not bring us very near to the springs of Gilbert's genius. He is turned round and round, but not revealed. There is too little play of light and shade; all details seem to be of equal importance; there are no leading ideas to govern the chaos of mere fact. It is entirely too like life. Strachey and his followers have spoiled us for this sort of biography.

A doubt, however, will spring up. It may be true in the end that it is quite as difficult to expose Gilbert's secret as it is to expose Hamlet's or Everyman's. Can it be that the Comic Spirit, recognizing a peculiarly favorable medium for its purposes of expression, uses a Gilbert without his real knowledge or consent? We need a new Meredith to reassess the comic germ. However that may be, surely it is in his astounding command of words that we come nearest the thing which makes Gilbert most recognizably Gilbert, as well as in the endlessly varied and easy exploration of rhythms adaptable to English uses. Here he has no rival. Under his wizard's eye, the dictionary, losing shyness, performs a prodigiously agile dance, all with native grace, that leaves no word undizzy. And not only the English dictionary, but the French as well.

But while this technical facility of Gilbert's may interest the initiated who grow green in the contemplation of its finality, it does not explain his success in the theater. He tickles irresistibly the ear and brain of the most heterogeneous audiences in London, New York, and in little provincial summer "parks." It is, of course, all in the manner, for the matter is the stock in trade of all satiric humorists, but the how of the manner is still to seek. Words and ideas clash and kindle. You can always see how the trick begins, but you never see the end of it, because the magician has first laughed you out of thought, and then back again into thought. Your emotions have been worked upon as easily, as pleasantly, and even as mysteriously as by the Mozart grace, the Vermeer coloring, or the cadence of Caroline lyric verse. It may be remembered that Gilbert loved conjuring. He can "trick you into learning with a laugh," and gild very delicately "the philosophic pill," but he survives not by reason of the instruction or the pill.

Since there was more of humor in him than wit he was a conservative; being a poet he could enjoy the wonders in the world and talk about them charmingly; being a satirist as well as a conservative he was not blind to the discrepancy between things as they are and as they might be; being a Victorian he allowed himself the luxury of a little sentimentality. To him belongs the honor both of originating and of perfecting a wholly individual mode of expression, and of bringing back to the comic stage honest craftsmanship and honest merriment.

H. K. Dick

Teachers in Israel

Patriotism of the American Jew. By Samuel Walker McCall. Foreword by Charles W. Eliot. Plymouth Press. $2.50.

Changing Conceptions in Jewish Education. By Emanuel Gamoran. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Bernard Felsenthal, Teacher in Israel. By Emma Felsenthal. Foreword by Cyrus Adler. Oxford University Press. $3.

LET us have books about Jews written either by Jews or by anti-Semites; for the first are at least prevented by the dictates of good taste from the fulsome eulogy and worthless sentimentalizing which Gentile friends of the Children of Israel deem it necessary to bring to the discussions of the Jewish question, and obviously the latter are not guilty of this venial transgression whatever other deadly sins they may commit. These reflections are called forth by the fact that on the crest of the wave of anti-Semitism which recently inundated America have come some books which it is a mortification and a humiliation for a Jew to read. Surely the experience of the past 2,000 years of grace should convince the amiable defenders of the Jew that intolerance is not to be combated by apologia or hatred by flattery.

Thus, even Dr. Eliot's opinion that Governor McCall's book ought to be widely read in the United States does not convince me that there is anything of value in the volume beyond the first and the last two chapters, in which the author generalizes in a liberal and intelligent manner on the dangers of race prejudice and on America's position in the present

Ku Klux crisis. For the rest, it is the usual compilation of historical instances which, though they reflect credit on the Jew, are useless as evidence of Jewish worth and utterly irrelevant to the questions of racial tolerance and America's problem in establishing national amity.

> From the earliest times to the latest [writes Dr. Eliot] the Hebrew race has been to a remarkable extent a literate people, passing down from father to son and from generation to generation the art of reading and writing, the love of letters, and a strong belief in education. On down the centuries the synagogue has been a school for both children and adults, and the rabbis have been teachers of morality, social order, and domestic honor and love.

Dr. Gamoran's volume is a study dealing with the institutional development of this "love of letters" in Europe and America. It is a careful, scholarly work concerned with the broader aspects of the influences which are responsible for the changing concepts as well as with the more concrete manifestations of this evolution. The author regards these developments with a smug and satisfied air; he has played his part in effecting some of the latest changes and he finds them good. In his complacency, Mr. Gamoran occasionally forsakes the critical attitude of the scholar. Hence he, like Dr. Eliot, sees in the numerous commands and injunctions to study the innate Jewish love of learning; it would be more truly interpreted as an important duty which demanded a good deal of emphasis from the prophets of the Bible and the Talmudic sages.

Mr. Gamoran might profit by the genial cynicism of Dr. Felsenthal, who was in a wider sense one of the teachers in Israel. In fact, Rabbi Felsenthal went beyond the confines of his race to teach, and his lecture on Bible Interpretation to a Gentile audience is probably one of the keenest blows at prejudiced theological pedagogy struck in our time. With two other exceptions the selections from his writings given in this volume are addressed entirely to Jews, but they carry implications beyond either sectarian or national problems. Miss Felsenthal's biography of her father is informative, lucid, and restrained.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

An Unquenchable Spirit

The Strike for Union. By Heber Blankenhorn. H. W. Wilson Company. $2.25.

> Shortly before midnight they were awakened by flashlights. Ten khaki-clad men were in the room waving revolvers and they seized Mr. Rykala. All the men went downstairs except one. Just as the door slammed shut, this man leaped at Mrs. Rykala, who was still in bed, violently brushing aside her seven-months-old baby, and falling against it as he hit the bed. With one hand over her mouth, almost strangling her while he covered her with his gun, he speedily overpowered her. Mrs. Rykala is a small, delicate woman who had been in ill health for several months and was able to offer poor resistance. As the thug finished the assault he again threatened to kill her if she told anyone. He was leaving, when two of the other men stepped into the room, looked at her and laughed, making coarse remarks.

THE ten men were the coal and iron police of the Berwind-White Coal Company in Somerset County, Pennsylvania. John Rykala was a miner suspected of union sympathies, and the night was that of May 1, 1922. This is what it may mean to be the wife of a man suspected of union sympathies in the most Christian State of Pennsylvania today.

Mr. Blankenhorn through some obscure chemistry has accomplished a very difficult task. He has succeeded in mixing the oil of emotion with the water of facts, and has given us an account of a strike in the coal-fields which is at once profoundly stirring and meticulously documented. Somerset County is non-union—has always been non-union. Yet when the United Mine Workers struck in the spring of 1922 Somerset County went out with them. There was no organization, no call, but by a curious telepathy the pits were emptied almost spontaneously. And then in the face of guards, guns, evictions, courts, constabulary, and such incidents as that quoted above the county proceeded to organize.

> In some places an accordion led the throng. Then the arriving jitney and acclaiming hullabaloo—"it's the organizers." The climax would be the dead silence surrounding groups of men, hats off, right hands upheld, repeating, phrase after phrase, the oath of allegiance to the union.

The story of the strike, which lasted a year and more before Messrs. Rockefeller, Berwind, Gary, and Mellon finally broke it, its sidelights on labor politics, on the stake of the public in the coal industry, on waste and mismanagement and overdevelopment, on the status of the Constitution in the remoter sections of the Appalachians—are important, and admirably set forth by Mr. Blankenhorn. But more important still is the fact that even generations in the mines cannot quench the human spirit; that, living under a feudalism black as any to be found in the tenth century, men could still come laughing from the pits, still hold up their right hands and swear allegiance to the union, still close their ranks through a winter of privation and suffering, still faint and starve, aye, and die, as a protest and a sign against the intolerable degradation of modern industrialism. It's this which beats the breath from the heart and blinds the eyes with tears!

STUART CHASE

A Modernist Primer

A Primer of Modern Art. By Sheldon Cheney. Boni and Liveright. $6.

THE history of art has revealed many curious phenomena, but nothing so extraordinary as the incredible theories put forth in defense of the more recent tendencies of painting. The plastic arts, essentially the simplest and most perspicuous of all creative forms, have become so heavily encumbered with speculative nonsense that one begins to despair of criticism, and to wish that psychology had never been invented. No wonder the layman is tempted to regard modernism as an esoteric cult, half-science, half-nerves—a meaningless practice devoid of the sanity of human conflicts and aspirations. Mr. Sheldon Cheney's book is no exception. Not in a long time have I seen a work that promises so much and accomplishes so little. With every intention of writing a primer, the author has condensed the theoretical aspects of art into journalistic enigmas, and has with results that are bewildering and pointless made the appreciation of pictures dependent on a set of popular laboratory formulations. In the first place, his desire to display an unusual acquaintance with names and movements has led him to include everything in the modernist category—painting, sculpture, mobile color, the theater—and to praise nonentities and eccentrics if they happen to conform to European mannerisms. In the second, his opinions, while entertaining and cleverly translated into newspaper English, are borrowed from untrustworthy sources.

The aesthetics of the "Primer" is a rather unstable compound of expressionism and Clive Bell. "What is art?" asks the lay reader. "Art," answers Mr. Cheney paraphrasing Mr. Bell, "is expressive form." "And what is expressive form?" "Expressive form," answers Mr. Cheney in the language of Mr. Bell, "is that which provokes the aesthetic emotion." "And the aesthetic emotion?" Here the author is not so facile, but from the general trend of his ideas one gathers that the aesthetic emotion is something very rare indeed. It is indispensable to the enjoyment of art, and yet it is limited to a handful of cosmopolitan hedonists; in common with other emotions it has its basis in human feelings, and yet it is somehow unique. The favored souls capable of this aesthetic excitement understand the purity of art, that is to say, they divorce from the object all representational elements, all racial reflections, all meaning, and derive a peculiar ecstasy from the abstract harmonics of lines and colors in dynamic combinations. This sort of reasoning may be attributed directly to the curse of half-baked psychoanalysis. Better the descriptive oratory of Ruskin and his disciples than the barren hedonism of the intellectual abstractionists. The truth is that Mr. Cheney is quite as academic in his approach as was, for instance, Walter Pater. To both of these men the whole significance of art is contained in the object: the difference lies in the fact that Pater described pictures in terms of an inordinately refined sentimentalism, whereas the modernist critic describes them in the shifting theories of contemporary psychology.

Until critics take into account the social values of art, and discover its importance as an integral factor in progressive experience, the painter is doomed, I fear, to remain in the isolation which makes him either an outcast or a snob. The theoretical function of criticism is to guide and assist our objectifying faculties by pointing out the relation of current activities to individual needs. Criticism in a professional sense should be an extension of these activities to a larger field, a field where new ideas and new explorations, as they take form in pigment, are considered as possessing an intimate connection with general demands. It is undeniable that the late efflorescence of abstract designs sprang from a widespread feeling of necessity, from a dissatisfaction with imitation and a revolt against unreflective naturalism; but Mr. Cheney, when he touches on the problem, falls back on the expressionistic formula. With him expressionism is a vague and technical affair excusing anything that occurs in art, and he does not take the trouble to show how this doctrine, perhaps the most popular aesthetic doctrine in the world today, has a certain philosophical justification in the lyrical attitude of Croce. Whatever may be said of art as a personal expression, the subject finally arrives at the point where it becomes an object of communication with a definite social value. In this respect it resembles political, economic, and ethical ideas which, according to the richness of their content, are so much change destined to circulate as long as it is related to practical needs, as long as it affords a release for new activity. Art, therefore, is representative of ideational tendencies as well as dreams of beauty and drama, and takes a distinct place in the general evolution and development of thought. It becomes, in short, an ingredient of progressive experience. It is with art as such an ingredient that fundamental criticism is concerned.

THOMAS CRAVEN

Confusion Worse Confounded

Confusion. By James Gould Cozzens. B. J. Brimmer. $2.

"CONFUSION," although it is cleverly joined, is not well written. Speaking of a husband released from military duty, Mr. Cozzens says: "The leisure which Pierre had been denied at the Post enabled him to play the lover now." It may require but a slight correction to give the author's intended meaning—"Leisure, which Pierre had been denied at the Post, enabled him to play the lover now"—yet the significance of such a confusion of thought is multiplied by the frequency of its occurrence, as well as by the overabundant evidence of incoherence in style, particularly the continued misuse of "and." One might attempt to wave such things aside if, as often in Dreiser's case, the style added power to the subject; unfortunately, in this volume, the suave culture of a thousand years receives the same slipshod presentation as the modern mummery of the flapper. It seems hardly necessary to point out absurdities in the tale, such as the infantile speculations of the women when Cerise is born; or the fact that although the twelve-year-old Cerise (on page 55) drives an auto at a speed of over forty miles an hour, with a wave of the hand to passersby, the mature Cerise (on page 299) is to be taught how to drive. Errors of this sort seem the inevitable accompaniment of confusion.

Nevertheless, Mr. Cozzens has worked cleverly, effecting by triple shifting an impression of growth. The first section of his tale is in the land of Carefreedledom, that pre-war paradise in which gold flows like wine and culture is the inheritance of any fair heroine. In this ideal land Cerise learns her six languages, her fencing, shooting, swimming, riding, driving, while the fresh ardor of a beautiful spirit of nature grows in her. The twelve-year-old tomboy stands rapt before a marble Aphrodite, "sunk immediately in the old amazement"; she sits breathless, facing the sunset, until, "at last able to look away from the evening and the soft fields," she calls for a story of old. From this pre-war El Dorado she is transported to our own times, to the men and the maids and the maze of Jazzbohemia; in the round of petty maneuvers for petting privileges, Cerise first endures, then pities, then embraces, while the young Mr. Cozzens trails the young Scott Fitzgerald. The embraces of Jazzbohemia are barren, these writers proclaim; the unsatisfied heroine seeks beyond. In the third stage of the tale the author, brave as the early A. S. M. Hutchinson, achieves his distinction: he sends Cerise for her solution beyond the mundane sphere. She dreams of escape with one hero—at once his aeroplane crashes him to death; she flees from her thoughts with another—a train splinters their automobile and kills the man. In the hospital (in a chapter called White Roses) Cerise seems on the way to recovery; she ponders, decides that life has nothing of value to offer, and she dies. Her tale has united two great periods and types of literary bunk; her death bids for the teardrops of a third. That it should all be taken seriously is a tribute to Mr. Cozzens's skill at cozenage.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

The African at Home

The Bagesu and Other Tribes of the Uganda Protectorate. Part Three of the Report of the Mackie Ethnological Expedition to Central Africa. The Macmillan Company. $6.50.

WITH this work Cannon Roscoe completes the series of three volumes constituting the report of the Mackie Expedition to Central Africa, the other two being "The Banyankole" and "The Bakitara." The expedition itself took place during the years 1919 and 1920, and supplemented the author's previous large experience in Africa, where he has been missionary and student of native life in this region for many years. This third volume, unlike the two which have preceded it, is hardly more than field notes, rather than a monographic study of a single tribe. At the same time, it emphasizes the point which is perhaps one of the most difficult for the lay reader to comprehend when thinking of "primitive" peoples—the individuality of one tribal group in its customs and manners as against another, and the importance of not grouping large numbers of peoples under one heading and saying that they all do one sort of thing or another in the same fashion.

The first people described in the book, the Bagesu, live on the slope of Mount Elgon, a snow-covered peak not far from the Equator lying immediately to the northeast of Lake Victoria Nyanza. These people, "one of the most primitive of the Negro tribes of Africa," live high on the mountain side, where they find refuge and shelter in caves. Driven there by their fierce and more competent neighbors, the Nandi, Masai, and the Abyssinians, they found safety in the high places, where the cold and the ease with which they might hurl missiles on their approaching foes made for safety for them. The caves are also used to shelter their cattle, which are taken out to graze only at night, when raiders are near; at other times they graze about the villages in which their masters live. The tribe is divided into clans, which, to the surprise of Cannon Roscoe (who in matters of social organization is greatly influenced by the theories of Sir James Frazier), are to all appearances quite unconnected with totems. These clans seem to be of significance in regulating the marriage relationship, marriage within the clan being forbidden. Although living in this cold climate, their clothing is scanty, and their ideas of sanitation, both personal and in regard to their habitations, are simple. Their occupations are mainly agriculture and herding, though the number of cattle they possess is small as compared with the herds of the great cattle-keeping peoples about them. Pottery-making is done by anyone who wishes, there being no special class, and the knowledge of iron-working, usually so extensive in Africa, is rudimentary. The ceremonials which mark birth, death, marriage, and puberty are elaborate, and women, to be eligible for marriage, must scar themselves in stated patterns by raising keloids, which are disfiguring marks made by scratching the body and irritating the wound as it heals by rubbing dirt and ashes in it.

On the northeastern slope of the mountain the expedition found the Basabei, who are described as semi-pastoral. They, too, are divided into clans, and, as among the Bagesu, the clans regulate the division of the land. Each has its own head-man, who controls it and its relations to the other clans, and settles disputes between its members. Unlike some of the strictly cattle peoples to the west, the diet of these people includes vegetable food as well as meat and milk, although in many of their ceremonies the use of cattle resembles that of these other groups. They busy themselves with herding their cattle and working their land, making pottery and knife-blades and spear heads of iron, by building their houses and hunting the wild animals that abound, by dancing and warring. Here, both girls and boys are initiated into the mysteries of adulthood by rigorous and painful operations. The marriage customs of the tribe differ largely from those of the Bagesu, for, whereas there the fathers arrange for the marriage of their sons, the Basabei couple settle matters themselves and then announce the fact to their parents. Other tribes more or less sketchily described, often merely as notes to be added to the earlier accounts collected by the same writer in his "Northern Bantu," are the Bateso, a Nilotic tribe living to the north of Lake Kioga; the Busoga, an early tributary of the Bakitara, whom they resemble in most of their customs, such as the meat and milk taboos, the importance placed on cattle, their political organization, the Bakyiga, who live to the west of Lake Victoria Nyanza, and who are agriculturists as well as cattle-keepers; and still other tribes barely mentioned.

The book is interesting for the diversity of customs set forth for peoples living in a comparatively restricted area, although the shortness of the presentation with regard to each people is disappointing. It is also to be wished that Mr. Roscoe had occasionally let the people speak for themselves, and that, instead of devoting all his space to straight description, had taken and given translations of verbatim texts of some of the customs and ceremonials observed, so that these rapidly disappearing peoples might have left some account of their own for the student of the future. And it is to be doubted whether such illustrations as the one which shows the commissioner's camping ground is of any too great ethnographic interest or value. At the same time, the usefulness of this work must not be underestimated. Authoritative works on the African tribes are all too few for us not to welcome one which is carefully done and done without prejudice. And Mr. Roscoe is quite right when he states that "the origin of these pastoral people of the Lake Region still remains a mystery" and that "there still remains to be accomplished the more difficult . . . task of procuring information from the tribes along the frontier of Abyssinia." It is to be hoped that some light on the prehistoric migrations of the African peoples will eventually be forthcoming, but until many more careful works are given us, the problem will remain insoluble.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

Drama

Four Plays from Old Japan

WHILE the music revues are gathering up the jaded population of New York and are holding out alluring enchantments to any lingering convention delegates, a company of young people are offering a group of plays brought to this country from Japan and produced at the Threshold Theater under the direction of Mr. Michio Itow. Mr. Itow, who comes from the Imperial Theater of Tokio, which was destroyed in last autumn's earthquake, has selected an unfortunate time at which to present his efforts. The season well over, and a large proportion of the city's theatergoers fleeing to more inviting regions and leaving for the most part busy workers who seek lighter forms of entertainment, the Japanese plays seem an eminently worthy effort, but a sadly wasted one.

Splendid in certain features—notably lighting, scenic effect, costuming, and the glamorous atmosphere of Mr. Pogany's enchanting murals—they do not succeed in creating the hoped-for illusion. The flower is there and it is beautiful—but it is scentless. After all, in an Oriental play it is the Orientalism that counts for most. There is nothing Oriental about a bouncing young American, and most of the actors, under their make-up and gorgeous clothes, were hardly more than that. With the outstanding exception of Mr. Louis Smith, whose makeup was a highly artistic achievement, the characters, analyzed singly or as a group, missed the intangible illusion without which no amount of scenery could make their efforts thoroughly satisfying.

Of the four plays presented two, "Somebody-Nothing" and "The Fox Grave," were short comic sketches—comic in an inscrutable fashion that reminded one of the most humane Mikado that ever did in Japan exist. There was the master with his two henchmen, and one waited for the introduction of the boiling oil or the melted lead. Mr. Smith, mentioned before, was the master, and as he stood bedeviling his faithful but conniving attendants with smiling ferocity, against a magnificent backdrop of a pale color on which one huge gnarled tree in gorgeous blues and greens spread its stocky branches, one might have been looking at a Hiroshigi print miraculously vitalized.

The longer plays were less effective, if more ambitious. "Forsaken Love," a "poetical comedy," is a melancholy fantasy in which a dashing young Samurai falls in love with a beauteous maiden and, coldly ignored, decides to "renounce the world" and seek consolation in the arms of Buddha. He gets him to his nunnery and makes friends with the children and animals who play about the temple. She, meanwhile, repenting and realizing that she had dallied too lightly with that which she most wanted, seeks the shrine to make confession and expiate her cruelty. There is a lovely scene between them, as with stoic renunciation the young priest closes the gate to her and thereby ends all possible connection with his mundane life. Albert Bliss as Tokiyori, "the heartbroken," does some very good work—if sometimes his manner is rather too Occidental.

Perhaps the most ambitious of the plays was the tragedy "Bushido," bloody, full of intrigue, self-sacrifice, and devotion to cause and monarch. There were many truly dramatic moments in the action—most moving of all the spectacle of a mother willing to see her only son slain almost before her eyes, as a substitute for the sacred little prince to whose honor and protection her life—and her child's—had been consecrated. The closing episode, as the dead child's parents, bowed in sorrow but serene in the righteousness of their sacrifice, remove their outer clothing and prepare for the burial of their slain child, is extremely well done. It leaves an impression of the sincerity as well as the technical potentiality of these players, and the hope that Mr. Itow will give New York a chance to know the plays of his country on some more opportune occasion.

OUIDA MEYER

International Relations Section

Russia's Bill of Damages

MUCH has been said about Russia's debts and the claims on behalf of other nations against Russia for damages and expropriation of property, but little has been said about Russia's claims. In a recent issue of its news letter the Rosta Agency published a summary of the counter-claims put forward by Russia, chiefly at the Genoa Conference in 1922. A part of the text follows:

The Soviet losses were divided in the Genoa memorandum into four main categories. The first category included the following main items: Gold exported from the state treasury illegally (by Kolchak and others), destruction of food and other property, known damages caused to railways, river transport, etc., which can be accurately estimated, and which are based on direct documentary evidence. Altogether, this category totals 12,213,160,000 gold rubles.

The second category consists of domestic losses which cannot be estimated so exactly. In particular, it includes deterioration and damage of railways, water transport, town buildings, peasants' stock, etc., and pensions to be paid to victims of the civil war (on the precedent of the Versailles treaty). The total losses of the second category are estimated at 11,271,590,000 gold rubles.

The third category is still more difficult to estimate in figures, but the damages are no less real. In includes the losses sustained by Soviet foreign trade by the blockade; and losses resulting from reduced industrial and agricultural production. The estimated total is 15,560,220,000 gold rubles.

The fourth category cannot be estimated in figures. No attempt was made to do so. It is certain that, if all the losses enumerated could be computed, they would make an immense total. Among the items included are: Stores and movable property carried off by invading armies (not included in any of the previous categories), the loss in live stock, the value of food crops not reaped as a result of invasion, the famine, in so far as it was made more severe by the blockade which prevented the import of agricultural machinery, etc., the epidemics of typhus and other infectious diseases, in so far as the consequences of blockade made it impossible to struggle against them successfully, the material losses resulting from pogroms, chiefly in south and east Russia, various properties of the state, municipalities, and other organizations carried off from Russian territory, or sums standing to the credit of those bodies in foreign banks, etc.

Without, however, including the losses and damages of the fourth category, the bill of damages thus amounts to 39,044,970,000 gold rubles, or roughly about £4,000,000,000. According to Mr. Lloyd George's estimate, Great Britain is responsible for over 50 per cent of the total damages and losses, or at least £2,000,000,000. This total, it must be emphasized, does not include all the actual material damages and losses suffered by the Soviet Union as a result of the Allied intervention and blockade.

Loss of Life and Human Suffering

It is, of course, impossible to estimate in cold figures the terrible suffering inflicted on 130,000,000 human beings by the civil war which was fostered by the Allies for nearly four years, or the agony of the prolongation and intensification of the famine by the Allied blockade (which Mr. Lloyd George called "the death cordon"), or the miseries resulting from the impossibility of fighting, without soup, disinfectants, linen, etc., the epidemics which always follow in the wake of famine. There is no mathematical means of estimating the suffering of the numerous widows and, above all, of the orphans, left helpless as a result of the civil war, famine, and epidemics.

The actual loss of life resulting from the civil war, the famine, the diseases was enormous. But it was, perhaps, the least terrible of all the sufferings inflicted upon the Russian people as a result of the Allied intervention and blockade.

Although all this suffering cannot be computed in exact monetary terms, the British Government has itself provided a rough measure for translating suffering and death into terms of money.

On January 16, 1920, when the Allied intervention and blockade were still in force, Mrs. O. F. Davidson was executed in Leningrad on a charge of espionage, and in the summer of the same year Mrs. Stan Harding was imprisoned on a similar charge. The justice of these sentences, or the guilt or innocence of the victims, does not concern us here. In June, 1923, the British Government claimed compensation on behalf of Mrs. Davidson and Mrs. Harding in the following note to the Soviet Government:

> The claims in question have been carefully examined. Assessment has been made on calculations derived from precedents which have occurred in other countries in the past. Without claiming the full amounts thus arrived at, His Majesty's Government propose that the Soviet Government shall pay the sum of £3,000 in respect of the claim of Mrs. Stan Harding and of £10,000 in respect of the claim of Mrs. Davidson.
>
> These moderate claims are presented in the hope that it may be possible to arrive at an immediate settlement by agreement. If the Soviet Government is unwilling to agree to the figures mentioned, His Majesty's Government are prepared to submit the assessment of the claims to the judgment of an arbitrator appointed by both parties. In that event, however, His Majesty's Government hold themselves at liberty to put forward figures based on the detailed actuarial calculations on which there have been worked out figures which they only refrain from putting forward in the hope that the presentation of the more modest estimate will afford a chance of immediate settlement.

Both sums were paid by the Soviet Government.

If these two cases were accepted as standards, and £10,000 were claimed by the Soviet for every Soviet citizen who lost his or her life directly or indirectly as a result of the Allied blockade and intervention, and £3,000 for every Russian citizen who suffered from the same causes as much as Mrs. Stan Harding suffered from her imprisonment, the sum total would run into many thousands of millions of pounds sterling.

China and Russia Agree

THE text of the recent agreement between the Soviet Government and China has not been made public, but the following article by George Chicherin, Russian Commissar for Foreign Affairs, printed in the International Press Correspondence for June 19, discusses the present relations between China and Russia:

Everyone of us and also every Chinese who has the interests of his people at heart will breathe more easily on learning that the impenetrable wall which separated us from China has at last been thrown down. It is high time! China could have no reason whatever for refusing to resume normal relations with us. The Chinese Government is not a creditor of the Soviet Union and could not make use of the question of the recognition of the Soviet Union in an attempt to compel payment of debts by us. It has hesitated so long over the recognition of the Soviet Union because it did not itself wish to recognize us. It began the blockade against the RSFSR at the beginning of 1918; later it rendered service to the interventionists and hesitated until recently to recognize us for one and the same reason: because of the pressure of the Entente Powers.

Even now the agreement between Comrade Karachan and the Chinese Foreign Minister, Wellington Koo, had to be prepared with the greatest secrecy. The diplomacy of the great Powers at first prevented the signing of our agreement with China and even now would not have permitted it if we had not succeeded in concealing from them the diplomatic documents during the negotiations.

The signing of this agreement by the Chinese Government is therefore a big stride on the road to the liberation of the politics of the colonial and semi-colonial peoples from the yoke of the great Powers. The significance of this independent act of Chinese policy extends far beyond the frontiers of China. It is an historical event in the emancipation movement of the Eastern peoples. China thereby shows that it is following the same road as Turkey did in Sakarien and in Lausanne, as Persia did in the year 1920, and Afghanistan at the beginning of the rule of the Emir Amanuli. The process of the awakening of the peoples of the Orient, their fight against imperialistic suppression, the establishment of their complete freedom is going steadily and inevitably forward. The forces of the Eastern peoples are gradually growing. They are increasing in political and economic strength with every day.

Thereby their friendly relations with the Soviet Union are strengthened. These friendly relations represent one of the most important elements of that historical process which embraces the whole East. These relations become more firm with every success of the Eastern peoples on the road to emancipation. In the same way the resumption of normal relations with the Soviet Union is for China a gigantic step forward on the road to emancipation from the foreign yoke, and, vice versa, its further advance along the same road will conduce to a further strengthening of the friendship with the Soviet Union.

The normal relations between the Soviet Union and China must be of the friendliest nature, and this truth has penetrated deep into the consciousness of the broadest masses in China. The peoples of the Soviet Union will proceed together hand in hand and render each other the fullest support in every respect. The broad masses of China, among whom the name of Lenin has become the most popular, thoroughly realize that the Soviet Republic is their only consistent and entirely disinterested friend. It is precisely because Chinese public opinion recognizes this that it has exercised such persistent pressure upon the Chinese Government and demanded an understanding with the Soviet Union. The undisguised, brutally cynical act of American diplomacy, which endeavored by intimidation and by open pressure to prevent China from coming to an agreement with us, has still further roused Chinese public opinion and thereby accelerated the favorable solution of the senseless crisis, which had already lasted too long, between the Soviet Union and China.

The strengthening of the Eastern peoples who are striving after emancipation, the transference of their whole foreign policy and their inner life to entirely new lines is therefore one of the general causes which led to the restoration of normal relations between ourselves and China. Another general cause consists in the fact that the international policy of a whole series of great Powers has taken, only partially but nevertheless noticeably, a new course. The bourgeoisie of the strongest Western Powers has, if one may so express it, changed from the right horse to the left, among other reasons because their old policy in colonial and semi-colonial countries threatened them with imminent disaster. They were obliged to adopt other methods, to proceed to compromises, to carry out a policy of peaceful penetration. This new colonial policy of the bourgeoisie of the strongest countries meets with essential obstacles; capital seeks and will always seek in the colonies for surplus profit, it will not invest in the colonies for the same rate of interest with which it is content at home. And in order to be able to obtain a surplus profit it will always endeavor to create suitable political conditions. The Soviet Republic alone remains a constant and sincere friend of the Eastern peoples. But the absolute failure of the policy of the mailed fist in the East is compelling the great Powers to adopt a line of compromise. . . .

The appearance of the Soviet Union on the coast of the Pacific Ocean as a power friendly to China immediately raises the question of the world-importance of the Pacific Ocean. The political and economic interests of the world reach out more toward the Pacific. It is the ocean of the future. The prospects which the resumption of normal, that is to say, friendly relations between the Soviet Union and China open will only become gradually clear to us. Already today we can trace in general outline the enormous importance of this event.

A New Famine Year in Russia?

THE Press Bureau of the People's Commissariat of Foreign Affairs issued the following statement which was published in the Moscow press on June 20:

The foreign press has recently carried a report that a bad crop is expected in the USSR. . . . The following authoritative statement by the "Exportkhlieb" (state grain-exporting organization) explains the actual state of affairs:

"The information which is being spread by the hostile foreign press does not correspond to the actual state of the crops on this date. There have been no cases of frozen seed. Some cases of too rapid growth due to rainy fall weather were reported in the northwest and in some localities in the northeast. In the first instance they are of no importance since they affected only an insignificant area in a non-producing but consuming region, while in the southeast the crops have become normal during the last ten days of May.

"The state of the crops in May, according to the five-mark system (with 3 as the normal average) as compared with 1923, is best shown in the following table:

Region	1923	1924
Consuming	2.2	2.4
Producing	2.6	2.7
Southeast	2.7	2.6
Ukraine	3.3	2.9

"The area affected by locusts was 2,115,000 dessiatins in 1923 and 1,473,000 dessiatins in 1924. The area affected by field-mice was 8,700,000 dessiatins in 1923 and 7,673,000 dessiatins in 1924.

"Locusts infested only the Caspian region and Azerbaijan, which have little effect on the total harvest in the Union. Field-mice invaded the Volga region but the department for the protection of plants in the Commissariat of Agriculture, with the assistance of the local population, carried on an effective campaign for their extermination. Even if the whole crop in the region invaded by field-mice should be destroyed it would be foolish to describe the crop of the Union as a failure considering the total area under cultivation in 1923-1924.

"The crops might have been badly affected by the drought during the last ten days of May when the prospects decreased from 3.2 on May 15 to 2.9 on June 1. But the rain during early June improved the situation. . . . Thanks to the rainfall the crop conditions are normal in the Ukraine, the southeast, and in parts of the Volga region. Only in the province of Tsaritsin have the crops been lost.

"It is evident from these facts that there is no general crop failure in the USSR."

June 19, 1924

Articles on international aspects of the oil question will appear in early issues of The Nation, including: Russian Oil and American Oil Kings, by Louis Fischer; Oil and Revolution in Albania, by Emil Lengyel.

The AMALGAMATED BANK

103 East 14th St. COR. 4TH AVE. AT UNION SQ.

OFFERS EVERY BANKING FACILITY

MEMBER FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

One Dollar Starts a THRIFT ACCOUNT

ACCOUNTS OPENED ON OR BEFORE JULY 31st WILL RECEIVE INTEREST FROM JULY 1st.

4%

Compounded Quarterly

CHECKING ACCOUNTS INVITED

Business—Personal—Organization

BANKING HOURS

Mon., 9 a.m.-8 p.m.
Sat., 9 a.m.-5 p.m.
other days 9 a.m.-6 p.m.

MONEY TRANSMITTED TO EVERY PART OF THE WORLD

The efficiency of our Foreign Department is recognized by over 300 responsible Banks, which send their remittances to Russia through the Amalgamated Bank. Over $5,000,000 has been remitted in a little over a year.

NEW YORK'S FIRST LABOR BANK

Midol

headache
toothache
neuralgia

Does not affect the heart

Non habit forming

For Headache

General Drug Co.
94 N. Moore St., New York

MARX'S CIVIL WAR IN FRANCE has now for the first time been published in cloth binding: in the same volume is the COMMUNIST MANIFESTO by Marx and Engels. Both are invaluable historical documents. Price 60c. postpaid. Ask for book catalog.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

NEW ADDRESS: W. BEYER'S BOOKSHOP

From June 1st: 213 West 43rd Street

Just West of Times Square—Broadway

Large stock of German and American books New and Second Hand

A BEAUTIFUL PLACE IN THE BERKSHIRE HILLS FOR A WEEK-END or an EXTENDED VISIT

5th SEASON

Rates $7 a day and $37.50 a week. Address E. G. Ohmer, Western View Farm, New Milford, Connecticut, 2½ hours from New York. Telephone New Milford 153—Ring 2. Among our guests, such persons as Mr. Louis Untermeyer, Edgar E. Robinson, F. Luis Mora, Dr. Ludwig Lewisohn, Mme. Helen Teschner-Tas, Sara Teasdale, Jessie B. Rittenhouse, C. Bertram Hartman, B. W. Huebsch, Suzanne La Follette, Margaret Woodrow Wilson, William and Marguerite Zorach, Mary Ellis, Frank Alvah Parsons, Babette Deutsch, W. E. Woodward, Ernest Gruening, Lee Simonson, Sidney Howard, Clare Eames, Dr. and Mrs. Charles A. Beard, George Ochs Oakes and Irwin Edman have attested to the qualities which give this spot the atmosphere of a home—with all its comforts and none of its responsibilities.

BASH BISH LODGE, Copake Falls, N.Y.

A Camp for Adults

IN THE BERKSHIRES

Less than 3 hours' ride from New York

TENNIS, BATHING, DANCING, ETC.

Rates $30 per Week—$6 per day

Address RUBENSTEIN & LEIKIN

Bash Bish Lodge Copake Falls, N. Y.
Tel. 31, Ring 4 City tel. Intervale 2667

The Lloyd—on Great South Bay

Bellport, L. I.

Wonderful Location Excellent Table All Sports

Cool, Comfortable, Charming

CAMP U.TO PIA

LAKE ELLIS, WINGDALE, N. Y.

A Vacation Ground for Grown-Ups in the Berkshire Hills

120 minutes from Grand Central

WM. J. PERLMAN, Managing Director
DR. WILL DURANT, Associate Director

Telephone 10 - F4

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

5 MILES ABOVE LAKE GEORGE

An ideal spot for rest and fun

Rates $25 per week. Accommodations limited to 25

Reservations booked to Aug. 15—Open until Oct. 1

An opportunity to spend Indian Summer in the Adirondacks.

Fare for round trip to Lake George, $12.28.

For booklet, address Lena Barish.

Watkins 1281 21 Seventh Ave., N. Y. C.

THE RUSSIAN INN

33 West 37th St., N. Y., near 5th Ave.

LUNCHEON DINNER SUPPER

Unique After Theatre Entertainment

Music and Singers

The final article in
Agnes de Lima's series
THE NEW EDUCATION
will appear in next week's issue of
THE NATION

SPEAKERS: We assist in preparing special articles, papers, speeches, debates. Expert scholarly service. AUTHOR'S RESEARCH BUREAU, 500 Fifth Avenue, New York.

STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY

AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

BELL SYSTEM

One Policy, One System, Universal Service

ANY CHANGE OF ADDRESS

should be mailed to our Subscription Department at least two weeks before it is to become effective. This will insure uninterrupted delivery of The Nation to you, and will materially lessen the pressure of work in our office. When notifying us be sure to give both old and new addresses and stipulate the exact date upon which you desire the change made.

SUBSCRIPTION DEPARTMENT

The Nation

20 Vesey Street New York, N. Y.

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 30, 1924 No. 3082

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 105
EDITORIALS:
1914-1924 108
Just Another Conference? 109
A Good Ship Gone 109
Literature in Limbo 110
WHEELER AND BRYAN AND DAWES. By William Hard 111
WORKING TOWARD DISARMAMENT. By James T. Shotwell 112
HOW FRANCE WENT TO WAR. By Lewis S. Gannett 113
WHY MATTEOTTI HAD TO DIE. By James Fuchs 114
THE NEW EDUCATION:
III. Following the Child's Lead. By Agnes de Lima 116
READING ON SHIPBOARD. By Ruth S. Alexander 118
A STRIKE AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT. By Roger N. Baldwin 120
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 122
CORRESPONDENCE 122
TWO SONNETS. By Robert L. Wolf 124
BOOKS:
A Voyager's Epic. By Alexander Goldenweiser 124
Where Do We Go from Here? By John M. Gaus 125
Elegant and Commodious. By J. W. Krutch 125
Nordic History. By William E. Dodd 126
Suspense. By Alice Beal Parsons 127
Social Living. By Kimball Young 127
With Apologies to Socrates. By John B. Watson 128
Books in Brief 128
WHAT IS MODERN ARCHITECTURE? By Fiske Kimball 128
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
They Were Born . . . They Died 130
The Disarmament Treaty 131

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY IRITA VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

"HARD-BOILED, HARD-BITTEN, HARD-HEADED, hard-fisted"—that is the way William Hard describes La Follette's choice for his running-mate—Burton K. Wheeler of Montana. Wheeler is, indeed, the kind of man who has learned to fight with a smile on his face. All his life he has had to fight. The son of a Massachusetts shoemaker, he fought to earn his way through college. His legal practice in the city of Butte, Montana, was built on fighting. He fought through to success workmen's-compensation claims against the copper companies, which had seemed hopeless in a copper-controlled State. During the war he stood firm and refused to pervert his office as federal district attorney to persecute the industrial radicals who, in Montana, as elsewhere, were branded as "traitors" when they continued to fight their class war. He waged the bitter fight which forced the infamous Daugherty out of office, despite a violent campaign to discredit him and the witnesses who, being Daugherty's associates, were naturally low-lived men. He did not hesitate when, as part of the attempt to stop his investigation, he was indicted on a trumped-up charge in his home State. Despite his complete exoneration by the Senate committee which investigated the charge, it will doubtless be raked up and pressed during the campaign. But Wheeler is used to that kind of tactics; like La Follette, he has stood abuse, and he emerges from such campaigns of vilification better loved and more trusted than ever.

WHEELER'S NOMINATION will add clearness to the issues of the campaign. He and John W. Davis are both able lawyers, but they made different choices long ago. Wheeler chose the defense of poor men, and, for himself, relative poverty; Davis went into virtual partnership with the House of Morgan, became a director of the Santa Fe Railroad, the Rubber Trust, and the National Bank of Commerce, and, presumably, was one of the 357 men who reported incomes over $300,000 in 1922. He chose to be primarily a business man rather than a lawyer. Such choices are in part deliberate, in part instinctive; but they reveal the heart of the men more than all their campaign speeches put together. Davis believes in big business and is proud of the fact that the biggest corporations in the country have selected him to defend them. Wheeler made his fame in opposition to the Copper Trust. Such differences mean more than erudition, diplomacy, or personal charm—although Wheeler is by no means a rough Montana diamond; they betray the inner urge which will move a man in time of crisis. Faced, for instance, with a nationwide railroad strike or mine strike, Davis, we suspect, would seek, lawyer-like, a legal way to crush the strike; Wheeler would seek to end the human abuses which brought it on.

SENATOR WHEELER remains a Democrat, just as Senator La Follette and the North Dakota Nonpartisan Leaguers retain the designation "Republican." Some of the Eastern Republicans and Democrats are perturbed at this "robbery" of party names; they seem to believe that parties remain eternally fixed and stable, and that all good party men should religiously indorse the personal choices of their bosses. But were the Republicans who supported Mitchel for mayor in New York City a few years ago therefore ruled out of their party? Did Democrats who bolted Tammany, or gold-standard men who refused to support Bryan, forfeit the right to call themselves Democrats? The assumption is ridiculous. If we had two old parties with clear-cut differences of principle there might be some excuse for demanding a measure of orthodoxy. But in fact we have two great sprawling organizations, the members of which agree on nothing. The Democracy is an anti-alien, anti-Catholic, anti-Negro, Ku Klux party in the South; an immigrant, Catholic, anti-Klux party in the North, and anything-to-beat-the-Republicans in the West. In Wisconsin men who pride themselves on their hereditary Republicanism swear by La Follette and swear at Coolidge; in the East it is precisely vice versa. What's in a name?

ONE OF THE FINEST TRIBUTES yet paid to Senator La Follette's candidacy appears in the news letter of a large cotton firm:

> With the Democrats having finally nominated the best man in their party, it would seem clear that the country will be safe, regardless of whether Davis or Coolidge wins, and that business should take on new courage; but La Follette, like the weevil, is yet to be heard from.

How happy could Wall Street be with either fair old party! As for the political boll weevil—the insect that eats the heart of the crop—few farmers will look for him near their friend Robert La Follette. They would be more likely to examine the neighborhood of the cotton exchange. We recommend the idea, however, to other trade publicists. For example, in the coal industry, "La Follette, like the deadly mine-damp"; in the hair-net industry, "La Follette, like the French shingle"; in the electric business, "La Follette, like daylight saving"; in the umbrella trade, "La Follette, like fair weather"; or in the undertaking business, "La Follette, like the life-saving corps."

NOW THAT THE HIGHEST COURT of Massachusetts has overthrown the essential feature of the minimum-wage law of that State there seems to be no future for such legislation in this country without an amendment to the Constitution. The Massachusetts law, it will be recalled, did not attempt to fix a compulsory minimum wage. The commission established under the law was not given the power to enforce its decisions. These were only recommendatory in character, but in case of refusal to abide by its findings the commission was authorized to advertise the name of the offender in the daily press, and it was provided that no newspaper could refuse to print such an announcement, under penalty of a fine of $100. The Boston Transcript refused to print such an advertisement, and has now been upheld in this action by the State's highest court. In declaring the advertising clause of the minimum-wage law to be unconstitutional the court argued that it was an undue interference in a publisher's business and questioned whether the statute could—as it undertook to do—protect a newspaper against an action for libel. It is possible that under the present practice of jurisprudence in the United States the court's decision is warranted, but obviously it is based on broad general considerations of public policy rather than on any direct conflict of the clause in question with a specific provision of the State constitution. In other words, the action of the court was partly legislative.

IT IS THIS TENDENCY of our courts to exercise partly legislative functions—now a practice of many years—that has made them become a definite menace to democratic government. As Professor Haines pointed out in The Nation of May 14 last, there are numerous other countries where the courts have virtually the same power over legislation as here. But it has been exercised in a much more restricted way. In order to get around an attempt to limit its powers the Ohio supreme court recently declared a statute not "unconstitutional" but "unenforceable," on the ground that its provisions were so vague that it was practically impossible to administer it. Without discussing whether the Ohio tribunal was right or wrong in the instance in question, it seems to us that the attempt to distinguish between the "unconstitutional" and the "unenforceable" betrays the erroneous attitude of American courts toward legislation. A court is not actually asked to pass upon the constitutionality of a law as such. Its job is to enforce all the laws, giving preference to the higher in case of conflict. The question of constitutionality arises only where it is argued that it is impossible to enforce a given statute without violating another and higher one: the Constitution. A court has no business to declare a law unconstitutional unless it is impossible to enforce both the act and the Constitution. When a court goes beyond this it invades the legislative field. It is because our judges are continually guilty of such invasion that we must either limit them or abandon the theory of democratic rule.

WHAT ARE OUR "NATIONAL POLICIES" in regard to the ownership of natural utilities—whether they should be publicly or privately controlled? Judging from what we see in the press and hear on the platform, we had formed the idea that the question was at least an open one—that it was, in fact, a matter of controversy and experiment and the future. Apparently we were wrong. Our "national policy" has already been fixed. We are committed to private ownership and opposed to anything else. At least whenever the United States is invited to take a hand in any parley, we find our representative bobbing up on the side of existing monopoly and exploitation. Take the Pan-American Conference on Electrical Communication, for example, which assembled lately in Mexico City. The gathering was favorable to an extension of government ownership and of official regulation of inter-American communications, but A. H. Babcock, the delegate from the United States, refused to sign a resolution to that effect. He assured the assembly that the United States believed that inter-American communications could best be extended by encouraging the investment of private capital. He refused to join in a statement of "principles contrary to the national policies of the United States." How well big business looks after its own! How uniformly it manages to pass its ideas off as those of the people of the United States!

MEXICO IS A PROVINCE of mañana-land, election machinery is a bit rusted by disuse, and so despite the heat and fury which preceded this year's as almost all other national electoral contests returns trickle along in a peaceful and leisurely fashion. The result will not be officially announced until Congress convenes in September to scrutinize, compute, and certify to the totals. Nevertheless unofficial reports from widely scattering districts already make certain the overwhelming victory of General Plutarco Elias Calles over his opponent, General Angel Flores. For some months this result has been a foregone conclusion and an eminently desirable one. Calles has been Obregon's right-hand man and, next to his chief, the outstanding figure in revolutionary Mexico. He is a firm believer in the necessity of that modicum of social revolution embraced in the agrarian program, in general education, and in labor legislation which when carried out will make Mexico neither "red" nor "pink," but will substitute for archaic feudalism the basis of modern statehood. Mexico's hope, and her only hope, lies in this direction. Yet it is not sufficient that her chief executive have the proper social viewpoint. He must be strong enough, in a country steeped in the autocratic tradition, to carry out his purposes. The task is formidable; one cannot apply the standards current in a long-established republic like ours to a nominal and still uncrystallized democracy such as Mexico. Calles may fail, but no other man is as well qualified to pilot the Mexican ship of state for the next four years.

ONE OF THE DISADVANTAGES of government censorship is that it often defeats its own purpose. This has happened in a notable way in Brazil. When rebellion started the government clamped down a censorship, and for several days our newspapers printed only the official communiqués indicating that the affair was a trifling flare-up already virtually suppressed. Then word from the revolutionists' side of the fence reached us from Uruguay and Argentina. At once it was evident that the Brazilian government communiqués were about as accurate as the writings of Dr. Cook, and from then on our newspapers have been featuring the news from the other side, relegating the official version from Rio de Janeiro to an inconspicuous place at the foot of the column. As to the causes of the revolution, almost nothing is said in the news from either side. Apparently the revolt is a move of the military group which has long been displeased with the effort of President Bernardes to reduce their control. This group, which centers largely in the province of Sao Paulo, numbers in its membership many of the wealthy coffee planters. They have an additional grievance against the Government in the newly instituted income taxes, imposed in accordance with the advice of the recent British financial mission, which was to revise the fiscal system and arrange a loan. These taxes bear upon the Sao Paulo planters more heavily than the former indirect levies. The revolt springs presumably from the same sources that engineered the uprising of two years ago, which was more promptly squelched.

THE NEWSPAPERS PRINT on the same day dispatches from Japan, one saying that the Government has asked the Mexican Federation of Chambers of Commerce to put it in touch with sources from which merchants may obtain products now purchased in the United States, the other noting that the projected boycott against American motion pictures has virtually collapsed on account of lack of public support. With these conflicting evidences, it is hard to say how effective Japanese retaliation for the exclusion clause of the immigration act may prove, but sentimentally there is no question that our boorish and unnecessary procedure has cut deep into a growing and hopeful friendship. Accounts of recent anti-American demonstrations indicate a kind of religious fervor, an unmodern fanaticism, that is in odd contrast to the easygoing indifference with which we regard the question here. Take these placards in Tokio:

> Japanese must never forget July 1, when America inflicted an intolerable insult on Japan. Always remember the date. Prepare for such steps as are demanded by the honor of the fatherland when the occasion comes. Every Japanese must remember the following rules:
>
> 1. Alter your mode of living so as to impress the date lastingly upon your mind.
> 2. Hate everything American, but remain kind to American individuals.
> 3. Deny yourself all luxury.
> 4. Never forget national honor for private gain.
> 5. Never enter a church supported or guided by Americans or United States missionaries.

ALMOST ANY AMERICAN will admit that Japanese inferiority is a fact. In view of this generally accepted and officially stamped belief it is brilliantly illuminating to read a list of gifts exchanged when America introduced civilization to Japan three-quarters of a century ago:

> The interchange of amenities brought to our President beautiful specimens of gold lacquer, bronze, silver, porcelain, rolls of silk brocade and pongee, coral and silver ornaments, and other articles innumerable, in return for our own gracious gifts to his Imperial Majesty, which included among other things a diminutive locomotive, a telegraph key and wire, a natural history of the State of New York, sixteen volumes of the Annals of Congress, Journal of the Senate and Assembly of the State of New York, two volumes of Lighthouse Reports, a barrel of whiskey, with an assortment of other liquors, and three ten-cent boxes of tea.

It almost is unbelievable but it must be true, for it is printed in the Atlantic Monthly. The prominence of whiskey can only be accounted for by the success with which we had used fire-water in avoiding arguments with the American Indians. But why the "literature"? Perhaps there were wets and drys even then, and the list of gifts was a compromise.

THAT LONG-TALKED-OF PROJECT, a tunnel under the English Channel, has been laid on the shelf again by the British Government, principally because what the newspapers call the "war chiefs" oppose it as a danger to Great Britain in case of hostilities. The "war chiefs" always have opposed the scheme, but more through traditional bureaucratic fear than because of reason. Forgetting that the airplane and the submarine have reduced the value of British insularity anyhow, they argue that a channel tunnel would enable enemy forces to invade England in case of war. Would it? Would any commander in his senses dare start troops through a tunnel unless he controlled the territory about its exit? And if he controlled such territory, he would not need the tube in order to land his forces. Indeed, even for a commander who held both ends of a tunnel, it would be a ticklish means of transport; an enemy submarine or airplane might wreck it midway. A channel tunnel is going to be built some day; it will not forever be just talk. Years of discussion and fruitless effort preceded the successful construction of the Panama Canal. Like it, a channel tunnel may not promise immediate commercial success, but it is a challenge to human daring and faith that some day will sweep away the fears of the "war chiefs," helping to place them and their hatreds on the shelf to which they have temporarily relegated it.

FISK UNIVERSITY has raised an endowment fund of one million dollars—the first Negro university to raise anything like such a fund. It is an encouraging thing that the school which began its career in an army barracks in Nashville nearly sixty years ago should find the confidence and respect which such a fund implies. Fisk is no mere industrial school. It is a full-fledged university; its students are given the same recognition at Columbia and Chicago as are graduates of Harvard or Princeton. Another encouraging sign is the fact that citizens of Nashville have set out to raise a supplementary fund of $50,000, which Fisk sorely needs since the endowment fund is pledged exclusively to teachers' salaries. This is the first time that any Southern city has contributed any such sum to any form of Negro education. Meanwhile Fisk University's other work goes quietly on. Fisk produced Roland Hayes. The Fisk University Jubilee Singers sang before Queen Victoria fifty years ago, and King George is hearing them at Lady Astor's home—they are again on European tour—as this Nation goes to press.

1914—1924

TEN years ago this week Europe, rather casually, slipped into war.

It was a grim slip. Europe was appalled, but hardly surprised. She had been preparing for the war for two decades, and her statesmen had grown rather fatalistic about it. The Austrians preferred a European war to loss of their opportunity to crush troublesome Serbia; the Russians preferred it to a loss of prestige; for many Germans it was der Tag, and to many Frenchmen it meant the long-awaited revanche. No one dreamed of four and a half years of fighting, starvation, revolutions; of the absorption of distant continents; of a miserable post-war decade. After all, as we Americans learned so cheerfully three years later, it did make life interesting. Men lived dangerously, and they did not have time to think. The troublesome petty social conflicts of peace days were for the moment lost in the fires of war. An Oxford professor wrote a much-appreciated essay on The Peacefulness of Being at War.

We in America were very remote. It is difficult today to think back to those idyllic days when President Wilson was proclaiming the duty to be "neutral in fact as well as name," "impartial in thought as well as in action." Less than three years later those days already seemed distant of which Randolph Bourne wrote:

> To the American academic mind of 1914 defense of war was inconceivable. From Bernhardi it recoiled as from a blasphemy, little dreaming that two years later would find it creating its own cleanly reasons for imposing military service on the country and for talking of the rough, crude currents of health and regeneration that war would send through the American body politic. They would have thought anyone mad who talked of shipping American men by the hundreds of thousands—conscripts—to die on the fields of France.

We went into the war with a vim. Neutrality in thought or in action became a crime and we hunted down our pacifists to put them in jail. The mass of the people accepted the myth that they were fighting for an ideal, and when disillusionment came they lost faith in these ideals rather than in war as a method of realizing them.

For the Old World there was a brief glimmer of hope when the guns stopped firing. A new era seemed about to dawn. Russia had thrown off her czar, and all the Central Empires had put aside their kings. No officer dared show himself in uniform in the streets of Berlin. Militarism was for the moment utterly dead. Woman suffrage was suddenly granted in Russia, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Belgium. The French Chamber considered women's rights seriously for the first time in its history and a dozen countries passed eight-hour labor laws. The ranks of the labor unions swelled, and their power grew. Wilson, when he came to Europe, was hailed as a messiah, and everywhere men and women believed the old evils at an end.

Then Europe, too, was disabused. The German delegates at the Peace Conference were kept behind bars, like wild beasts; the secret treaties were incorporated, veiled only in pious phrases, in the peace treaty which President Wilson signed; the name "League of Nations" was given to a league of victors, which the well-behaved neutrals were invited to join (the Central Powers, Soviet Russia, and Mexico were left out); revolutions were drowned in blood in Bavaria and in Hungary (where the American relief agents joined hands with the counter-revolutionaries); and all the Western world, America included, continued the war on Soviet Russia, masking its capitalist hate of the workers' republic in a dreary succession of miserable lies. When Soviet Russia finally emerged triumphant from her war against the world she was so battle- and blockade-worn that she could no longer hope to serve as a beacon.

Gradually the darkness deepened. Italy plunged from chaos into bloody Fascism, and good men applauded it; Russia went through famine; France, refusing to face the emptiness of military victory, demanded of Germany more than Germany could possibly pay, and finally marched her soldiers into the Ruhr, while the mark lost its value and millions went hungry. Desperate Germans prayed for a return of the good old days of the monarchy.

Are we on the verge of a new dawn? Certain it is that for the moment a fresh wind is blowing across Europe. Ramsay MacDonald's Labor Government, slight as have been its concrete achievements, brought with it an atmosphere of decency and friendliness and of expectation of decency from others. The German elections were less of a reactionary landslide than had been expected; France ousted Poincaré and opened the way for new measures. The United States permitted its experts to aid in devising a plan for reparation payments which is today under hopeful discussion. Russia has, unaided by the West, stabilized her currency and resumed trade. Austria and Hungary have been put on a forced regime, under the auspices of the League, which has at least maintained life where there had been despair, and Germany has, for the time, stabilized her currency and made normal living once more possible. If we have abandoned bright dreams we seem at least to be drifting back to normalcy, where dreams may again become plausible.

Normalcy is an advance over the chaos of these later years, but the disposition to regard normalcy through rosy spectacles is a kind of shell-shock, a product of weariness. Normalcy is the pre-war state which produced the war and all our social conflicts, and with it goes that fatal fatalism which permitted the war to occur. Its motto is "What's the use?" The World War was not inevitable; it is easy today to trace a dozen links of causation which led straight to the cataclysm, but it is as easy to suppose a dozen slight changes in the course of history which might have avoided it. As Bertrand Russell pointed out in The Nation a year ago, it may reasonably be argued that Napoleon fell because he ate an unripe peach after the battle of Dresden; and if the Emperor of Austria, a very old man, had only eaten an unripe peach and died a decade earlier, or if the war had been postponed a few years until socialism in Germany and revolution in Russia had become stronger, the map and spirit of the world might be very different today. We do not need to accept war as an inevitable incident in normal living; we can change normalcy.

If the world accepts normalcy as an unmitigated boon and basks calmly in it, there is, indeed, little hope. The fact that it is not yet basking, despite well-intentioned efforts, is the real hope of the present hour.

Just Another Conference?

ANYTHING—a conference or a plan or a man—that is heralded as the beginning of a general settlement in the affairs of Germany, France, and England may well be looked upon with skepticism. The stage for the present conference is set in London. So far it is another Allied conference—without Germany, as usual—and if France wins, and it looks very much as if she might, the conference will prepare more plans which the Germans are to accept cut-and-dried from the Reparation Commission. In 1921, in London, upon this same stage, a bill was prepared and handed to Germany for 33 billions of dollars. That stands as the legal bill today and is one of the skeletons in the closet which no one dares to haul forth three years later.

The press has made much of the general optimism and good-will hovering over the conference. This optimism (mixed with anxiety in proper amounts) is of course part of the stage properties for any important Allied meeting, but it has a basis in reality. First, there is the personal friendly accord between Mr. MacDonald and M. Herriot. Then there are the Americans. No one knows what our envoys will do, but the Dawes Report is our child and we are proud of it, so there is no telling what may happen. Next, the frank stating of Anglo-French differences is a gain, infinitely better than M. Poincaré's constant repetition of platitudes. Above all, there is the Dawes Report to keep the conferees on the economic track and off the political.

But there are sharp disagreements. The fifteenth section of the Dawes Report states that the successful execution of the plan depends on "cooperation between the Allies and Germany toward assuring political relations such as the world's financiers will consider favorable to a German loan." There lies the real crux of the Franco-British difference. The French do not want to cooperate; they want to impose.

France holds that she should have the last word on sanctions, as she is to receive 52 per cent of the forthcoming reparations. In other words, the French would keep the Ruhr weapon always in reserve. "Thus," writes the Manchester Guardian, "the new judicial issue of the legality of the Dawes scheme under the Versailles Treaty leads directly back to the old judicial issue regarding the Ruhr occupation." This is particularly important since many experts believe the payments provided for in the Dawes Report impossibly high. If Germany defaults involuntarily, should the Allies confer, or should France retain the alleged right to invade the Ruhr to punish the delinquents? The Dawes Report assumes an immediate loan to Germany of $75,000,000 and later subscriptions in bonds in still vaster sums. American and English bankers will absorb the larger part of both loans, and naturally they will want guaranties against isolated action by France. The first reports from London are anything but encouraging. Vague compromises are reported which may mean exactly what France wishes and at the same time leave a loophole for England to crawl out if things become too hot. The investors are to have priority on all German resources; but all the rights of the Treaty of Versailles—which includes an explicit priority for reparations—are preserved. Result: France may take separate action when she wishes, just as in the past, and German resources may disappear like snow on the first hot days of spring.

Another hotly disputed question concerns the method of transferring German payments from the receiving body in Berlin to the creditor countries. This involves the appointment of a reparations agent and what power he shall have. An American, Owen D. Young, has been suggested for this position. England wishes this agent to have independent power and France wishes him to be a handmaiden of the Reparation Commission, on which she casts the deciding vote. This provision for the transferring of German payments marked a new understanding by governments of international finance. Instead of the grab-bag fashion of the last five years, the problem of the paying in of reparations was separated from the problem of turning the German marks into the currency of France, England, Belgium. Germany's responsibility was to end when she deposited gold marks in the new bank of issue to be established. Many economists are questioning whether we shall not yet learn that those marks cannot be taken from that bank and be of value to the creditor. Mr. Henry Scattergood stated in an address before the American Academy of Political and Social Science that the drawing of those funds depended "upon the world buying from Germany three times as many goods and services as it has been buying at any time since the war." Who is ready to do that? Certainly not France—and as certainly no French representative will let the issue be clearly drawn.

Another Good Ship Gone

WE told the other day (A Sea Wolf's End, June 18) of the sentence to the junk pile of the steamship Kronprinz Wilhelm—one of the famous quartet of the North German Lloyd. About the same time another vessel, also one of a celebrated quartet, was towed out of New York harbor destined for a similar end. The quartet of which the St. Louis was one—the last—was American; indeed it was perhaps the most notable quartet of American ships ever assembled. The other three were the St. Paul, a sister ship of the St. Louis; the New York; and the Philadelphia.

The St. Louis and the St. Paul were American built—the largest and finest steamships constructed in American yards up to their time. In consideration of their construction by home talent, permission was granted the owners by special act of Congress to put the foreign-built New York and Philadelphia also under American registry. The latter two were built with forward-curving bows—clipper stems—and bowsprits, after the model of sailing vessels. For years after these beautiful lines had been superseded by vertical bows in the newer steamships, the New York and the Philadelphia kept this type familiar to our eyes.

Nowadays steamships leaving the port of New York all sail from docks that are well removed from the business heart of Manhattan Island. Up to the time of the European War, and a bit after, the St. Louis, St. Paul, New York, and Philadelphia used to sail for Southampton from the old pier of the American Line near the foot of Fulton Street, North River—right under the windows of the sky-piercing office buildings of lower Broadway. As they backed out into the stream on a Saturday morning they opened up their whistles to clear the way, sending the roar reverberating through the downtown canyons, sifting even in winter-time through the windows, so that pens stopped adding figures and fingers balked in tying bundles while somebody's bookkeeper and some other body's office-boy went dream-voyaging.

The St. Louis was in many ways the luckiest and the most renowned of the famous four. As Captain Felix Riesenberg wrote lately in the Nautical Gazette she was > . . . a faithful ship, a brave ship, a proud ship, an honest ship, a ship not without her own memories of great days when cheering thousands responded to her greeting, crowded her decks, and awaited her arrivals and departures. She knew the caressing swish of silken petticoats and the gay laughter of the elite. Her passenger lists were like the social registers of two continents. Fame and riches chose her because she was famous and swift and smart. The black funnels with the white band were the hall-mark of Western Ocean perfection. At her launch, in the great Cramp yard at Philadelphia, in 1895, the first lady of the land, Frances Folsom Cleveland, the lady of our President, broke the bottle of sparkling wine across her sharp steel prow.

1895! Yes, it was almost thirty years ago that the St. Louis and the St. Paul took to the water. They were of about 10,000 tons gross, with a speed of some eighteen knots —both huge and fast for their day. They had scarcely been put into commission when they were yanked out of the transatlantic service and sent into the Spanish-American War as scout cruisers by the Government. The St. Louis cut the Spanish cable at Santiago in 1898. When America entered the World War the St. Louis and St. Paul were again called on by the Government.

After the armistice the famous four all fell upon evil days. They had not reached old age; they were not worn out. But as crack passenger carriers they had been pushed aside by bigger, faster, more luxuriously appointed vessels; and they were too expensive to operate in humbler trade. The poor New York had the most sordid fate of all. Sold by the American Line, she passed through the hands of a series of fly-by-night companies, and at one time was held at a Brooklyn pier for debt, plastered with attachments and other legal papers. In the summer of 1922 she sailed for the Mediterranean. Five days out her engines broke down, and again at the Azores. Smallpox was discovered among her passengers near Algiers, and upon arriving at Palermo she was fined 85,000 lire for failure to carry an Italian doctor. At Naples she was fined again for violation of law in regard to the landing of luggage. She was last heard of late in 1922 in collision in the Sea of Marmora.

About the same time the Philadelphia, also in strange hands, set sail for Naples; but her crew mutinied, broached the ship's stores, and upon arrival in Italy fought both the vessel's officers and the state police. Accidentally or purposely the hold was flooded, and the ship was beached to keep her from sinking. And thus, so far as accounts have reached this side, she came to her end. The finish of the St. Paul and the St. Louis was less spectacular but not less tragic. The St. Paul was sent to Germany to be scrapped a year ago. The St. Louis caught fire at a Hoboken shipyard, after which she was sold for junk to an Italian firm. Towed by a tug that she would once have snorted out of her path, she let herself be led meekly down the Hudson River on a green morning last May—past her old dock at the foot of Fulton Street, past the Battery where she had formerly been cheered, past the Narrows where she had so often come proudly to anchor after a safe passage, and out to sea. . . .

From her, too, we have had the last word.

Literature in Limbo

THE seeds of a literary fashion blow further than most historians ever seem to notice. Scott and Cooper, for example, continue to be valued for the robust sinews which not even their superannuated habiliments can disguise, but critics ordinarily assume that such fashions have passed from the earth. Not at all. The creator of Nick Carter died only the other day, after an immense career of industrious fabrication which went, much of it, into stories of wild adventure told in a fashion that was respectable a hundred years ago. Richardson, for another example, continues to be valued for his fussy insight into the problems of bourgeois sentimentalists, but there is a general assumption that his manner is outlived. Not at all. Bertha M. Clay died the other day, after an immense career of industrious fabrication devoted to the very kind of fiction that has flowed for a hundred and fifty years from the source which Richardson was virtually the first to tap for a wide audience. The dramatic fact which brings the topic into the news is that Bertha M. Clay and the creator of Nick Carter were the same person, were both of them John R. Coryell, whose strikingly double life has ended at seventy-six.

Though Mr. Coryell, after originating the Nick Carter idea and after writing a few stories of the cycle, turned them over shortly to the late Frederick van Rensselaer Day, and showed himself equally productive in many other fields of hack-writing, he may nevertheless be justly enough discussed on only two counts—the counts of Carter and Clay. He was a link between the ancient melodrama and the modern movie. He either disregarded or did not feel the dignity of his forms of literature as Scott and Cooper and Richardson felt them; he played with them in a kind of serene, earnest make-believe, as children play with tales of fairies. A reader and a student, a philosophical anarchist in his opinions, he could no doubt have defended the art he practiced with excellent reasons for the qualities he gave it. But it cannot be seriously denied that he wrote about a universe as remote as fairyland. The considerable verisimilitude of his settings, the simplicity and directness of his narratives, did not make him less romantic. Stories such as his march as a hobby-horse marches, back and forth, back and forth, always in the same spot of ground. They are, to bring the image down to date, like an engine racing in an automobile, with no clutch thrown in to bring their power to bear upon the burden of reality.

The truth seems to be that no mere fashion in literature has a great vitality for any great length of time. Its themes, its conventions, its tricks, once given up by the writers of the first rank, may indeed still be manipulated by hacks with tireless ingenuity, and may long continue to please readers of slowly descending levels of sophistication. But something of the original vitality has gone. Ingenuity has taken the place of fresh creation. The critical faculty has been lulled to sleep by habit. The thing goes on by sheer momentum, without any renewed push from forces continually reborn. The end of a literary fashion dwells in a dim limbo. Let the limbo be populous and thrilling, as it may be; it is still only limbo.

Somehow or other, quantity production seems not to work in literature. It is a pity, for Nick Carter was exciting and Bertha M. Clay was edifying.

Wheeler and Bryan and Dawes

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE tails of all the tickets seem to have stings in them this year.

Dawes at the tail of the Republican ticket will devote himself, with a poisonousness which Coolidge could not possibly command, to the stinging of "demagogues." Suave, kindly, neat, dapper, sociable, musical, aesthetic, amiable, domestic, Dawes is a honey-bee who is all full of honey and sweet charm till he sees a "demagogue."

Himself, in fact, one of our very best demagogues and delightfully and ingenuously given to passionate appeals to the class feelings of his own class, he is driven frantic when he sees other demagogues making passionate appeals to the class feelings of other classes. He stings them, he threatens to sting them, and he will sting them. Dawes has this writer's affection because of his admirable industry and efficiency as director of the budget and because of his total sincerity in his political views and because of his delicious unawareness of the fact that Plutos as well as Demos has those who natively and naturally speak his language and that in "plutagoguery," as distinguished precisely from "demagoguery," there is no more unconsciously and instinctively perfect platform performer in this country than Charles G. Dawes of Illinois.

Contented property, whether held in large lots or in small lots (and in this country there is plenty of contented property held in small lots), will hug Charlie Dawes to its bosom and will with confidence and elation send him out over the political pastures to raise large swellings on the necks and noses of those whom he attacks. The tail of the Coolidge ticket will be its arousing appeal. It will inspirationally convince many a stay-at-home capitalistic voter that he ought to do his duty for capitalism and go to the polls and vote with vehemence for Coolidge and coolness.

The tail of the Davis ticket is widely said not to have a teaspoonful of brains. It is said that his brother William is a bag of wind and that he is the same except without even the wind. This must be an exaggeration. Or, perhaps, it points to the suspected truth that the most valuable possession of a public man is not brains.

Brainy public men—like David F. Houston, formerly Secretary of the Treasury—seem almost always to hold, as Houston held in 1920, that when economic distress is on its way the only thing, generally speaking, that a government can do is to wave and cheer it on its way. Charlie Bryan, on the other hand, not having brains, and knowing no better, went and reduced the price of coal and the price of gasoline in Nebraska by various actions performed in the course of his labors and alleged or assumed duties as governor of the State. The pundits of economics in political life would never have thought of doing it. That is, they would have thought; and then they would not have done it. Being by definition incapable of thought, Charlie Bryan did it.

Whatever, therefore, is deficient in Davis because of his excess of brains we may expect to see happily and successfully supplied by Bryan because of his lack of them. This writer, after long experience with highly intelligent public men who can see clearly that nothing can be done about anything, welcomes in Bryan a man so dull and so useful that he cannot see it. The tail of the Davis ticket may be its unthinking, but it is also its working, end.

As for Burton K. Wheeler, the tail of the La Follette ticket, this writer ventures the prediction that Wheeler will be the stingingest of all this year's stinging tails.

Wheeler is much younger than either Bryan or Dawes. He is in his early forties. As public men go, he is a mere youth. He is still engaged, as it were, in writing his juvenilia. He writes them in the spirit appropriate to his years. He is not an old young man. He is a young young man. He is politically romantic. He is pugnacious. He is adventurous.

He hails from the East—from Massachusetts. He cannot say Cool-idge, to rhyme with too. He says Cull-idge, to rhyme with full. The long "oo" is too much for him. He has a Massachusetts accent and a Montana temperament. The temperament led him inevitably to Montana. He would have made a great prospector in the old Montana mining days. Or he might have made a great gambler. Taking chances is no bother to him. It is no anxiety to him. When he made his charges against Daugherty in the Senate, he did not have the proof. He only knew that a certain amount of proof existed. That proof might have been stolen from him. His witnesses might have been snatched away from him. They were that sort of people. Wheeler did not hesitate. He made his charges just the same. He took one of the biggest chances that anybody in Washington ever took. He got away with it. When the witnesses were called they still were his. It then became necessary, however, to make them relate gossip. Wheeler did not hesitate. He made them relate gossip. He knew that almost any one piece of that gossip, by itself, was ridiculous. He did not hesitate to be ridiculous. He knew that all the pieces of the gossip of all his witnesses, when put together, would convince—or, at any rate, would persuasively suggest. He did not hesitate to be ridiculous in detail in order to win in mass.

He has an iron heart and a brass forehead. Also he has one of the most charming of smiles—a boyish smile, a cool and deadly smile. He could have put his shooting-irons on the table and smiled handsomely and happily at his fellow-gamblers in the old Montana days. He will cut a wide swath through the hearts of women in his audiences. They love to ask him to dinner in Washington even when he is engaged in trouncing—and perhaps traducing—their favorite conservative statesman on the Senate floor. He is exigent; but he is attractive. He is attractive perhaps precisely because he is exigent and uncompromising and—it might be said—politically bloodthirsty. There is something soft in many reformers. There is nothing soft in Wheeler. He would have made a great bucko mate quelling the crew on an old New England China clipper. He is humane in his policies. Personally he is hard-boiled, hard-bitten, hard-headed, hard-fisted, with a tinge in him of the handsome sword-crossing heart-breaking soldier of fortune.

A soldier of fortune plus what is now called a "social conscience"—a soldier of fortune animated and dominated by a "social conscience": that is Wheeler of Montana.

La Follette went out to his house and personally asked him to run with him. La Follette in his youth took some chances himself. In Wheeler perhaps he recognizes a fellow-spirit who, when it comes to chances, will not be second to him. La Follette is looking wonderfully well. Yet he is the oldest of the candidates. Wheeler is the youngest. "Old men for counsel." And young men for war? Well, war, one of your names certainly is Wheeler.

Working Toward Disarmament

By JAMES T. SHOTWELL

SENATOR DE JOUVENEL, one of the most influential French politicians, stated in the Revue de Paris last winter that in his opinion peace was as much the key to the aspirations of the present day as liberty was in the time of the French Revolution. That, from a Frenchman in whom the traditions of the revolution live, meant a great deal. British and American liberals have tended to believe that the Poincaré policy was the only genuine expression of France, and many of them were surprised when, at the last election—the first chance the French people had had to express themselves politically since 1919—the truer voice of France spoke out. But all along, even among Poincaré's associates, there was a genuine striving for a workable peace formula.

Unfortunately, even the French who represent the peace movement tend to think in different terms from their American and British colleagues, and constant misunderstanding results. Fundamentally, the Frenchman thinks in terms of history—and one who thinks in terms of history can never proceed upon universal principles, whereas the British or American liberal, bred in the traditions of Cobdenism or some similar philosophy, demands as the first condition of readjustment a general acceptance of his principles. Viscount Cecil, for instance, has insisted that you cannot have disarmament until you have general disarmament. The French say that you can, and that you must begin with partial and local disarmament, proceeding from individual differences and circumstances, and that to demand general principles before you develop the situation for them is absurd. The British—and American—liberal is like the medieval realists; he believes in phenomena as attributes or incidents secondary to the whole. The Frenchman is a nominalist, as critical as his Abelard was in the thirteenth century, standing for concrete realities all the time.

This difference became very clear in the attempts made by the League of Nations and other bodies to work out plans for disarmament. The French protested against the constitution of the Temporary Mixed Commission, which drew up the League's disarmament plan, because its members were selected as individual experts and were not responsible to their governments—a device intended to secure initiative. The French claim that it resulted in British delegates advancing clauses of a disarmament treaty which even their own Government would not ratify. When the French protest against these fine sentiments of universal application (which have never been applied) the Anglo-Saxon mind tends to regard the protest as essentially hostile to the peace movement itself. One of the French delegation said that he did not want to go to Geneva to hear the Sermon on the Mount—he could hear that at home any Sunday—but to make a contract binding his neighbor to go as far as he himself would go. And his neighbor would not go very far toward the Sermon on the Mount.

The French believe that the way to peace leads along the historic path of alliances. There is, obviously, nothing wrong in a nation having friends. If having friends makes you feel so secure that you do not have to arm, that is good. But if its effect is that a third party is scared, the result may be a resumption of the old-fashioned arms competition and new wars. Obviously the way to move forward is to get rid of suspicion, and one way to that is through public diplomacy. The French themselves made one very notable contribution to public diplomacy when Colonel Réquin proposed an article, later embodied in the League draft treaty and also in the so-called American plan, providing that treaties the terms of which were fully known and accepted by the Council of the League as harmless and defensive might be carried out automatically in time of crisis, without any delay. But, in order to have that privilege, the same nations should agree to take any unforeseen incidents, or matters arising under secret clauses, before the instruments of mediation provided by the League, such as the Council or the World Court. This means that if an agreement is secret there is delay in executing it—and a soldier fears nothing so much as delay in the moment of danger. For example, the Franco-Czech treaty provides for mutual aid in case of invasion. That is permitted under this draft treaty as "purely defensive." But if such an unforeseen incident happened as occurred in Serajevo in June, 1914, the state which felt its "security" or "honor" endangered would be obliged not to go to war or undertake aggressive measures until other means of redress suggested by the League had been exhausted. It is a method of routing secret agreements into the avenues of public diplomacy. This provision, Articles 6, 7, and 8 of the Cecil-Réquin League treaty, is incorporated in substance as Articles 26, 27, and 28 of the American treaty.

Last winter a group of Americans interested in the problem of general disarmament began meeting in the hope of working out a practical program and discovering a formula which would to some extent unite the main principles of the British and French views and at the same time state in broad terms what might be called the American standpoint toward disarmament. The result was the formulation, after three or four months of discussion, of the so-called Draft Treaty of Disarmament and Security, which is printed in the International Relations Section of The Nation this week. A few copies of this document were sent informally to those in Europe at whose request the American group had carried on the last phase of its work. When the Council of the League of Nations met on June 10 some members of it, having this American document in their hands, asked that it be distributed as an official document of the League, with an eye to its consideration by the next Assembly, when the Draft Treaty of the Temporary Mixed Commission was to come up for discussion. Since that time both the British and United States governments have definitely rejected the League's draft treaty.

The American treaty—which is obviously not in final form, but a basis for negotiation or planning—naturally differs widely from the Franco-British draft. Its distinctively American note is the entire absence of compulsion upon any government to enforce peace at the dictation of the Council of the League or of any other outside body. Peace is to be assured by denying to an aggressor the rights and privileges enjoyed by him in the territories of the other states, through treaties, international law, or municipal law. But it is left entirely to the individual states to say whether or not they will apply these sanctions. This provision has been criticized as an inadequate guaranty, but is it not all that American public opinion would approve? In any case it strikes at once at the entire credit system of an aggressor state. This means that it strikes at the currency, and after the experience of the past five years in Europe no other warning as to the possible consequences of aggressive action could be more clear.

Finally, this American draft treaty must not be taken for more than it is. It is simply a treaty of disarmament, not of universal compulsory arbitration. It is an agreement not to commit aggression, and it includes a readily recognized definition of aggression. It does not insure justice but it denies states the right to attempt to secure what they think justice by force of arms, it is only the beginning—if it is that—of a long process, by the substitution of something else for force in international affairs. Justice within nations has not yet been achieved, yet we have outlawed the feud and eliminated the disorders attendant upon it. The processes of civilization have to do more with procedure than with substance, and the draft treaty is an attempt to establish processes through which civilization can slowly work out a peaceful destiny. This means that the first part of the proposed agreement which would come into operation would be the Permanent Advisory Conference and its Technical Commission. Such a body should not only furnish a clearing-house for that kind of information about armaments which if known is relatively harmless, if withheld breeds war, but it should also study the variant effects of economic sanctions in a world of credit, and the kind of incidents which make for—or are—aggression. In short, we should have a definite and standing challenge to the intelligence of the world on the greatest single problem of our time.

How France Went to War

By LEWIS S. GANNETT

(These are unedited extracts from a diary kept in August, 1914. They are fragmentary, but they are first-hand impressions jotted down on the spot and at the moment.)

RHEIMS, August 1, 1914, 4.30 p.m.—The fools cry "Vive la guerre!" Everywhere crowds, everywhere soldiers, everywhere haste and bustle and noise. For some it is a game, the longed-for war, the chance to fight. "Vive la France!" "Vive la guerre!" "A bas l'Allemagne!" Others know what war is. Wives and husbands and babies go to the station together, the parents pale and anxious, arm in arm, the children half-ready to shout and cheer, yet deterred by the wet cheeks of the mother.

The station is jammed, crowded. A woman sits on her coat nursing a three-month-old baby. The Paris express is already two hours late. All trains today are headed toward the border. France and Germany are at last at war, and Alsace may be revenged and rewon. Long troop-trains pull into the station, their windows alive—some faces glum and weary, some bright and excited. More troops crowd in—wife kisses husband, sweetheart sweetheart, and man man in farewell. Some eyes bright for the adventure before them—some eyes dry and brave, some dry and hopeless, some wet with tears. . . . The station breaks into yet louder cheers—they are off to the war! An old woman presses a franc into a soldier's hand, another runs up with a cake of sweet chocolate. The train windows are like the bleachers at a home run—all arms and hats and noises; heads invisible. The platform responds.

PARIS, the same day, 11 p.m.—The street surges with the crowd; there are thousands there below. They laugh and shout and applaud each new flag, each "Vive la guerre!" and sing the "Marseillaise," and think themselves patriotic. . . . Jaurès is dead, the first martyr in the cause of peace.

The Paris express was 3½ hours late at Rheims and 4 at Paris. Rheims was mad enough, as the troop trains pulled through—infantry, cavalry, aeroplanes. But here the streets were black with crowds; no taxicab or wagon to be had. And soon we discovered worse: no food to be had. One restaurant after another said "C'est fini"—at half-past nine. The crowds had eaten them out. Everywhere the insane mobs. Nowhere policemen. Here a man hurt, lying outstretched on the pavement—a huge jam about him. There a youth of perhaps nineteen standing on a restaurant table, haranguing the mob. Now someone has found a French flag, and the crowd falls in behind, shouting and singing the "Marseillaise" and "Alsace-Lorraine," while the sidewalks resound with applause. Later, English flags appear, and Italian. The crowd grows—they are like college boys, high-school kids. A great cheer goes up. Unconsciously one listens for the rest—one expects an organized college cheer to follow. But this is France, and war. These mad creatures are not celebrating a football victory, but the mobilization of the army of France, the probability of war with Germany.

August 6.—Paris is quiet now. The first wild excitement has passed, and she has settled down to a realization of realities. It is war; she faces it calmly and bravely, and her patriotism is no less that the shouts and parades are things of yesterday. The shops of luxury are closed, but the food shops are open.

LONDON, August 15.—We came over from Paris two days ago. It was a relief to see the calm of the blue sea once more. After the raving mobs of those first Paris days and the dull excitement of the shut-in city, after the wild hatred of Germany and the lying headlines, it was a pleasure to be among a people which took things normally, and, fighting, respected a foe worthy of its mettle.

Why Matteotti Had to Die

By JAMES FUCHS

FOR the placemen and lieutenants of the "regular" Fascisti in Italy the April elections were not merely a struggle for maintenance of power but for their personal safety as well. Nearly 4,000 of their crimes—chiefly assaults, mayhem, murder, destruction of property, and acts of incendiarism—committed before Mussolini's accession to ministerial office, were covered by his Christmas amnesty of 1922. This document, perhaps for the first time in history, made party affiliation a criterion of immunity by pardoning acts of violence committed "with a national aim in view"—in plainer words, by Fascists of regular standing. But many hundreds of similar crimes, still technically indictable, have since been committed by the beneficiaries of the amnesty and their associates, which made victory at the polls a vital necessity to them—and to the author of the amnesty as well—no man in his senses doubting that the day of his downfall as a cabinet minister will be followed immediately by his impeachment.

From l'Ere nouvelle

Victory at the polls, however, in the terms of a free and lawfully conducted election, was out of the question. It had to be brought about by a nation-wide campaign of fraud and violence. The administration was confronted not only by a powerful Socialist and Communist movement which in 1919, at the inception of the militant career of Fascism, had control of nearly 2,000 out of the 8,000 Italian municipalities—a movement largely recovered from the effects of Fascisti assault. It had likewise to face a liberal bourgeoisie thoroughly disgusted with administrative inclusion on terms of contemptuous tolerance, a Catholic peasant movement bitterly opposed to Fascismo, and, worst of all, a disaffected Fascist element, bent upon discrediting and combating the "regulars" under the leadership of those about Mussolini.

The trail of Fascismo in office—that is to say of Mussolinism—is littered with tergiversations, broken promises, and shameless disavowals of platform planks deemed essential by Mussolini's original following of 1919. Of these old-timers only two groups are blindly obedient to the chief: the office-holders and certain "men of action" (violent action), in especial need of governmental protection. To understand the bitter indignation of the others it should be remembered that, like Mussolini himself, they graduated from the ranks of international socialism. These "old-timers" are chiefly workingmen and intellectuals, gullible but of honorable intent, who took to heart the syndicalist program of 1919, with which Mussolini split the ranks of the Socialists at the close of the war. They took seriously the endlessly repeated promises, before his accession to power, of holding the balance true in the common national interest in all contentions between capital and labor. The Fascist program of 1919 included a legal establishment of the eight-hour day, minimum wages for all industrial and agricultural workers, old-age and invalid insurance, control of production by the workers, and the technical management of public utilities by boards of employees. Once in office, the Fascist administration riddled its eight-hour bill with 100 special exemptions and a blanket exemption for all industries not specifically mentioned in the bill. It abandoned the minimium-wage plank, abolished the old-age and invalid insurance already in force, suppressed a number of joint boards, and turned over the state-owned public utilities (parcel post, telephones, telegraphs, and governmental railroad lines) to private enterprise. As a consequence, the nationalist ("white") trade unions, in their organ Il Domani Sociale, incited their members in a joint manifesto, on the eve of the elections, to vote against the Fascist "national list."

The most powerful personality among the Fascist dissidents is Deputy Cesare Forni. On the threshold of the present year he delivered a sensational speech of challenge and denunciation, declaring that "Mussolini has fallen among bad companions." The Prefect of Pavia urged him to name them. He named Cesare Rossi, Luigi Freddi, Aldo Finzi, and Francesco Giunta. The dissident press added to this list of "bad companions" General De Bono and Giovanni Marinelli. Of the six four are now under arrest as implicated in the Matteotti murder. On January 24, in his speech at the Palazzo Venezia, Mussolini expressly countenanced and vindicated the entire six: "The men denounced as the bad counselors of the good tyrant are five or six men who report to me in person every morning. I herewith make distinct avowal that I look upon them as my closest collaborators and fellow-burdenbearers, who share with me the salt bread of direct responsibility for the acts of the Fascist administration. I declare in your presence that I owe them the deepest sentiments of gratitude and affection."

Another of the Matteotti murderers, Amerigo Dumini, vindicated Mussolini's "bad companions" in a more literal sense of the term; together with three stalwarts of the "regulars," he set upon Forni at a railroad depot. Forni, a man of powerful build, succeeded in knocking down one assailant and, with the help of bystanders, in driving the others to flight, after receiving a severe beating.

Beset by the enmity of at least two-thirds of the nation, and in the midst of fierce contentions among the Fascists, Mussolini entered upon the election campaign last spring. The deputies of his own list, in keeping with a cult of Fascismo—that of giovannezza (youth)—were largely fire-eaters below the age of thirty, without any parliamentary experience to speak of, and thoroughly resolved to have a good time hustling, insulting, outshouting, and challenging the deputies of the Opposition.

Mussolini's bearing at the opening session of the Chamber was the strangest imaginable mixture of defiance and propitiation. He delivered his opening speech in a gorgeous fancy dress of his own invention, looking somewhat like a Gilbert-Sullivan Admiral of the Queen's Navee.

For all his bullying airs, he knew that presently the election would be shown up, with a crushing wealth of evidential material, as a huge fraud, a nation-wide orgy of forgery, intimidation, and coercion. His prefects, his carabinieri, his militia, his centurions and fighting gangs, several days before election day, had turned hell loose against all adversaries of the administration. He knew that at least a hundred mandates of the "national list" would be plainly shown to be invalid. He also knew who would place the evidence invalidating the elections before Italy and the world. The person designated by the radical Opposition as attorney general in the trial, about to begin, of Fascist governmental corruption was Giacomo Matteotti, Deputy for Rovigo, who had been banished from Rovigo some time before his election by an arbitrary decree of the local Fascisti. Matteotti collected a formidable volume of incriminating evidence concerning the governmental election frauds, the Fascist orgies of violence after the elections, and the personal corruption of some of those who were sharing with the dictator "the salt bread of direct responsibility," namely:

Amerigo Dumini, founder of the Fascist movement of Tuscany and professional gunman of the party; leader of many "punitive expeditions"; implicated in the attack upon the Villa Nitti and the assaults upon the deputies Forni, Misuri, and Amendola. After Mussolini's accession to power he secured a lucrative post as traveling inspector of the Fascist Corriere Italiano. About to be exposed by Matteotti as a smuggler of arms to Jugoslavia.

Albino Volpi, another of the assailants of Forni; one of the charter members of Mussolini's Fascio in Milan; chief of the Fascist after-election terror in Milan, where, two days after the election, he and his gang raided a gathering of a hundred unarmed citizens, beating them and leaving fifteen seriously wounded on the pavement.

Filippo Filipelli, editor of the Corriere Italiano; Cesare Rossi, chief of Mussolini's press bureau; and Giovanni Marinelli, general secretary of the Fascist board of directors—the three "oil corruptionists" of the American press dispatches.

To keep the murder motive clear from wrong conjectures: there was nothing in Matteotti's record or personal traits to make him a conspicuous target for Fascist vindictiveness. A moderate Socialist, a follower of Turati, he had persistently advised against counter-attacks during the Fascist terror. He was known as a declared enemy of communism, a scholarly jurist, a courteous intellectual without any personal contentions on his hands. He was slain for three reasons: because he countered the move of Mussolini, who wanted 320 mandates declared valid en bloc, by revealing the true story of the elections; because he was about to incriminate the chief participants in the after-election acts of terrorism; and because, if suffered to live, he would have forced judicial action against the main corruptionists about the dictator. That, but for the daggers and bullets of his murderers, he would have invalidated enough mandates to deprive the Government of its majority, admits of no doubt.

To mention only a few of the events in connection with the elections, two days beforehand a circular letter of the administration enjoined all employees of the post, telegraph, and telephone systems to vote the "national list" on pain of dismissal. In Girgenti the Catholic (Popolari) municipal authorities were suspended, and reinstated only upon a pledge that they would advise the population to vote the Fascist ticket. In Allesandria della Rocco a police commissioner appeared before the municipal authorities, threatening to return on election day with fifty Fascist militiamen "to crush the skull of everyone not voting the Fascist ticket"—whereupon the entire magistracy resigned. The Fascio of Sciacca, on April 2, openly declared that it would throw out all anti-Fascist ballots, and—to make assurance doubly sure—that it would cast Fascist votes for those former inhabitants that had emigrated to foreign parts. In Campobello di Licata the Fascist militia dosed the chief of Popolari with castor oil, gave him a severe beating, and threatened to do the like to everyone staying away from the polls on election day or voting a ticket other than "the national list." In Mestre the Socialist candidate Vallemari was threatened with death in case of acceptance of the nomination. In Melfi the oppositionist Deputy Di Napoli was forced, by Fascist threats, to abandon his campaign and to leave the town. In Chieti, the Socialist candidate Calliano Magno was first kept under restraint in his house, then beaten by an officer of the Fascist militia and forced to leave town. Four dailies of the Fascist dissidents were suspended by administrative decree, among them La Sicilia in Messina and Il Risveglio in Pavia, where the anti-administration officials of the communal magistracy were forced to resign. The entire electorate of Apulian and other towns were driven out of town on election day by carabinieri or Fascist militia, the local Fascisti stuffing the ballot boxes. All rural clergymen of certain Tuscan districts were forced by carabinieri, "looking them up" in their homes, to do Fascist electioneering among their flocks.

On May 30 the Verification Committee on Mandates proposed to the Chamber the validation en bloc of 320 mandates. Matteotti fired his opening round, giving a first instalment of his revelations on the elections. The young stalwarts of the Right insulted him and the Opposition in general, and the session closed with a free fight.

Two days later, on June 1, Mussolini's personal organ, the Popolo d'Italia, incited to physical violence against Matteotti. His speech in the Chamber, it said, was provocative and deserving of a more tangible acknowledgment than the vituperative epithet leveled at him by a Fascist Deputy. The Premier's vindication of the election before the Chamber of Deputies, a few days later, was unique in its Latin artlessness—not to say effrontery: should a million and a half of the votes cast for the "national list" be found fraudulent or cast under physical coercion, even then the Fascist party would still be the rightful representative of the nation. He had the assurance to continue: "You of the Opposition complain that you were restrained from holding free election meetings. What of that? Such meetings are of no avail anyway." A second broadside of Matteotti, dealing with the election doings of the Premier's personal cronies, and with their transactions in the realm of high finance, would probably have shaken even this extreme of governmental brass. It was not to be. No chance was given him for further and weightier disclosures. On June 10 he was kidnapped by five assassins, among them the Florentine gunman Dumini, and was shot and stabbed to death. Up to the fifteenth, the fiction of a mere abduction of Matteotti alive was maintained by the Government. On the fifteenth Mussolini abandoned this position and owned to a certainty of Matteotti's death.

Matteotti had to die because he was about to prove, what his death has proved beyond rational dispute, that Italy has lost its rank as a nation with a representative government.

The New Education

By AGNES DE LIMA

III. Following the Child's Lead

AT its annual meeting on May 17 an ambitious proposal was made by the Teachers Union of New York. Following an intensive study of the leading private experimental schools in and near the city, the union has outlined and is prepared to submit to the city board of education a scheme for establishing a similar experimental center in the public-school system. The proposal deserves particular consideration because it comes not from outsiders but from a group of workers who have labored long to apply the ordinary methods of instruction. These methods, according to the union, have brought public-school education to a condition of stagnation. Children are turned into automatons by the artificial discipline of drill as an end in itself; they are robbed of their childhood by having to conform to adult standards of thought and behavior; their individual and creative tendencies are smothered by the rigid curriculum to which all must submit; they soon develop antagonistic attitudes toward their work, toward their teacher, their associates, and life in general.

In the school which the union seeks to have established "the boys and girls will reconstruct their experiences in a boys' or girls' world. . . . The environment will be such as to liberate and organize their capacities through self-initiated, self-directed, wholehearted, purposeful activities. In this way they will be able to experience the sheer joy of living. The curriculum will be as varied, rich, and fluid as life itself." The union observes that in experimental schools conducted on this basis children learn the "fundamentals"—the three R's—better than under the traditional methods. This has been determined by the use of objective standardized tests. The many other gains made by the children become apparent if one makes the slightest examination of what these newer schools have to offer.

The experimental centers which served as models for the union's program included the City and Country School and the Walden School in New York City. The City and Country School was founded (as the Play School) by Caroline Pratt in 1914. The Walden School was started by Margaret Naumburg in 1916 and is now directed by Margaret Pollitzer and Elizabeth Goldsmith. To the extent that they serve to revitalize and raise the standard of public-school procedure, these schools have a significance far beyond the education of the limited number of children who attend them.

In both schools, questions relating to curriculum are of secondary consideration and emphasis is laid upon the child's present needs and his innate capacities and interests. The outstanding purpose is to help the children to evolve a world of their own in which they will think, act, and express themselves on their own level. Book learning as an end is discouraged, especially in the early years, for it represents at best vicarious experience. Instead, children are given every opportunity to obtain first-hand contact with the world about them and are given ample and varied materials with which to express their own fresh reactions to these contacts. This involves, of course, the abandonment of fixed recitation periods, of assigned lessons, of immovable desks and immovable children. Freedom from constraint, however, does not mean that the pupils "run wild." Indeed, they hold to their self-chosen tasks with a concentration and absorption rarely found in the ordinary schoolroom, where the slightest interruption—the flapping of a blind or the creaking of a door—is sufficient to shift the whole base of the attention of the class. To those inured to the stereotyped and poverty-stricken responses of children brought up in the conventional environment, the creative achievement of the pupils of these newer schools seems almost incredible. This is most dramatically evident in the field of the plastic arts, where the work in drawing, painting, and pottery achieves a standard of high professional merit. Striking work is done in music, in rhythm, and in imaginative writing.

Characteristic of these schools are the lengthening of the school day and the extension of the school's influence to the earliest years of childhood. With the growing recognition on the part of psychologists, physicians, and child-welfare workers generally of the supreme importance of infancy and earliest childhood, nursery schools have been established in many centers which are concerned with studying early growth and habit formation and making certain that they proceed along wholesome lines. Both the City and Country and Walden schools admit babies as soon as they can walk, and the former has provisions for their all-day care. Both schools also maintain a careful and scientific system of record-keeping, covering every possible detail of procedure and of individual and social development. Since the schools are experimental these records are invaluable as means of checking achievement, as well as for the light they shed on hitherto unexplored fields of child growth.

While the two schools have thus much in common, their method of approach is very different. In so far as classification is possible for either, it may be said that the City and Country School has been influenced by the teaching of behaviorist psychology and the Walden School by that of analytic psychology. Now the psychologist who is concerned chiefly with the science of human behavior declares that the individual can be trained to withstand most of the shocks and disasters of life by being properly "conditioned" in early childhood—by having the right instead of the wrong sensory stimuli presented to him and acquiring early the proper habits of response. The analytic psychologist is also concerned with childhood, but chiefly because of the mechanism of the unconscious to which he believes are relegated the unpleasant incidents of life, especially those of early youth.

Now, it will not do to draw any fine psychological distinctions between the City and Country and Walden schools, but in general terms it might be said that the former is interested in what children do, how they act, and what use they make of their environment, whereas the latter school is mostly concerned with underlying motive and emotional make-up. This does not mean that one school hopes to develop objective and the other subjective types of people, nor that in one school children will grow up mainly interested in materials and in the other mainly interested in introspective and personal relationships, but the differences between the two schools have this general trend.

Miss Pratt's behaviorist "slant" is well shown in these sentences from her forthcoming book on the City and Country School to be published by E. P. Dutton:

> We are not willing to be dominated or have the children dominated by subject matter. We wish them to form strong habits of first-hand research and to use what they find; we want them to discover relationships in concrete matter so that they will know that they exist when they deal with abstract forms. We want them to have a fine motor experience because they themselves are motor and to get and retain what they get through bodily perceptions.

Miss Pratt has developed her curriculum very much more completely than has the Walden School. As the result of ten years' testing of her theories she is now prepared to assert that certain activities are better performed at certain age levels than at others. For example, seven-year-old children in her school always have for their main enterprise for the year the building of a miniature city in permanent form, just as at six they reproduce the city in block form. At seven, the children construct wooden houses, which they paint, furnish, and wire, they lay out streets, trolley lines, and waterways with a full quota of boats. At eight, the children run the supply store for the school, taking complete charge of all orders and accounting for the money. While not an advocate of formal programs, Miss Pratt believes that the programs of successive years should bear definite relationship to one another and that one year's activities should grow naturally from those of the years preceding. At seven, she also has the children begin their work in reading, writing, and arithmetic. Before that age is reached they have acquired some number sense and a limited ability to recognize written symbols. But at seven, she has discovered, they become more concerned with realities, their drive becomes more conscious, they emerge from the merely play world, and desire to be taught. To those who have made a fetish of sugarcoating the three R's, the story of one youngster is instructive. She reported enthusiastically to her mother one day that spelling was her favorite subject. When her mother inquired whether that was because of some new way of teaching it the child replied: "Oh, no, Miss —— just says do it, and we do it!"

Drill is of course reduced to a minimum. For the most part information is acquired naturally as the children carry on their enterprises. For example, children who cannot perform the necessary operations in arithmetic cannot hold the coveted posts of salespeople in the school store. Geography may be said to start with the three- and four-year-olds. The little ones learn to go about the school and to locate their room with reference to the rest of the building. Later they venture out into the streets and locate the school. Excursions to parks, markets, docks, bridges, public buildings broaden their knowledge of their immediate world and furnish material for reconstruction in block, clay, story, or pictorial form. Their inquiries about everything with which they come into contact leads to their acquiring an immense amount of information not found in textbooks. Miss Pratt is far less interested in having the children learn the States of the Union and their capitals than to have them discover the interrelation of different parts of trade and industry and our dependence upon them. "In building a body of what the schools call 'general information' unrelated to the child's experience, they build of straw." The six-year-old group who paid repeated visits to a Cuban steamer each time it docked accumulated a vivid store of material about Cuba which formal instruction would never have provided.

Miss Pratt has occasionally been criticized for limiting the development of imagination by keeping the children too much in the present and giving them too much concrete material. Her answer is that the first-hand experiences of children contain the factual elements necessary to art. "Vivid auditory and perceptive images come from vivid experiences." Children who can observe deeply, whose interests are kept live, and who remain sensitive to new impressions cannot be lacking in imaginative power. As a matter of fact, the imaginative plays, drawings, and writings of the older groups in the school are of a high order. The twelve-year-old class has recently given a performance of Euripides's "Alcestis" which would do credit to maturer students. Their back-drop and costumes, their original music played on lyres made in the school-shop were delightfully executed. There is, thinks Miss Pratt, too much vicarious living, too much vicarious enjoyment in our civilization. Children if taken young enough and helped to develop their own creative purposes will establish habits of being motivated from within, which is the only way in which original and artistic work can be achieved.

In the Walden School there is no attempt to define activities at given age levels, although of necessity older children demand more formal instruction. Groups, according to Miss Pollitzer, are no more alike than the individuals composing them. A class of six-year-olds may be interested in studying boats one year and may embark upon an intensive study of waterways or of transportation. The following year the sixes may, because of summer-camp experience, become interested in primitive life and organization. "The school," says she, "is the child's world and the course of study evolves out of the problems and interests arising from the immediate community life, leading to further and further realms of study." This apparently hit-or-miss method of attacking subject matter does not leave the gaps in knowledge which one might expect. The children uniformly measure up extremely well in all the standard achievement tests and have a store of information frequently far in advance of their years. Some of the courses initiated by them are immensely interesting. This winter, for example, the oldest group, also twelve years old, has been studying anthropology with the help of Dr. A. A. Goldenweiser of the New School for Social Research. The course developed from an initial visit to wholesale markets and observation of the immigrant peoples in them. This led to a discussion of races and their cultures and various experts were invited by the children to address them on these subjects. Dr. Goldenweiser's material on the Iroquois Indians so interested them that they asked him to return and the course thus gradually developed. The stenographic notes of the sessions show an amazing intellectual acumen and range of knowledge on the part of the students. They discussed such topics as primitive cultures, taboos, superstition, religion, morality, inheritance of acquired characteristics, and toward the end of the first term outlined a text on anthropology for children, since no satisfactory one exists.

In the free environment of the school art flourishes naturally. The paintings of the children of the Walden

School have been on exhibit for successive years at leading art galleries of the city and have attracted an unusual amount of attention from artists and professional critics who have been astonished at the originality, the design, the feeling for composition, the richness and color of the work. The children are given no formal instruction and no models, but are from the earliest years provided with large drawing-sheets and appropriate color materials. An artist spends one day each week with the older children, not to impose his ideas, but to inspire them and give any necessary technical assistance.

Similarly the wood-and-linoleum cuts made by the children are of a high artistic order. In this connection it is worth noting that the process of woodcut-making was come upon by chance by a girl of ten working in the school-shop. A printing press had just been acquired and she was intrigued by the possibility of reproducing type in wood. She hollowed out a letter from a block of wood and discovered that it would print. She thereupon decided that if a letter would reproduce, so also would a design, and soon everyone in the school, faculty members included, were enthusiastically making woodcuts. Later linoleum was selected as material more easily handled by children.

In one sense neither Miss Pratt's nor the Walden School is experimental. These happy, vitalized children whom one observes in them are proof enough that what these schools are achieving is of supreme social worth. Bertrand Russell recently remarked that public schools have long demonstrated the possibility of giving instruction without education, that, in fact, any schoolmaster who was caught educating was quickly "given the sack." With the growth of schools like these, and with the gradual incorporation of their principles in the public-school system, it may come to pass that education and instruction will become identical—a thing never before achieved under the sun.

Reading on Shipboard

By RUTH S. ALEXANDER

IT is, as every voyager knows, not only "things rich and strange" that "do suffer a sea-change." Eggs, bread, butter, on any ship, save those great floating Ritz-Carltons which are not real ships at all, have an unforgettable and unvarying difference from those same articles of food ashore. And what man who has made any sort of journey by water will forget the extraordinary difference in the appearance of his fellow-passengers, when at the end of the trip they appear panoplied once again in the normality of their shore-going apparel? Even our books are in some mysterious way different.

I am setting forth no mere academic theory. I know whereof I speak, having recently spent twenty-nine days as the only passenger on a freight-boat loaded mainly with beans from Madagascar and raisins from the Cape. The officers were kind, but busy; the meals, at 8 a. m., 12:30, and 6 in the evening, were not of a nature to linger over; the sports, concerts, deck-games, and other diversions of a passenger liner did not exist. The promenade deck was about as long as the average dining-room of a New York apartment-house. "You'll have plenty of time for a good rest," said my friends. They were correct.

We ran out of Cape Town harbor into a cold wind, a gray, tumbled sea, and a heavy swell. Neither beans nor raisins were present below the hatches in sufficient quantities to ballast the ship to any great extent. She rolled when there was nothing particular to roll about, and tangoed when there was. Under such circumstances the mere physical processes of reading became complicated to an unforeseen extent. The deck was cold and wind-swept; a couple of rubber bands, the purser's device, kept the pages flat, and a rug fortified one against the weather. Still, matters were difficult. The lop-sided swell could not leave a digestion not yet seaworthy altogether unaffected; there was urgent need of books that should absorb the mind and cheat the eye into forgetfulness alike of the dancing skyline and of the fact that we had still, with any luck, twenty-seven to thirty days ahead of us.

In this uneasy plight it seemed natural to fall back in the first place to the new novels among my collection. There was Arnold Bennett's latest, "Riceyman Steps." The gray narrative, artistically a reversion to an earlier manner, and much the gainer thereby, did hold the attention. Here was the Arnold Bennett of that great novel, "The Old Wives' Tale," of that great beginning, "Clayhanger." Gray story to gray sky, the book went well enough; only as it drew to an end, I was beset by an insistent and annoying half-memory. Where had I met that gentle, exquisite, inarticulate servant-girl before? Suddenly I remembered Flaubert's "Un Coeur Simple," of which she is the heroine. And I thought of "Esther Waters," that perfect story, and was glad for the fiftieth time that it is one of George Moore's works published at a price within the reach of poor folks' purses, and angry for the fiftieth time to think of those beautiful books he has published latterly at a price impossible to all except plutocrats and public libraries.

D. H. Lawrence's "England, My England" did not go so well. Its concupiscent landscape and hot-cheeked women seemed in the stark purity of rain-washed air, five hundred miles off the land, faintly nauseating. Not all the splendor of his craftsmanship could nullify the oppressiveness of an obsession which, if one does not happen to share it, is of all obsessions the least interesting. How tonic to turn from this heaviness to the frank indecencies and incomparable wit of Congreve's "The Way of the World," lately revived in London, and hence republished in a cheap edition. How ponderous, how underbred, our modern "daring" comedies seem when read beside a page of this dialogue. Here is wit in one short scene sufficient to make the fortune of any modern playwright. Even Oscar Wilde's brilliant sallies, dealt out impartially to all his characters like a round of cards, are less spontaneous, less delightful than Congreve's. And how charming Millamant is, and how alive, from that moment of her entrance in which Mirabell, watching her approach, says "Here she comes, i' faith, full sail, with her fan spread and streamers out, and a shoal of fools for tenders." . . . How is it that young actresses do not pant to play Millamant? She is adorable. She has youth and breeding, wit and charm, nor has her creator left her divested of the beauty of pathos. It is the measure of Congreve's overstepping of the Sheridans and Oscar Wildes that he has a feeling for the tears of things. A well-known critic who recently watched a perfect Millamant's first-night performance says that at one speech of hers, at the beginning of the famous proposal-scene, she had her audience all but weeping.

> My dear liberty, shall I leave thee? My faithful solitude, my darling contemplation, must I then bid you adieu? Ay-h, adieu. My morning thoughts, agreeable wakings, indolent slumbers, all ye douceurs, ye sommeils de matin, adieu. I can't do't, 'tis more than impossible. . . .

What exquisite lines to speak, or to listen to, adequately spoken! But they would be a singularly searching test of fitness; to sentimentalize them would be a gross vulgarization; the slightest undertone of flippancy or suggestiveness would make havoc of them. They hold the cry of all girlhood, spoken through the lips of a lady and a wit.

The mere elegance of Congreve's men and women was a refreshment to the spirit on that journey. Indeed, any book which held the atmosphere or described the details of life as it is lived with an infusion of the amenities was welcome. The cockroaches were so large and friendly. A Phillips Oppenheim novel of Monte Carlo, teeming with wonderful clothes, superlative lunch parties, and beautifully groomed Englishmen, helped one to forget, if taken immediately after a meal, what the prunes tasted like, and what salmon mayonnaise, of the reddest and yellowest, looks like, eaten on the same cold plate and at the same time with hot roast beef. And provided one were not too hungry or too qualmish, there were always the feasts provided at Combraye by the incomparable Françoise for the strange, sensitive, unhappy child of Proust's first and most wonderful volume.

Our good ship steadied down as the temperature rose, and the deep blue of Southern latitudes stole into the waters. The fact that it was possible once more to sleep in comfort lifted a tension from us all. The sailors sang at their work, and leaned against the railings to swap yarns and watch the flying-fish. The cook recovered from the effects of a too-sudden reintroduction to prohibition, and gave us something that was not rice pudding for dessert. Books and writing materials began to remain approximately where one placed them. At night, Venus, low down near the horizon, shone with a radiance that burned a golden track in the dark, still sea to rival the paler, broader path of the moon.

In the contented languor of the golden hours, not to be spoiled even by the sticky heat of the doldrums, one's mind turned inevitably to the blessed band of leisurely, long-winded writers. All through the still, breathless nights, when the pillows were little, square, red-hot stones, and the electric fan was a bad practical joke, Moby Dick spouted and disappeared, was spoken of in whispers and rose on the surface to do his deadly work. It is a great book. On land, where time is precious, Melville's florid divagations and inflated apostrophes are apt to prove somewhat irritating; but at sea, in the second week of a month's voyage, time has no value, and little existence except as a convention, so that the sheer bulk in the hand of "Moby Dick" was at once a promise and a pleasure.

Then, by way of contrast, I had a beautiful book, redolent of woodland glades, the aromatic fragrance of wood shavings, and the timeless quietude of the Surrey countryside. This was George Sturt's "The Wheelwright's Shop," printed and bound as the Cambridge University Press knows how. George Sturt, in 1884, entered upon the management of the wheelwright's shop which had been his grandfather's before him. In 1920, paralyzed but "for the first time a free man," having sold out to his partner, he began to write books, of which this account of an old and moribund folk industry is the third. The shop turned out farm wagons of various types, the photographs of which show a singular shapeliness, the comeliness that is the product of an all but forgotten craftsmanship, loving and knowledgable, exercised from the first careful selection of the trees to the last nailing into place of the wrought-iron or wooden "strouter." Mr. Sturt gives us his account of the shop and its activities and his own special share in them in the simplest, quietest of ways. Since, however, he loves that whereof he writes, and is much more concerned (tell it not in Greenwich Village) with it than he is with himself or his "reactions" to it, he has managed to depict for us a section of English country life, very beautiful and almost extinct, as vividly as any novel could have done. Incidentally, he has left us a most valuable social document, one, moreover, especially delightful to ponder over when the eye is satiated with purple sky melting into purple sea, and the ear with the never-ceasing swash of the waves against the ship's sides.

> The expeditions to buy oak were always in the late spring or the summer. The bark had been stripped then—it stood in big brown stacks beside the shining butter-colored "sticks" or butts of timber, where they lay in the brambles and newly springing fern. The "lop and top"—the branches and twigs—had also been stacked, the bigger branches into cordwood, good for fires, the smaller—the twiggy boughs—into "bavins" or "sprays" such as bakers want for their ovens or potters for their kilns. So, the ground was clear enough for the wheelwright to examine his trees, and to measure them if he bought. . . . His quest took him into sunny woodland solitudes, amongst unusual things and with country men of a shy type. . . . As I pushed through some brambles . . . and came to a patch of spurge (or it may have been a mist of blue-bells), the tall young forester who was showing me the oak-trees suddenly dropped forward his full length without bending; and when he stood up he had got a rabbit in his hands.

The days passed. We moved out of the doldrums into the white scurries and sudden changes of the trade-winds. The air grew cooler and the water darker. In this less languorous weather I embarked upon the curious adventures of Master Johann Dietz, born in Halle in the year 1665, surgeon in the army of the Great Elector, and barber to the Royal Court. Dr. Ernst Consentius first published this chronicle taken from the old manuscript in the Royal Library of Berlin, and Bernard Miall, the versatile translator who has recently given us such charming new volumes of Anatole France, has translated the surgeon-barber into English. It is a fascinating autobiography; he is as frank as Pepys, as naively certain of the Almighty's special protection and interest as Benvenuto Cellini. And Master Johann Dietz had interesting experiences, not only as an army surgeon and plague doctor, but also as surgeon on a whaling-ship. The original title of his book, comment upon which is superfluous, gives more of its peculiar flavor than could many pages of description.

> Master Johann Dietz > Being
> The faithful Description of his Life written by himself Relating all that he endured in the Campaign against the Turks in the Arctic Ocean > in German cities and countrysides among Soldiers, > Robbers and peaceful Citizens Young Maidens and > Apparitions he finally settling down in Halle, > his native City where he married two Wives and > all that he suffered in this World.

Master Dietz's unvarnished "description" of siege and plague, storm and battle was finished by me just in the nick of time. It was impossible not to enjoy his company immensely while it lasted. But when the gales which gave New York an April blizzard, and which traveled our way at ninety miles an hour, had struck our ship, his artless materialism would have been somewhat overpowering. It grew so rough that to the roll and pitch we had already experienced was added the continual jarring shock and shuddering subsidence of the ship as her propeller lifted out of the water, hung, and plunged again. Sitting and standing were difficult; even lying in one's bunk meant to be buffeted from side to side continuously; the captain, during the worst night of all, was pitched almost head over heels as he lay asleep. In the saloon the chairs with their occupants slid across and back again, accompanied at times by every glass, plate, and bit of cutlery on the table. Everyone was very kind to me. The white-haired first mate, in his gentle voice, told me "seasick" stories of incredible antiquity and great realism; the assistant engineer laid bets with himself as to my chances of turning up at the next meal; the purser lent me a volume containing all of Strindberg's most macabre plays. As the storm closed in it grew colder and colder, windier and windier, so that the deck was impossible.

I fled then to my cabin, armed with Wilfrid Gibson's "Kestrel Edge." Of his harsh, beautiful, undecorated blank verse I can say nothing higher than that it was possible to finish "Lover's Leap," the finest play in the volume, and take up "Julius Caesar," unread since my school-days, without any feeling of passing from small things to great. "Lover's Leap" is a great play, and, without a single purple patch, unmistakable poetry. But after all, Shakespeare is the man for a long voyage. Here indeed, as Dryden said of Chaucer, is God's plenty. What need I care for the storm when "Macbeth" went so gloriously with it? In the silver fog and bleak rawness that presently succeeded to it, the sheer, adorable, useful high spirits of "Love's Labor's Lost" sparkled more exquisitely than ever. And then I lost time and place in "Antony and Cleopatra." The siren might do its worst, the tackle for the unloading of the cargo bump and rattle as it please, the voices forward quicken and rise in the excitement of nearing land. The Comic Spirit arranged that in the most moving scene of all, the last dialogue of the two regal lovers, just as Antony had sighed out,

> I am dying, Egypt, dying;
> Give me some wine, and let me speak a little,

I was hailed by the captain's shout to come out and have a look at "the rum fleet." Half hidden in the mist, a baker's dozen of schooners dipped and swayed against the horizon on all sides of us, while from one of them a black speck of a boat shot like a bullet across the dark, oily water. The twenty-nine days were over.

A Strike Against the Government

By ROGER N. BALDWIN

SIXTEEN hundred postal employees in Toronto, Canada, marched triumphantly back to work on June 29, after an eleven-day strike, headed by a band of bagpipes playing the "Cock of the North," with the strike leaders carried aloft on the shoulders of the crowd. With 2,000 postal employees in three other cities—Montreal, Windsor, and Moncton, N. B.—they had stuck with a solidarity which amazed even themselves. They had paralyzed the nerve-centers of the postal service. After ten tense days of negotiation they had all won back their places without discrimination against their leaders, and with a gentlemen's agreement that the Government would promptly consider revision of the intolerable wage of $85 a month.

To Americans who were visiting Toronto it seemed impossible—3,500 men on strike against the Government, picketing government post offices day and night without interference by police or the courts, without an hysterical press campaign against "Bolshevism," "revolution," or "treason," and with public support outside labor ranks from many ministers, some newspapers, and even the Board of Trade! The 3,500 men who stuck, out of the 6,000 original strikers, returned to their jobs after repeated government announcements that they had all been "fired," "discharged," or "replaced," and after the Minister of Labor had publicly stated on the second day that they would "not be taken back until hell freezes over." Apparently it froze in ten days.

A French strike leader from Montreal, speaking brokenly but with heat at a Toronto meeting and apologizing "for to speak such bad words," said that "Canada had her first revolution in 1837. The second—she begin now. We go back not miserable civil servants, but free Canadian citizens."

Yet they were conventionally patriotic. After drubbing the Government for hours, they would all reverently stand at the close of strike meetings and sing with real feeling "God Save the King." Many of the postal employees, at least in Toronto, are returned soldiers, still afflicted with war delusions. One visitor who attempted to address them and who said "I wasn't in the war—I used my head," aroused such antagonism that he was put off the platform. The strikers' songs were chiefly the popular soldier songs of war days. Toronto is a conservative city, the heart of Tory Canada. The Labor member of Parliament from Winnipeg, who was on the platform and who did not join in "God Save the King," said that in western Canada at labor meetings they no longer sang it. "We sing the 'Red Flag' instead," he said, "just as they do in England."

More than half the strikers had never been in a union before. This was their first strike, yet they behaved like veterans. Only some sixty men quit their ranks in the eleven days, despite government announcements that their seniority would be lost, their places filled, and despite the crumbling of the strike in every city but four. There was very little strike relief, and no hope of other jobs in the face of widespread unemployment. The tie-up of mail service in the four cities disorganized the whole postal system; 3,500 men standing firm out of the 10,000 postal employees won whatever was won for the whole body of miserably underpaid workers. The minimum wage is $85 a month for all new men, which is little more than half the minimum cost of living for a small family as estimated by the Canadian Department of Labor and less than three-fourths the postal wage of similar men in the United States.

The immediate cause of the strike was a revision of the salary scale by the Civil Service Commission under which the war bonuses were largely dropped. The men demanded a minimum of only $1,260 a year, against the present $1,020.

An extraordinary factor in the strike was the widespread public support in the four centers. In Toronto the strikers got their case across by house-to-house distribution of some 75,000 handbills and by public parades, in one of which strikers' children made the appeal with placards reading: "Would you trust a man with your mail who took my daddy's job?" The tie-up of all local mail gave these strikers the advantage, as their chairman put it, of "not giving the other side a chance to flood the mails with propaganda."

Even the Toronto Board of Trade actively worked for a fair settlement. The press was commended by the strikers as fair. Six ministers of as many denominations spoke at strike meetings, and prayers for fair treatment were offered in many churches following a printed circular appeal by the strike committee. Liberal Party leaders espoused the strikers' cause, laboring with the pompous officials at Ottawa who refused "to deal with strikers." The employees on the Canadian National Railways threatened that they would not touch mail handled by strike-breakers. Strike-breaking letter-carriers were assaulted by persons to whom they tried to deliver letters. The hose was turned on them. Pickets followed them. They all quit after a day's trial. At the final strike meeting the loudest shout went up when the chairman called for a cheer for "the lady who got arrested for beating up a strike-breaker." Only one case of violence by a striker was reported in Toronto.

Strike-breakers were commonly referred to as "cuckoos," an improvement in exactness over most strike epithets. They were not allowed to rest easily in their stolen nests. The postmaster recruited some six hundred of them, many said to be university students just out of school for summer vacation, but they were totally unable to move the mountains of accumulated mail, and the day-and-night picket line outside the post office did not help their morale. Although thousands are unemployed in Canada, the men organized in the Unemployed Association refused to "scab." In appreciation of their stand the impoverished postal employees took up a collection for them at a strike meeting. The police, who are organized in a non-strike union, were sympathetic, and there was no interference whatsoever. In Windsor, the mayor himself was the strikers' chief spokesman.

The high morale necessary to "stick it through" was a combination of crowd pressure, desperation, and the certainty of being right. At the last meeting genuine sorrow was voiced that it was over; that the uplifting spirit of fighting together would be dissolved into humdrum routine. They knew they had won together a power that would serve them beyond this strike. The men's attitude toward the Government was tellingly illustrated in the final strike meeting. In the face of the Government's announcement, made known at 3:30 p.m. Sunday, that they would all be taken back at 4 o'clock, they simply took their time about closing up the strike. They even indulged in hearing a religious solo, "Jerusalem" (with all three verses), in which the whole crowd joined. They arrived in a body at the post office at 6:30 o'clock. But they were insistent on showing their loyalty to the postal service. They felt that it belonged to them. A resolve was taken in meeting to "clean up all mail, if it meant working 24, 48, or 72 hours on a stretch—to show the public and the Government that we are the only men who can do the job."

The strike audience was quick. It responded instantly to every emotion. It made fine distinctions. It kept its own order, supporting at all times an intense, sawed-off little chairman with a small voice, but with a hard will and an eloquent gavel. One of the Federation officials in advocating acceptance of the Government's terms became too moved to go on when he sketched a picture of the unity and sacrifice of the men in the four cities. In dead silence, looking down, he stood flicking the ash from his cigar. Then the whole audience let go the tension, and broke out into a tumult of understanding applause. From it he got power, and went on. At another tense moment the chairman singled out two men standing in the balcony. "Who are you?" he shouted. The men turned to leave. "Lock the doors," he directed. Then one turned back to explain in a trembling voice that he was just a visitor living at a hotel near by. "Follow them home," ordered the Chair, "and see if they live there. If they don't, bring them back." Scores of men rushed to follow them. "Here, there," shouted the Chair. "We don't need two hundred. Two's enough." Tension broke; the crowd roared; and business went on. When the final proceedings were on, the Chair called a striker to the platform to explain in sign language to the deaf-mutes among them just what it was all about. In sympathetic silence, save for one smart Alec who called "Not so loud," the whole audience followed his jumping fingers and broke into applause when he was done.

The Government's behavior all through was thick-headed. The Cabinet tried to maintain a lofty moral stand, outraged by an unwarranted strike which "bordered on treason." It refused point-blank to apply to its own employees the Industrial Disputes Act, for which, by the way, the Premier was getting an honorary degree from Yale the day the strike broke. The strike started off in bad form due to confusion as to whether or not it would actually take place in accordance with the strike vote, or whether the Government would concede the demands. The Government at first stuck by the Civil Service Commission, a heritage of the preceding Tory Government, but finally turned matters over to the Minister of Labor, who, in conference with the officials of the Canadian Federation of Postal Employees and Toronto leaders of the Liberal Party, conceded enough to get the men back. Whether the gentlemen's agreement to take up the salary scale again and readjust it in two months means what the strikers think it means, still remains to be seen. The Minister of Labor has since protested in Parliament that he conceded nothing and that the men misunderstood. But there are apparently private assurances that satisfy them. They have announced that they will strike again if the Government fails to deal promptly with their demands.

In the Driftway

SMALL, odd, and little-known magazines and newspapers have a fascination for the Drifter that he often fails to find in more conventional—and successful—publications. These waifs of journalism possess a freedom, a spontaneity, an originality that is ironed out of the others. Hence the pleasure of the Drifter when he encountered the other day the Fossil, official publication of an organization known as the Fossils, or the Amateur Journalists of the Past. There is an old and enthusiastic organization in this country known as the National Amateur Press Association, the members of which get out little publications of various sorts just for the fun of it. Most of these amateur publishers are still in the first flush of youth. Later many find that getting out a newspaper isn't such fun after all, and quit. Some of these persons—with a secret love for their early ventures—have banded together as the Amateur Journalists of the Past. They get together for an annual dinner, and meanwhile read about one another in the Fossil. Fossil Smith and Fossil Brown they call each other, and the Drifter is told that nobody under fifty years of age is admitted. In a recent issue of the Fossil the Drifter finds the following:

There has recently been endowed in Philadelphia the Curtis Institute of Music through the generosity of Fossil Cyrus H. K. Curtis, publisher and philanthropist.

On the evening of April 5, 1924, in the cozy annex of the exclusive Metropolitan Club, in Washington, D. C., forty men prominent in American legal circles gave a dinner to Fossil James M. Beck, in celebration of the fortieth anniversary of his admission to the bar.

Fossil William C. Sproul, former Governor of Pennsylvania, is a recently elected member of the [Trust Company of North America's] board of directors.

Fossil-Senator George H. Moses was defeated as a delegate-at-large to the Cleveland convention, and Fossil-in-Ordinary Frank H. Challis happened to be the man who handed Senator George the wallop.

* * * *

THE Drifter's outpourings in the issue of July 16 on the subject of women's names, the Lucy Stone League, and the way in which Old Spain had years ago adjusted the difficulty, has led a Chilean to send some further comment on the practice in Spanish-speaking countries:

As the Drifter suggests, the Spanish have used since long ago a formula conciliatory to manly pride and woman's new rights. After marriage a woman in the Spanish-speaking countries keeps her maiden name, dropping her mother's family name only then, to attach her husband's to it with the possessive particle de as the link between them. For the suspicious female, this de (of) may sound worse than nothing at all, considering that it means that Señora Maria Gomez de Martinez has become the property of Señor Martinez. But, as the Book says of wealth, what we possess in the same measure possesses us; and as the Spanish use the same particle in the nobiliary sense of being born to a land heritage, it can hardly be sustained that the name Señor Ponce de Leon suggests that he is owned by the house of Leon rather than being in the right sense the lord of it.

And, furthermore, we Spanish do not call a married woman by the cumbersome Señora Maria Gomez de Martinez—except in addressing an envelope. Her younger friends and her domestics alike will call her Señora Maria, tout court, or, better, Doña Maria. The romantic idea about everything Spanish would make everyone believe that we address one another as in the chivalrous stories. The fact is that in Spain and all over Spanish America, among other truly democratic practices, we treasure the custom of calling people by their first name, adding Don or Doña, which mixes in the right proportion a measure of affection and respect hardly conveyable in any other language. Thus a great writer like the late Don Benito Perez Galdós was merely Don Benito to his valet as well as to the head of the Madrid Government.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Snappy Journalism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "How about this convention? I only enlisted for six months, not for duration. It isn't any fun any more."

Thus, after its ninth day, the genial Heywood Broun showed up the Democratic Convention and, incidentally, explained the columnists. Life is for them a Ziegfeld Follies or Charlot's Revue—it must have pungency, variety, and quick movement. The exactions of spicy and snappy and short paragraphs subject events to the necessity of being spicy and snappy and short. What business has a great presidential convention to drag on with slow-moving, powerful forces? We have other things calling for cinematographic comment than the travail of a great and historic party. There is a new Ziegfeld Follies, and Maughan's flight, and the Parisian Olympics, and much else already forgotten. But if we are to report the convention, then things ought to happen every minute! We ought to be able to dish up pungency daily—paprika swallowing the roast. After all, events are for columnists, not columnists for events. What matters that a long train of causes were operating and deep-rooted forces were slowly emerging, requiring time for clarification and expression? We can't wait. As well have asked a columnist to report Sherman's slow march to the sea, or Grant's campaigns of attrition, or the dreary, weary Battle of the Marne. We want action, and be damn quick about it, so that we can move on to the next action, like the restless motor caravans to Florida or California!

And the convention was no less a trial and a bore to the famous "special" writers. Take the best of them, like William Allen White, whose presence anywhere is like a benison. Being "special" they must give us a "special" stunt. Reporting events in the convention or "behind the scenes" isn't enough. That's a "regular" reporter's job! Esoteric interpretation is the specialty—the subtle stuff that escapes the garden variety, every-day-in-the-week reporter. "Bill" White gave us some amusing bits and some illumination (as, of course, did Heywood Broun), but he, too, felt the necessity of furnishing drama—and so he furnished it. Again it gets back to the pressure for "storiettes." He, too, must supply the short and simple annals for the poor in time. Events, therefore, have to be symmetrical and dramatic—symmetry and drama give simplicity and brevity. The great fight represented by McAdoo and Smith—which, one would suppose, to a considerable extent involved the moral issues raised by McAdoo's professional entanglements and standards since he left the Treasury—is wholly assimilated to the K. K. fight and the wet-and-dry issue, and so becomes a coherent, unified clash between Southern rural Puritanism and Northern urban Catholicism—or is it Paganism? What matters that Underwood of Alabama initiated the K. K. fight and forced the issue, or that Erwin of Georgia gave it most fearless voice in the convention? Moreover, simplicity and drama demand a deus ex machina—and so the K. K. issue was a mob creation! The sidewalks of New York stimulated the irrelevant row, and the galleries at the Garden precipitated it! That's dramatic reporting, "inside dope," proving that art is greater than these insignificant facts: (1) The four days' tussle before the Resolutions Committee, away from all galleries, in which the K. K. issue was insisted upon and could not be composed; (2) the chief promoter of a straight-out fight on the Klan was the least of gallery politicians, Oscar Underwood, supported (3) by Pettangall of Maine, who had forced the fighting in his own State and brought it to New York long before there was a gallery in the Garden.

Of course the Garden convention afforded endless material for the mere fun-maker and wit—for an Artemus Ward or a Swift. That's why among all the "special" writers Will Rogers carried off the laurels. He was plainly and completely out for fun and sauciness; he didn't pretend to interpret the news or to stick his pen below the surface to reality. But when it comes to the historians of the convention, the real news and insight for present-day readers and for future historians will be found in the unpretentious work of the dray horses of journalism, the daily chroniclers of daily happenings—stupid, slow, confused, struggling events—men like Michelson of the New York World and Oulihan of the New York Times.

Cambridge, Massachusetts, July 12 FELIX FRANKFURTER

Historical Parallels

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: When the serfs of Britain, Russia, and other countries of Europe were encouraged by little groups of radical persons to strive for freedom, conservative folk argued that the serfs were unfit for freedom; that they needed the protection and control of masters.

When Garrison, Phillips, and other radicals urged the emancipation of America's black slaves, conservative folk again argued that the slaves were unfit for freedom; that they, too, needed the protection and control of their masters.

Today, when Alice Paul and her little group of radical women urge a constitutional amendment to liberate women from a servile position under the laws of the Republic, conservative folk argue that women are not fit for equal liberty with men; that they need the "protection" and control of male law-makers and courts—their present-day masters.

Milwaukee, July 2 FRANK PUTNAM

The Nation Among Royalty

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am always surprised to find how well known and respected The Nation is over here. The young ladies of the Wittelsbach family get your paper and read it religiously. I don't know that they are more intelligent than any other young women I have met here, but it tickled me to find Bourbons, Hapsburgs, and Wittelsbachers reading anything as hugely defiant and forward-looking as The Nation. More power to you.

Venice, May 15 A. H. H.

Contributors to This Issue

JAMES FUCHS was associate editor of Pearson's Magazine.

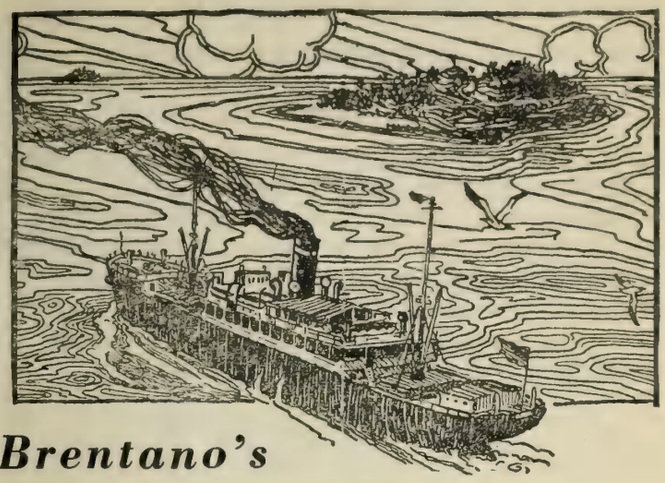
RUTH S. ALEXANDER is a resident of Cape Town who has recently visited the United States.

ROGER N. BALDWIN is director of the American Civil Liberties Union.

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER is an anthropologist and psychologist and a lecturer at the New School of Social Research at New York.

JOHN M. GAUS, who resigned from Amherst in protest against President Meiklejohn's leaving, is now professor of political science at the University of Minnesota.

JOHN B. WATSON is known for his work in behaviorist psychology.



Brentano's
Bon Voyage Book Boxes

Don't let your friends sail without one. It will insure them many pleasant hours on shipboard. Prices: $5, $10, $15, $20, etc.

Personal selection can be made, or BRENTANO'S will gladly use their best judgment in choosing the new and most popular Books and Magazines.

Write, or wire, name of recipient, giving price of assortment desired, the name of vessel and date of sailing, and delivery will be promptly made to Steamer.

BRENTANO'S

BOOKSELLERS TO THE WORLD

FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK CITY

The AMALGAMATED BANK

103 East 14th St. COR. 4TH AVE. AT UNION SQ.

OFFERS EVERY BANKING FACILITY

MEMBER FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

One Dollar Starts a THRIFT ACCOUNT

ACCOUNTS OPENED ON OR BEFORE JULY 31st WILL RECEIVE INTEREST FROM JULY 1st.

4%

Compounded Quarterly

CHECKING ACCOUNTS INVITED

Business—Personal—Organization

BANKING HOURS

Mon., 9 a.m.-8 p.m.
Sat., 9 a.m.-5 p.m.

other days
9 a.m.-6 p.m.

MONEY TRANSMITTED TO EVERY PART OF THE WORLD

The efficiency of our Foreign Department is recognized by over 300 responsible Banks, which send their remittances to Russia through the Amalgamated Bank. Over $5,000,000 has been remitted in a little over a year.

NEW YORK'S FIRST LABOR BANK

Two Sonnets

By ROBERT L. WOLF

Giddy

"Because from this small coign too high for sound
Save the caw-cawing of a rusty crow;
Down to those neat red roof-trees, row on row,
One flung himself, in self-contempt, and found
The whistling—the enormous surging ground
Quietly intercepted, and a slow
Roll of sweet mist, while angel hands below,
Above, on all sides, softly pressed around:

"Shall I, who lean one hand upon this wall
Sheer down to where the dotted midgets move,
Vault over now, invoking for a fall
Deliberate and planned—indulgent love . . . ?"
He shook the swimming brightness from his head—
"Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God," he said.

Open Ocean

We two who found the haven snug and safe—
The riding faultless, sheltered, pleasant, warm,
Learn now at last how any rope must chafe,
And put to sea again and face the storm.
Knowing no separate ports at which we touch
Can ever equal this, or offer more,
We know as well, at last, that vessels such
As we were not intended for the shore.

The danger is not small—we count the cost
Of climbing tide and wave, of seeing sail
Across the water, vanishing and lost,
The other—to be swallowed in the gale.
But we are built of too imperious stuff
To rank this harbor-happiness enough.

Books

A Voyager's Epic

Madagascar: Land of the Man-Eating Tree. By Chase Salmon Osborn, LL.D. Republic Publishing Company. $5.

"I HAVE traveled and studied in every country on the globe," writes Mr. Osborn. "To me, the most strange and interesting is Madagascar." Unless I am badly mistaken, most readers of "Madagascar: Land of the Man-Eating Tree" will be in serious danger of joining the company of the author.

An anthropological monograph it is not; for that the book is too discursive and subjective. Nor is it merely a book of travel, for the volume of well-digested fact which it carries is tremendous. Again, it is not just a catechism of a man's ethical code, although in this domain also the book is spiced with innumerable thrusts at the powers of evil in our civilization as well as with wholesome advice as to ways of improving our attitudes, for those of us who are willing to listen. "Madagascar" is a combination of all these qualities. Moreover, it is written in a style which is truly English, nay, American. If Mark Twain had had the equipment of a Darwin and the experiences of a Marco Polo, he might have written such a book.

We learn from it not only of the impressive size and the marvelous geological history of this isle of wonders, but of its four million inhabitants, Negro, Malay, Arab, and white, all in one with their ways, customs, and beliefs, which range from the magic and hunting rights of the primitive savage to the political superstitions of centralized kingdoms and the economic accessories of modern civilization. We learn of rivers so crowded with giant man-eating crocodiles that the natives, at least in their stories, cross the streams by stepping upon the backs of these animals. We read of an amazing tropical flora only partially explored (here Mr. Osborn indulges in a bit of deliberate highbrowism in citing in Latin a page and a half of some of the genera to be found in Madagascar).

> Inasmuch as the tropical areas cover twenty of the fifty million square miles of the earth, it is interesting to note that nearly all the species found anywhere in the tropics appear in the big island and many that are not to be seen elsewhere.

One of the specimens to which we are introduced is the so-called rain tree:

> A watery fluid resembling rain and suggesting a shower drops from the tree continuously. Careful examination proves this rain to be produced by millions of tiny hemipterous insects crowded on the little leaves. They secrete so much of the rain that it drops all the time. They multiply as rapidly as they die and there is no discontinuance of the shower from one end of the year to the other.

The animal life and mineral riches of the island are treated with great vividness. In describing the latter, the author makes use of Mr. Lacroix's two-volume treatise on "Malagasy Mineralogy" as reviewed in Science by the ubiquitous George F. Kunz, of New York.

Madagascar is so large and so well stocked with worldly goods that its inhabitants are in many ways self-sufficient. For example, they seem to have no interest or even knowledge of America and its inhabitants. The author's accounts of the United States often fell upon incredulous ears. Many even of the better-informed natives suspected him of telling stories for their entertainment, while others were surprised to learn that not all Americans were Negroes. All this does not imply that racially the Malagasy are either pure or uppish.

> One evening at a party at Tamatave there were black French officers with white wives and white French officers with black wives and they all deported themselves, if anything, with more circumspection than the all whites. The color line is not drawn rigorously by the Germans and not at all by the French, unless possibly the French girls prefer pigmented husbands and lovers; not necessarily both at the same time.

Among the dangers of Malagasy existence we hear of a pestiferous bedbug (mentioned by Mr. Osborn in company with the crocodile) called jigger, which is a deadly enemy of man. The native method of ridding a house of jiggers is noteworthy. A crowd of children is invited in, allowed to sit a while on the floor, walk about, and depart. Then it is found that most of the jiggers will have fastened themselves to the feet of the youngsters. The jiggers are removed and there is no further trouble. If, however, they are permitted to remain in the body, they grow, encyst, and incubate. When the growth reaches the size of a grain, the whole cyst breaks and the myriad progeny journey through the body, destroying everything in their path. Death, of course, cannot be averted.

Interesting pages are devoted to a description of trials by ordeal, an institution, incidentally, which Madagascar shares with Africa as well as, until recent times, with Europe.

Space does not permit more than a mere mention of the sketch of native history which, in horrors, adventure, and romance, may well be compared to the Arabian Nights.

The creation legend of the Hovas is worth quoting in full as given by Mr. Osborn:

> The Hovas are descended from one man and one woman. God placed the man on the summit of the mountain Andringitra and the woman on the top of the Ankaratra; the man thirty miles south of Antananarivo and > the woman forty miles north. They knew nothing of each other and wore no clothing. But the Creator had made them for each other and He gave them a mighty hunger which led them to each other. But before the happy design was fulfilled there was a trial of strength and fortitude. They were made to wander for months through the lonely valleys and over the trackless mountains. Their longing grew only the more fervent. Each night they were given blissful dreams and the promise that at the proper time when their love had been tested enough they would find each other and be happy. One day the man made a fire to cook his simple meal of manioc. This fire spread into the dry forest and made a huge mass of smoke that could be seen for a long distance. On the same day the woman made a fire to cook sweet potatoes and it also ignited the woods. Each saw the smoke made by the fires. They took heart anew and felt that they were soon to find each other. The man started toward the smoke on Ankaratra, building fires on every crest as he proceeded. The woman went in the direction of the smoke she saw and lighted fires to guide the man for whom her heart yearned. Six days after they saw the smoke the first time they came face to face. There they stood speechless, enraptured with the beauty and love and radiance that each saw in the other's face. In just a little time their voices were heard in words of love and endearment and they perfectly understood why they had been sent to each other. No snake, no apple, no punishment; just perfumed bliss such as the world had not known up to that time.

It would be unfair to Mr. Osborn to conclude this review without at least a passing reference to his humanitarian outlook. He, for one, has not been taken in by the Nordic myth. He has only sarcasm for the paternalistic exploitation of natives by their civilizing brothers.

> The fact is that a Nordic super race never existed. This earth is a sad old raft and those who squirm and fall overboard and climb on again down the river of the ages must learn that if they are to have a place they must grant one. Nearly three-fourths of the peoples of the earth are colored and they are vital and they must be treated right or humanity will pay for it. We must learn justice and practice it and teach it to those from whom we may one day beg it.

ALEXANDER GOLDENWEISER

Where Do We Go from Here?

Social Change. By William Fielding Ogburn. B. W. Huebsch. $2.

"SOCIAL CHANGE" is an excellent book. It at once provides the reader with an introduction to the relationships between our natural and social heritages and the controversies now being waged as to their relative significance in social development and offers us the example of an excellent method of analysis and study in the social sciences.

The argument is simple, but with far-reaching implications. After indicating the limitations imposed upon us both by human nature and by the institutional scheme which men have built up, Mr. Ogburn points out that our material culture develops fairly rapidly, owing to the reworking of old and the employment of new discoveries and inventions. Our non-material culture, on the other hand, such as law, custom, ethical codes, institutional organization, changes more slowly. This is due in part to the growth around a given system of vested interests, it is due to tradition, habit, forgetting the unpleasant, and to various other traits of homo sapiens. Consequently between non-material culture and material culture there is always a "cultural lag," exemplified by our failure to provide for a program of conservation of natural resources until long after those resources had clearly approached exhaustion, by the failure of the law to take account of machine technology in its treatment of industrial accident until long after there had been injustice and waste, and in our failure to plan and predict city growth long after the terrible costs of such planlessness were only too evident. But since our human nature is frequently poorly adjusted to our material culture—the human body becomes fatigued, while the machine is tireless—we have physical maladjustments, as revealed in nervousness and insanity, as well as social maladjustments, as revealed in the cultural lags mentioned above.

Practically all of the book is devoted to this very able and dispassionate analysis. The last few pages suggest possible ways of meeting some of these difficulties, but Mr. Ogburn is frankly and avowedly less interested in this side of the situation. He is very stimulating, however, in his brief discussion of recreation as a means of enabling us to meet these maladjustments.

This book is admirably objective in its treatment of social problems. I can also speak from experience based upon its use in classes of mine when I say that it gives the student who is first attacking the study of social institutions an excellent orientation toward the relations between our natural and social heritage and toward the significance of inventions, social changes, and maladjustment. As a matter of fact, I think that this is a better book than Graham Wallas's "Social Heritage," because I think that the author is more careful in using terms and arguments, and is much more objective in treating social problems. Furthermore, he seems to me to supply an excellent approach to the significance of the new work in physiology and psychology for social sciences. One may be a little fearful, after reading "Social Change," of the growth of a special jargon in the social sciences. After all, those of us in those sciences do aspire to some mark of the trade. Perhaps it is another example of cultural lag.

The lay reader will find here an interesting introduction to the world he lives in. He will not be too optimistic concerning his power to change or direct that world when he finishes the book. But if we do not know where we go from here, it is something to know the methods of travel, and at least exciting to know why we get wrecked.

JOHN M. GAUS

Elegant and Commodious

Sandoval. By Thomas Beer. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.
Inigo Sandys. By E. B. C. Jones. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

WE moderns may possibly lack a proper respect for our grandfathers, but we are certainly not without a lively and almost unprecedented interest in them. Biographers and novelists have established what amounts to a veritable cult of the immediate and unheroic past, and now Mr. Beer has joined Mr. Strachey, Mrs. Wharton, and Miss Macaulay in the exploration of times past. Less weighty than Mr. Strachey or Mrs. Wharton, Mr. Beer has the advantage of a certain debonair insouciance, and like his fellow-explorers he is fascinated by an age so near and yet so far, by customs and habits of mind which are really only of yesterday, yet have a quaintness which is almost legendary.

In that New York where he lays his scene, Tweed was boss, and Ward McAllister, strolling down the aisle at Daly's, dubbed ladies and gentlemen knights of society with a touch of his gloved hand. Up the Hudson, ingenious patriots who had taken advantage of the war to buy cotton at five dollars and to sell it to England at fifty built houses overlooking the river, had them described in printed pamphlets as "elegant and commodious, surrounded by extensive grounds, furnished with four bathrooms," and bought genuine oil paintings by the best Parisian painters to demonstrate that America was not behind Europe in the arts. It was the age of innocence, but it was something more; ladies, it is true, played harps and did not mention legs, but the gambling hell was an accepted institution, and though champagne was drunk with a certain self-consciousness it was consumed in considerable quantities.

Moreover, some of its youth could give points to the younger generation of today in fast living, and its politicians had the advantage of living in the epic age of robbery. The days of great Elizabeth were, we have it upon good authority, "spacious days," but those of the other great queen were, on both sides of the Atlantic, at least "elegant and commodious." Yet America was not quite England. It tried hard to be Victorian, but the essential rowdyism of its rank youth broke through, and even its vulgarity had a vigor which was not wholly contemptible. Of the great numbers enthusiastically playing the game of respectability on both sides of the Atlantic, there were fewer in America who never doubted that it was more than a game.

Only that past which is remote enough to be peopled with genuine antiques can be heroic, for the merely outmoded is bound to be a little comic, and so Mr. Beer's novel is not without satire, but he looks upon his chosen scene chiefly with the eye of a romancer. He is not so much concerned with social moralizing as Miss Macaulay and he does not catch as much of a lingering fragrance of sentiment as Mrs. Wharton, but he exploits to the full the bright colors and the grandiloquent gestures of a lively and fantastically lavish age. The story which serves as an excuse for his mise en scène is melodramatic and trivial enough, but nowhere are his documents in evidence, and he moves with quiet ease through forgotten scenes which he conjures up with a casual air and none of the portentousness of the historical romancer of the old school. For an hour and a half harps twinkle and gentlemen bow; bottles are emptied, cards shuffled, and hearts are broken; then the lights go out, and the New York of the sixties drops back into the yesterdays which are dead.

Perhaps in retrospect we get a little the impression of a very lively wax-works, but the costumes are fresh and the illumination is good; what more can we ask? Though sometimes we like to fancy otherwise, the past is never really much more than that. Only that part of it which has remained unchanged today can really live for us, and in no historical romance ever written are cast-off modes of thought more than merely costumes, more or less skilfully draped upon lay figures. Grandmother's ideas are like her crinolines—good only to dress a masquerade.

Four novels by Miss E. B. C. Jones have nourished a real admiration for her genuine and delicate talent for psychological analysis somewhat in the James manner, but even that admiration is not sufficient to inhibit a wish that her people might be exposed to a little of the rowdyness which Mr. Beer describes. She is not exactly effeminate—the firmness of her delicate line saves her from that—but her people are too invariably nice not to awaken an occasional impatience. Her world is the world in which pink-cheeked youths fresh from the university play tennis with moderately emancipated maidens who have competent mammas usually within easy reach. Being very modern, they not infrequently break the commandments, but they are never ruffled out of their manners, and they conduct even their illegitimate love affairs with such perfect decorum that one sometimes longs for a little less sensibility and a little more passion.

Cambridge, the scene of the first portion of the present book, is undoubtedly a beautiful place, and the life of its undergraduates has a graceful charm. But outside the walls, cricket, for instance, is not a sacred ritual, and one expects in novelist and even character some faint suspicion of that fact. Yet neither Miss Jones nor her Inigo seems to have it, and they take with the same solemnity every traditional mode of feeling in the right little, tight little class of their right little, tight little island. No hint of that larger world in which each must create anew the modes of his thought and feeling ever comes to disturb the mild comedies and serene tragedies of her people, but she endows them with all the grace possible to those who have chosen to lead the merely comely life.

J. W. Krutch

Nordic History

Jefferson Davis, President of the South. By H. J. Eckenrode. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

WE have here a book, like so many others, of good and bad qualities intimately interwoven. I should like to pick out the good and set it over against the bad.

Mr. Eckenrode treats the causes of the Civil War and therefore of Jefferson Davis fundamentally. They were distinctly industrial, although there were moral influences that at times proved powerful. The rise of industrial America is, however, the basic cause; and Eckenrode's chapter treating this subject is excellent, discriminating, and not sectional or hot-tempered.

His portrayal of the planter system is hardly equal to his portrayal of its rival, the industrial, but it is good and sometimes the picture is most lifelike. Nor is there any taking of sides. In fact Eckenrode likes both the industrial and the planter inequalities and oligarchies. He makes it plain that he thinks democracy was and still is a great blunder. Men can not govern themselves anyhow. And maybe he is right.

For Davis as an historic figure Eckenrode has little but praise. The old notion that Davis was a mere traitor, a selfish politician willing to wreck "the best government on earth," is entirely exploded. Davis was a man of highest integrity and most devoted patriotism, the patriotism that swears by the Constitution and the law and cares little for that vast body of toiling folk who make up the country. Davis was even tender to these, but not at all impressed by the great thesis on which the United States was first projected, democracy. Nor does Eckenrode waste his time upon that dream.

There are some new facts brought out in the recent body of the correspondence of Jefferson Davis, edited by Dunbar Rowland, to which I should like to call attention, but I must only say that these new facts substantiate all that Eckenrode claims for Davis as a high-toned and considerate leader of men. Davis was not a stubborn, narrow, or personally vain and opinionated man as so many have made him out. And a new biography of a popular character, such as this is, ought to be widely read.

Now for the bad. There are very serious misjudgments in this work. It is, unfortunately, based frankly upon the very flimsy foundation of Madison Grant's "The Great Race," or some such title as that. Madison Grant a philosopher! A guide to the uncertain steps of historians! That I had never expected. His philosophy is the old gospel of God's chosen people put forth by the ancient Hebrews, urged and practiced by the Romans, pressed upon the world by Napoleon. Now comes an American historian and writes the story of the Civil War in the spirit of this ancient "will to power." The war between North and South was but a lamentable conflict between the two Nordic elements of the country. One of the great groups was defeated; the other was successful only after the loss of something like a million lives and perhaps ten billions of wealth. And the outcome was and is the dominance of the industrial Nordics, the Republican Party with its industrial barons for underpinning.

One may well agree that the destruction of the planter civilization in favor of the industrial oligarchy which all historians, but Rhodes, recognize as dominating American life since 1865, was unwise, perhaps a calamity. One may well recognize the fact that Lincoln lost his cause before he lost his life; but to glory in that loss and lament the danger that the beneficiaries of Lincoln's defeat may yet lose their control of the country is strange indeed in one who, if he be a historian, must look impartially and with a certain inward sorrow upon the futile struggles of men for ideals.

As I have said this is an interesting, a sad book. If historians fall such easy prey to mere propaganda what may not the rest of us be excused for doing?

William E. Dodd

Suspense

The Snob. By Helen R. Martin. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.

IN fiction as in life there are the methods of God and of the Devil. Doubtless God knows all about the little puppets he turns loose on the world, since of course they were fashioned in his own workshop, but he gives them a run for their money, possibly because he realizes that the play will be more interesting if for their day the puppets seem, at least to themselves, to be real. But the Devil is always hovering over his progeny with his trident. "So you think you're in love, do you?" he sneers. "As a matter of fact, your liver is on the rampage."

Whether or not it is from innocence that Mrs. Martin belongs to the creative school, the fact that she does enables her to tell a good story. In spite of much elementary social theorizing in the course of which all the popular Main Street arguments for the present system and against socialism are neatly bowled over, in spite of repetitious Pennsylvania Dutch dialect, only mildly interesting in itself, in spite of a quite impossible situation, the book absorbed my attention on a spring day from the opening chapter to the end. Impossible though it may be, there is a situation. The titillating Mephistophelian school can have no situations because they have pricked the mystery of personality, reducing it to a few generalizations.

And even if mere innocence is the saving quality of Mrs. Martin's point of departure, she adds to it first-rate craftsmanship in the telling of a tale. The reader is continually in an agreeable state of suspense, being kept busy throughout the first chapters speculating about the character of the little country school-teacher for whom the Snob, although reluctantly, endangered his career, later striving to anticipate the reactions of Leitersville on the mysterious Nancy and of Nancy on Leitersville, and in the end tumbling happily from one denouement to another.

The characters may be somewhat sentimentalized by the pink and gray lenses turned on them, it may be a bit inconsistent to enable these socialistic aliens who neither toil nor spin and who nevertheless rival Solomon in all his glory, to "put it over" on the penurious, hardworking, and unbeautiful natives because of their superior wealth and prestige, one may have one's doubts as to the Snob himself—all this is for the moment beside the point as the tale unfolds.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Social Living

Social Psychology. By Floyd H. Allport. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

THERE are two standpoints in social psychology today; the first, which is sociological, involves the group as a unit of study; the other, which is psychological, in the strict sense, deals with the individual in social situations, either real or imaginary. For Mr. Allport social psychology falls under this second category.

In accordance, then, with his thesis, the author has confined himself very largely to describing and interpreting the mechanisms of individual consciousness and behavior as they involve social stimuli and the responses thereto. The opening chapters give a general behavioristic background to the problem with emphasis upon the "prepotent reflexes": hunger, sex, struggle, rejection, approach and withdrawal, and "sensitive zone reactions." Through learning, which consists chiefly in the process known as "conditioning," habits are built up which furnish us with the concrete features of conduct. Connected with these fundamental behavior patterns are the emotions and feelings. The author has modified the James-Lange theory of emotions to take into account the differentiating aspects of bodily sensations and the place which the autonomic nervous system plays in emotional expression.

Following this preliminary treatment of human nature is given an interesting analysis of personality. Here are presented some original researches upon temperament, compensation, inferiority feelings, sociality, and domination-submission tendencies. While there is in this volume no direct acceptance of Freud, the influence of psychoanalysis upon Mr. Allport's conception of personality is everywhere evident. In fact, one of the outstanding contributions of the book, aside from its specific content, is the author's acceptance in a systematic treatise of much of the new psychology, although it is couched, on the whole, in terms of behaviorism. To him "personality is preeminently the social aspect of the individual" whose traits are a combination of original nature and much transformation under family, playground, and other group environment—a viewpoint very much like that of Freud, Adler, and Jung.

The second part of the volume deals more especially with "social behavior," that is, for Mr. Allport, the reactions and attitudes of the individual in social situations. The chapters on "language and gesture" and on "facial and bodily expression" as forms of social stimulation are the ablest summary of this important material which the reviewer has seen in English. True to his general standpoint, however, the author does not venture beyond the mechanistic phases of the topics into the wider significance of human communication which is so basic to social intercourse and social control. And in the section on the relation of infantile to primitive language there is an unwarranted assumption that non-inflective languages, for instance agglutinative or polysynthetic languages like those of native Africa or America, are inherently inferior to our own Aryan tongue which no modern anthropologist would accept.

Two chapters are given over to the presentation of experimental data on the responses of the individual to the presence of other persons. Confirmation of older observation is here given. The mere presence of other people tends to make, in the individual, for quantity rather than quality of motor skill. So, too, working in groups tends to eliminate individual differences in mental performance leveling the thinking capacity of the brighter to the mediocre standards of the average member concerned.

In the discussion of crowd behavior, more specifically, the author follows Martin's interpretation fairly closely. The older theory has been that the crowd wipes out the individual's own personal attitudes and ideals. It is here maintained, on the contrary, that more frequently the real deep-rooted emotional attitudes of hatred, selfishness, and aggression of the individual are there fully expressed, simply because of the feeling of universality and of release from responsibility which the crowd fosters. As Mr. Allport puts it, "The individual in the crowd behaves as he would alone, only more so."

The final chapters discuss the place of social attitudes in social adjustment and give a sketchy account of the nexus between the individual and his institutional environment.

It may be said in conclusion that this book is a very adequate account of the fundamental mental mechanisms behind social relations. To hold with the author, however, that the province of social psychology consists in this sort of treatment only is to ignore the important contributions to this field of such writers as Tarde, Le Bon, Graham Wallas, J. M. Williams, and the type of studies now being published under the direction of Professor Park at Chicago. I believe that the basic foundations of social psychology must first treat the individual mechanisms of mind coupled with an analysis of the concrete nature of idea and attitude. In the second instance, account must be taken of the specific environment around which these attitudes and ideas revolve and toward which behavior is directed. To ignore either the individual or the social environment in dealing with social psychology is to possess a particularistic formula from which the full interpretation of social living will tend forever to escape us.

KIMBALL YOUNG

With Apologies to Socrates

The Logic of Conduct. By James MacKaye. Boni and Liveright. $3.

ON the cover of Mr. James MacKaye's book, "The Logic of Conduct," we are told that it is "a revolutionary book that transforms morals from a philosophy of life into a science of life." Goodness knows we need a book that will do just that; but shades of Plato and Socrates! What do we find? Forty-five "sessions" between a junior and a senior! Each "session," conducted in some peaceful, secluded spot, consists of a dialogue between the two about the good, the bad, and the indifferent. The conclusions reached by these youthful but all too close friends advance ethical thought not one whit beyond the point where Plato had Socrates leave it. If the author had only introduced a bit of romance—if the junior had only been a girl, one could have forgiven him even 486 pages!

Socrates if alive would be furious at the abuse of his method at the hands of a 1924 writer who knows so little of the color of the water that has passed over the dam in the stream of philosophy and psychology during the past twenty years.

In his preface Mr. MacKaye states that we are in need of a group of volumes on the science of "utilitechnics." He modestly intimates that should the demand justify the preparation of such volumes he would be glad to undertake them. If the present ancient, threadbare presentation is an earnest of what they will be like, heaven forbid that in this day of the high cost of paper and printing he can ever again find so lenient a publisher for his manuscripts.

JOHN B. WATSON

Books in Brief

Plays in Prose and Verse. By W. B. Yeats. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Later Poems. By W. B. Yeats. The Macmillan Company. $2.50

Two volumes of a new edition of the works of Mr. Yeats which will fill in all six volumes. The edition is welcome, since its predecessors are difficult to obtain and are necessarily incomplete. The first of the two volumes at hand contains more plays than have hitherto been collected in a single book; the second contains all of Yeats's poetry written since "The Wind Among the Reeds."

What Is Modernism? By Leighton Parks. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.

A simple, readable, well-informed, and well-reasoned statement of the case for modernism by a devout churchman. If it does not meet all questions and doubts both from without and within the church, it ought to allay many fears as to the piety of the more conservative modernist and his loyalty to the church.

Treve. By Albert Payson Terhune. George H. Doran Company. $2.

While it is largely true, as Mr. Terhune says, that the story of one's dogs, like the recital of one's dreams, is of no special interest to others, this writer gets around the handicap by the communicable eagerness of his enthusiasm. Knowing so much about collies, he has become their literary spokesman. The shaggy aristocrats are fortunate to have their interpretation in the hands of a writer who is sympathetic without being sentimental.

Le Français Classique. By G. Cayrou. H. Didier. 20 francs.

Although addressed directly to students preparing for examination on precise interpretation of classic texts, this book will be useful to American teachers whose interest in words and their ways extends further than the novel of yesterday. It contains approximately 2,200 words common in the seventeenth century and now either obsolete or used in a different sense. Definitions from early dictionaries are followed by examples and by remarks from contemporary grammarians to illustrate shades of meaning.

What Is Modern Architecture?

By FISKE KIMBALL

SPEAKING of her buildings, Henry James compared New York to "an ample childless mother, who consoles herself for her own sterility by an unbridled course of adoption." It is the current view that American architecture, under the lead of designers such as McKim, Stanford White, Charles Platt, and John Russell Pope, has turned its back on modernity and reconciled itself to a barren reproduction of the classic. It is not the true or vital view. If we consider more intently the work of this contemporary classic school, we will find it is not only creative, but that it has an underlying affinity, real though not obvious, with the progressive work in modern painting and the other arts.

In the thought of the nineties, by contrast, the insistent search for a "modern style," for an "American style," was bound up with the effort to find a new expression for modern materials and structure. Its doctrine, derived from the writings of Ruskin and Viollet-le-Duc in the sixties, crystallized in the mottoes: "Form follows function" and "You may decorate your construction, never construct your decoration." It was in reaction against the historical eclecticism of the mid-century, the indifferent copying of historic forms, Greek, Roman, Gothic, and Renaissance. Taking to heart the environment theory of Taine, it emphasized the novel elements in modern life, rather than those of continuity with the past. Thus its attention was devoted primarily to the new products of modern materialism, steel and concrete, the skyscraper and the factory.

In 1895 Louis Sullivan of Chicago for the first time solved the problem of indicating the steel frame of the office building. He abandoned any wall surface in favor of a visible protective casing of the steel itself. This he accomplished in the Wainwright Building in St. Louis, and repeated and developed, the following year, in the Guaranty or Prudential Building at Buffalo. The essence of the building, its height, and the relatively greater strength of the vertical bars of the frame, he emphasized by doubling and accenting the vertical lines. The achievement in the expression of structure was widely recognized and acclaimed. Few, if any, tall buildings from 1897 to 1912 failed to show its influence, which extended far beyond the circle of consistent "modernists" who sought to abandon all historical forms. It was taken up also by the eclectics, and hybridized especially with Gothic, which itself involved the tendency to structural expression and an emphasis on the vertical. The skilful use of Gothic forms in so conspicuous an instance as the Woolworth Building, in the years 1911 to 1913, gave them increased currency. Even the most determined classicists did not remain untouched. Thus in McKim, Mead and White's Municipal Building, designed in 1908, the structural lines of the steel columns were accentuated by shallow vertical strips.

A parallel achievement in the expression of concrete factory construction was made by Ernest Wilby, associated with Albert Kahn of Detroit. In designing the first Ford plant at Highland Park, the idea came of exhibiting the concrete frame itself, and filling the entire space from pier to pier with glass. Only below the sills did a low parapet wall of brick remain. The new treatment, which had great practical and economic advantages, spread over the country like wildfire, and has given the American industrial building its characteristic physiognomy.

These realistic treatments of the subject matter of modern life have their obvious relation with the realistic movements in painting and sculpture, in literature and music. Painting from Courbet through the impressionists and neo-impressionists, sculpture in the hands of Carpeaux, Meunier, and Rodin, the music-drama of Wagner, the novels and plays of Tolstoi, Flaubert, Zola, and Ibsen, all seek characteristic beauty through truth to nature, rather than abstract beauty through relations of form. And while, nevertheless, the men of fundamental greatness in the other arts, as in architecture, preserved a sense of form, the lesser men and the imitators fell into the formlessness which we see, for instance, in Monet's successors.

Against this formlessness of the impressionists, this scientific observation of nature, this equation of beauty with truth, there began a reaction, even before 1890. Cézanne wrote "One must compose by the cylinder, the sphere, and the cone," and he let anatomy and photographic foreshortening give way. Bourdelle, Maillol, and Mestrovic became "archaic" and geometrical. The symbol replaced the statement of objective fact. Representation itself has been discarded by painting and sculpture in some instances, and the possibility of a purely abstract art of form and color asserted. In literature there has been a renaissance of verse, with a multitude of novel experiments in form. Music has tended to abandon its programmatic and representative efforts to express extraneous ideas, and to revert to its own language, enriched by new scales and tonalities.

In the architecture of the past the preeminent manifestations of pure or abstract form, as against a structural or sculptural emphasis, have doubtless been in the classic styles. Periods of renewed interest in unity and purity of form, such as those of the fifteenth and eighteenth centuries, have coincided with reversions to the classic elements, which have come to constitute a universal language, of elementary geometrical simplicity. It is in this sense that we must interpret the new revival of the classic which has decidedly gained the upper hand in American architecture during the last generation.

It is important to note that this movement in its origins owed little to contemporary Europe and that it has remained American in leadership. Although the leaders have been men of European training, it has not been the style of their French masters which has determined theirs. McKim and White came back from France with their portfolios full of picturesque high-roofed chateaux, such as Hunt, their predecessor at the Ecole des Beaux-Arts, had already been transplanting here. Their initial works, whether showing the influence of Richardson or of the Queen Anne period, were themselves romantic in composition. The earliest work in a new manner, one which in the sequel assumes importance of the first magnitude, was the group of Villard houses in New York, built in 1885 on Madison Avenue between Fiftieth and Fifty-first Streets. The four houses were not individually differentiated, but were welded into a single great palace, simple and uniform, its details suggested by the Italian Renaissance. When I once asked Mr. Mead how this sudden departure came to pass in the work of the firm he spoke of the gifted and unfortunate Joseph Morrill Wells, one of their designers, and showed me Wells's two sober drawings of the Farnese Palace and Lescot's wing of the Louvre, still on the walls of the office, representing his classic ideals, which became the ideals of his great associates.

A series of influential works quickly followed, the most notable being the Boston Public Library, for which McKim's uniform and majestic competitive design was adopted in 1888. Then came the marvelous phantasm of 1893 at Chicago, in which the unsubstantial realities of wood and plaster were bodied forth in an ideal splendor and harmony of form. Here McKim himself was rivaled and outdone by Charles Attwood in his two superb designs of the Peristyle and the Fine Arts Building, the latter a masterpiece which well deserves the promised resurrection from its sad decay. The effect on current practice was electrical. Almost overnight the whole public architecture of the country was turned into a monumental and classical channel. When, in 1901, McKim and Burnham made the great plan for the architectural development of Washington, the movement found a nationalistic sanction in the buildings of the early republic, unparalleled abroad in their literal adherence to the classic ideal.

Although, to many later works of the school, the Ecole des Beaux-Arts has contributed its analytical science of planning, it is a mistake to suppose the movement itself to be, as Jacques Gréber has asserted, "preuve de la force d'expansion de la génie française." The scores of élèves who have returned from the unrivaled discipline and emulation of the Paris school have had here to lay aside their French language of form, based on characteristic emphasis and on lavish, dynamic energy, to learn anew a language of almost mathematical simplicity and of Dorian harmony. Not one has permanently escaped the overwhelming domination of the American classic.

Even the citadel of functionalism, the skyscraper, has finally been captured. In 1912 there rose in upper Fifth Avenue the building of the Century Holding Company, the first of the "millionaire apartments," at the corner of Eighty-first Street. Here McKim, Mead and White no longer compromised, but were true to their own implicit theory of form—that "instead of constructing first, without preoccupation with the final appearance, promising oneself to utilize the ingeniousness of the construction as the decoration, one should relegate the ingenuities of structure to a position among the secondary means, unworthy of appearing in the completed work." The steel frame disappeared again behind sheer, unbroken walls, the merits of which lay in uniformity and proportion. Almost simultaneously came Charles Platt's Leader-News Building in Cleveland with its vast plane surfaces of grooved stone. Now the multitude of high apartment buildings east of Central Park follows the new precedent with one accord, and the Federal Reserve Bank raises its sheer cliffs of unbroken masonry in the narrow lanes downtown. For better or worse, the struggle to express the steel frame, so burning in the nineties, has become a dead issue.

Meanwhile foreign conquests have begun. The French, who made fun of the plaster colonnades at Chicago in 1893, reproduced them at the Paris exposition of 1900, so unlike all its European predecessors. The English, abandoning their long tradition of ridicule, are frank in admiration. The leaders of the new generation, such as Adshead, Richardson, and Atkinson, know America well. They have modeled their schools on ours, and are striving to bring about a revival of their own fine classic architecture of 1800. The young pensioners of the Royal Institute have already come to America to study, more than once; and now with the founding of the Bossom scholarship they will do so as a regular practice. They are not interested merely in the commercial and material aspects of American architecture, but equally in the largeness and simplicity of style. With the building of Bush House in the Strand, the first conspicuous monument of this style on English soil, the buzz of admiring tongues tells us that in architecture American hegemony is won.

In the never-ending flux of artistic creation, what is the "modern" of one generation is no longer the modern of the next. We may admire the apt epigram of the nineties, but if we persist in repeating it, it becomes a platitude of today.

In art, unlike science, there is no single "right" way. Only to stand still is wrong, since it belies the imaginative and creative nature of art itself. Which way is forward at the moment is determined only by the march of events. If the procession turns south, those who still continue westward are condemned henceforth to insignificance. Such a great change of front has taken place in our day. Wells and McKim, White and Attwood, we now see, did not lead merely the rear-guard of a belated historic revivalism, but a new van. In their apparent classicism, the architects are really marching side by side with the modernists in sculpture and painting—alike votaries of a new worship of abstract beauty of form.

International Relations Section

They Were Born . . . They Died

THE shaded patches on the accompanying chart show the excess of deaths over births in France and Germany during the war years—the smaller patch the excess in Germany, the larger that in France. The chart is compiled from figures given in the May 1 issue of Wirtschaft und Statistik, issued in Berlin by the German Government.

The three columns at the left each cover a decade—they show the steady pre-war decline both in birth- and death-rates in France, Germany, and Great Britain. The coincidence between the decline in deaths and that in births is striking; the excess of births over deaths in each country remained virtually stable through the four decades covered by the chart. The later columns cover each one year. In France in one year before the war (1911) the deaths actually exceeded the births. It is important to bear these pre-war figures in mind in considering the later figures.

In both Germany and France the death-rate jumped in 1914, in France exceeding the birth-rate. In Germany it did not cross that line until 1915. In both countries the birth-rate fell sharply in 1915 and still more in 1916; in France it began to pick up in 1917, in Germany not until 1918; in both countries it leaped upward in 1919 and 1920, in 1920 almost equaling the pre-war rate in Germany and in France reaching a high point not touched in any other year of the present century. Then it began falling again. In Germany the 1923 birth-rate was only 20.9, as compared with 27.5 in 1913, in France it is still above the pre-war figure—19.4 in 1923, 18.7 in 1913—partly because of the inclusion of Alsace-Lorraine in the later years. The French death-rate is almost precisely at the pre-war level; the German death-rate is slightly below the 1913 figure, although not nearly as low as it would be had the pre-war decline continued. France is, consequently, gaining population slightly more rapidly than before the war; Germany much less rapidly than before, but still more rapidly than France. This gain, however, is offset by an emigration approaching the huge figures of the eighteen eighties.

The British figures used in the chart are, relatively, deceptive, for they do not include military losses. They do, however, reveal three things: first, that the British birth-rate showed no sharp decline until 1917, and then declined but slightly, although it jumped in 1920 to an almost unprecedented figure; second, the increase in mortality among even the civil population in war time; third, they show the extraordinary increase in civilian deaths in 1918 due to the "flu" epidemic, and make plain that the peaks shown in the death curves for all three nations in 1918 are primarily due to that plague rather than to any increased intensity in the fighting.

The Disarmament Treaty

THE Draft Treaty of Disarmament and Security, drawn up by a committee headed by General Tasker H. Bliss and Professor James T. Shotwell (who comments on it elsewhere in this issue), is here reprinted because of its importance despite the fact that it has already been made public elsewhere in the United States.

The High Contracting Parties, being desirous of promoting peace and of lessening the danger of war by reduction and limitation of armaments, agree to this treaty.

PART I—GENERAL MEASURES

Chapter I—Outlawry of Aggressive War

Article 1.—The H. C. P. [High Contracting Parties or Party] solemnly declare that aggressive war is an international crime. They severally undertake not to be guilty of its commission.

Art. 2.—A state engaging in war for other than purposes of defense commits the international crime described in Article 1.

Art. 3.—The Permanent Court of International Justice shall have jurisdiction, on the complaint of any signatory, to make a judgment to the effect that the international crime described in Article 1 has or has not in any given case been committed.

Chapter II—Acts of Aggression

Art. 4.—The H. C. P. solemnly declare that acts of aggression, even when not resulting in war, and preparations for such acts of aggression, are hereafter to be deemed forbidden by international law.

Art. 5.—In the absence of a state of war, measures of force by land, by sea, or in the air taken by one state against another and not taken for purposes of defense or for the protection of human life shall be deemed to be acts of aggression.

Any signatory which claims that another signatory has violated any of the terms of this treaty shall submit its case to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

A signatory refusing to accept the jurisdiction of the court in any such case shall be deemed an aggressor within the terms of this treaty.

Failure to accept the jurisdiction of the court within four days after submission of a claim of violation of this treaty shall be deemed a refusal to accept the jurisdiction.

Art. 6.—The court shall also have jurisdiction on the complaint of any signatory to make a judgment to the effect that there has or has not in any given case been committed a violation of international law within the terms of Article 4.

Art. 7.—The Permanent Advisory Conference hereinafter mentioned shall from time to time consider the further codifying of the principles of international law relating to acts of aggression and preparations for such acts.

In this regard, the conference shall take into account the additional security to the signatories and the progressive disarmament which are by this treaty contemplated.

The recommendations of the conference shall be submitted to the H. C. P. for their adoption, and shall also be transmitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Chapter III—Sanctions

Art. 8.—In the event of any H. C. P. having been adjudged an aggressor pursuant to this treaty, all commercial, trade, financial, and property interests of the aggressor and of its nationals shall cease to be entitled, either in the territories of the other signatories or on the high seas, to any privileges, protection, rights, or immunities accorded by either international law, national law, or treaty.

Any H. C. P. may in such case take such other steps toward the severance of trade, financial, commercial, and personal intercourse with the aggressor and its nationals as it may deem proper and the H. C. P. may also consult together in this regard.

The period during which any such economic sanction may be continued shall be fixed at any time by the court at the request of any signatory.

In the matter of measures of force to be taken, each signatory shall consult its own interests and obligations.

Art. 9.—If any H. C. P. shall be adjudged an aggressor by the Permanent Court of International Justice, such power shall be liable for all costs to all other H. C. P. resulting from its aggression.

Chapter IV—Decrees of the Permanent Court

Art. 10.—The H. C. P. agree to accept the judgment of the Permanent Court of International Justice as to the fulfilment or violation of the contracts of this treaty.

Any question arising under this treaty is ipso facto within the compulsory jurisdiction of the court.

Art. 11.—If a dispute arising under this treaty shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice, it is for the court to decide as to its jurisdiction and also whether or not its decree has been complied with.

PART II—DISARMAMENT

Chapter I—Reduction and Limitation of Armament

Art. 12.—The H. C. P., recognizing that excessive armaments constitute a menace of war, mutually agree:

(i) To limit or reduce their armaments to the basis necessary for the maintenance of peace and national security.

(ii) To study the ways and means for future reduction of armaments either as between all signatories or as between any two of them.

Chapter II—Demilitarized Zones

Art. 13.—In order to facilitate the security and progressive disarmament contemplated by the present treaty, any H. C. P. may agree with one or more neighboring countries for the establishment of demilitarized zones.

Chapter III—Permanent Advisory Conference

Art. 14.—The H. C. P. will call a permanent advisory conference upon disarmament which shall meet not less than once every three years.

This conference shall, in addition to its functions as described in Article 7, publish periodical reports concerning the actual conditions of the armaments of the signatory states.

The conference shall advise the H. C. P. concerning measures to be taken to insure the carrying out of the principles of the present treaty and it may prepare supplementary treaties for the establishment of demilitarized zones and for the further promotion of disarmament and peace.

ART. 15.—The Advisory Conference upon disarmament shall appoint a Permanent Technical Committee.

ART. 16.—The Permanent Advisory Conference or its Permanent Technical Committee shall give advice on technical questions to the Permanent Court of International Justice at the request of said court.

ART. 17.—The expenses of the Permanent Advisory Conference and of its agencies shall be borne by the signatory Powers in the proportions of their respective budgets for defense.

PART III—INTERNATIONAL INFORMATION

CHAPTER I—COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

ART. 18.—By the terms of Article 8 of the Covenant of the League of Nations:

"The members of the League undertake to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military, naval, and air programs, and the condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to warlike purposes."

In order to facilitate the carrying out of the said engagement by the Powers party thereto, the signatories hereto agree that there shall be maintained under the direction of the Council of the League of Nations a commission charged with the duty of making the necessary official examinations and reports.

ART. 19.—The said commission shall proceed under such regulations as the Council of the League shall from time to time approve.

ART. 20.—Subject to such regulations the members of the commission shall be entitled, when they deem it desirable, to proceed to any point within the territory of any signatory or to send subcommissions or to authorize one or more of their members so to proceed on behalf of the commission.

ART. 21.—The signatories hereto will give all necessary facilities to the said commission in the performance of its duties.

ART. 22.—All reports made to the Council of the League by the said commission shall be communicated to the signatory Powers.

CHAPTER II—OPINIONS OF THE COUNCIL

ART. 23.—The Council of the League, taking into account the reports and opinions of the said commission, shall at any time when requested by any signatory hereto, consider summarily whether (a) the armaments of any signatory to this treaty are in excess of those fixed under its provisions; or (b) the military or other preparations of any state are of such a nature as to cause apprehension of aggression or an eventual outbreak of hostilities.

ART. 24.—If the Council shall upon such request be of the opinion that there is reasonable ground for thinking that a menace of aggression has arisen, the parties to the defensive agreements hereinafter mentioned may put into immediate execution the plan of assistance which they have agreed upon.

ART. 25.—If the Council shall, upon such request, not be of opinion that a menace of aggression has arisen, a public report to the effect shall be made and in such case no signatory shall be under any obligation to put into execution any plan of assistance to which it is a party; but any signatory, believing itself to be threatened with a menace of aggression, notwithstanding the fact that the Council of the League has not been of such opinion, may forthwith notify the Council to that effect, and such signatory shall thereupon have full liberty of action in military or other preparations for defense, subject, however, to the limitations as to armament which are imposed by any treaty then in force other than this treaty and treaties dependent thereon.

PART IV—TREATIES OF MUTUAL ASSISTANCE

ART. 26.—The H. C. P. may conclude, either as between two of them or as between a larger number, agreements complementary to the present treaty, exclusively for the purpose of their mutual defense and intended solely to facilitate the carrying out of the measures prescribed in this treaty, determining in advance the assistance which they would give to each other in the event of any act of aggression.

Such agreements may, if the H. C. P. interested so desire, be negotiated and concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations.

ART. 27.—Complementary agreements, as defined in the preceding article, shall, before being registered, be examined by the Council with a view to deciding whether they are in accordance with the principles of this treaty and of the Covenant.

In particular, the Council shall consider if the cases of aggression contemplated in these agreements are of a nature to give rise to an obligation to give assistance on the part of the other H. C. P.

The Council may, if necessary, suggest changes in the texts of the agreements submitted to it.

When recognized, the agreements shall be registered in conformity with Article 18 of the Covenant. They shall be regarded as complementary to the present treaty, and shall in no way limit the general obligations of the H. C. P. nor the sanctions contemplated against an aggressor under the terms of this treaty.

They will be open to any other H. C. P. with the consent of the signatory states.

ART. 28.—In all cases of aggression, for which provision is made in the agreement constituting a defensive group, the H. C. P. which are members of such group may undertake to put into operation automatically the plan of assistance agreed upon between them; and in all other cases of aggression, or menace or danger of aggression, directly aimed at them, they will consult each other before taking action, and will inform the Council of the measures which they are contemplating.

PART V—PARTIES TO THE TREATY

CHAPTER I—ACCESSION

ART. 29.—Any state, member or not of the League of Nations, may adhere to this treaty by depositing an act of adhesion with the Secretary General of the League, who shall at once inform the other signatories thereof.

CHAPTER II—WITHDRAWAL

ART. 30.—Any party to this treaty may withdraw therefrom by depositing an act of withdrawal with the Secretary General of the League of Nations. Such withdrawal shall take effect one year after the deposit thereof and only as to the party withdrawing.

CHAPTER III—RATIFICATION

ART. 31.—The present treaty shall be ratified and the instruments of ratification shall be deposited as soon as possible with the Secretary General of the League of Nations.

It shall come into force:

In Europe when it shall have been ratified by five European states, including France, Great Britain, and Italy.

In Asia when it shall have been ratified by two Asiatic states, one of which shall be Japan.

In North America when ratified by the United States of America.

In Central America and the West Indies when ratified by one state in the West Indies and two in Central America.

In South America when ratified by four states in South America, one of which shall be either Argentina, Brazil, or Chile.

In Africa and Oceania when ratified by two states in Africa and Oceania.

With regard to the H. C. P. which may subsequently ratify the treaty, it will come into force at the date of the deposit of the instrument of ratification.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 6, 1924 No. 3083

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 133

EDITORIALS:
- Nobody's Children 135
- "Appalling Confusion" in the New York World 136
- Debunking 137
- The Father of the Brownies 137

SINCLAIR VS. STANDARD OIL IN RUSSIA. By Louis Fischer 138

NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
- Women—Free for What? By Edwin Muir 140

LA FOLLETTE'S PARTY—WILL IT LAST? By William Hard 142

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 143

CORRESPONDENCE 144

GIVE NOT WITH YOUR HANDS. By MacKnight Black 146

BOOKS:
- A Course Charted. By Johan J. Smertenko 146
- A Civil War City. By Emily Clark 147
- Personality in Architecture. By Harry Hansen 147
- An Old Master. By Eliseo Vivas 148
- A French Realpolitiker. By Lewis S. Gannett 148
- Industrial Democracy. By Stuart Chase 148
- Byron: The Last Phase. By Samuel C. Chew 149
- Books in Brief 149

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- A Program of Reconciliation 150
- The Communists and the Experts 150

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN

FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR IRITA VAN DOREN, LITERARY EDITOR

ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

LA FOLLETTE'S CAMPAIGN needs money! It is impossible to manage a campaign—to send out organizers; hire counsel and obtain names to get the ticket on the forty-eight State ballots; prepare, print, and circulate literature; buy radio time—without money. Stories of million-dollar funds for La Follette may be set down as sheer invention; the fact is that the campaign has been financed on a shoestring, and that nothing larger than shoestring contributions are in sight. Money is needed now. La Follette's campaign must be financed by hundreds of thousands of small contributions. Labor organizations will help raise the funds, but few unions are able to give out of their war-chests for a political campaign, and it is slow work raising large funds from among union members. The two old parties pass the hat quietly among their big-business friends, thereby creating secret bonds and subtle allegiances to sources of large contributions. La Follette makes no such appeal to wealth. That is why The Nation, on the inside back cover of this issue, is appealing to La Follette's friends among its subscribers to start The Nation's La Follette-for-President Fund.

NORMAN THOMAS FOR GOVERNOR is a slogan which appeals to the editors of The Nation, who have known and worked with him day after day for many years. The 1924 Socialist candidate for Governor was for a time an associate editor of this paper; he has long been one of its most valued and active contributing editors. His has been an extraordinary evolution—from small boy in President Harding's home town, through Princeton, through pastorates first at a "silk-stocking" church and then at a working-class church, into a fearless war-time pacifist, editor of the World Tomorrow, member of the American Commission on Conditions in Ireland, editor of the New York Leader, and director of the League for Industrial Democracy. Among his associates on the ticket are other unusual men and women, among them Frank Crosswaithe, an exceptionally able Negro orator, and Professor Vladimir Karapetoff, head of the engineering department at Cornell.

MICHIGAN'S MILLIONAIRE SENATOR is on the war-path again. It was Senator Couzens who insisted, four months ago, on hiring Francis J. Heney of San Francisco to help dig for graft in the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury, and called out the President's improvident protest against all the investigations. He is one of the few men in public life who fails to bat an eyelash when Secretary Mellon fires a batch of statistics at him; Mr. Couzens also is accustomed to thinking in millions and he calmly fires more figures back at the Pittsburgh millionaire. The recent publication of the 1922 income-tax figures, it will be recalled, showed that Mr. Couzens was right and Mr. Mellon wrong in their last winter's controversy. Mr. Couzens has flatly refused to accept a resolution adopted by his State Republican organization binding all candidates to all other candidates of the party, Coolidge included. Now, recovering from a surgical operation, he announces that he intends to continue the investigation of the Treasury Department. One might expect a Treasury Department conscious of rectitude to welcome investigation. Instead, Senator Watson, administration supporter, indignantly retires from the chairmanship of the Senate Committee, declaring that "the country is tired of investigations," and administration organs like the New York Evening Post denounce the "sinister aspect" of this "Hunting Ammunition for Mud Guns." If there is mud in the Treasury comparable to that which Senators Walsh and Wheeler spaded out of the Interior and Justice departments, the country will certainly support Senator Couzens in getting after it.

THE WAR DEPARTMENT plans nation-wide military maneuvers for September 12. The National Council for the Prevention of War protested. The governors of Maine and Nebraska refused to participate. The opposition became so strong that President Coolidge was called in to help. In a long letter to Frederick J. Libby of the Anti-War Council, the President argued that the demonstration was "merely a compliance with the purposes of the National Defense Act of 1920," "a non-militaristic gesture for the purpose of keeping down to its lowest possible point the professional military organization of the United States"; he objected that "It is not a mobilization, and the people who first attached to it the terms Mobilization Day and then proceeded to condemn it have been utterly unfair." But, as Mr. Libby replied, the name Mobilization Day > was first used publicly in the Army and Navy Register of January 5, where, under the heading Prospective Mobilization Day Maneuvers, it was announced that "the greatest peace-time military demonstration in the history of the United States" had come nearer realization that week when Secretary Weeks gave favorable consideration to the Mobilization Day plans on which General Staff officers have been working for months.

Later the War Department used the phrase in its own publicity. It is something that Mr. Libby has forced the militarists, the President at their head, to retire behind a new name. But the whole plan for a showy "mobilization" or "defense test," call it what you will, should be abandoned. To claim that it is required by the National Defense Act of 1920 is nonsense. Does the President mean to imply that he and Mr. Harding violated the law in 1921, and 1922, and 1923, before the bright idea occurred to the General Staff?

SOMETIMES BANKERS provide a useful supplement to politicians. The course of Franco-British negotiations might be summarized somewhat as follows: Premier MacDonald and Premier Herriot met in England, liked each other, and devised a businesslike program for execution of the Dawes Report. When Herriot went home he met a political storm, stirred up by Poincaré, which led him to revise his plans. MacDonald went to Paris and made a show of compromise and conciliation. The two premiers met again in London, accompanied by formidable delegations of "experts," and drew up an impressive draft of their compromise agreement. Then they took it around and showed it to the British and American bankers, who said "That won't do."

SUCH A VERSION, of course, lacks accuracy in detail. In substance it is true. The success of the Dawes Plan depends upon the ability of the governments concerned to put it into effect in such a manner that the bankers, satisfied, will feel ready to advance several hundred million dollars—or, more exactly, will feel able to sell the bonds to their customers. They hold the whip-hand. Their judgment can overrule prime ministers. In the present case it is probably a healthy thing for the world that the bankers are in a position to quash compromises forced by the exigencies of local politics. The dangerous facts remain that the bankers—chief among them John W. Davis's clients, the House of Morgan—today hold a power beyond that exercised by the kaisers and czars of a decade ago, that their power is steadily increasing, and that neither the democracies of the West nor the fascist dictatorships have yet discovered any adequate method of controlling their actions.

FIVE YEARS AGO the International Labor Organization set up by the League of Nations met at Washington and drew up a draft convention for a general eight-hour day. Though most of the great industrial Powers have some sort of eight-hour law, not one of them has yet ratified the convention. The catch lies in the provision that ratification binds the state for a period of ten years. Both employers and government representatives feared to go that far. Mr. Tom Shaw, Great Britain's Minister of Labor, has recently attempted to break this deadlock by urging "simultaneous ratification" by France, England, Belgium, and, if possible, Germany. The new Government in France has declared its desire for early ratification, and Belgium would probably follow France's lead. In Germany, however, the future of the eight-hour day is very doubtful.

REPARATIONS ARE OF COURSE the fly in the ointment. The German employers are using that excuse to the limit. Stinnes declared before his death that for the next fifteen years or more German labor must work an extra two hours each day in order to clear the reparations bill. Unfortunately on this subject there is much argument and very little proof and the workers have scarcely more than their employers' word for it. They are not in a particularly trustful mood, as the big industrialists have been struggling too hard and too openly to deal a mortal blow to the unions as well as to the eight-hour day. Within the Reichstag Socialists and capitalists are evenly enough balanced to block each other. Outside the Reichstag the employers have used other and simpler tactics. Notices have been posted announcing an increase in working hours. As a result there have been strikes, but as the unions cannot finance long strikes the employers usually win in the end. How successful the employers have been is shown by an article in Vorwärts (Berlin) for June 28 giving the results of an inquiry made by the German Federation of Trade Unions. During one week in May reports were received from 46,123 works employing 2,453,523 persons. Of these employees 54.7 per cent worked more than 48 hours a week and 13 per cent worked more than 54 hours. Five years after their revolution the German workers must begin all over again their fight for the eight-hour day.

THE LOOTING OF HAITI continues. The $40,000,000 National City Bank loan forced on that helpless country which automatically extended American occupation sixteen years beyond even the treaty negotiated by the notorious "military-pressure" method, is being used as its beneficiaries intended it. Of the $16,000,000 actually floated two years ago the Haitians have got nothing. There is talk of schools and public works, and numerous salaries are being drawn in anticipation of them. But the only real action has been the settling of every concessionnaire's claim on lip-smacking terms. Take the long bankrupt Haitian railroad, for instance, of which Roger Farnham, formerly vice-president of the National City Bank, was first president and then for many years receiver. It was an enterprise of dubious financial soundness at best, considering the great construction costs in the highly mountainous terrain. After several years work on it was discontinued, the Haitian Government refusing further payments on the ground that nearly every specification had been violated. The merits of the conflicting contentions were never threshed out. Instead the United States Navy, the United States Department of State, and the United States federal courts were called in. Result: The railroad security-holders have been handed the new 6 per cent Haitian bonds, guaranteed by Uncle Sam, and cash in addition. "Each holder (of a bond)," United States Judge Julius Mayer declares, "of the principal amount of $96.53 and coupons receives a new Republic of Haiti bond of the principal amount of $72.39, and $35.75 cash." And the court states "securities which were worthless . . . have now an appreciable value." None will dispute it.

REGRETTABLE AS WAS THE DEATH of an American consular officer and the severe beating of another of our citizens at the hands of a mob in Teheran, it was not an act for which the Persian Government should be blamed. The tragedy seems to have been due partly to religious intolerance and partly to anti-foreign feeling—to a kind of Persian Ku Klux Klanism. Hitherto Americans have not been as unpopular in Persia as, on account of our bullying State Department and our unscrupulous big-business methods, we are rapidly becoming in most other parts of the world. Persians still remember the good fight for their national integrity put up by W. Morgan Shuster, although in recent years the machinations of our oil interests have done a good deal toward identifying Americans with the rest of the international exploiters. The dispatches indicate that the two Americans who were set upon were mistaken for Englishmen—against whom there is much resentment—but apart from this their actions were obviously indiscreet, since they were photographing a religious shrine and festival. It is difficult, under the circumstances, to justify the American note demanding apologies, guards of honor, payment for a man-of-war, and similar paraphernalia—it reeks of the Big-Stick arrogance which reached its fine flower in the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia in July, 1914.

THERE SEEM TO BE A NUMBER of really simple things that the British Labor Government might have done but hasn't. We mentioned in a previous issue the publication of war documents. In a letter to the editor of the New Leader (London) we read: "By the will of Cecil J. Rhodes fifteen scholarships were assigned to German students, and in the years before England declared war on Germany these students were in the enjoyment of the stipends arranged for by the will. I understand that by an Act of Parliament Rhodes's will was upset, and the German scholarships allocated to various parts of the British Dominions. . . . Peace should, it seems to me, abolish wartime exclusions."

MEXICO SEEMS TO BE IN THE GRIP of counter-revolution. Reaction has her by the throat and the fruits of many years of revolutionary struggle and heroic sacrifices are in hourly peril. A few weeks ago a couple of young women wandered across the frontier between Texas and Mexico clad in the garments of freedom, of independent action, of swift progress—they were, in fact, clad in knickers. Were they welcomed in Mexico as happy symbols of its own freedom, its own progress? They were not. They were chased back across the border; Mexico, revolutionary Mexico, would have none of them. Meanwhile, in Mexico City, a war on bobbed hair is raging, and already it has spread to other parts of the republic. In Tampico a bobbed young woman saved herself from attack by swimming away from a crowd of young men. Another was saved by an army officer. Knickers and bobbed hair—if Mexico crushes out of existence these universal emblems of youthful and feminine revolt she may as well throw her constitution into the sea and hand her oil wells to the foreigner.

Nobody's Children

ENGLAND'S new legitimacy bill is a short step toward a civilized code of personal relations. By its provisions a child born out of wedlock becomes legitimate through the subsequent intermarriage of its parents. An amendment designed to except from this rule children born of adulterous unions was passionately defended but ultimately defeated.

Penalizing children for the sins of their parents has as good legal precedent as it has biblical and biological. By the common law of England, overthrown in the bill just passed, a person could not achieve legitimacy nor have it thrust upon him; he could only be born legitimate. A bastard was "nobody's child." It could inherit neither from the father nor the mother, and its status was unchanged by the subsequent marriage of the parents. In countries accepting the civil or canon law, the marriage of parents legitimized a child previously born. The introduction of this principle—exactly the principle embodied in the recent bill—was urged by the English bishops in the twentieth year of the reign of Henry III. But the proposal was voted down by the Lords whose pronouncement became famous in English legal history: "Nolunt leges Angliae mutare, quae huc usque usitatae sunt et approbatae"—"They do not want to change the laws of England, which up to the present have been used and approved." And so an inhuman doctrine which was sanctified by its antiquity in the year 1236 remained binding until 1924.

Like England under the new dispensation, the United States accepts in general the old church doctrine. The usual rule in this country today is that an illegitimate child becomes legitimate upon the marriage of its parents and may then inherit property and claim support.

Such provisions are interesting; the vast majority of illegitimate children, however, are untouched and unhelped by them. Born of casual unions which do not end in marriage, unacknowledged or disowned by the father and unwanted by the mother, the illegitimate child is still in a human sense "nobody's child." His chance of life is smaller than that of the child born in marriage; his economic circumstances are usually deplorable; he is frequently abandoned to public charity; and his life is that of an outcast from decent society.

It is these conditions that demand change. Scandinavia, through the influence of its powerful and radical women's movement, has passed liberal legitimacy laws going far toward securing the health and social status of all its children. Soviet Russia, too, has put the welfare of children above all other considerations. One of the earliest decrees of the Soviet Government contains these clauses—which we print for the edification and future guidance of the so-called civilized nations of the world:

> Children born out of wedlock are on an equality with those born in wedlock with regard to the rights and duties of parents toward children, and likewise of children toward parents.
>
> The persons who make a declaration and give a signed statement to that effect are registered as the father and mother of the child. . . .
>
> In case the father of a child born out of wedlock does not make such a declaration, the mother of the child or the guardian or the child itself has the right to prove fatherhood by legal means.

"Appalling Confusion" in the New York World

THIS is the cry now raised against the La Follette candidacy: It will create confusion. We had expected it, of course, in the Washington Post and similar journals. We were not prepared to find the New York World echoing it. But that newspaper has been somewhat hard put to it to explain why it is sticking to the Democratic Party, whose degeneracy it has so often bewailed. So the World assumes that the only success that can be achieved by the La Follette ticket is to throw the election into Congress. "The confusion would be appalling," it declares. "And the result, whatever it was, would in no sense come from an exercise of the people's will." We have rarely come across more specious reasoning. In brief, the case these dailies seek to make out is this: It is a crime for La Follette to be running because he is likely to be so strong as to cause Davis and Coolidge to fail of a majority in the electoral college. Ergo, Mr. La Follette's supporters must not try to exercise their sovereign rights as American citizens to found a new political party unless they guarantee that they will carry so few States as not to interfere with the working of a hopelessly outworn institution. If the World and its reactionary contemporaries could only be assured that La Follette would do no better than Mr. Taft did, they would be quite content to have him run.

Obviously, if no new party could be launched which ran any risk of such a popular success as to deadlock the electoral college, we should be forever condemned to the existing ones, no matter how rotten and degenerate they were or how utterly they might fail to serve faithfully the American people. This cry was never raised by the World during the Roosevelt candidacy in 1912, if our memory serves us. We do not believe it was raised when the Republican Party came into being. It could have been then with equal justice. Roosevelt was attacked as a traitor to the two-party system by hidebound Republican papers, but even they did not assail the Colonel on the ground that he might throw the election into Congress. Yet no one foresaw that Taft would carry only two States. The pretext is too flimsy. To attempt to shoulder upon Mr. La Follette the responsibility for a situation made possible by the Constitution itself will mislead no thinking person. What the World and its contemporaries should do is to point out unceasingly the dangerous condition due to lack of clarity and vision in the drawing of the Twelfth Amendment. It is one of numerous reasons for calling a constitutional convention to overhaul our entire organic law, for it is idle to presume that this country must and shall have only two parties.

Plainly neither the World nor any other journal would do else than ridicule and denounce Senator La Follette if, after reading their solemn warnings of an impending chaos, he should issue a statement to this effect, to the millions who desire to vote for him:

> Dear friends and supporters! I am profoundly conscious of our great and pressing economic issues, of our far-reaching political evils. I am aware that the government is honeycombed with graft and corruption. I am aware that millions of you are disgusted with both the old parties and that many of you will be deterred from voting if you cannot cast your ballots for some one other than Mr. Davis or Mr. Coolidge. I am also deeply stirred that some of you have turned to me and asked me to carry the banner of a new order. But I find that if I run and too many of you should vote for me I might upset the electoral college. It is true that the college has been for one hundred years a vermiform appendix in our political system. Yet one must have respect for vermiform appendices. Besides, if I should by chance get enough electoral votes I might deprive both dear Mr. Coolidge and dear Mr. Davis of the chance of winning, and create appalling confusion. Therefore, while not forgetting our political ills and your grievances, I thank you very much for your good-will and retire from the field. Perhaps four or eight or twelve or twenty years from now a situation may arise in which some one else may lead a new party with the assurance that he will get either so few votes or so many as not to jeopardize the smooth functioning of the electoral college. Faithfully yours,
>
> ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE

Would not the World call for a lunacy commission?

If the election were thrown into the Senate, the World says, the result would in no sense "come from an exercise of the people's will." Is that Mr. La Follette's fault? Moreover (and nobody knows this better than the World), the people's will is constantly thwarted by other anachronisms in our political life. It was not the people's will which nominated Mr. Harding or Mr. Davis. It was not the people's will which decreed that a Congress elected in November, 1922, should not sit until December, 1923. Those who are really concerned as to the people's will ought to be the first to say "Hats Off!" to the La Follette movement. It is the product of the spontaneous desire of great groups of our citizenry. It is financed by no group of big-business men and engineered by no corrupt political machine. It is without party machinery, yet it is spreading like wildfire.

Supposing—and it is not more impossible than it was for Roosevelt to outrun Taft in 1912—that the third party should run second, but that Mr. Davis, by reason of the solid Southern bloc, should win just enough electoral votes to deadlock the electoral college? The offender would then be Mr. Davis, not Mr. La Follette. Would not the Washington Post, which declares that "if too many votes support a third ticket the actual will of the people of the United States may be thwarted," then be justified in berating the Democrats for having thwarted the people's will by casting too many Democratic votes? And why, if it is a question of Mr. La Follette's having too many votes, do not these papers simplify the problem and specify just how many votes the followers of La Follette shall graciously be allowed to cast? The people's will! Well, only 58 per cent of the American electorate voted in 1920. Despite his huge majority, less than 35 per cent of the electorate voted for Mr. Harding—he was a minority President as was Wilson in 1912. Did the World cry out in 1912 or 1920 that the will of the majority had been thwarted?

No brave, independent action was ever taken in our political life without someone solemnly wagging his head to declare it meant confusion. No great reform was ever achieved save in the face of endless assurances that it meant chaos and the thwarting of the people's will—this was notably true of the anti-slavery struggle. No such contest would ever have been won had men been deterred by fear of the effect upon the Constitution—radical anti-slavery men publicly burned the slavery-protecting Constitution. If chaos comes in our political life this autumn the responsibility will not be Robert La Follette's, but that of the masters of privilege, those dominators of our political and business life who are responsible for conditions that cry to the stars for remedy, who are driving Americans into that revolution for which Woodrow Wilson called, which he strove in vain to bring about. To Robert La Follette attaches only honor for his readiness to take up the fight where Wilson left it, for his willingness to raise up a standard of revolt to which honest Americans may repair.

Debunking

HISTORY can wait. Time brings to light contemporary letters and journals, picturing the "great men" of a day as keen associates really saw them—although even then the piety of editors too often deletes the most expressive phrases in order that the poor public may not be too harshly disillusioned. Meanwhile the poor public, victim of its incurably respectful reporters, usually lives in a fairyland of myth and hero-worship.

The Kaiser and the Crown Prince are suffering the deflation process in their own lifetimes. For the sake of their legends they should have died at the front on armistice morning. Instead, they fled in disguise to Holland, and that fact, which could hardly be glossed over by the friendliest correspondents, began a process which still continues. The inside stories of their diplomatic experiments, their marginal notes, even their letter-paper is being exposed to a cynical world. The latest revelations come from the private letters of Kiderlen-Waechter, who crowned a long diplomatic career by becoming Foreign Minister in 1910. Kiderlen, writing to his amie, tells how, during the Turco-Italian war, the Crown Prince wrote him on paper decorated with a colored sketch of a cocotte, suggesting that Germany should seize the occasion to get something out of Turkey. He also paints a pretty picture of the Kaiser on his private yacht in the North Sea, amusing himself by putting a group of fat generals through setting-up exercises, laughing and poking them in the ribs, while the irate supporters of the monarchy tried to look as if they liked it.

While Germany is being debunked, however, we Americans are still in the grasp of political myths. Frank R. Kent, the veteran Washington correspondent, delivers a mighty blow at our American illusions in the current issue of the American Mercury. Newspaper reporters, he says, are as unaware as the public that they are engaged in a "conspiracy to keep from the public the facts about public men." It does not matter whether their papers are hostile or friendly, the reporters uniformly help build myths. The explanation is simple enough:

> The reporter's business is to get news. The more news he gets the more secure his job and the greater his value to his paper. The public official has what the reporter has to have, to wit, news. Competition with other reporters and the fear of being beaten spur him to the closest possible relationship with every man who has it. . . . As a matter of self-interest his effort is to establish friendly personal relations with his news source. He thinks the way to do this is by protecting him, refraining from telling rude and illuminating truths about him, sidetracking little details that would be unpleasant or hurtful. . . .

Hence the Coolidge myth. The Boston newspapermen knew that he did nothing about the police strike until it was all over, but they bootlicked the Governor and built up a legend. Every Washington reporter knows, as Mr. Kent points out, that as Vice-President Mr. Coolidge was "so near nothing" that his party intended not to renominate him. He became President, and the legend-mills set to work again. The reporters meet him twice a week. They see him as "a very much dismayed and huddled little man who is as close to complete futility as any man in his position can ever get"; they know that what he says to them "is mostly non-committal, neutral, evasive"—but they must have good stories. So they "inject their own vigor into those pale and anemic utterances"—and "the weak and watery utterances of a passive and pallid little man, torn by indecision and doubt, become the forceful and vigorous talk of a red-blooded, resolute, two-fisted, fighting executive, thoroughly aroused and determined." The public comes to believe that a strong, silent man sits in the White House.

How are we to escape such myths? There is no ready answer, but there is an encouraging fact to report. Among the most successful and appreciated Washington correspondents are William Hard, Frank R. Kent, and Clinton W. Gilbert. Gilbert and Kent played the game for years. Today they are busily pricking soap-bubbles. Is it an omen?

The Father of the Brownies

PALMER COX is dead; the Brownies have lost their father. A generation now sedate in middle age was surprised to learn that the creator of its childhood friends had lived so long. The Brownies had become almost as authentic and universal a part of American childhood as Cooper's red Indians. For nearly half a century Cox's whimsical genius had been equipping their thin-legged bodies with dress suits and policemen's garb, stocking caps and nautical dress, and sending them forth on high adventures. Generations of children and ex-children lose a friend.

Cox's must have been a rarely happy life. He was one of those fortunate persons whose talents rescue them from a life of dull business. He grew up in a Scotch settlement in Quebec, but early wandered to California, where he made two false starts toward the happiness he achieved in the days when his Brownies were making St. Nicholas famous. Eleven of his thirteen Brownie-books are still in print: and hardly a year passes without a reissue of one or another of them. Their royalties made it possible for him to build and live in a Brownie castle in his boyhood home.

Strictly speaking, of course, Palmer Cox did not "create" the Brownies. They crossed the ocean when his ancestors came from Scotland. Cornwall knows Brownies, and Scotch tradition swarms with them. Medieval German houses bear carved figures of Kobolds obviously related to the creatures of Cox's fancy. Rome and Arabia were peopled with similar beings. But he rescued them from the byways of folk-lore and made their antics a living part of contemporary life; his Brownies were as much his own creations as the Kewpies are Rose O'Neill's, and that their popularity survives his death at eighty-four is eloquent tribute to his genius. For the fancies of childhood are fleeting, and it is rare that one generation will read the favorites of its parents' youth.

Sinclair vs. Standard Oil in Russia

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, June

SOMEWHERE in the United States the Sinclair Oil Company and the Standard Oil make common use of a small pipe line. Elsewhere in the United States and throughout the world the two companies are cutthroat competitors. Sinclair is the youthful rebel of the oil industry. He has broken lances with the Standard Oil in Persia and indirectly in Soviet Russia, for when he went to Moscow last summer trailing Senator Fall, Mason Day, and a host of others behind him in the hope of obtaining a concession in Baku he was defying the mighty House of Rockefeller, which claimed Baku as its own. Sinclair was stepping in where angels feared to tread, and he knew—he said so to his coworkers here—that a Nemesis would pursue him. He was in "for the greatest battle of his life."

From the New Leader (London)

The Marriage of the Oil Trusts

Baku is probably the richest oil-field in the world. Before the war most of it was held by the Swedish Nobel Oil Company. After the Bolshevik revolution the Standard Oil, by which we generally mean the Standard Oil of New Jersey and the Standard Oil of New York, bought up most of the Nobel interests in Baku. The Communists, however, nationalized the wells and refineries of Baku, and have never paid any heed at all to the Standard Oil's claim.

Actually, however, the Standard Oil's animosity toward Soviet Russia was born in Persia, and here, too, Sinclair plays an important role. The tale goes back to March, 1916, when Akaky Mefodievitch Khostaria, a Russian citizen, obtained a concession from the Persian Government to exploit the oil-fields in the five provinces of North Persia. But it was obtained, according to Wossoughod Dowleh, several times Prime Minister of Persia, "under coercion by the Czarist Government and without the consent of the Persian Parliament."

On May 8, 1920, Khostaria sold all his rights in North Persia to the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, in which the British Government holds the controlling interest. In February, 1921, the Soviet Government signed a treaty with the Persian Government according to which the Khostaria concession and "all other concessions forced from the Government of Persia by the late Czarist Government for itself and its subjects" were declared "null and void." By the same treaty the Shah's Government pledged itself not to hand over any of the canceled concessions to any third state or its citizens without the approval of the Soviet Government.

With the claims of the Anglo-Persian Company to the North Persian fields thus canceled, the Standard Oil appeared in the field. Much of what transpired is veiled in doubt, but the course events took cannot be mistaken. The Standard Oil obtained a lien upon the concession in December, 1921. In March, 1922, however, it was still discussing with the Persian Government the form of a proposed loan and the matter of "moral suasion" by American financial advisers. In accordance with this program in the summer of 1922 the United States Department of State sent a financial mission, headed by Dr. A. C. Millspaugh, one of the Department's officers, to Persia; its members became Persian officials and are still there. At this time Mr. Hughes was insisting to Lord Curzon on an "open door" for the Standard Oil in Mesopotamia and Palestine—British mandated countries. Curzon was adamant and clouds gathered over the Anglo-American horizon. Then Sir John Cadman, former British Oil Controller, technical adviser to the Anglo-Persian, supplanted the diplomats and undertook direct negotiations with the American oil companies. A give-and-take ensued: the British satisfied the Standard Oil's desire for a share in Mosul's production and in whatever oil might be struck near the Dead Sea (where the Standard Oil has been prospecting for some time), and the Standard Oil abandoned its independent concession and identified itself on a fifty-fifty basis with the Anglo-Persian's claim on the Khostaria concession. Obviously the two companies were convinced that their joint power backed by the influence of their governments could bring to life what Persia had declared dead. Mr. Hughes, indeed, officially expressed his "approval" of the Khostaria claim—although at a later date Mr. Sinclair forced him to inform the Persian press that, as between two American oil companies, he was neutral.

Here the Soviet Government enters the scene. Russia is naturally averse to British penetration of North Persia; such penetration would make Great Britain Russia's next-door neighbor. In pre-war days the problem was solved by vivisecting Persia into English and Russian "spheres of influence." At present the British and the Anglo-Persian with the D'Arcy concession still hold South Persia, while Russia exercises its influence, first, by the veto on oil concessions in North Persia which the 1921 treaty gives it, and, secondly, by its control of the only commercially available route for bringing oil out of North Persia into the outside world—the one that leads across the Caspian and the Caucasus to the Black Sea.

Accordingly, when the Standard Oil joined hands with the Anglo-Persian in supporting the Khostaria concession, Soviet Russia immediately saw the danger of British penetration via the Standard and forthwith entered its objections. Thereupon the Persian Government repulsed the Standard Oil, and subsequently lent an ear to Harry F. Sinclair. In June, 1923, it passed a law providing for concession of the northern oil-fields to an "independent" American company, in return for a $10,000,000 loan and other valuable considerations, and in December it signed an agreement with a Sinclair representative. This agreement, however, required ratification by the Persian Parliament and difficulties ensued. Sinclair may have resorted to American tricks, for the Teheran journal Naserelmelleh of January 15, 1924, charges that he gave the Persian Prime Minister a bribe of $275,000. This has, of course, been denied. Be that as it may, Sinclair has the inside track. In fact the Rosta correspondent at the Shah's capital recently reported the arrival there of a Sinclair agent who had come to arrange the terms of the $10,000,000 loan on which the concession is conditioned. The only substantial security which the Persian Government can pledge in support of such a loan is its right to 16 per cent royalties on the Anglo-Persian oil-fields in South Persia, however, and naturally the British interests fight the proposal to have their revenues used in aid of an American concession. Hence the delay in ratifying Sinclair's concession and hence, probably, the revolutionary disturbances in Persia last March.

Sinclair's victory over the Standard Oil in Persia was at least indirectly the result of Soviet Russia's intervention. Add to this the circumstance that the Communists granted Sinclair a concession for oil in Sakhalin and that they subsequently entertained a proposition from him for a more valuable concession in the Caucasus, and one may feel that there is a case against the Moscow Government for allying itself with the dark and unscrupulous force which the Sinclair company has proved to be.

This would be a misinterpretation. The truth of the matter is that with the exception of such companies as the Gulf and Texas Oil, which however have never ventured beyond the Western Hemisphere, Sinclair is the best and almost the only Soviet customer.

The British companies are eliminated as a matter of course. For if the Russian Government is opposed to having the British as neighbors in Persia it would hardly be likely to invite them into its own home. The oil of the Caucasus is the great prize in the Near East. English interest in the Georgian Menshevik Government and all of Churchill's and Curzon's schemes for intervention in Soviet Russia were probably dictated in large part by a desire to gain a foothold in the Caucasus and obtain possession of its invaluable petroleum resources at Grosni and Baku. In fact the British and their puppet Russian generals did capture and hold Baku till as late as April, 1920, when they were finally dislodged by the Red Army. Even to this day—so it is charged—the British carry on intrigues and propaganda in the Caucasus with a view toward weakening the Soviet regime there. That Russia should therefore bar British oil interests from the Caucasus will be readily understood.

The writer recently showed to a member of the collegium of five of the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs a clipping from the Nieuwe Rotterdamsche Courant to the effect that in connection with the Russo-Dutch diplomatic negotiations the Russians had listened to a proposal from the Royal Dutch Oil Company—in reality a British organization—regarding a concession in the Caucasus. He denied the rumor and added: "You may take it for your general guidance that the Bolshevik Government will grant no concessions for oil to English companies." (The Emba oil-field, lying deep in the trans-Caspian region and far removed from any territory under British influence, is probably the only exception to this rule.)

The Standard Oil Company is subject to the same suspicion, for, though it may fight certain British oil firms with money and cannon in some parts of the globe, it is suspect to the Russians because of its alliance with the Anglo-Persian in Mesopotamia and in Persia and because of a deal with the Royal Dutch-Shell oil interests with regard to Russian oil.

Remains Sinclair. But, the same member of the Foreign Office's collegium said to me: "We would much rather deal with the Standard Oil, whose financial and political influence is far greater than that of Sinclair." The connotation here is clear enough. Russia needs money and wants recognition. It is prepared to barter its oil for these. Soviet Russia is perhaps the richest oil country in the world. The Baku field is estimated to have an underground supply of from eight to nine billion barrels of the crude product. The oil of the Grosni district, likewise tremendously rich, contains from 7 to 8 per cent of paraffin and is therefore the best in the world. Then there is the Emba field, the Fergana region in Central Asia, and the Kuban. If the Soviet Government possessed the necessary funds it would keep these valuable resources for itself. It would drill, draw, and refine the oil and then pocket all the profits. But to do so equipment, improvement, and development are needed, which the state cannot afford. Last year Russia's total oil output amounted to 400 million poods; this year production could easily be increased, but the Government does not plan to go beyond the 400 million figure simply because funds are lacking. Hence the policy of concessions.

The Standard Oil, however, does not want a concession. The Standard Oil wants the Nobel holdings in the Caucasus which it claims, denationalized. It wants them as its own unquestioned property and not as a qualified concession from the Bolsheviks. Therefore the Standard Oil (and Mr. Hughes) insist on denationalization in Soviet Russia. Mr. Hughes sets it as one of the conditions for United States recognition of Soviet Russia.

About a year ago Mr. Dodge of the Standard Oil visited Moscow and probably attempted to persuade the Bolsheviks to denationalize his company's holdings in the oil-fields. He failed. It is just possible that Mr. Dodge's failure is somewhat related to Mr. Hughes's failure to accord recognition to Soviet Russia.

The question of recognition was also involved in Russia's dealings with Sinclair. The Sakhalin concession, it will be remembered, was granted to the Sinclair company on condition that the concession becomes invalid if after five years (1927) the United States has not recognized Soviet Russia. The larger and more valuable concession which brought Sinclair to Moscow last July also had a rider: a loan of $250,000,000. So big a loan plus the tremendous investment which such a concession requires must be protected, and there can be no protection without diplomatic recognition. The American lender-concessionnaire would therefore be inclined to bring pressure on his Government to establish friendly relations with Soviet Russia. To this extent the offer of a concession to Sinclair in the Caucasus was a bid for American recognition.

Nobody will say whether recognition was discussed between Sinclair and Litvinov. It may well be that Sinclair did explain that since President Harding was his friend and several cabinet members his pals, he could be of no little use to Russia in obtaining recognition—provided, of course, he got the oil. But such things can go without saying.

The blow which the Walsh investigation gave Sinclair obviously prevented him from floating anything like a quarter-billion-dollar loan for Russia. It also removed his pals from office. If now the forthcoming elections remove Mr. Hughes from office, denationalization and oil will cease to play a role in the question of American recognition of Russia; the matter can be determined by the healthy instinct of two large nations to be on good terms with each other.

And the fate of Russian oil? Recognition by the United States and by Great Britain may bring the Moscow Government credits and loans with the aid of which it would itself operate the oil-fields of the Caucasus. Or the Soviet Government may continue its concession policy. In that event American companies would enjoy a virtual monopoly, for though the Emba field may be granted to the Shell company, which held title to it before the war, the unfathomable wealth of the Caucasus would await American exploitation. The Standard Oil's union with the Anglo-Persian may in itself not eliminate the Rockefeller company unless it chooses to eliminate itself by further agreements with other British organizations like the Royal Dutch and the Shell. For in reality such agreements, which have already been rumored, are not at all matters of business. They are rather an outgrowth of the desire of the Standard Oil to draw an iron ring around Russia by inducing all the powerful oil firms of the world to keep "hands off Russian oil" until Russia recognizes the rights of former owners in the Caucasus. Such a boycott would supposedly bring Russia to her knees. With Sinclair unable to raise the necessary capital the Standard Oil may feel that its battle is won. But Russia can wait.

New Morals for Old

Women – Free for What?

By EDWIN MUIR

IN the beginning of the Scottish Shorter Catechism there is a beautiful affirmation. "The chief end of man," it says, "is to glorify God and enjoy Him forever."

To any one nourished on the literature and thought of the last half-century that sentence, which defines the chief purpose of life as praise and enjoyment, comes like an audacious blasphemy, a blasphemy, however, bringing light and freedom. The terms of the dogma are a little antiquated now, but it would be easy to restate them in modern language. For "God" we might substitute "nature and man" or, if we were metaphysically inclined, "God in nature and man." The authors of the Shorter Catechism, entangled as they were in a gloomy theology, recognized that the significance of life cannot reside in the labor by which men maintain it, but in some kind of realization of ourselves and of the world which is the highest enjoyment conceivable of both.

Let us go back for a few decades and see if we can catch the values of our time confusedly shaping themselves within the framework of human life. I say shaping themselves, for as Nietzsche said fifty years ago, the time of the conscious valuers has passed; our values for a century have not been created, they have happened. They happened because men had become skeptical not merely of God, or of the existence of a moral order, but of life itself, and could not set before themselves any purpose justifying life, but only its bare mechanism, work, duty, the preservation of society. It has been, thus, one of the main achievements of modern thought to banish from the world the notion of enjoyment. This was begun first in a philosophical way by the utilitarians, who were reasonably convinced that, factories existing for the first time as far as they knew in history, it was incumbent on men to work in them. A fine philosophy, truly; yet men believed in it. After the utilitarians came the advocates of self-help, who showed that the utilitarian policy might not be without individual advantage; that if one cut off one's pleasures, or at least those which cost money, one might win a bizarre, undreamed-of success. The anchorites of wealth arose, the great men who, when they had acquired riches which might have built a new Florence, if scarcely a new Jerusalem, could make no use of them, preferring to teach in Sunday-schools and endow universities. In the eyes of these men wealth was justified only if it could not be enjoyed, for enjoyment was the one thing which went against all their ideas, all those instincts which had set them where they stood. Wealth, thus, could not be enjoyed, could not be used, for when they had reached their end the means still remained means.

The disciples of Smiles have disappeared; men get rich in other ways now; nevertheless a whole view of life has been left behind which we have not fundamentally questioned. The Victorians established the basis of morals in utility; we have come to the stage when we imagine that the basis of life itself is utility. For recreation as an end in itself we have so little appreciation that even sport has become a kind of duty, and nothing is more devastating than the scorn of a conscientious athlete for those who, enjoying perfectly good health, do not go to the trouble of keeping themselves fit. A little unpremeditated pleasure still persists in our common lives, in fox-trotting, drinking, and revues, but it is without either taste or resource; it is not expression but simply relaxation, an amusing way of being tired. The one thing that people will not pardon is the taking of pleasure seriously as an end in itself. The aesthete, at the Renaissance a type of the opulence of life, and quite a common, indeed an expected type, is in our day an aberration demanding our satire when once we have overcome our indignation. Nothing shows more disastrously how incapable we are of entertaining the conviction that life in itself, apart from the labor necessary to make it possible, is a thing worth living. Even art has justified itself for several decades chiefly by its social utility, and only now, against strong opposition, is it escaping from the barriers set up by the generation overawed by Mr. Shaw and Mr. Wells. The notion that men may be on the earth for something else than sweating is dead. We have arrived at an amazing incapacity for joy; and life is to us always less worth living than it should be.

This exaltation of means has brought about a general instrumentalization of life. It weighs heavily upon men; but upon women its weight is crushing, for women have not such a ready capacity as men for transforming themselves to the image of their functions, and they disfigure themselves more in the attempt. Consequently, as woman has taken a larger and larger part in our tentative and unsatisfactory civilization she has undergone, in fact and in people's minds, a distorting process. It is true, woman, lovely woman, the fair charmer, has passed away; but we are hardly better off now when she has become a term like economics. After the economic man has come the economic woman; that is, an entity almost as useful as machinery, and for the inner culture of mankind almost as uninteresting.

How, in striving for emancipation, woman has reached such a dismal stage in her development is one of the saddest stories of our time. The age is an age of work; woman desires freedom, the right of every human being; and freedom in such an age can only mean the freedom to work. But to work, except in a few vocations such as art, is in our time to specialize oneself, and the freedom of women has necessarily resolved itself into a permission to do little things which can give them no final satisfaction. Their freedom is bounded by the slavery under which men, too, suffer; and in changing their occupations they have not escaped from the cage, but only out of one compartment of it into another a little more cheerless than the first. They have achieved a little more liberty than they had before; but this liberty is disenchanting because it leaves them as far away as ever from the full liberty of their spirit. Perhaps in no other age has woman been, in a deep, instinctive sense, so skeptical as she is at present.

And for all this the age—an age in which labor has a fantastic prominence—is responsible; for it is in a time when everybody works, and when there is nothing conceivable that one can do but work, that the cantankerous question of inequality arises. Only in a race can one be slower than another; only then does the necessity to become as good a runner as the fastest come home poignantly to every one. But if it should happen that life is not a race at all? Where leisure is regarded as a more important thing than work and work falls into its proper, subordinate place as the mere means to leisure one does not think very much about inequality, for it has no longer any urgent importance. Nor does one set much value, except in superficials, on uniformity. Among people free from crushing labor (as the whole human race may some time be) there has always been delight in diversity and scorn for uniformity; for, to people enjoying their spirit and the world, diversity even when it is exasperating is of infinite interest, giving a satisfying sense of the richness of life.

Comedy—and comedy is idleness tolerantly enjoying itself—is founded, it has been said, upon a recognition of the equality of the sexes; but it would be more just to say that it is founded upon a view of life into which the notions of equality and inequality do not enter at all, because they are unnecessary. To Congreve and Stendhal women were not the inferior sex, for, in spite of the conventions in which ostensibly they moved, they were free, and therefore interesting. And remote as these figures are from us, they demonstrate a very useful truth, that the way to get over our stupid obsession with inequality is to reach a stage where diversity will be the norm, involving disadvantage to no one. Toward that stage, which can only be made possible by a more general leisure, we are moving, if what the reformers and the scientists tell us is true. It will be a stage in which rules will have more importance than laws and spontaneous actions than obligations; and most of the things we do will be regarded as play rather than duty. Conduct will probably be about a fourth of life, instead of the three-fourths postulated by Matthew Arnold. And although this state has not come yet and may not come for a long time, it would be as sensible to found a philosophy upon it as upon a period of transition as dismal and impermanent as ours. Moreover the values of the past are against us as well as those of the future which we imagine. There is a certain ignobility in the dispute over human inequality, a failure to rise to the human level. It is not a question but a misunderstanding, which the accumulated imaginative culture of the world might have made impossible. A little sense of the richness of life would disperse it. Who would be so fantastic as to say that Falstaff is greater or less than Ophelia, or whether Uncle Toby is the exact equal of Anna Karenina? To ask the question is to evoke at once an image of the diverse riches of human nature and of the poverty of mind which can reduce it to such terms, destroying all interest and all nuance.

But where our instrumental philosophy has had the most grotesque effect has been upon our conception of love. People have come to regard love as merely a device for propagating the race. Now this view of love is not new; it has always been dear to the bourgeoisie, who have always thought it a matter of immense moment that they should have sons to carry on their businesses when they were dead. It is the immemorial philistine conception of love: the strange thing is that it has been taken over by the intelligentsia and glorified. This is in the strictest sense a revolution in thought. No one who has written beautifully of love has thought of it as the intellectuals think. To Plato and Dante the essence of love did not reside in procreation; nor has procreation been anything but a divine accident to the poets. And that is in the human tradition, and probably in the natural order of things; for it is possible that both love and procreation are most perfect when they are unpremeditated, and the child comes as a gift and a surprise; for in the fruits of joy there is a principle of exuberance which distinguishes them from the fruits of duty.

The intellectuals have destroyed the humanistic conception of love as pure spontaneity, as expression, by setting its justification not within itself, but in the child. In "Man and Superman" Mr. Shaw makes Tanner say that if our love did not produce another human being to serve the community, the community would have the sacred right of killing us off, just as the hive kills off the drones who do not attain the queen bee. But what does that mean? It means that happiness is of no importance, that it is a matter of the slightest moment whether, in a life which will never be given to us again, we realize some of the potentialities of our being or pass through it blind to the end. If it is worth while living at all, this must needs be the precise opposite of the truth. The child, like everything else, is justified; but it is not justified because it adds to the potential wealth of society, but because it adds to our present delight, and moreover lives a life as valid as our own. The truth is that we dare not admit that any pleasure whatever has a right to exist without serving society, and serving it deliberately.

The joys of other generations have become our duties; and it is significant that Mr. Shaw and the bulk of the intelligentsia are at one on the birth-rate with the Roman Catholic Church, that church which has on many occasions through its theologians affirmed its belief that sensual love is a guilty thing, and, using its own kind of logic, has exhorted man to multiply and replenish the earth.

"The chief end of man is to glorify God and enjoy Him forever"; and that being so, it is the task of those who are a little more serious than the serious to set about discovering the principles of glory and enjoyment in life. And—I am setting down a truism—the main principle of enjoyment for the human race is not art, nor thought, nor the practice of virtue, but for man, woman, and for woman, man. The exchange of happiness between the sexes is not only the creative agent in human life, perpetuating it; it is also the thing which gives the perpetuation of life its chief meaning. People have always felt this vaguely; it has made labor endurable to them; but hardly ever have they recognized it clearly, and to the poets and artists who know it they have always responded a little skeptically. They have thought of love as a justification a little too materialistic for life; but love is only materialistic when it is regarded as a means.

To accept men and women as ends in themselves, to enter into their life as one of them, is to partake of absolute life, that life which at every moment realizes itself, existing for its own sake. We cannot live in that life continuously; for the accomplishment of the intricate purposes of society we must at certain times and with part of our minds regard our fellow-creatures as instruments; but the more we tend to do so the more we banish joy from life. Life does not consist, whatever the utilitarians may say, in functioning, but in living; and life comes into being where men and women, not as functions, but as self-constituted entities, intersect. This is the state which in religion as well as art has been called life; this is the final life of the earth, beyond which there is no other. We may accept it or pass it by; but whatever we may do with it, it is our chief end, giving meaning to the multitudinous pains of humanity. This commerce between men and women is not merely sexual, in the narrow sense which we have given the word; it involves every human joy, all the thoughts and aspirations of mankind stretching into infinity. It is the thing which has inspired all great artists, mystical as well as earthy. It is the point of reference for any morality which is not a disguised kind of adaptation; for virtue consists in the capacity to partake freely of human happiness. All reform, all economic and political theory has a meaning in so far as it makes for this; and that was recognized by the first reformers, the utopians who had not yet become mere specialists in reform.

The libertarian movement has been such a dismal affair, thus, not because it has been too free, but because it has not been free enough. The democracies and the women of the world have been potentially liberated; but not so very long ago they were slaves, and they have still a slave's idea of freedom. Instead of equal joys they have asked for equal obligations; and the whole world is in the grip of a psychological incapacity to escape from the idea of obligation. Against the unreasonable solemnity which this has imposed on everything there is little left for us except a deliberate and reasonable light-heartedness; this, and the faith that the human race will some time attain the only kind of freedom worth striving for, a freedom in joy.

La Follette's Party—Will It Last?

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

TO this reporter the elements supporting La Follette seem to be fortuitously conjoined members of a body of clay into which La Follette will have to breathe the breath of life if the body is to remain intact and spring to its feet and live as a new and permanent political party.

Each of the three great elements supporting La Follette is doing it for a special separate reason of its own.

Let us consider, first, the railroad trade unions. Why was it that in the Cleveland convention the railroad trade unions were so strongly represented and the plumbers and carpenters and bricklayers and cigar-makers and barbers and textile workers and iron-puddlers—and even miners—were relatively so weakly and scantily, and sometimes even negligibly, represented?

Is the locomotive engineer by inherent nature more radical than the carpenter? Is the railroad conductor by inherent nature a more outbreaking character than the miner? Are the "aristocrats of labor" in our train service more democratic politically than the lower branches of the labor tree?

The answer manifestly simply is that the railroad trade unions have a special grievance of their own in relation to the Government and in relation to their employers under the Esch-Cummins Transportation Law. When and if that grievance is abated we must in common-sense expect to see an averaging-out of the radicalism of the railroad trade unions and of the radicalism of other unions.

Meanwhile, a large part of the agricultural element which will support La Follette in the Northwest has been brought to its present state of mind by innumerable orations declaring that the specific proof of the need of a new political movement is the low price of wheat.

In the first two decades of this century a relative rise in the price of farm products, especially as compared with railroad freight rates, was accompanied by an almost complete disappearance of the old Granger and Greenback and Anti-Monopoly and Populist movements which had rallied and thrilled the agricultural West and Northwest during the last three decades of the last century.

In 1892 the Populists got a million votes at the polls and twenty-two votes in the presidential electoral college. In 1900 they got fifty thousand votes at the polls and not one electoral vote.

What is to prevent a relative revival of agricultural prosperity from doing to the La Follette party what it did to the Populist Party?

The third great element energetically promoting and supporting La Follette—in addition to the railroad trade unions and the Northwestern farmers—is the Socialist Party of Debs and Hillquit. Most of the railroad trade unionists and most of the Northwestern farmers are far indeed from being Socialists. They are distinctly non-Socialist. So are all the members of La Follette's own immediate machine, and so is La Follette himself.

On domestic issues the La Follette party has a pro-governmentalist wing, as illustrated by Hillquit of New York, and it has an anti-governmentalist wing, as illustrated by Voigt of Wisconsin, a La Folletteist who in the House of Representatives was one of the official managers of the opposition to the governmental wheat-trading corporation proposed by the McNary-Haugen bill.

On foreign issues the La Follette party has a pro-League wing, as illustrated by William H. Johnston, who was chairman of the Cleveland convention, and by Burton K. Wheeler, who is the party's candidate for Vice-President, and it has an anti-League wing, as illustrated by Shipstead of Minnesota, who is the outstanding figure among the outright Farmer-Laborites of the Northwest, and by La Follette, the party's candidate for President.

Is each of the two old parties divided on crucial issues? So is the new party.

What dominant idea can fuse the elements of the new party together? What permanent idea, what permanent vision, can keep the hungry elements of the new party alert and alive for "progress" when perhaps their hunger has been satisfied by larger personal incomes and when they are tempted to follow the old Populists back from penniless radicalism to affluent political regularity?

There is only one State in this Union in which a radical movement has outlasted internal divisions and has outlasted prosperity. That State is Wisconsin.

Wilsonian Democratic radicalism in New Jersey in 1911 and 1912 produced the famous legislative "Seven Sisters" against "monopoly" and in favor of "the new freedom" in the economic life of the State, and then the "Seven Sisters" became wall-flowers and "the new freedom" became a mirage and Wilsonian Democratic radicalism in New Jersey became an empty memory.

Johnsonian Republican radicalism brought forth immensely larger fruits and gave California a new governmental era, which in the essential machinery of it has remained operative till now. Yet, with the temporary decline of Johnson's personal power in California, no new fruits are today apparent in the Californian political air. It has become an air carrying few seeds of change.

Meanwhile in Wisconsin—and in Wisconsin alone—a progressive movement, showing its head above ground sturdily in 1898, is still throwing out new branches and bringing forth new fruits from the same roots and the same sap in 1924.

What is the explanation? Is there an explanation? This writer will attempt one in an ensuing article.

Here he points out just two summary facts.

In the first place the Wisconsin movement has been characterized by a deep passion for human personal individual liberty—and liberation. People were to be freed from so-called "subjection" to railroad corporations but they were also to be freed, for instance, from subjection to their own ignorance. They were to get ahead not merely by throwing the railroad corporations off their backs but also then by doing something for themselves in their own sweat. Therefore the La Follette movement enormously and spectacularly supported the State University in its effort to study out and develop the means by which the individual farmer and the individual wage-earner and (for that matter) the individual business man might by his own exertions find for himself new capacity and new liberty and new prosperity together.

In the second place, and in association with this interest in liberty, the La Follette movement in Wisconsin has never attempted to make the State the operator of business but only an agency through which a fairer field—fairer in justice and fairer in fruits—could be given to the private operators of it in so far as was consistent with their duties to other tax-payers and to consumers.

The La Follette movement in Wisconsin has not been socialism in harmony with Mr. Hillquit's idea. It has not been individualism in harmony with this writer's idea. It has been an in-between third thing—the only thing of its kind in America—the only thing that has kept a so-called progressive movement in America permanently intact and alert and alive. In an article next week this writer will essay to describe it in operating practice as the possible coming inspiration of the suddenly assembled and incoherent and unadjusted political body which La Follette is now nationally leading.

In the Driftway

ANTHROPOLOGISTS who for the last fortnight may have been smacking their lips in joyous anticipation of a feast to make the researches of Mr. Beebe and his companions seem like the attempts of mere infants in the art of fauna-hunting may now sit back quietly in their chairs, unfurrow their brows, roll down their sleeves, and heave a sigh of relief—not unmixed, the Drifter fancies, with a tinge of disappointment. They may even go on comfortably with their summer vacationing, safe in the knowledge that there are no rock-hurling apemen at large in the untenanted jungles of the Northern Pacific coast. The Drifter sits back, too, and idly goes on with his own summer plans—which include a trip abroad when rates are at their lowest—but not before he casts a roving eye over the cuttings that strew his desk and are, alas, all that remains of what might have been the nucleus of a new and exciting chapter of life in the animal kingdom. And he reflects, too, on the possibility that real apemen who inhabit far-away regions as yet unexplored may even now be swinging by their prehensile tails and snickering over the gullibility of their more civilized human relatives in distant zones.

* * * *

WHAT started it all was the report which came winging across from the West two weeks ago: A tribe of apemen had appeared in the wild mountain defiles of Washington, and had made battle with stones on a lonely prospector's cabin. What really happened will doubtless never find its way into the first readers and history primers of another generation, but certain it is that the waiting East was thereafter treated to a fortnight of fantastic journalistic narrative, with the result that the archives have been prepared with oil and wine, fine linen and purple against the reception of this latest living contribution to their treasures. The Drifter suspects that many a thrill of joy in that fortnight has passed up the spines of a round hundred scientifically inclined college professors weary of tipping back their chairs on the boarding-house porch or waiting for a bite more promising than a bull-head or a catfish.

* * * *

TWO weeks of round-eyed expectation. Two weeks of feverish perusal of the morning news, of vivid conjecture and the consultation of tomes, and of conversation, and controversy. Indian lore, drawn from its source by way of the tribe's most erudite living member, legends and fables unearthed—and always the trimming of fascinating journalistic jargon: "apemen"—"hairy Indians"—"mountain devils"—"giants roving the hills"—"shaggy creatures who kill game by hypnotism"—"ventriloquists."

* * * *

AND then the sickening denouement. The Drifter cannot find the courage to tell of it. He sighs and passes the buck to a fellow-dupe. It is the New York World of July 23. The fellow-dupe has nothing to say. It presents cold type, devoid of a touch of human emotion. There is only a stark, brief paragraph, hanging by a thread to the end of a column and looking as though it had been whittled to fit its meager two inches of space:

> PORTLAND, ORE., July 22.—Two boys at the Y. M. C. A. Camp at Spirit Lake on Mount St. Helens believe that they were the "apes" which prospectors reported hurled stones at their cabin recently.
>
> One boy, Maxwell Pierce, wrote to his parents: "We stumbled onto a trail that led to the miners' cabin. A couple of them greeted us with revolvers. They told us we were the first ones ever to find their cabin, but the next day they told the rangers their 'apeman' story."

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

1848-1860-1924

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "America is no place for third parties"—that is the belief of every 100 per cent American who has not read the history of his country, and probably could not quote a line of the Constitution or the Declaration of Independence. But whether America is a place for third parties or not, we have to admit that there have been third-party movements, one of which finally crystallized into the very party of which Silent Cal is now the leader.

The situation at this time is, in many respects, like that of 1848. Calvin is our Cass, La Follette our Van Buren, but at this writing who can say who is our Taylor? The previous administration had toadied to the slave-owners, and although from the North, Cass refused to "interfere with the rights of the States" in this regard. So today Coolidge has toadied in every respect to Wall Street; in place of the Mexican War we have the oil scandal, which the President has all but condoned, doing nothing to punish the wrongdoers.

The Socialist Party occupies the position of the old Liberty Party, which compromised with the "progressives" of the time in the formation of the Free Soil Party. While this party was not strong enough to win its way, it did hurt the other parties. Van Buren, a lifelong Democrat, left his party for his ideals, sacrificed his position in society, and ran as a "radical." La Follette, whatever have been his views, has always been a Republican in name, though he may have little in common with Lodge or Coolidge. But neither did Van Buren and Calhoun have much in common, though both were members of the same party. And just as Van Buren probably drew more votes from Cass in 1848, especially in the North, than from Taylor, so will La Follette probably draw more votes from Coolidge than from the Democratic nominee and secure the latter's election.

Yes, and in 1846-1848 we had a great Puritan reform movement and the beginning of the anti-Catholic, anti-"furriner," 100 per cent Nordic American Party which lived and died and then was resurrected in the form of the more powerful Know-Nothing Party.

This brings us to the analogy between La Follette and Lincoln, probably the two most honest, whatever else may be said, of all the characters that have ever appeared in American political life. Lincoln would never have been elected if he had not had three opponents. La Follette cannot be elected, except by a miracle, if there are three parties this fall. But if, like the Know-Nothings, or American Constitutional Party, their offspring, the K. K. K., should put a ticket in the field, "Fighting Bob's" chances would be greatly enhanced.

This will not be another 1912. Will it be an 1848? Will it be an 1860?

San Francisco, July 4 SAMUEL LEWIS

Against Gandhi

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I wonder whether your interest in Mr. Gandhi is sufficiently two-sided to permit of my gently protesting against the exaggerations and fulsomeness of some of your recent pieces about him? Your correspondents appear to worship from afar, but if I understand The Nation correctly it wants to get the clay feet into perspective when it takes a picture, and to have a good look at the halo, tap it if necessary, to make sure it is not stannous.

What happened is quite simple. When Mr. Gandhi was in South Africa he used the weapon of non-cooperation with a compact and fairly small body of Indians there who were naturally homogeneous. When he became prominent in India he took up the same weapon against excellent advice which urged upon him the fact that he was bound to fail if he used all India. He thought he knew better, but after 1919 he saw for the moment the possibility of danger, and said so when he opened the 1920 campaign. His own words:

> I should cease to cooperate [with the non-cooperators] and advise every Hindu, and for that matter every one else, to cease to cooperate the moment there was violence actually done [by his own followers], advised, or countenanced. I would therefore urge upon all speakers the exercise of the greatest restraint under the greatest provocation. . . . The cause is doomed if anger, hatred, ill-will, recklessness, and finally violence are to reign supreme. I shall resist them with my life, even if I should stand alone.

All unimpeachable sentiments expressed on March 10, 1920, but not for long afterward. (Mind you, this was after Dyer had done his fiendish work at Jallianwallah Bagh; so the worst its rulers could do was already behind poor India.) He took to provocative language. He called the Government devilish and satanic over and over in public, to mobs of every sort. He burned piles of European clothes to the tune of execration. He denounced everything modern, like motor cars and trains, while he himself used them.

When violence appeared did he resist with his life? Not in the least. He fasted once or twice for a day or a week, without the least effect upon anybody, as far as one could notice. He called his own passive-resistance movement of 1919 "a Himalayan blunder," but was tempted to repeat the blunder on a large scale in 1920. In March he spoke, as I have shown, but a few months later we heard with horror his announcement that it might be necessary to wade through "rivers of blood" and stride over "mountains of corpses" to get to the goal. Whose blood and bodies? Chauri Chaura is a good specimen of the answer in fact. There the Indian police were burned alive by the Indian people roused by Mr. Gandhi's wild language. You may say he was not to blame. But what then was the good of his several promises to "retire to the Himalayas" if there were violence, or even coercion? Would he had retired! As the number of riots mounted, the Government became anxious. At last came Malabar, after ninety-two other disturbances, some most serious. Not all were directly consequent upon non-cooperation, but the excessive number in the total and the considerable number traceable directly to that prove that Mr. Gandhi is not a man of his word. Well, then Malabar. Thousands dead, tortures unspeakable, homes burned, and all the rest of it. Mr. Gandhi stood helplessly by. But the Government had had all it could stand. What would any government do under such circumstances? It arrested him politely, and gave him comfortable quarters in privacy.

The political workers who really united India were those who built up the home-rule movement from 1913 to 1918—Mr. Tilak, Mrs. Besant, and others. It was they, and not the non-cooperators, who got the announcement of home rule as the goal (Parliament, August 20, 1917) and got the reforms of 1919, in which progressive steps were guaranteed. They in turn built upon the work of the Congresses of preceding years. The Congress had not had the daring and the vision to demand this, but the home rulers had, and they soon got the Congress to accept the demand and back it up. This united the country and gave it hope and enthusiasm. When Mr. Gandhi appeared on the scene he had this capital to use, and he used it most unwisely, squandering it in his visionary schemes, his swaraj-in-a-month-or-two promises (there were several of these) and those wild-cat ventures which exploited schoolboys ruthlessly and poisoned the mind of young India, teaching it to howl down speakers and destroy the magnificent, restrained, but one-pointed will, which the home rulers had evoked.

What did Mr. Gandhi contribute? Disunion, for one thing. The country was united in 1917. All that Mr. Gandhi did was to help break up the firm union. His subtle egotism made him a tool for Islamic interests. Bit by bit he lost his footing in spiritual things, as practical considerations (which he never understood) drove him into corner after corner. Your pages have never dealt with this side of the story. I know that you aim carefully at the truth, but I know also that as regards India you have failed lamentably to hit it.

Sydney, Australia, May 1 F. KUNZ

Private Property in Esthonia

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In a letter in The Nation of April 2—somewhat tardily brought to my attention—Professor Piip, the Esthonian Minister at Washington, commenting on an article of Mr. Louis Fischer's in which references were made to the new Baltic republics, remarks:

> Mr. Fischer overlooked also the agrarian reform put through in Esthonia in 1919 and in Latvia in 1920, by which all the large estates were proclaimed state property and taken over after payment of compensation.

The large estates were, indeed, taken over, but the phrase "after payment of compensation" is a trifle misleading. Payment was offered for the "inventory"—i.e., animals, machinery, etc.—and not infrequently refused by the former estate-owners, in the belief that such acceptance of payment might be construed as acceptance of the principle of confiscation. The question of payment for the land itself was postponed to an indefinite future date.

This partial compensation, based on the pre-war value of the articles in question, turned into Esthonian paper marks at an arbitrary rate of exchange, was so small that the owner of a large and well-developed estate might find himself with no more than enough to pay his board and lodging for a few months in Reval.

That the Esthonian Government, desperately trying to establish itself and make both ends meet after the hurricane of war and revolution, had no funds with which to compensate the estate-owners is understandable enough. That it felt itself compelled to "meet the competition" of Soviet Russia, from which it had just won its independence, is also understandable, although this aspect of the matter can scarcely be gone into here. But it is only fair to the Balt estate-owners to state the plain facts—that their losses as the result of their own revolution were only slightly less complete than those of estate-owners in Russia itself.

New York, June 14 ARTHUR RUHL

Hurting France

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his appeal through your columns for books of reference for the University of Strasbourg, André Koszul cites as an example of the way in which the Germans had neglected scientific productions from America the fact that in the library there the Poole's Index to Periodical Literature stops at 1902! Surely the French professor must know that Poole's Index, as such, has stopped, and that for the last twenty years or more its place has been taken by the Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature. If that is not on the shelves at Strasbourg, it is, indeed, some indictment of German thoroughness, though one wonders why the French, during the five years since the war that they have been in charge, have apparently till now made no effort to supply the deficiency.

I take pleasure in sending the missing volumes and subscribing to the current numbers of the Readers' Guide for the University of Strasbourg. Those who are interested in seeing the writings of one nation studied in another are always glad to respond to an appeal of this kind, even when it is accompanied with an apparent attempt to discredit still another nation. We may feel that some of the finest spirits of France—Renan, Anatole France, Romain Rolland—would not at this time have mixed any such slur with their appeal. It is a shame that other Frenchmen do not realize that such an attempt now to turn prejudice against the Germans merely lends color abroad to the mistaken feeling that such a tendency is characteristic of the French, and thus tends to hurt the reputation of France more than it does that of Germany.

Cambridge, Massachusetts, July 15 H. W. L. DANA

Against Blasphemy

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The good Lord knows that I am not the most appropriate person to act as Defender of the Faith but I have got to say this or bust:

In the New York Tribune of Sunday, July 27, appeared a photograph of one of those terrible boy evangelists who sometimes are spewed forth by the darkest hinterland. The text accompanying the picture announced that the brat had been arrested for speeding, and then, if you please, had prayed for the policeman who arrested him quoting the Bible words: "Forgive them for they know not what they do."

In the name of an outraged citizenry I beg to protest against this vile profanation of an inherently holy sentiment. To publish the mug of that arrogant little wretch is bad enough. But spare us his blasphemy!

Westport, Connecticut, July 27 H. v. L.

The next article in the series on New Morals for Old will be Modern Marriage and Ancient Laws, by Arthur Garfield Hays.

Give Not With Your Hands

By MacKNIGHT BLACK

Give not with your hands; they might break, lifting mountains.
Give not with your lips, shaping words like blue swords, or lanterns of silver, to fail.
Give with your heart, like earth, the old giver,
Not knowing what life shall come out of its wholeness,
Thundering the white pear branches of Spring from its silent dark!

Books

A Course Charted

Culture and Democracy in the United States. By Horace M. Kallen. Boni and Liveright. $3.

ALTHOUGH inseparably bound up with the discussion of the state of civilization in the United States which is the subject of the rest of his book, Mr. Kallen has written in the chapter Humanism and the Industrial Age a critique which goes far beyond the confines of our national cultural problem. It is, as its title denotes, a study of the transformation of the human mind by the forces of our time; it is the philosophical solvent that melts all the inquiries, criticisms, and utopias of the present generation into fluid thought capable of moving toward some attainable goal; it is, in short, the stuff that religions are made of. Given the fundamental ideas at which Mr. Kallen has arrived, a Loyola would have organized a new order in which he could initiate genuinely creative laws of living, a Luther would have arraigned the present spiritual props of our social framework and, like Bryan, would have maneuvered legislatures into making theological doctrine a political question, a Wesley would have moved the mob to a vision of higher values and would at least have substituted some emotional ritual for the concepts that his audiences could not absorb—and Mr. Kallen writes an essay for a book which will be read by a few hundred intellectual defeatists who are incapable of greater exertion than their daily commiseration of God for the sorry state of the universe.

The fault is, of course, Horace Kallen's. He lacks both Peter and Paul in his make-up, or, to put it in the succinct terms of our industrial age, he does not sell his idea. It is not that he is wanting in the magnetism or the fervor of these religious leaders, but that he is writing without the compass which guided them to their all-important ends. There is a conflict as well as a contrast between the clear and concrete goal to which each of his chapters is directed and the devious, difficult course which each sentence and paragraph pursues. The reader who would follow Mr. Kallen to his conclusion will be amply rewarded by the Pisgah sight of contemporary civilization and of its future possibilities, but he must be prepared for an arduous journey which will tax all his faculties. Let me not be misunderstood. In this volume the reader is not asked to crash through the noxious underbrush of dead and moldering terms and concepts that obstruct progress in the works of the general pedagogues of philosophy; Mr. Kallen is most emphatically not academic—he is fresh, vital, and vigorous. Again the reader is not forced to seek out the implications of inadequate definitions and to rescue important meanings from pages of surging emotions; Mr. Kallen is no enfant terrible of a howling generation—he is articulate and comprehensive. But he pursues each idea to its philosophical source, each deduction to its logical end; he not only hunts the fox, but also bolts every hare that comes athwart his chase. That's his undoing.

The essence of his conception of the ultimate reconciliation between man and the machine, or, rather, of the true conquest by man of machinery, toward which the twentieth century is heading, may be gathered from a few extracts:

> The living pattern of this new humanism, the humanism of the industrial age, cannot yet be fully prefigured. Only some of its qualities can be signalized and the attitude toward man and the world in which its freedom and fellowship cohere. . . . There has been a concentration on the attainment of self-knowledge and self-mastery through the psychological disciplines; not constrained; spontaneous rather, and inevitable. Its spirit is a joyous realism. . . . It aims at freedom, but its foundations are such that when it turns from rebellion to creation the freedom it attains will rest secure on the recognition of the casual bases of life and will crave the courageous attempt to evaluate and master them. . . . This is an experiential naturalism. It acquiesces in the living propulsions of its theme. It seeks to understand it by its history and setting and to give it ideal fulfilment by working out the perfections wherein a reaction to life becomes an achievement of art. Both joy and beauty enter into it. . . . It does not interpret, it envisages. The metaphysical democracy of science directs its imagination and guides its craftsmanship. Before its temper and spirit the ancestral quarrel of romanticists and classicists, of ancients and moderns, is dispelled as vapor before sunlight. History and the future, the near and the far, the passionate and the intellectual, the traditional and the novel, the ephemeral and the lasting, the hidden as well as the public, have equal holiday in its court, but particularly the hitherto unregarded common things, the routine and grubby detail of daily life. Whatever has a ground in existence is capable of a glow of beauty without illusion, which this new spirit in art promises to elicit and set forth. . . . It promises, when it comes, to be much more socialized than the old humanism, its freedom and fellowship being spelled in terms of the community in the individual, not the individual in the community. Of religion, in its traditional sense, it gives no indication; it would seem to make no claims on life; rather it accepts and enjoys. Its spirit, consequently, will be catholic, tolerant, disillusioned, and serene.

This, then, is the promise of what the age of science holds in store for the spirit. In a large measure the changes toward this ideal are inevitable and self-engendered or, at least, generated by conditions beyond human control; but to the extent that life may be molded and shaped in order to bring it about, the work will be done not by the humanist sect in the academies, "romanticists disturbed by their own times and fleeing for refuge to antiquity," but by the new rebellious generation which even now, as it turns from revolt to disillusion, has intimations of the new humanism.

In the United States this spiritual development is further complicated by the problems peculiar to our country. And this brings us to the bulk of Mr. Kallen's book. Is culture compatible with democracy? Is democracy compatible with the temper of the American people? Who is the American people—or is it peoples? Is the Ku Klux cry against "foreigners" simply a cruder and more rancorous expression of the theories that are axiomatic to the mind of the average Anglo-Saxon-American? Is the Anglo-Saxon-American more American than the Irish-Jewish-Scandinavian-American, or any other hyphenate? These and other inquiries into the national constitution and the American psychology make up the studies. It is at once obvious that the work is timely as well as permanent.

It is more. It is a challenge and a test. Henceforth every American, especially he who plays his part in molding public opinion, must take a stand for or against the ideas to which Mr. Kallen has given expression, unless he would be accused of groping blindly for an unknown end. Columbia is moving forward, and moving swiftly. And now Mr. Kallen has mapped not only her direction, but the sources of her motive power as well. Surely no one should presume to take the helm and steer her course without considering this chart.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

A Civil War City

Richmond, Its People and Its Story. By Mary Newton Stanard. J. B. Lippincott Company. $3.

BETWEEN old and new Richmond, as interpreted by Mrs. Mary Newton Stanard, there is a narrower gulf than I had believed possible—in fact, hardly a gulf at all, only a gradual gentle progress along the original track marked out by William Byrd. This is reassuring to those who know Richmond, because the old city, for the most part burned in the war between the States, was, as American cities go, sufficiently picturesque. We are accustomed to regard the new city as a more or less mushroom growth, whose relationship with the old is vague—at times non-existent; a city whose picturesque qualities live chiefly in certain of its inhabitants.

Richmond's story, from its foundation by Colonel Byrd and his friends in 1753—it is a comparatively new city—to its return to the Union in 1870, moves easily. It is not generally known outside the State that Richmond has not been the most romantic part of Virginia, except during its four years as capital of the Confederacy. Aristocratic Virginia lived for the most part on its plantations, and Richmond was a center where laws were made and tobacco was bought and sold. As the successor to Williamsburg it became an important part of American history, and Mrs. Stanard has used this history to make an amazingly interesting story. Colonial Richmond, revolutionary Richmond, and the Richmond which witnessed the debate for and against the Constitution between the adherents of Washington and Jefferson shortly after the colonies became States, are recreated with color and grace.

Enlightening, too, is the tale of a Negro uprising which did not quite occur at the dawn of the nineteenth century. This is fresh information to many persons who believe that if Negroes had been allowed to remain black they would never have become a problem. The battle between Federalists and Republicans is presented quite without bias as are the personalities of Marshall, Mason, Henry, Randolph, Pendleton, Madison, Monroe, and others who pass through "the Court End of town." This "Court End of town," by the way, remains one of the few visible links between old Richmond and new. Some of it still stands, lazy and mellow, its white porticoes and iron balconies giving no threat of the lodging-house mustiness all too prevalent within.

Poe's intermittent residence in Richmond and his editorship of the Southern Literary Messenger, as well as the visits of Thackeray and Dickens, figure in the latter part of this history, and the subjects of Thackeray's lectures are so alluring that one compares them a bit wistfully with the subjects selected by the English lecturers of today; for example, "Steele and the Times of Queen Anne" and "The Georges of England; Court and Town Life During Their Reigns." He was "delighted," he wrote to a friend in New York, "with the comfortable, friendly, cheery little town—the picturesquest" that he had "seen in America." The first part of the verdict is frequently echoed by novelists who visit Richmond today, but alas for the picturesqueness! George F. Babbitt is as prominent a citizen here today as in Zenith, but he has not pushed his way into Mrs. Stanard's enchanted town, even in her extremely well-done Epilogue.

The Civil War and Reconstruction, which form the core of Richmond's history, live in these pages with a distinguished freedom from bitterness and are the most essential part of the book. For Richmond is preeminently the city of the Civil War. At that period only she was to Virginia what Philadelphia has always been to Pennsylvania and Charleston to South Carolina. Her great traditions, social, military, and political, belong most utterly to that period, when Richmond held literally the nerve centers of America.

EMILY CLARK

Personality in Architecture

The Autobiography of an Idea. By Louis H. Sullivan. With a Foreword by Claude Bragdon. Press of the American Institute of Architects, Inc. $3.

THIS unusual and revealing book is the spiritual confession of an American architect whose philosophy of life is imbedded in its pages as deeply as in his brick and stone. Louis H. Sullivan, whose life closed this spring in Chicago almost at the time of the publication of his book, belonged to a generation of architects who were strong personalities—Stanford White, John W. Root, Daniel H. Burnham, H. H. Richardson, Richard Hunt, and perhaps half a dozen more. They were most effective in the eighties and nineties, when they preached a message of beauty as well as utility—the venustas and utilitas of Vitruvius—and when, concretely, they met and solved the pivotal problems growing out of the coming of the skyscraper. The temptation to place Mr. Sullivan in the last century is not an error of chronology, for like a writer who exhausts his ideas before the end of his days the architect found his career ended soon after he reached middle age.

Mr. Sullivan has disclosed much in these pages about the evolution of building in America, but his principal concern is with his "idea." He conceives of man as a receptacle of power, who, through fear and tradition, has been hampered in the use of his imagination and his intellect; he celebrates him as a free, conscious agent, capable of becoming a creative dreamer with power of vision to harness the imagination and the intellect, to make science do his will and his emotions serve him. He argues that "man's spirit must be free that his powers may be free to accomplish in beneficence," that man, freed from dogma and fear, may be driven on by imagination, "the inscrutable dynamic power that energizes all other powers." Readers in philosophy may be pardoned if they see here and there a kinship to the doctrines of positive freedom of will, the free, self-conscious spirit, and the rational use of the intellect that have a Kantian ring. It is the story of Mr. Sullivan's progress that is much more important than the evolution of his philosophy, for there are passages here that recall the thorny path of Philip Carey in "Of Human Bondage."

There is plenty of proof that Mr. Sullivan applied his rationalism and his individualism to his buildings. He started with the conviction that "for centuries art had been belittled in superstitions called traditions"; that form followed function, in fact that "function created or organized its form," and that "a realistic architecture should be evolved based on well-defined utilitarian needs—that all practical demands of utility should be paramount as a basis of planning and design; that no architectural dictum, or tradition, or superstition, or habit should stand in the way." He found that the immediate problem was increased daylight in buildings. "This led him to use slender piers, tending toward a masonry and iron combination, the beginnings of a vertical system." He has told here how he built the Auditorium in Chicago—"with its immense mass of ten stories, its tower, weighing thirty million pounds, equivalent to twenty stories—a tower of solid masonry carried on a floating foundation; a great raft 67 by 100 feet." The story of these rafts, moored in Chicago's ooze and sand, is too detailed to be related here—the best account is to be found in "John Wellborn Root" by Harriet Monroe—but their evolution is a chapter in American building. A few years later came the tall, thin, structural iron shaft—the product of the imagination of sales managers of Eastern rolling-mills, who saw their first opportunity for using it in Chicago. The problem of foundation as related to height was solved.

Louis H. Sullivan has recorded here his deep, inward regret that the World's Fair of Chicago of 1893 took its architecture from classical antiquity instead of from the imagination of its builders. The beautiful palace of the arts, soon to be rebuilt in stone in Jackson Park, he terms "the most impudently thievish." Even at this late day he calls the Fair "a naked exhibition of charlatanry in the higher feudal and domineering culture, conjoined with expert salesmanship of the materials of decay." His opportunity at that Fair consisted chiefly in planning and executing the great door of the Transportation Building. Perhaps it was in a spirit of defiance that he made it so magnificent—for many will remember that it blazed forth in gold amid the cold, dignified classicism. That American architecture can be better served in developing native ideas than by rebuilding the Parthenon on Western prairies I earnestly believe. But I cannot follow Mr. Sullivan in his conviction that the Fair, by its emphasis on the classic, wrought irreparable damage to the art spirit in America, any more than I can imagine the mastery of Greek and Latin working harm to the writer of a pure English prose.

HARRY HANSEN

An Old Master

Celestina, or The Tragicomedy of Calisto and Melibea. Translated from the Spanish by James Mabbe (anno 1631). Edited by H. Warner Allen. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

FEW masterpieces have a greater claim than "Celestina" to a place in a collection "of the more robust and human examples of the classic and medieval literature" which the Broadway Translations purpose to be. For "Celestina" is a most profound record of life as understood by a race whose distinguishing feature, according to Havelock Ellis, is, above all, "its primitive and eternal attitude of heroic energy . . . directed toward the more fundamental facts of human existence." "Celestina" is so great an achievement, indeed, that if it ranks second to "Don Quixote" among the glories of Spain, it is not because Cervantes knew human character better than Rojas (whose claim to the authorship of this book is no longer disputed), nor because Rojas was an inferior artist. But rather, because the allegorical meaning we can read into "Don Quixote" gives it a more immediate significance to any age than "Celestina" could possibly possess. In fact, if we could rid ourselves of traditional prejudices we should readily come to see that Rojas's insight into the human soul was in every respect as deep as that of Cervantes, and that his artistry was, perhaps, superior. Mabbe's translation, in spite of the liberties he took with the text, is, in its effect, almost perfect. Professor Allen's introductory essay on the picaresque novel contains much keen criticism and historical information difficult to obtain in so succinct a manner. His arguments supporting Rojas's claim as author, however, are a mere rehashing of facts already well known.

ELISEO VIVAS

A French Realpolitiker

Lettres à un Ami: Souvenirs de ma vie politique. Par Alexandre Ribot. Paris; Editions Bossard. 12 francs.

ALEXANDRE RIBOT was one of that fateful generation whose youth was formed amid the scorching memories of French defeat in 1870 and whose old age found satisfaction in the World War and its intrigues. One wonders if the pan-German youth of today will be as proud of their revanche fifty years hence as Ribot was when he wrote these memories of his service in five war cabinets.

As Minister of Finance Ribot was responsible for the war policy of postponing taxation, which has left France with a franc worth less than a quarter of its pre-war par. France did not begin to increase her taxes until after three years of war; Ribot did not even raise a loan until after a year and a half; he lived on inflation. A third of his memoirs is a defense of this policy. In 1916 he began borrowing from American bankers, and his methods improved; it is a little disconcerting to discover how thoroughly Morgan dominated the French fiscal policy even before America entered the war.

The offensive of April 16, 1917, the consequent mutinies, the Russian peace offers, the invasion of Greece all occurred under Ribot's premiership. Nivelle's offensive was not of his planning, but the brusque rejection of the Russian peace offers and the ousting of Constantine were his work, and he was proud of them to his death. He was not the father of the secret treaties, but he was their apologist.

> What preoccupied the Ministry, and especially the President of the Republic [Poincaré], was the fact that we had no written proof of the Czar's promise to support our demand for Alsace and Lorraine and our project of an independent buffer state on the left bank of the Rhine.

It did indeed preoccupy them—so much so that Ribot, like Poincaré, was resolutely opposed to letting the French Socialists try their hand at peace-making in Stockholm in 1917.

> If France had agreed not to demand Alsace-Lorraine and if Italy had given up her claim for Trieste, Germany would doubtless have made some concessions to France in Lorraine (not giving up Metz, however), and the Emperor of Austria would have ceded the Italian-speaking Trentino to Italy in return for some compensation in Africa or elsewhere.

Those to Ribot were impossible terms, but how much better than the "peace" we have!

The story of Constantine's abdication is amazingly frank. It was pure French Realpolitik.

> The way to satisfy Admiral Jellicoe, justly fearful of inability to supply the troops at Salonica, because of the submarine war, was . . . to seize the railroad from Salonica to Athens via Larissa. That required a Government at Athens on which we could count.

So Constantine had to go. Ribot decided to land French troops and put him out. England objected. Kerensky's Russia objected. Ribot listened, agreed not to use force, and sent Jonnart to do the deed. Jonnart planned to use force; the English heard of it and protested violently to Ribot; Ribot failed to forward the protest but telegraphed Jonnart that he was "sole judge" of what to do—and the French troops, of course, were landed. It was the depth of duplicity as well as the height of bullying. Ribot, proud of it, died honored as one of France's great leaders.

He was, after all, typical of his generation—the post-war-of-1870 generation that made the pre-war-of-1914 and mid-war policies. Clemenceau was his contemporary; Poincaré spiritually belonged to his generation. Of these and of Millerand, Painlevé, Briand, Joffre, Foch, Lloyd George, and Venizelos he gives discriminating and not too friendly portraits. Of the men now coming to the fore in France he knew little; he never noted economic motivation; he thought exclusively in terms of national prestige. The war of 1870 had blighted him—as the war of 1914-18 seems to have blighted the rulers of tomorrow in Germany.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

Industrial Democracy

Representative Government in Industry. By James Meyers. George H. Doran Company. $2.

THIS is an earnest and thoughtful book, but still a somewhat disappointing one. There are in American mills today no less than one thousand plans of employees' representation in actual operation. Mr. Meyers is connected with one of the most successful—the Dutchess Bleachery—and has had ample opportunity to study the technique at first hand. He does not draw heavily on this wealth of operating data, however, but tends rather to give us his philosophy in the historical process, evolution, the psychology of the worker, capitalism, the church, morality, education, and the distribution of income. Not that his philosophy is bad. On the contrary, it seems to me remarkably good. But it has all been said a great many times before by Hobson, Veblen, Bertrand Russell, Tawney, and others. For those who have not read the realistic economists intensively, Mr. Meyers's summary is compact, lucid, and to the point. But for those who have so read them, most of the book is an old story, and the paucity of quantitative data covering the subject in hand is, we must admit, a cause for considerable regret.

Mr. Meyers traces the growth of industrialism, shows how the status of the industrial worker today is a de facto slavery —however much the air may be charged with such words as freedom, liberty, equality, and democracy; and how this de facto slavery breeds a relentless psychological reaction of servility or rebellion. In this impasse—of which every intelligent student of industrial affairs is aware—what is to be done? Mr. Coolidge and his friends say nothing. Mr. Trotzky and his friends say communism. Mr. Cole and his friends say guild socialism. Mr. Meyers says introduce representative government into the factory as it has already been introduced into the political state. And he proceeds to a broad outline of the technique involved, and various odds and ends of cases. The outline commands our attention, but the cases—virgin soil for a new book—are pitifully meager. Four main types of workers' representation are set forth:

1. Plans which allow the shop committee of the workers advisory powers only. Such are hypocritical and largely farcical in that the management has absolute veto.

2. Plans which provide for outside arbitration where men and management cannot agree. This removes much of the hyprocrisy, but places little real responsibility on the workers.

3. Plans where representatives of the workers are placed on the board of directors of the company. This is a commendable gesture, but in a crisis the workers, being in a minority, can always be outvoted on the board.

4. Plans where the company deals directly with the accredited organized trade union of the workers. Here Greek meets Greek, and here is the only possibility of real control and real responsibility. Mr. Meyers hews to the line when he tells us that of the four classes enumerated this is the only one where hope for genuine industrial democracy lies. Paternalism and democracy have nothing in common, and in class four paternalism is completely relinquished.

But beyond this sound classification I have learned little. I should like to be shown that representative government in industry can bring about at least a partial truce on the industrial front, that it does tend to blunt the edge of the struggle between dividends and wages, that it will abate the de facto condition of industrial slavery and its attendant servility and rebellion, and so make life for millions less of a mockery and a torment. But Mr. Meyers, for all his fine analysis of the factors leading up to the present impasse, adduces no conclusive nor yet compelling data, and gives me little more than hopeful dreams. And of the most significant experiment yet undertaken—the Baltimore and Ohio agreement with the machinists' union—the book contains no word.

STUART CHASE

Byron: The Last Phase

Byron: The Last Journey. By Harold Nicolson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

Byron and Greece. By Harold Spender. Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.

MR. NICOLSON justifies his "presumption" in traversing again the ground already explored by so many scholars by remarking upon the new material that has lately become available and upon the "slightly different angle" of approach which he has adopted. He rightly discards the old legend that the poet went to Greece inspired solely by Philhellenic enthusiasms. But that legend was long since discarded by every student of the subject. Byron was bored in Italy, harassed by his ill repute in England, anxious to escape; yet when committed to the Greek cause, he hesitated and procrastinated and went reluctantly. His statesmanship was of no high order, yet instinctively he decided rightly when, after months of waiting in Cephallonia, he elected to join Mavrocordate in Missolonghi rather than throw the weight of his prestige to the side of the government of Eastern Greece. At Missolonghi he experienced a protracted agony of disillusionment, but by choosing to die rather than to follow the advice of friends and escape, "he secured," says Mr. Nicolson, "the liberation of Greece." The confused events after his death amply bear out this assertion.

Mr. Nicolson writes after his kind—the kind of biographers of the "new" school. He is soundly documented; brilliant, entertaining, clever (a little too clever), at ease. Having decided upon his "angle" of approach, he does not hesitate to minimize or to suppress evidence not in line with his point of view. The picture he draws of Byron is amazingly vivid, but it does not show the whole man. The biographer is fundamentally out of sympathy with his subject until the protagonist is on his death-bed—when sympathy suddenly emerges. Throughout the earlier chapters there are persistent faults of taste and temper. Mr. Gamaliel Bradford is the man to write the book which Mr. Nicolson has attempted to compose.

The chief value of Mr. Spender's compilation is that it gathers together all Byron's writings upon Greece. The plan of printing prose and verse vis-a-vis on alternate pages was not a happy one. Mr. Spender's own comments are somewhat jejune. He errs as much upon the side of overenthusiasm as does Mr. Nicholson in the opposite direction. His narrative of the rape of the Elgin marbles is informative but very badly put together. In a group of appendices various Byronic problems, some of them not at all related to his main subject, are discussed. His bibliography is marred by serious blunders.

SAMUEL C. CHEW

Books in Brief

The Happy Traveller. By Frank Tatchell. Henry Holt and Company. $2.25.

Most of the things which the conventional travel guide omits as either undignified or irrelevant will be found in amusing and vivid paragraphs in this volume. The vicar of Midhurst, London, starting with the thesis that travel is the high estate for the young and the poor in purse, proves himself a delightful repository of diverting information, applicable to remote corners of the earth. These pages are filled with detailed and unexpected hints. For instance, "The decay of national costume makes it easy for a man to pass as a native anywhere, at least in Europe." "I take a neck scarf to wear in the country and one rubber collar for the towns." The demarcation between city and country could not be more pithily sketched. Mr. Tatchell tells one what to eat in various countries, and what to drink. He knows a Greek remedy for sunstroke, and an old-fashioned one for cold feet. There are brief conversational guides in many languages, and many hints for walking excursions. The author says that "The Happy Traveller" is a book for poor men, but it is rich in experience.

Come: Let Us Walk Together. By Gabriel Heatter. Brentano's. $1.

It is touching to discover that sporting-goods salesmen still have their inspirational wants supplied in the form of uplift editorials; it is perhaps a little alarming to learn what brand of uplift is on tap. "His Majesty, the American Sportsman" is the keynote, and every transaction involving a tennis racquet or a fishing rod takes on the high glamor of benefaction. "For every dollar a man hands you across the counter . . . you are giving him health, you are restoring happiness, you are leading him back to youth, you are taking him out under the sun, out beside smiling streams and laughing waters." Mr. Heatter writes in the mood of a super-Spalding.

International Relations Section

A Program of Reconciliation

THE executive of the Union of Democratic Control in England has issued the following statement of its views on the Dawes Report and the reparations problem. The present executive of the Union consists of the Right Hon. Lord Acton, Mr. J. A. Hobson, Mr. L. S. Woolf, Mr. H. B. Lees Smith, Hon. Bertrand Russell, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, Mr. E. D. Morel, M. P.; Mrs. Hamilton, Mr. F. J. Shaw, Captain E. N. Bennett, Mr. C. R. Buxton, and Mr. Hamilton Fyfe.

The executive of the U.D.C. has taken into careful consideration the report of the expert committees appointed by the Reparation Commission to examine and consider the means of balancing the budget and the measures to be taken to stabilize the currency of Germany, and, recognizing the limitations of the committees' terms of reference, expresses the hope that the French and German governments will accept the report.

1. In view of the legacy produced by the events of the past five years and which the present British Government inherited when it took office, we approve its adoption of the report, because we feel that the proposals embodied therein offer a possible means of escape from a situation which was rapidly leading to disaster.

2. We hold, however, firmly to the view that the policy and the principles which still find expression even in this report, viz., that further immense sums must continue to be paid, by way of tribute, for an unspecified number of years, to the victorious states in the Great War by the German people, are morally wrong, politically unwise, and economically disastrous.

MORALLY WRONG, (a) because the continued enforcement of such tribute is avowedly based upon the assumption, arbitrarily affirmed, never submitted to impartial investigation, and reduced to absurdity by post-war official disclosures, that prewar Germany was solely responsible for the war; (b) because the overwhelming majority of the present generation in Germany cannot manifestly be considered responsible, in any case, for the events which culminated in the outbreak; (c) because the formal acceptance by Germany of these obligations under the Versailles treaty was obtained under duress and is, therefore, morally invalid.

POLITICALLY UNWISE, because the infliction upon the German people of the moral stigma involved in the assumption of sole guilt, upon which it is sought to justify this tribute, must remain as a rankling sore calculated to hinder the growth of a spirit of peace and good-will, to discourage Germany's application to enter the League of Nations, and, therefore, to prove an obstacle to material and moral disarmament.

ECONOMICALLY DISASTROUS, because the payment of this immense tribute is impracticable, and no stable economic conditions in Europe are possible so long as the attempt to extort it persists.

Therefore, while we consider that, for the reasons already stated, the British Government is justified in giving the recommendations of the report a fair trial, we hold that, should the scheme elaborated in that document break down, no British government should ever again identify itself with a policy which requires the payment by the German people of impossible sums in money and in kind.

We also recommend that there should be an explicit and formal agreement that no separate action shall be taken by any of the signatory governments in the event of another default or failure on the part of Germany.

We urge that the acceptance of the report by the French and German governments should be immediately followed:

(a) By Great Britain renouncing any further share in reparations provided that this renunciation decreases by an equivalent amount the total sum to be paid.

(b) By Great Britain inviting Germany to apply for admission to the League of Nations, and supporting her claim to sit on equal terms with the other great Powers.

We recommend the renunciation, in these circumstances, by Great Britain of any further share in reparations for the following reasons:

1. Because it is the wise and noble tradition of our people, exercised on many occasions in their history, to display generosity toward a worsted foe.

2. Because virtually no sums are now due to this country in reparations by Germany except under the guise of pensions and allowances, the legitimacy of the demand for which, under the terms of the armistice, has long been a matter of the gravest doubt to many Englishmen, irrespective of political views or prejudices.

3. Because, in the ultimate resort, these payments can only be effected in manufactured goods, which form of payment would have the most detrimental results upon our home and foreign trade and upon our employment.

4. Because the enforcement of an annual and enormous tribute upon Germany must necessarily be accompanied by a decline in the general conditions of the German working-class population, with the inevitable effect of lowering still further the standard of life of our own industrial and agricultural classes.

The Communists and the Experts

THE representatives of the Communist Party and the Communist parliamentary groups of Germany and of France, the representatives of the unions and the revolutionary works councils of Germany and of the United Confederation of Labor (extreme left) assembled at Cologne issued the following statements on the Dawes Report, in l'Humanité of June 24:

Plundering capitalism, which killed during the war twenty million workers and peasants, has not succeeded in bringing peace to the world since the conclusion of hostilities. In spite of all the artifices of high finance, in spite of abominable repressions against the class-conscious proletariat, they have not been able to reestablish the equilibrium of the capitalist economic state. Capitalism struggles everywhere in the grip of its final crisis. In that situation it is trying by a new method to lead astray the laboring masses with the hope of procuring a delay before the ultimate collapse.

The experts' report is the expression of a grand scheme intended to concentrate international capital against the proletariat with greater force than ever before. The direction of that enterprise is in the hands of the English and American capitalists—in spite of the financial competition between London and New York. Capitalism in all countries strives toward that goal by assuming a mask of democracy and pacifism. It has removed the representatives of open aggressive politics such as MM. Poincaré and Baldwin; Signor Mussolini assumes a democratic air, and Mr. Coolidge accepts his candidacy with Mr. Dawes, president of the Experts' Commission.

For the moment the capitalists of America, of England, of France, of Italy, not forgetting those of the Reich, try to hide their imperial antagonisms in order finally to be better prepared to master the working masses.

THE COMPLICITY OF THE SOCIAL DEMOCRATS

These miserable maneuvers of the capitalists are generously supported by the Social Democrats and the bureaucratic syndicalists of the Amsterdam International. Mr. MacDonald

Hotel Astor

Times Square ∞ New York

The life of New York, with its ceaseless activity and gay animation, centers in and around the Astor; yet within its guests' rooms you find quiet, seclusion and congenial comfort.

F. A. MUSCHENHEIM

Astor Roof

Dancing during dinner and throughout the evening

Lyman and His Famous California Orchestra.

WHEN THE COURT TAKES A RECESS

A collection of articles on subjects of current interest which both entertains and offers valuable information to the man who would know his City and its problems.

By JUDGE WILLIAM McADOO $2.00 E. P. Dutton & Co.

MARX'S CIVIL WAR IN FRANCE has now for the first time been published in cloth binding: in the same volume is the COMMUNIST MANIFESTO by Marx and Engels. Both are invaluable historical documents. Price 60c. postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

PROGRAM AND MESSAGE
of the International Fraternal Secret Order
of the World Opportunities Society

"Come ye seekers after friendliness and peace, romance and opportunity"

Order, enclosing 25c, from the WOS, P. O. Box 1224, Chicago, Ill.

BRENTANO'S BRENTANO'S

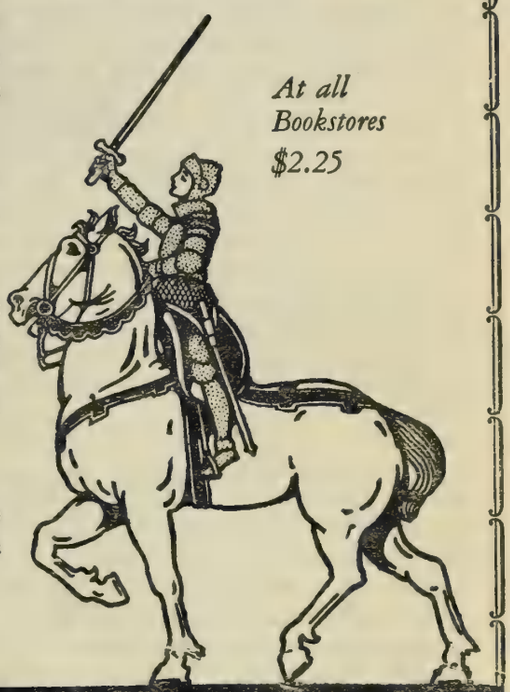
By BERNARD SHAW

Shaw's new play, with its lengthy and provocative preface, is the most important literary work of the season.

Heywood Broun calls it "The finest play written in the English Language in our day."

If, through some unfortunate chance, you are not already a Shavian, obey the impulse and become one at once. "SAINT JOAN" is obtainable at any bookstore.

SAINT JOAN



At all Bookstores
$2.25

BRENTANO'S
Publishers New York

BRENTANO'S BRENTANO'S

DOES YOUR CHILD FAIL TO CONCENTRATE?

This fault is often found in super-gifted children, due to lack of interest in routine work.

Our progressive methods, our small classes, and our understanding teachers enable us to attain unusual success with such children.

A COUNTRY DAY SCHOOL OF THE progressive new education type, WITH SMALL BOARDING DEPARTMENT UNDER IDEAL HOME CONDITIONS FOR YOUNG CHILDREN, IN WASHINGTON'S LOVELIEST SUBURB.

CHEVY CHASE COUNTRY DAY SCHOOL
DEPT. A, CHEVY CHASE, MD.
Stanwood Cobb, Harvard A.M., Director

YOUNG WOMAN—American, Protestant, single, age twenty-eight years, of excellent health; college graduate with business and teaching experience; willing to travel; cultured, tactful and trustworthy. First-class references. Box 232, care the Nation.

THE NATION will be glad to pay the current price, plus postage, for several copies of THE NATION of April 30, 1924. Please communicate with the Circulation Department.

German Books, Etchings
W. BEYER
213 West 43rd Street, New York City

SPEAKERS: We assist in preparing special articles, papers, speeches debates. Expert scholarly service. AUTHOR'S RESEARCH BUREAU, 500 Fifth Avenue, New York.

STEINWAY
THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

The Nation is informed that one Barnet G. Braverman is representing himself in Austria as a correspondent of The Nation. The name is unknown to us. Mr. Braverman has no authority to represent this journal.

BASH BISH LODGE, Copake Falls, N.Y.
A Camp for Adults
IN THE BERKSHIRES
Less than 3 hours' ride from New York
TENNIS, BATHING, DANCING, ETC.
Rates $32.50 per Week—$6 per day
Address RUBENSTEIN & LEIKIN
Bash Bish Lodge Copake Falls, N. Y.
Tel. 31, Ring 4 City tel. Intervale 2667

CAMP UTOPIA
LAKE ELLIS, WINGDALE, N. Y.
A Vacation Ground for Grown-Ups in the Berkshire Hills
120 minutes from Grand Central
WM. J. PERLMAN, Managing Director
DR. WILL DURANT, Associate Director
Telephone Wingdale 10 - F - 4

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
5 MILES ABOVE LAKE GEORGE
An ideal spot for rest and fun
Rates $25 per week. Accommodations limited to 25
Reservations booked to Aug. 15—Open until Oct. 1
An opportunity to spend Indian Summer in the Adirondacks.
Fare for round trip to Lake George, $12.28.
For booklet, address Lena Barish.
Watkins 1281 21 Seventh Ave., N. Y. C.

THE RUSSIAN INN
33 West 37th St., N. Y., near 5th Ave.
LUNCHEON DINNER SUPPER
Unique After Theatre Entertainment
Music and Singers

defends with skill the affairs of the large bourgeoisie of Great Britain; M. Herriot openly leans on M. Blum, and the Italian Social Democrats are at all times ready to throw themselves into the arms of a Mussolini under a democratic mask.

The new government of the left in France plays a most extraordinary comedy before the masses. M. Herriot promised the evacuation of the Ruhr without really wishing it. And the intention of M. Herriot reveals itself plainly in the nomination of General Nollet as Minister of War. The other promise of M. Herriot, assuring to officials the right of coalition, is already revealed in all its nullity. . . . And the same comedy is being played at the same time by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald before the English proletariat.

The Effect of the Plan on the German Workers

The experts' report will have as its first result the making of Germany into a colony of international capital, and the German capitalists are invited to become the slave-drivers of the German proletariat. The realization of the experts' plan means for the German proletariat a new reduction of wages, a working day of ten to twelve hours, the rise in price of all the necessities of life by the increase of indirect taxation and custom duties, and enslavement by the combined forces of the republic of Herr Ebert and the creditor states.

The execution of the experts' report imposes on the German proletariat an increase of the fiscal charges to two billion and a half gold marks. For some time the feeble and transient improvement of the standard of living of the German proletariat has been offset by the pernicious effects of the Micum agreements and the mass unemployment which recommenced at that time.

The Effect on the French Workers

The effect of the experts' plan on the French proletariat will be identical. Anglo-Saxon capital will reduce France to the same slavery in which Germany is at present. The action of Mr. Morgan to stabilize the franc was to begin with very dangerous. The same international trust will operate the factories and works which use the cheapest and most oppressed labor, therefore those of Germany. And the proletariat of France, of Belgium, of England will have to choose between two things: either unprecedented unemployment, or a reduction in the standard of living of the German working class, by reduction of wages, loss of the eight-hour day, etc.

The entente of international capital revealed by the experts' plan will not last. The antagonisms between the two capitalist groups will destroy that hypocritical alliance. As a consequence the plan of the experts does not assure the peace of the world; on the contrary, it heralds new imperialistic and international conflicts.

It is the duty of the internationally conscious working class to lead a united fight against this scheme of world capital; and in that fight the Communist parties of all countries find at their side the works councils and the revolutionary unions. . . .

In Germany as in France it is necessary to break the domination of capital by fighting for working-class control of production. That fight should be led by the masses of the workers, the employees, the officials, in close cooperation with the works councils.

As to the scheme of the experts to hand over to private capital the German railways, till now property of the state, we demand instead in France as in Germany the nationalization of the railways, of the post and telegraph, etc., and of their administration by the workers and the officials. The fight of the railway men against capitalist exploitation, such as has already developed in Germany and in France, is one of the most important tasks at present.

As to the scheme of the experts to hand over the central banks to international capital we shall, in Germany as in France, demand rather nationalization of all banking institutions.

The experts propose by the system of obligations imposed on German industry to build themselves into a single international trust. To counter that project we propose, in Germany and in France, the nationalization of all the essential industries —mines, metallurgy, textiles, chemical products, etc.

As to the project of the experts to complete the system of indirect taxes to the detriment of the working masses we propose, in Germany as in France, the abolition of all such taxes, the suppression of the infamous tax on wages, and the confiscation of all the capitalist fortunes. . . .

As the whip of the experts stimulates German economic life toward increased production, the flow of German merchandise into the international markets will provoke the greatest competition among the victor states and will cause damage. All the past attempts to execute the Treaty of Versailles, that infamous scheme of plundering capitalism, have only tended to augment the confusion in international economics and the misery of the laboring masses in all countries. . . .

And those who are suffering are the workers of all countries including the victor countries; for the capitalists always know how to unload on the shoulders of the workers the debts of the war. The scandalous enrichment of the French capitalists through the reconstruction of the devastated regions of the north of France emphasizes this fact. The French capitalists who are as responsible for the war as the German capitalists have no right to claim reparations of German workers.

All resistance to the reduction of wages and the increased cost of living, all resistance to the acts of capitalist violence in Germany and in France is at the same time a blow against the plan of the experts.

Down with the capitalist pirates gathered in Europe!

Down with their acolytes, the Social Democrats!

Long live the revolutionary workers of Germany and France!

Long live the Third International!

Long live the accession of the soviet republics of Europe!

Contributors to This Issue

Louis Fischer is The Nation's correspondent in Moscow.

Edwin Muir, poet and essayist, has been assistant editor of the New Age (London) as well as dramatic critic for the Scotsman and the Athenaeum. He was a frequent contributor to the Freeman. At present he is in Prague, at work on a series of essays, a novel, and a volume of poetry.

Emily Clark, editor of the Reviewer, is one of a group of young Richmond writers who founded that magazine.

Harry Hansen is literary editor of the Chicago Daily News.

Samuel C. Chew, the foremost Byron scholar in this country, has just published a new book, "Byron in England."

MT. AIRY, (Near Harmon-on-Hudson)
A new colony for liberals and radicals. 54 minutes from Grand Central station; frequent expresses. Property a mile from Croton Lake, two miles from station, three miles to the beach. ¼ acre of high, dry and well wooded land (equal to 4 city lots of 25 x 100 ft. each) $150 to $400. Address Harry Kelly, No. 70 Fifth Ave., Room 411, for circular. Office hours 2:30 to 6 P.M. daily except Saturday. Saturday 11 A.M. to 2 P.M.

THE CALIFORNIA SCHOOL OF GARDENING FOR WOMEN
Offers a two years course in practical gardening, including the propagation and care of flowers, shrubs, fruit and vegetables, the laying out and management of small gardens as well as large estates.
At Hayward, California (one hour by train or motor from San Francisco). Principal: Miss J. Walrond-Skinner, N. D., Hort., F. R. H. S.
Tuition $250. Term begins Jan. 15, 1925. Only six students will be taken the first year. Write for information now and make application to the Principal, Hayward, California.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 13, 1924 No. 3084

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 153
EDITORIALS:
Sword-Rattling 155
The Tariff-Commission Scandal 156
As Students See It 156
Conrad and His Fame 157
LA FOLLETTE IN WISCONSIN. By Arthur Warner 158
WISCONSIN AND SOCIALISM. By William Hard 160
THE BURIED PAST OF GREENLAND. By Poul Nörlund 161
BAKING YOUR OWN BREAD. By J. P. Warbasse 163
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 165
CORRESPONDENCE 165
IF SOME GRIM TRAGEDY. By Ninna May Smith 167
BOOKS:
The Value of Personality. By H. A. Overstreet 167
A Spanish Woman Novelist. By Eliseo Vivas 168
Some Essayists. By Johan J. Smertenko 168
Tant' Alie. By Ruth S. Alexander 169
Euphues His English. By Gerald Hewes Carson 169
Exploiting Jefferson. By Lewis Browne 170
Before Sudermann Found Himself. By Roy Temple House 170
Books in Brief 170
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Get Rich Quick in Poland. By Anna Louise Strong 171
A Letter by Matteotti 172

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor IRITA VAN DOREN, Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

INDORSEMENT OF LA FOLLETTE AND WHEELER by the American Federation of Labor means more than appears in the cautious words of the Federation's statement. It means that the Old Guard in the Federation is weakening. The younger forces in the ranks, including the leaders of half a dozen of the largest unions, demanded support of the third-party ticket, and, despite a veil of traditional phrases, they got it. Labor has officially indorsed the new party's leaders and its platform (with a mild and obscure reservation on international affairs). The Old Guard was strong enough to reiterate the historic policy of the Federation not to support any political party as such—but where is the difference if the Federation can denounce both old parties and support the program and candidates of the new? When the Federation meets at El Paso after the election there will be time enough to discuss further the question of a labor party for America. Meanwhile the most conservative labor body in the world has gone on record that "Mr. La Follette and Mr. Wheeler have throughout their whole political careers stood steadfast in the defense of the rights and interests of the wage-earners and farmers" and will put the force of its organization behind the effort to make its three million members active workers for La Follette.

FIVE MEXICANS are killed every month in the United States—at least that is the average of a six-year record. Mexico has not therefore broken diplomatic relations, demanded apologies and indemnities, or filled the front pages with scare headlines. Mexico is small and weak, and we are large and strong. So whenever one American or Englishman is killed in Mexico we are faced by an "international incident." The recent murder of Mrs. Evans, the Texan widow of an Englishman whose spirited —and violent—defense of her ranch against nationalization was at the bottom of the British-Mexican incident of a few weeks ago, ought not to create more international excitement than the death of a Polish miner at the hands of a Pennsylvania mine guard.

EUROPE HAS DECLARED PEACE—that seems to be the momentous outcome of the London Conference. It may really be a momentous outcome despite the discouraging record of successive peace declarations which have come out of Europe since the peaceless Peace of Versailles was signed more than five years ago. For this time peace exists not merely in the ink on the documents but in the hearts of the men who hold the pens. That is the achievement of Ramsay MacDonald. He has been more eager to create a pacific atmosphere in Europe than to win a political advantage at home, and his patient effort has gone far to do away with the hate and distrust which have made the previous peace formulas mere scraps of paper. It still remains true that good intentions are not enough, and it is possible that, in his desire to calm French opinion, Mr. MacDonald and the Americans who have worked with him have gone further along the path of compromise than will prove wise. The program which emerges is a Dawes Plan made more stringent to please the French, and the original Dawes Plan was harsh enough. The revised plan, while providing a number of intermediate stages, leaves the French with a final possibility of independent action. This, in view of the fact that many experts consider the Dawes schedules of payments beyond Germany's real capacity, may prove serious. The bankers, however, profess themselves satisfied with the safeguards provided, and the stage is set for application of the plan.

AMERICA'S PART IN EUROPE'S AFFAIRS promises to be increasingly large. The plan upon which Europe will work is known as the Dawes Plan, after the American chairman of the international commission which devised it; an American will sit, "unofficially" but none the less effectively, on the Reparation Commission when it adjudges default; an American will, again "unofficially," be the Agent General of Reparations, and another will be trustee of the holders of the German loan bonds; and these two will sit on the powerful Transfer Committee, which will decide how much cash reparations will be paid to the Allies. Essentially, Americans will become the umpires of Europe. The Americans chosen will be big-business men, with the abilities and narrownesses of the type, and their action will be an acid test of the international statesmanship which American business life can produce. They will act not as official agents of our Government, speaking as representatives of our national interests, but as private citizens, with the good-will and cooperation of our Government but in no sense committing it by their actions. They will be trusted because it is believed that Americans have an aloofness and impartiality which those who have been plunged into the maelstrom of European politics must have lost. And thereby our "return to Europe" is itself a vindication of the aloofness from Europe's politics which has been our policy since the Senate rejected the Treaty of Versailles.

WHILE MACDONALD AND HERRIOT were conferring in London troubles were accumulating behind their backs. The shadow of Poincaré has overcast Herriot's mind ever since he took office, and neither on the Ruhr nor on domestic questions such as the amnesty law has he acted as a free man. MacDonald has imperial worries. The Sudan question has stirred Egyptian opinion as it has not been stirred since peace-conference days, and Premier Zaghlul is on his way to London to seek an understanding. Egypt, which has provided and paid for the bulk of the army which has kept the Sudan quiet, is not satisfied with the present status of the "condominium" in which she shares the name but not the reality of rule. For England the Cape-to-Cairo route is at stake, and with it a measure of imperial prestige; there is the usual white-man's-burden claim of solicitude for the natives; and the British capitalists who have invested in cotton developments dependent upon the new irrigation projects are of course active. Still nearer home Ireland is demanding action in fulfilment of the treaty. This treaty called for a boundary commission to adjust the Ulster frontier, but Ulster, defiant as ever, will not even appoint a member of such a commission. Ulster did not sign the treaty and has a technical point in its favor; but the honor of three British governments—one led by a Liberal, one by a Tory, and one by a Laborite—is pledged to execution of the treaty. It is a hard nut to crack; and unless MacDonald finds some way to crack it civil war is likely to return to Ireland.

JUST BEFORE ITS SUMMER RECESS the United States Supreme Court handed down a significant opinion clarifying its previous rulings in regard to labor unions and the Sherman Anti-Trust Law. In the Coronado Coal Company case the Supreme Court had decided that a labor union could be sued as such, but it held that the particular strike involved in that case was not in restraint of trade because the output of the mines affected was so small as not to influence prices in interstate competition. The court did not make it clear, however, whether the strike would have been held a violation of the Sherman law if the output of the mines had been greater. This zone of doubt has now been clarified. In the case of United Leather Workers vs. Herkert Meisel Trunk Co., decided on June 9, the court ruled that a strike, even when attended by an illegal picketing campaign, would not be held to be a violation of the anti-trust law unless it appeared that the strikers intended not only to curtail the production of articles destined for interstate commerce but also to monopolize the supply of the product or to control its price or to discriminate between its would-be purchasers.

THE MERE FACT OF A STRIKE for increased wages or more desirable working conditions seemed to the court too remote from the stream of interstate commerce to be considered an intent to violate the Sherman law. This decision is further fortified by the court's reference to the Coronado case as having by implication decided the same question. For years it has been the aim of those who have ably and industriously attempted to apply the Sherman law against labor unions to persuade the Supreme Court to declare illegal any substantial labor-union activity curtailing production in a business the product of which subsequently entered interstate trade. This latest decision of the Supreme Court (Chief Justice Taft wrote the opinion) seems definitely to close the door to that attempt. In late years labor unions have received substantial setbacks at the hands of the Supreme Court; fortunately there seems to be a limit.

HEAVEN BE PRAISED that civilization leaves the cramped and exploited American Negroes their precious gift of pageantry! The Universal African Legion, the Universal Police, and the Royal African Guards of Marcus Garvey's parade in New York last week may be porters and elevator boys in daily life, but they look like potentates. The strictly Nordic shoe clerks and realtors of the Loyal Order of Moose, by contrast, who solemnly sidled up Fifth Avenue the same week in many military kinds of uniforms, looked like a legion of porters and elevator operators. Universal Negro Improvers march and play band instruments better than the loyal Moose ever will. On the platform of Carnegie Hall the colored men wear more gorgeous academic hoods than even the hypothetical winner of H. L. Mencken's contest in university degrees. Garvey's own red and green cockade is an important symbol to followers of this man who combines imposture so incomprehensibly with conviction. One pictures him and his band, when they have completed the conquest of Africa of which they dream, patronizing their primitive cousins intolerably. Much as one admires the ingenious ethnology of their demonstration that Jesus had Negro blood, it is hard not to regret that they have kept the white man's god in all but color.

NINE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-EIGHT YEARS before the American fliers hopped off from Iceland for the inhospitable shores of Greenland, Eric the Red, father of Leif Ericson, set out on the same route. For the American fliers it is a trip of a few hours; Eric the Red sailed in his open viking ship for days and weeks. The Americans had compasses and maps; Eric had neither, and no destroyers patrolled the sea to save him and his comrades from mishap. Of the twenty-five ships with which he set sail only fourteen ever saw the shores of Greenland. Greenland then was probably a greener, gentler country than today, as Poul Nörlund tells in his amazing story of Greenland's Buried Past (printed elsewhere in this issue), but it was a stern enough venture to set out from the hot springs of Iceland for a country which even at its warmest never supported a man-size tree. The civilization which Eric founded there lasted five centuries—longer than our post-Columbian culture on this continent—and then faded out as the little brown Eskimos advanced southward and the Norse ships ceased coming. But if those heroes whose bones the Danish archaeologists are only today dislodging from the frozen soil of Greenland could wake to see the airmen drop down into Greenland's harbors, doubtless they would toss back their viking locks and cry, "Skoal, brothers!"

Sword-Rattling

PLAYING with soldiers is a poor sport, for children or for grown-ups. It is a particularly dangerous sport for the responsible heads of nations. "Mobilization days" and "defense tests" are a kind of playing with soldiers. It does not matter very much whether civilians are called away from their pacific occupations or whether the show is confined to the professional soldiers and the semi-soldiers who spend their vacations in training camps—the reserve officers, national guardsmen, and such; the business of parading uniforms and guns, emphasis on the fact that we have the greatest potential military strength of any nation on earth, is bad business. It ought to be stopped, and we believe that the common-sense of the American people, stirred by the outspoken protests of Governors Baxter, Bryan, Sweet, and Blaine, will put an end to it.

There are indications that official Washington is already beginning to back water. President Coolidge himself, although he has made himself official sponsor for the "defense test," eagerly claimed that it was not a "mobilization." His letter to Frederick Libby, of the National Council for the Prevention of War, in fact, makes that point three times. The letter showed, to be sure, only that President Coolidge did not know what was in the minds and official publications of his own military advisers. The War Department junkers, as Mr. Libby's reply showed, wanted a "test mobilization"; they hoped, on September 12, to give a triumphant display of the military forces of this nation. They intended to call the militia out of offices and factories, and, wherever possible, to assemble civilian volunteer units. Three days after the President's letter, when the War Department issued its official order to the corps area commanders, it still stated:

> It is the intention primarily to have a test mobilization of all active units of the Regular Army, all units of the National Guard, and the organized reserves. . . . The event will not only provide instruction for persons in the military service, but will also afford opportunity for patriotic assemblies, parades of local units of the army, State guards and constabularies, civic and veteran societies, reserve officers' training corps, schools, etc., accordingly as may be developed in each locality. . . . Subject to certain modifications . . . the test mobilization will be conducted in accordance with the prescribed regulations governing the mobilization of man-power for military purposes and basic plan, War Department mobilization, 1923.

That order impressively reveals, beyond any question, the intention of the War Department to have a mobilization.

What is a mobilization? We have just had an impressive reminder. Ten years ago Europe mobilized, and from the moment of its mobilization war was inevitable. Of course the War Department's play with soldiers in September, 1924, will have no such dread effects as the Czar's general mobilization order in July, 1914. But Europe, still bleeding from the consequences of those mobilizations of ten years ago, can only interpret our war-games in the light of the war-games with which its military leaders—prattling of peace then as fluently as our Mr. Weeks and our generals today—developed Europe's readiness for war in the decades preceding the cataclysm. Is America so ready to follow our example, Europe must ask. Konrad von Hoetzendorff, commander-in-chief of Austria's armies in the war, has already hailed the omen.

What does Mobilization Day mean if it does not mean a desire to excite the American people and make them readier for military enterprises? Secretary Hughes did not have this day in mind, but his words were significant, when he said before the National Institute of Social Sciences last May:

> In respect to our international relations it is important that we should appreciate the fortunate position we hold and govern our conduct accordingly. . . . So far as we can see into the future we are safe from the slightest danger of aggression. . . . We know that in no Power or possible combination of Powers lies any menace to our security. . . . There is no occasion to indicate our proper authority, for no one challenges it. There is no reason to demonstrate our ability to take care of ourselves, for no one doubts it.

No, this is no time for such a show as the War Department proposes. It is, as John W. Davis says, "a time when every energy should be bent to getting the world back to peace and to work, calming the prejudices and passions growing out of the World War and encouraging fruitful trade and commerce." It is, as Governor Blaine, La Follette's lieutenant in Wisconsin, says, "a time when all people of the civilized nations of the world are demanding a reduction in armaments both on land and on sea," and at such a time Governor Blaine is indisputably right in insisting that "it is inadvisable for the American Government through propaganda and demonstration to stimulate a national military movement." To utilize a day which is almost the anniversary of the Battle of the Marne for a nation-wide military show is a blow at the heart of America and at the heart of the world.

We need appeasement. We need lessons in peace rather than war. We emphatically do not need such hysterical suggestions as are put out in the military propaganda:

> An enemy is coming. Scout aviators report huge air transports, giant planes bigger than anything conceived of today, preparing to hop off from foreign shores with thousands of men and tons of ammunition and arms.

This is a time for propaganda for disarmament, not for armament. There is work enough to be done in Washington if we had there an administration which really had peace as its goal. Eight years ago, on July 19, 1916, Robert La Follette stood up in the Senate of the United States and spoke these words, which ring as true today as in those days before we abandoned our neutrality and attempted to settle the problems of the world by force, by a mobilization which was more than a test mobilization. La Follette said then (and he stands for the same things now):

> Let us prepare the manhood and the womanhood of our country for the struggles of peace: more compensation for the industrial soldiers who fall by the wayside by reason of the hazards of their occupations; more compensation to their widows and children; pensions for the aged and infirm who have failed in the struggle of life to gain a pittance against old age or misfortune; more wages; more education; more money for the common good; more money to fight contagious diseases. This is the preparedness toward which we should turn. We should spend less to prepare to kill and more to prepare to live.

The Tariff-Commission Scandal

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE has done well to call attention to the scandalous condition of affairs in the Tariff Commission so far as the sugar report is concerned, and we trust that Mr. Davis also will help during the campaign to rouse the public to the way that body has been controlled or blocked by representatives of the interests affected by the tariff graft. The commission has been hamstrung for months; its personnel is evenly divided between those who believe that public office is a public trust and those who think that they are on the commission in order to serve private interests; several of the latter are obviously disqualified to sit in important matters because they or their families have a financial stake in the tariff schedules under study; and although this situation has been known to President Coolidge since he has been in the White House—he has repeatedly been approached about it by party leaders and business men—he has had neither the courage nor the rectitude to deal with the scandal. More than that, every effort is being made to get rid of the excellent chairman of the commission, Mr. W. S. Culbertson (the latest suggestion being that he be "kicked upstairs" into the Mexican Embassy), in order that his sense of duty and simple honesty shall not stand in the way of the interests, notably the sugar interests.

We confess to a temptation to say "we told you so"; we pointed out when it was constituted that the Tariff Commission could and would come to nothing, and that the protected interests which have for so long owned the Republican Party and a good part of the Democratic were content with this device only because they felt sure that they could control it. Indeed, while ostensibly agreeing to the proposal that this new body should have the power to reduce as well as to raise tariff rates, their real idea was, we believe, to use it to get more tariff graft for themselves without the bother, difficulty, and danger of going to Congress for it. So far they have been eminently justified in their confidence, for in the two years that have elapsed since the Fordney tariff went into effect the commission has lowered just one rate, which affected the cost of living not of human beings but of certain horned cattle!

Although a program of basic inquiries into some of the important schedules was laid out by the commission virtually nothing has been done to carry it out. Only in the matter of sugar has there been any threat to the tariff privileged, and thus far that industry has succeeded in warding off action. This has been chiefly due to the fact that President Harding appointed to the commission three interested men. One, Mr. Marvin, was secretary to the notorious Home Market Club in Boston and is utterly opposed to reduction of any schedule whatever. Another, Mr. Burgess, was an officer of the United States Pottery Association and had served as the recognized lobbyist for that industry when the tariff bills of 1909, 1913, and 1919 were drawn. The pottery industry enjoys a 70 per cent duty. Not unnaturally, when the commission voted a year ago for a preliminary inquiry into conditions in the chinaware and pottery trades, Mr. Burgess voted against the proposal. The third member appointed by President Harding, Mr. Grassie, is related by marriage to the great Louisiana sugar family of Caffery. The latter fact moved Congress at its last session to suspend the salary of Mr. Grassie if he sat in connection with sugar. For weeks it has been known that the sugar inquiry ordered by the commission has been completed. One word from Calvin Coolidge would have given it to the public, but that one word has not been spoken. Indeed as the term of one of the unbiased members of the commission has expired there is much eagerness to see whether our Chief Executive will reappoint him or give his job to some other henchman of the protected interests.

Since the passage of the Fordney-McCumber tariff the commission has been asked to act upon the rates on 168 different commodities. Of these applications, twelve have been denied any investigation, sixty-two are "pending," which means that nothing has been done about them although the list includes the most vital commodities. In twenty cases informal inquiries were undertaken and then suspended; fifteen cases were not investigated because, although the article was protected, there was no production of it in this country—a magnificent swindle on the public! William Hard declares that of the remaining commodities fifty-nine are shelved and forty-six are under investigation, only three final reports being ready in addition to that on sugar. Such is the result of the determination to "regulate" the tariff by "scientific inquiry" and scientific adjustment to the country's needs.

All of which is additional proof of the curse the tariff lays upon the whole country; the only way to end the graft and scandal is to break down the whole tariff structure. That will come to pass in due time as it should have years ago; there can be no such freedom for the American citizen as Mr. La Follette calls for until the tariff is rooted out. It remains the greatest source of corruption in our national life and the chief citadel of privilege and of corrupt big business.

As Students See It

EDUCATION, it has been said, is about the only thing that we pay for and then try to get as little of as possible. If this is true—and, largely, it is—there must be something wrong with our methods, because an appetite for knowledge is as general in all normal youth as an appetite for food. Appreciation of this is leading to a vast pother in our day on the subject of education, some aspects of which have been considered in Agnes de Lima's articles in The Nation. Naturally most of the new ideas in regard to education emanate from teachers and other persons professionally concerned with the subject. Our attention has been called to some suggestions coming from the victims themselves—dealing, to be sure, with the later stages of the process. The president of Dartmouth College, after appointing a faculty committee to report on advisable changes in educational policy and method, had the happy thought to get a similar report from students. He asked twelve undergraduates to make a serious study of the subject, arranging to let the work count as the equivalent of one college course.

The students, in their conclusions in regard to methods of instruction, begin thus:

> The chief indictment against the present method of teaching is that the student is forced into a passive rather than an active attitude. The criterion of passing is his ability to absorb, retain, and regurgitate on the proper occasions about 50 per cent of the information the instructor sees fit to include in his course, together with the latter's > supposedly authoritative commentary thereon. The student is pitifully dependent upon the instructor for information or for directions as to how to get it. . . . Is the culture and intellectual interest of college graduates meager? Do they forget and lose interest in the things they encountered in college? If so, is it not because they were spoon-fed there, and now that the manipulator of the spoon is no longer present they go hungry, never having been shown how to open the cupboards in the pantry nor even the location of the pantry itself?

In suggesting changes the student critics at Dartmouth begin with a drastic recommendation for the virtual abolition of lectures, which have "degenerated into an attempt at mass education, and the classroom, which has tended to become an arena for academic inquisitions and student bluffings."

> In order to make the acquisition of the necessary information the concern of the student rather than of the instructor, lectures would be almost entirely abandoned. It is more desirable that the student should dig out his information from books than that he should take in a professorially predigested account of it. An exception may be made in courses where demonstrations and experiments by the lecturer are of particular value and assistance, as, for example, in physics. Attendance at such lectures should be voluntary; the lectures should be offered to the students to make clear things that would otherwise be difficult to understand. If they prove helpful, the students will attend. Another exception may be made in the case of instructors who, by their grasp of the subject and their personality, can make lectures illuminating and inspiring. By all means let them lecture, bringing their personal point of view to bear on subjects already familiar to the students through their reading in the course. Here, also, attendance should be voluntary.

In place of lectures there would be assignments by topic or question, to be the work of a week or more.

> In some few cases it might be necessary to tell the student just what and how much to read in preparation, but more often the instructor would merely designate, in general, available sources of material and let the student select from them what and how much he will. This will mean more work for the student and probably some confusion at times, but he will learn to choose for himself in the matter of reading. It will turn his attention to the topic as such and away from an assignment of so many pages.

In regard to classes, the students recommend small groups—five to ten each—meeting once a week for discussion with the instructor. They also suggest certain regular office hours for instructors when students might consult them, and they advocate written work in the form of short assigned papers.

Dartmouth's student critics say of the existing method of testing students through daily quizzes and frequent hour examinations that it "fails miserably in its purpose in most cases and succeeds only moderately well in others." The daily quiz, the students declare, is a check but a hopelessly inadequate one except in elementary science courses, and it "puts a premium on superficiality or the ability to memorize and retain irrelevant material for a few short hours." In place of the daily quiz a program of periodic papers of an exhaustive nature is recommended.

We shall wait with interest to learn what teachers think of these suggestions. To us they seem as hopeful as any that have appeared.

Conrad and His Fame

JOSEPH CONRAD had the rare good fortune to please many classes and, as a result, when he died in England on August 3 the measure of his fame was probably fuller than that of any other writer of the English language except Rudyard Kipling. Others had achieved at least an equal measure of critical approval, and still others had sold their works in greater numbers, but only in the author of "The Jungle Book" and "Gunga Din" was equal popularity combined with an equal weight of critical approval. People to whom Hardy would have been dull had they ever read him and Shaw completely incomprehensible devoured Conrad with delight. Nor had, apparently, his fame reached its peak. He had just returned from a trip to America where he had been greeted like a conquering hero and his latest novel, though one of his least distinguished, had been treated as an assured best seller.

The secret lay, perhaps, in the multiplicity of his qualities. We speak sometimes of the one touch of nature or of some other trait which is supposed to enlist the interest of all mankind. But when all unite to admire the same work it is usually true that the poet and the peasant pay honor to the same author not because they see the same thing but because they see two different things. So it was with Conrad. It is true that the sea has a universal charm and that he treated this age-old charm in a peculiarly modern manner. But while the critics admired him for the subtlety of his style and for the color of the darkly brooding spirit there revealed, his great popular audience found in him simpler things—adventure, the appeal to racial solidarity, red blood—so that to some, it may be said, he was not much more than a fellow to Jack London, or even Robert W. Service.

Fortunately for him his qualities as a writer and the convictions of his mind nowhere came into open conflict with the ideals of his time. He may have been, as Mr. Mencken makes him out, a fit companion in his pessimism for Theodore Dreiser and it may be that

> In the midst of the hysterical splutterings and battle-cries of the Kiplings and the Chestertons, the booming pedagogics of the Wellses and the Shaws, and the smirking key-holes of the Bennetts and the de Morgans, he stands apart and almost alone, observing the sardonic comedy of man with an eye that sees every point and significance of it, but vouchsafing none of that sophomoric indignation, that Hyde Park wisdom, that flabby moralizing which freight and swamp the modern English novel.

But the fact is not so obvious as to prevent Mr. Phelps from leading his little flock to Conrad because his books "are based on the axiom of the moral law." And at least the great public could read him as it could not read Hardy or Shaw or Anatole France and get something from him without disturbing either its optimism or its moral ideas. It was his fortune either that he had no quarrel with his generation, or at least that the generation did not know that he had. Probably his name will go down as one of the important writers of our generation, but it is not likely that he will retain the preeminence which he holds in the minds of the great masses of readers. For though he outdistanced in popular estimation certain other great figures, it was not because of enduring artistry.

La Follette in Wisconsin

By ARTHUR WARNER

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE began his political career with a fight against the local Republican boss. He has been fighting bosses ever since, until forty-five years later finds him fighting all the bosses of both the Republican and the Democratic parties in his candidacy for President of the United States.

In 1880 he was twenty-five years old, recently graduated from the University of Wisconsin, just admitted to the bar, and penniless. He had a mother and sister to support, and was engaged to be married. The job of district attorney of Dane County—paying $800 a year and $50 for expenses—looked good to him. So he went out among the farmers, asking for their votes and never imagining that anything else was necessary. He had not gone far before he was asked to call upon the Republican county boss. The boss told him who the next district attorney would be. The name did not begin with "L."

"I intend," replied the young man, "to go on with this canvass; and I intend to be elected district attorney of Dane County."

He was.

Four years later he decided to run for Congress, and again went out to talk with the farmers. Again he was called to account by the bosses.

"Don't you know," he was told, "that there hasn't been a Congressman nominated for fifteen years who hasn't had our support?"

"I know of no reason why I should consult you," replied La Follette. "I've been out in the country consulting the people, and I'm going to consult a good many more."

"Well, young man, you can't go to Congress."

"I think I can."

He did.

Characteristically, he went even before his term began. The Congress to which he had been elected did not meet until December, 1885. La Follette went to Washington in the January previous, and attended the sessions of the closing Congress regularly in order to learn the ropes. Senator Sawyer, then the chief power of Wisconsin in Congress, took a fancy to the young man and asked him upon what committee he would like to serve. La Follette wanted to make use of his legal training, and named the Committee on Public Lands, explaining that many land-grant forfeitures were pending which he would like to tackle. Senator Sawyer replied that he would fix it with Speaker Carlisle (although the latter was a Democrat), and La Follette said no more. But when the committees were announced La Follette found himself assigned to the Committee on Indian Affairs! He had, it seems, expressed too much interest in land-grant forfeitures. And, besides, Senator Sawyer had a bill coming up presently which he wanted to have favorably disposed of by the Committee on Indian Affairs. Unfortunately for the Senator's plans (he was in the lumber business) La Follette decided that the bill was intended to facilitate stealing timber from the Indians, and ought not to be passed. He was successful in blocking it.

A little later, in spite of strong pressure by Senator Sawyer, the young Congressman headed off a land-grab bill intended to benefit Wisconsin railroads, and in his second term he further outraged his would-be mentor by refusing to vote for the Nicaraguan canal bill. This was a measure that Democratic as well as Republican henchmen were working for, both parties having been promised a campaign gift of $100,000 if they put the bill across. Harry F. Sinclair did not originate the idea of subsidizing both parties when he gave to the Harding campaign fund with his right hand and to that of Cox with his left.

In spite of La Follette's obstinate honesty, Senator Sawyer remained friendly to him until, after six years in the House, La Follette lost his seat in a Democratic victory and went back to his law practice. Then Senator Sawyer—as La Follette insists—tried to bribe him to use his influence with a judge who was his brother-in-law. The controversy came into the newspapers, and La Follette was bitterly assailed in party circles for besmirching a man of Senator Sawyer's prominence. The incident probably settled La Follette's future, for the political and even personal ostracism that followed led the young man to question the whole structure of party government as it was then builded, and in 1894 he and his friends came out squarely against the Republican State machine. They were beaten back that year, again in 1896, and still another time in 1898—chiefly by the unabashed corruption of delegates at the conventions. But the reform forces did not bolt the party, nor did they run up a white flag. "I didn't have one," said La Follette in commenting on these events later.

La Follette was campaigning indefatigably in those days, in season and out, hammering home his ideas of a more just and democratic political philosophy. An instance of his courage and presence of mind occurred when he was talking from a farm wagon at a fair in Oshkosh. His opponents were there too. He had barely got into his speech when the bell for starting the horse races began to ring and boys rushed through the crowd shouting:

"Score cards for sale! Score cards for sale!"

Roosevelt on La Follette

Thanks to the movement for genuinely democratic government which Senator La Follette led to overwhelming victory in Wisconsin, that State has become literally a laboratory for wise experimental legislation, aiming to secure the social and political betterment of the people as a whole.

Wilson on La Follette

I have sometimes thought of Senator La Follette climbing the mountain of privilege . . . taunted, laughed at, called back, going steadfastly on and not allowing himself to be deflected for a single moment, for fear he also should hearken and lose all his power to serve the great interests to which he had devoted himself. I love these lonely figures climbing this ugly mountain of privilege. . . . I am sorry for my own part that I did not come in when they were fewer.

The horses started down the track and the audience scrambled to get out of their way. At once La Follette had the wagon in which he was standing driven out upon the track. Addressing the judges' stand, he announced:

"I am here by invitation, and I propose to finish this address. If interrupted again, I shall talk all afternoon to the exclusion of any other program."

About that time La Follette had come to the conclusion that the only way to down the bosses was through direct nominations in the primary elections. No State had a direct-primary law then that amounted to anything or included all elective officers. La Follette began to propagandize for the novel scheme through speeches and pamphlets, and presently he and some associates found means to buy a country weekly of which John M. Nelson, now Representative in Congress and manager of the present Progressive campaign, was made the editor. It set forth the following program:

> Protection for the products of the factory and the farm.
>
> Sound money, a dollar's worth of dollar.
>
> Reciprocity in trade.
>
> Adequate revenues for State and nation.
>
> Equal and just taxation of all the property of each individual and every corporation transacting business within the State.
>
> Abolish caucuses and conventions. Nominate candidates by Australian ballot at a primary election.
>
> Enact and enforce laws to punish bribery in every form by the lobby in the legislature and wherever it assails the integrity of the public service.
>
> Prohibit the acceptance by public officials of railroad passes, sleeping-car passes, express, telegraph, and telephone franks.
>
> Enact and enforce laws making character and competency the requisite for service in our penal and charitable institutions.
>
> Enact and enforce laws that will prohibit corrupt practices in campaigns and elections.
>
> An economical administration of public affairs, reducing expenditures to a business basis.

This platform is illuminating of conditions a quarter of a century ago when direct, open corruption in politics was commoner than today and the railroads were the great manipulators of public policies. The great industrial corporations of our day had not yet come into existence, nor centralized financial control through a few powerful banks. La Follette proposed to attack party corruption through direct primaries and to assail railroad privilege through laws taxing the companies upon the full physical value of their properties—like all other interests—instead of following the scandalously inadequate and discriminatory methods then in vogue whereby farmers, manufacturers, and home owners were paying 1.19 per cent of the market value of their property in taxes while railroads paid only .53 per cent of their market value—based on their stocks and bonds. The campaign of 1900 was fought chiefly upon direct primaries and railroad taxation, and—at last—the new political forces won. La Follette became Governor on January 1, 1901.

It was a great victory, placing La Follette in the seats of the mighty just as the new century came in. Yet the two years that followed were probably the bitterest and most disillusioning of his life. The old machine obtained control of the Milwaukee Sentinel, the most powerful and about the only independent newspaper of importance in the State. The new editor called on the new Governor and offered the Sentinel's support if La Follette would drop the program of railroad taxation and direct primaries. Otherwise the newspaper would oppose the Governor and retire him to private life.

"If you will let up," La Follette quotes the editor as saying, "the legislature will be taken care of."

The Governor said he proposed to stand by the party pledges.

"Well, if that is your answer," was the reply, "the Sentinel will begin skinning you tomorrow."

It soon developed also that the "Stalwart" Republicans (the old machine) had control of the Senate, and even the lower house presently began to disintegrate. The most powerful business and personal pressure was brought to bear; by slow attrition or direct corruption the La Follette forces were worn down. The session ended by substituting for complete direct primaries a bill setting up a worthless scheme for county officers only, while instead of railroad taxation a bill was passed imposing a tax on dogs! La Follette vetoed both bills and then, broken with work and disappointment, was obliged to spend the next year in getting back into health.

La Follette was back on the stump in 1902, and was again elected Governor—with a legislature having more backbone. A railroad-taxation bill was passed, and the direct primary went through in the form of a referendum to the people in the election of 1904. Speaking of the railroad legislation, La Follette says in his autobiography:

> As an immediate result railroad taxes were increased more than $600,000 annually. When I came into the Governor's office on January 1, 1901, the State was in debt $330,000 and had only $4,125 in the general fund. But so great were the receipts from our new corporation taxes, and from certain other sources, that in four years' time, on January 1, 1905, we had paid off all our indebtedness and had in the general fund of the treasury $407,506. We had so much on hand, indeed, that we found it unnecessary to raise any taxes for the succeeding two years.

A law was also passed providing for expert accountants to ascertain if the railroads were correctly reporting their gross earnings in Wisconsin, the companies previously having been left practically to assess themselves. It was discovered that secret rebates to the amount of about $1,100,000 had been given during the preceding six years which had not been reported in the declarations of earnings. The State recovered more than $400,000 in back taxes on this account.

La Follette was encouraged but not satisfied with his second term as Governor. He saw that the preliminary successes of the progressive forces must be extended and consolidated, and he went into the 1904 campaign with more energy than ever. The direct-primary proposal was to be passed on by the people that autumn, and La Follette, having obtained full taxation of the railroads, was now determined to get authority to regulate rates, in order that heavier taxes might not be shifted to the people in the form of higher fares.

"I spoke forty-eight days in succession," he said later of the 1904 campaign, "never missing one single day excepting Sundays. I averaged eight and one-quarter hours a day on the platform."

La Follette picked out the districts where men that he regarded as faithless to the people were seeking election, and he opposed them regardless of their party. He inaugurated what later became known as The Roll Call, reading from the official journals the records of candidates on legislation. Sometimes he threw his weight to the Democratic candidates. "And I cleaned up the legislature," was his comment afterward.

On election day the La Follette forces were returned to power and the direct-primary proposal was carried by a majority of 50,000. One of the early acts of the new legislature was to elect La Follette as United States Senator. But he did not resign the governorship and go to Washington. He knuckled down to the job of getting through his desired legislation, first and foremost the regulation of railroad rates. He got that, together with other laws which brought Wisconsin forward from the rear guard of boss-ridden, corporation-ruled States into the very van of progress and democracy. Critics who are disposed to regard La Follette as an obstructionist and a demagogue will do well to ponder the remarkable record of constructive achievement in his five years as Governor of Wisconsin.

Nor did this legislation retard business or drive capital from the State. Its object was not to destroy corporations but to put them out of politics; to take away the privileges and unfair advantages obtained through corruption. From 1903 to 1909 the railroads invested some $39,000,000 in new construction in Wisconsin. While during the first five years of its existence the Railroad Commission caused a saving of $2,000,000 a year to the people through reduced rates, still the net earnings of railroads in Wisconsin increased slightly more than for all lines in the United States. The increase in Wisconsin was 18.45 per cent; in the United States as a whole it was 18.41 per cent. This was due to the greatly increased business brought by lower rates. Is there, perhaps, a moral in this for our present railway situation?

Eleven months after his election to the United States Senate La Follette felt finally that he could pass on the work in Wisconsin to other hands. He resigned the governorship, and early in 1906 he went back to the scenes in Washington which he had first known twenty years before as a green Congressman.

(This is the first of three articles on La Follette's political record. It will be followed next week by an article on La Follette in Washington and the week thereafter by an article on La Follette in America.)

Wisconsin and Socialism

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

CHESTER C. PLATT, State manager of the Wisconsin Nonpartisan League, has written a book entitled "What La Follette's State Is Doing"; and in the course of this book he remarks that it is "discouraging to note how little progress in public ownership has been made in Wisconsin in thirty years."

He is particularly distressed by the fate which overtook a certain proposed Wisconsin State constitutional amendment in the year 1922. According to that amendment all cities in Wisconsin would have been empowered to increase their indebtedness until it was equal to 10 per cent of the value of the taxable property within their boundaries and would have been enabled thereupon to acquire and operate street-railway systems and plants for the furnishing of light, heat, water, and power.

Simultaneously—in the year 1922—Mr. La Follette was running for reelection to the United States Senate. He was reelected by a spectacular majority.

The public-ownership constitutional amendment, however, was defeated. The votes for it numbered 105,000. The votes against it numbered 219,000.

It seemed possible for a State to be heavily for Mr. La Follette and yet be heavily against public ownership.

Mr. Platt seems to feel further that Mr. La Follette himself is not so actively zealous for public ownership as he might be and that Mr. La Follette's friend Governor Blaine is similarly delinquent. Mr. Platt says: "So far as I can learn, neither Senator La Follette nor Governor Blaine in their campaign speeches of 1922 spoke a word in favor of the constitutional amendment which would have opened up the gateway to municipal ownership of public utilities."

Mr. Platt thus bears witness to the truth of the proposition which this writer has been endeavoring to insinuate into the intelligence of a reluctant and refusing public.

The La Follette movement in Wisconsin has not been characterized by any profound persistent passion for public ownership. In all Wisconsin today there is no such illustration of public State ownership and operation as is furnished in the State of New York by the Barge Canal.

Wisconsin, it is true, has passed many laws dealing with business and has established many State commissions dealing with business, both agricultural and industrial.

These laws and these commissions are by many observers called socialistic. They are socialistic if the Fordney-McCumber tariff law is socialistic. They are socialistic if the United States Tariff Commission is socialistic. They represent an "interference" by government in the economic field. The tariff sort of interference is defended on the ground that it makes people more prosperous. So is the Wisconsin sort of interference.

Wisconsin in the year 1907 established a peculiarly drastic regulation of privately owned public utilities. Since that time—in the ensuing seventeen years—only one public utility in Wisconsin has gone bankrupt. Can regulation of public utilities by any other State government, or by the federal government, show fairer results—for the public utilities?

In Boston a gigantic local traction system is operated by public trustees appointed by the Massachusetts public authorities. In Wisconsin the need of public trustees for public utilities does not occur. Successful public regulation has obviated public operation. Regulation, if sufficiently drastic, has been shown to be not the avenue to socialism but the barricade against it.

Wisconsin had State grades, State standards, State labels for such commodities as butter and cheese. Are the private owners of butter and cheese factories thereby oppressed? On the contrary, they are thereby privately enriched. Their Wisconsin State-branded products—according to the Year Book of the Federal Department of Agriculture—are continuously able to command a price premium in the national market.

The North Dakota State Government started a bank and, being the government of a wheat State, started a grain elevator and a flour mill.

The Wisconsin State Government started no bank and, although it was destined to be the government of an outstanding dairy State, started no State-owned factories for dairy products. On the contrary, it encouraged and promoted the privately owned factories for those products by two methods—education and regulation.

The Wisconsin State Government gives financial aid to cow-testing associations. The federal Government gives financial aid to railroads. It has lent many millions of dollars—for instance—to the New York, New Haven and Hartford. Under the accepted idea there is governmental interference on behalf of certain interests. Under the Wisconsin idea there is governmental interference all around. It is not socialism. It is simply what might be called making governmental interference unanimous.

On that basis the Wisconsin "progressive" or "radical" movement—instead of dying out in a few years, as every other "progressive" or "radical" movement in our whole national history has died out—can now be seen controlling and governing the State of Wisconsin at the end of thirty years of continuous existence.

In that fact is there, or is there not, a lesson for the ladies and gentlemen who want to make the present national La Follette movement produce a permanent new national political party?

Further and finally the friends of the idea of a new national political movement will note that the Wisconsin movement has steadily had behind it in its legislative activities the intense laborious research of great economic specialists like Dr. John Commons and that it has been accompanied by uniquely lavish expenditures of public money on the education of the individual Wisconsin boy, girl, woman, and man in the State University, in the extension courses of the State University, in ordinary grade schools and high schools and normal schools and extraordinary new part-time continuation schools for young citizens already earning their living.

The 1923 Wisconsin Legislature appropriated $150,000 for a building in Milwaukee to be used as a center for university-extension courses conducted from the State University at Madison. In Milwaukee there is also now a new part-time school building, the construction of which will have cost more than $3,000,000.

The number of working children doing part-time school work in Milwaukee has risen to about 13,000. The nation can never duplicate the growing economic result of the Wisconsin movement without the Wisconsin movement's passion for schools.

For individual self-improvement the educated Wisconsin farmer thereupon, with instructions and assistance and advice from Madison, forms his own cooperative societies and does not ask the government to market his products; he markets them himself. Governmental interference for the purpose of producing ultimately more opportunity and more capacity for private individuality—that is the laboring soul of the Wisconsin idea. And this writer ventures the view that no new national party without that soul and without that intense technical laboriousness will ever be anything more than a fortuitously aggregated body, materialistic and transitory.

The Buried Past of Greenland

By POUL NÖRLUND

AMONG the many adventurers, discoverers, and explorers who have written their names on the pale Arctic heavens there shines—after the lapse of almost a thousand years—the name of an Icelandic outlaw, Eric the Red, the discoverer and colonizer of Greenland. All the daring, gruffness, and audacity of the Viking age center in this proud, lonely figure who, in the Scandinavian countries, has become one of the personifications of a barbaric but glorious past, and whose name, in America, too, is recalled together with that of his son Leif Ericson, the discoverer of the American continent.

In the fiords of South Greenland Eric the Red founded a free political community, where he and a few of his countrymen found wider scope for their bold self-sufficiency and spirit of independence than could be found at home in Norway and in Iceland. Here they possessed practically the same means of livelihood as in northern Iceland—pastures for their large flocks of sheep and for their cattle and horses; the most advanced even tried to raise corn. Over the moors they hunted the reindeer, and in the sea seals and white bears which came drifting on ice-floes along the shores, and they were not afraid of setting out on expeditions to the north in search of the huge sea-monsters frequenting those regions, particularly the walrus, the skin of which was cut into thongs and the tusks traded to the Norwegian merchants who visited the country.

On the inmost shores of the deep fiords about Julianehope and Godthope, where the colonists settled most thickly, the sites of their farmyards, undisturbed by the ravages of time, are still to be found beneath the sod and the willow copses. According to a topographical description dating from the fourteenth century the settlements consisted of about 300 farms, two cloisters, and sixteen churches, one of which was the cathedral at the episcopal residence of Gardar. The sites of most of these are now known, thanks to a charting carried on by both skilled and unskilled persons for more than a century and a half, and on the basis of excavations in both Greenland and Iceland made by Captain Daniel Bruun it has been proved that the Greenlandic dwellings corresponded to the old Icelandic dwellings of the Saga period.

By continued archæological excavations we shall certainly be able to procure still further details concerning the old Greenlanders' life on the farthest outpost of European culture. Even now, through excavations which the present writer undertook in 1921 for the Danish Commission for the Scientific Investigation of Greenland, new and unexpected perspectives have been opened.

One of the most renowned Icelanders who followed Eric the Red to Greenland was named Herjolf Baardson. He took land farthest to the south, a few miles from Cape Farewell, but in contrast to all his companions he settled on a headland by the open sea instead of seeking shelter in the snug fiords. At Herjolfsness grew up a large farm, which later had its own church, and in the neighborhood was a harbor, one of the favorite ports of call of the Norwegian merchant vessels.

The storms of centuries lashed the headland and made relentless inroads upon the exposed churchyard where, at the water's edge, some remains of the old graves were laid bare. To anticipate the sea in its devastating work we excavated the whole churchyard. Around the little though not quite insignificant church lay the graves, layer under layer, the uppermost fully decomposed, but the lower showing a more and more wonderful state of preservation the deeper we reached. There were coffins joined with wood-nails or baleen fibers; there were small carved crosses, sometimes with runic inscriptions, which had been placed in the hands of the dead; but the most remarkable things were the garments in which the corpses had been wrapped when their relations could not procure any coffin.

People have been so accustomed to the things which can be preserved and excavated in the warm countries, for instance, in the tombs of Egyptian kings and others, that it is necessary to emphasize how remarkable—indeed in its way unique—this discovery of medieval garments is. In Europe also in that period the dead were frequently wrapped in clothes instead of being placed in coffins; but never once has a complete garment been brought out of the earth. They have all rotted.

No one could ask for a more vivid illustration of the medieval Greenlanders' life and culture than that given by the dresses now exhibited in the National Museum of Copenhagen. They are woven of wool and were certainly made in Greenland, where the women had plenty to do in working the wool from the great flocks of sheep which grazed on the mountain slopes. Probably the Greenlanders also exported ready-made cloth as did the Icelanders; there were, indeed, so many articles of necessity which had to be bought in Europe that furs and walrus tusks were hardly sufficient to pay for all their requirements.

But if these dresses were made in Greenland their congruity with the European fashions is so much the more startling. One by one you can take them forth and point out their parallels in the abundance of medieval sculptures and miniatures which we in Europe must use instead of the originals as a sort of fashion paper. They are the same fashions which we find in Paris and the Netherlands, they are the same headdresses which Petrarch wore or which later in the fifteenth century the Florentines used. It speaks strongly for the activity of international intercourse, and for the Greenlanders' intimate relations with Europe, that these fashions were able to wander the long way over Scandinavia and, on the Norwegian merchant vessels, farther, away out to Herjolfsness.

Of course, the Greenlandic imitations possess nothing of the gorgeous splendor of the original models. The material is coarse and the colors have disappeared—if gaudy colors were used, as in medieval Europe. These dresses were much worn and often mended before being used as shrouds, and naturally the lapse of centuries has left its traces. But when we imagine them in their original condition we must admit that the cut is intricate and well deliberated, and the best pieces have so fine a fall that they are really a pleasure to look at. They were not such garments as the peasantry wore in Scandinavia.

According to our European "fashion papers" most of the dresses belong to the period about the middle of the fourteenth century, but of course in Greenland they must be later. It was a period when the dresses fitted the body closely to the waist, falling toward the feet in soft, voluminous folds, and when the men, too, wore long, richly folded dresses which they slipped over their heads like a jumper, while as head-gear they used closely fitting hoods of which the upper back part was continued into a long tail or tippet which dangled down the back or was fastened round the head. This hood—the French chaperon—was very highly favored throughout Europe in the later Middle Ages. It was the most popular and most characteristic garment, and it is really surprising that not one single specimen has been preserved in Europe, while fourteen to fifteen pieces were recovered in fine condition from the Greenlandic soil.

How is this possible? They wrapped the dead each in his garment and put him into the rude earth, and 600 years later we found the corpse decomposed, as is the way of nature, but the wrapping in about the same condition as when it was buried.

The explanation is that these graves are below the line at which in these days the soil will thaw in the warm summer time. The dresses have been frozen down. But this is an answer that raises a new question. They cannot have cut the graves in the frozen ground; in that case the corpse would not have been decomposed, and all the garments were penetrated by grass roots which must have originated at a time when these layers of earth were unfrozen. The only reasonable explanation is this: In the Middle Ages the ground thawed to a greater depth and then a change of climate occurred before the putrefaction from the corpse spread to its surroundings. Such changes may well have come gradually if we suppose that the deepest and best-preserved graves were made at midsummer and even at the beginning thawed only for a short period of the year.

The excavations at Herjolfsness support a theory which is set forth by Professor O. Pettersson of Sweden, and which for the last decade has engaged the attention of meteorologists and historians. According to this theory a change of climate, ascribed to cosmic causes, took place during the latter part of the Middle Ages, affecting a great part of the earth.

The Norse commonwealth of Greenland existed independently for about 250 years, until in 1261 it surrendered to the Norwegian Crown. Soon afterward the king received the monopoly of the navigation of the coasts of the country, but in return he assumed the obligation of maintaining commercial intercourse, and the arrangement must certainly have been a benefit to the isolated Greenlanders. A real peril was prevented—for Norwegian shipping was at this moment rapidly declining, and skippers were scarce who, at their own risk, would keep up the connection. The purely European character of the garments found at Herjolfsness must prove that throughout the fourteenth century there was a rather lively intercourse with Europe; indeed it proves that the Greenlanders far into the fifteenth century were in communication with the old country, because we found European fashions from the second half of that century. But the arrival of ships became rarer and rarer and at last stopped altogether. If a change in the ice conditions of the coasts of South Greenland really occurred it must have been fatal to navigation; probably one ship after another was caught in the ice packs until at last there was not one skipper left in Norway who knew the difficult and perilous route.

To us, who lived for a whole summer at Herjolfsness and saw ourselves blocked most of the time by drift-ice coming from the east and rounding Cape Farewell, it is hard to imagine how the Norsemen, under similar ice conditions, were able to use this place as a harbor. Nowadays Herjolfsness is one of the points on the southwest coast which is most difficult to navigate; the ice forces the ships farther north, where they cannot "stand in" toward the land until they have passed the whole of the old eastern settlement.

The change in climate made life harder for the Greenlanders. Supplies from Europe were necessary for their existence, their wholly European culture depended on a close connection with the home country. And, on the other hand, the same conditions which became fatal for the Norsemen brought the Eskimos southward, for their source of livelihood was on the drifting ice, the favorite haunts of the seals. But in the long run the two peoples could not live side by side without collision; there was not room enough for both. We imagine that they settled their differences not by a decisive contest but by small local feuds. Naturally the Norsemen, cut off from supplies from Europe, got the worse of it against a people inured to the Arctic climate and living in complete independence of the rest of the world.

Many people, among them renowned scientists, refuse to believe that the same Eskimos who nowadays are famous for their peacefulness were able to accomplish such a war of extermination. But my own nation, the Danish, now one of the most peaceful and anti-militaristic people in the world, a thousand years ago sent one devastating Viking army after the other over Western Europe. It has been said that the white race cannot be conquered by the savage; but it is often seen that its superiority disappears if it is isolated. And talk of the Norsemen's superiority to the Eskimos is silenced by the last result of our excavations at Herjolfsness.

After our return the remains of the excavated skeletons (their state of preservation being rather bad) were forwarded for examination to the renowned Danish anatomist, Professor F. C. C. Hansen. His careful investigations show that the last Norsemen of Greenland were a badly degenerate race, small and wretched persons, suffering from rachitis and tubercular diseases, many of them cripples, degenerated through intermarriage and undernourishment. Their teeth were even in youth decayed because of bad food. Consequently it was not a host of tall champions who had to fight the Eskimos, but a doomed race. We bow with respect to these our kinsmen who, voluntarily or involuntarily, stayed at their advanced outpost, and there were left to die. And their fate does not become less tragic because the breaking of communication with Europe was primarily due to circumstances of which their countrymen at home were not masters. But we must admit that the Eskimos, the little hardy polar people, by the right of the strongest, took Greenland from the white race. It was, under these circumstances, no great achievement.

Baking Your Own Bread

By J. P. WARBASSE

THE price of bread was five cents a loaf when wheat was $1 a bushel. When the price of wheat went to $2 the price of bread jumped to ten cents a loaf. The wage of the baker was not doubled. Only the price the consumer paid was doubled. One might get the idea that bread is made out of flour alone. It is not. It is made chiefly of labor, flour, and water. Wheat has been down around the pre-war price for several years, but the price of a loaf of bread stays around ten cents. What is this fiscal yeast that raises bread so successfully and keeps it raised?

During the war the farmers asserted their patriotism, paid their good money for government bonds, and made a terrible wail; and then were bribed to raise lots of grain by the promise of $3 wheat. That high-priced wheat cost them more than they got for it. It was the most expensive wheat the American farmer ever raised. It did him more harm than good. He knows it now. The bankers got the money, and he got deflation as a present from the bankers.

Now, the important fact is that most of the people in the United States are not farmers. This is no longer an agricultural country. It is a commercial country. Buying and selling the products of labor is more profitable than working. But still all of the people eat bread. The eight- and ten-cent loaf is the price they are still paying for that crop of $3 wheat that was raised half a dozen years ago. That crop of wheat has been bought and paid for ten times already by the consumers—and they keep on paying for it. But the farmer does not get the money. What is more, the farmer also buys flour and bread, and he has already spent his share of the money he got for his $3 wheat for these daily necessities. The interesting thing that is happening is that the people are paying for bread that they do not get. Big and little bakeries are developing and absorbing this surplus between the producer and the consumer. The "bread king" is actually coming into existence to take his place along with all of the other "kings."

What can the people do to get the full amount of bread they pay for? Bakeries are multiplying—but their purpose is not to make bread to feed the people but to make profits for the owners of the bakeries. What can the people do to bake bread to eat? This is an old question. The family answers it by turning the kitchen into a bakery and the good housewife into a baker. That is one way to bake bread to eat. There is another way.

I know a little town of 3,500 population. It has eight hundred families. The cooperative consumers' society in that town has nine hundred members—more than a member for every family. The society has five stores and a bakery. The bakery turns out about eight hundred loaves a day at a cost of less than five cents a loaf. This bakery is owned by the families that use the bread. Besides enjoying the advantage of having wholesome bread, eight hundred housewives are released from the baking function. The work of the eight hundred is done by four.

But what is more important, these people are learning how to administer their own business. If they can carry on stores and a bakery, they can qualify to carry on other functions for their own service. This happens to be a cooperative society of a town in Switzerland.

But the people in their voluntary societies of consumers can also carry on big business in this same field. The United Cooperative Baking Society of Glasgow, Scotland, is a good example. Its first bakery was started with one oven in a little old house in a back street. Now it has grown until it has over $2,500,000 share capital. It distributes $8,000,000 worth of bread and cakes a year, and makes a surplus-saving for its members of over $300,000. This bakery society devotes $7,000 a year to cooperative education, carries $250,000 worth of flour and bread in stock, and has $1,500,000 in reserve. It uses 30,000 tons of flour a year and puts out 800 tons of bread a week. Its 120 ovens are equipped with the most modern machinery. All of this highly successful and steadily growing business has been owned and administered from the beginning—fifty-five years ago—by the consumers who eat the bread. This is not the largest cooperative bakery. One in Vienna, Austria, is still larger, supplying bread to more than half the population of that city.

In England, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Germany, Russia, France—in every European country these bakeries of the people are to be found. The strong cooperative societies in Belgium did not begin with stores, as was the case in England, but with bakeries. "We are bombarding the citadel of capitalism with loaves of bread" has always been the slogan of Belgian cooperation. The society of Ghent turns out 120,000 loaves of bread a week in this bombardment. Bread is sold in that country at a reasonable price. The surplus-savings accumulating in the treasury of the society are used for all sorts of social purposes—life and sickness insurance, old-age pensions, medical care, unemployment, insurance, education, entertainment. And then the surplus accumulating beyond these needs is used to open stores for the distribution of other commodities.

In practically every town in Germany—or at least in 3,126 towns—is a cooperative consumers' society. The bakery is the next institution started by these societies after the store and the savings bank. Take Nuremberg, for example; there is a cooperative society of 50,000 members with a bakery having twenty-three ovens. The largest profit-making bakery in Nuremberg has four ovens. The Nuremberg society can supply the whole city with all the bread it needs.

The largest bakery in the city of Hamburg is that of the cooperative society. The cooperatives in Germany, Switzerland, Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, Austria, and half a dozen other countries own their own flour mills. And the federated societies of England not only have the largest flour mills in the British Empire but they own thousands of acres of wheat-lands where they produce their own grain. The same is true of most German towns and cities. They are producing bread to eat. The middleman is fading away.

There is something in these bakeries besides providing bread to eat at cost. They have carried efficiency to so high a plane that they are undoubtedly contributing to the health of the people. I remember seeing a machine for removing dirt and impurities from the flour in several of these bakeries, and I was informed that the profit-making bakeries did not use this machine. "Then what becomes of the impurities " "Why, the people eat them," was the reply.

In the United States we have about seventy-five successful cooperative bakeries. Fifteen of these are Jewish, three are Italian, ten or fifteen are Scandinavian or Finnish, and the rest are run by Americans or by a mixture of nationalities. Three of these bakery societies have a membership of around 2,000 each. Most of them are smaller, ranging from sixty to six hundred members.

As an example of what the people can do for themselves in the United States, let us take a look at the bakery of the Purity Cooperative Association of Paterson, New Jersey. Twenty years ago it started with eight members. They went from house to house and raised money in amounts from twenty-five cents to five dollars, until they had $800 in hand. They then rented a little bakery with one oven for $24 a month. The profit bakeries tried to put them out of business, and nearly succeeded. So poor were they that at times they did not have the money to buy a bag of flour. But they stuck it out and grew, and presently they moved to larger premises. Then they bought a house and equipped it with ovens. Ten years ago they put up a bigger brick bakery building with every modern appliance. And five years ago they built another of still greater size. In 1905 they baked 150 loaves daily, using one barrel of flour and employing two bakers. In 1915 they baked 3,650 loaves and 1,350 dozen rolls daily, used thirty barrels of flour, and employed twelve bakers. Today they have 2,000 members who are supplied with $250,000 worth of bread a year. Three auto-trucks and two wagons carry bread to the consumers. The property is worth $150,000. Their ovens turn out 5,000 loaves and 24,000 rolls a day. Big machines automatically weigh, sieve, and mix 500 pounds of flour at a time. They use a carload of flour a week. The society also runs a meatshop which sells $100,000 worth of meat yearly. It requires forty-two employees with a weekly pay roll of $1,600. Although only $8,000 has been subscribed in capital stock, the resources of the association are $175,000. The sum of $1,000 is contributed yearly to cooperative education.

Two years ago this Purity bakery united with three other bakeries in the same district, to form a federation. The four bakeries do a weekly business of $20,000 or $1,000,000 a year. The surplus-savings of these bakeries vary from 5 per cent to 25 per cent. Some is used to create funds for expansion and for educational purposes. The remainder is given back to the members as savings-returns. Every one of these bakeries is keeping down the price of bread in the neighborhood where it operates. By the price standards that they set they are saving millions of dollars to millions of people in the cost of bread who never heard of the bakeries.

When food controller Hoover fixed the price of bread during the war, the private-profit bakeries protested that they could not produce bread at so low a price. But the cooperative bakeries protested against being required to charge so high a price for bread. Despite protests both made money. The first group produced the poorest bread they could and put the profits in their pockets; the second group produced the best bread they could and gave the profits back to the people. Which of these principles is to be adopted ultimately in production and distribution remains to be seen. All that can be said for the present is that the profit motive in industry has got the world into a good deal of a mess; and as far as bread goes the people are still paying for much that they are never permitted to eat.

In the Driftway

CIVILIZATION, like almost everything in this world (even the Drifter's steady old desk in these days of whirling atoms), is difficult to define. We have highbrows who defend it, and anthropologists like Westermarck who take delightful jabs at civilized peoples as compared with primitive folk. The Drifter being a sentimental philosopher, and also because it pains him to think of century after century without progress, wishes with all his heart and soul, and half of his mind, to believe in progress. But the other half of his mind can't abide the absolute assumption of progress or that it is represented by "me" and "mine."

* * * *

ALL this has been aroused not by recent deep researches into anthropological lore, but by the arrival of the "white Indians." In the first place the Drifter's emotions were enlisted, his sympathy was aroused for Marguerite, Alo, and Chepu. The story of their first "hot and uncomfortable" day in city clothes brings squirms of approval from the Drifter's hot and uncomfortable body. Then an inspired reporter wrote that "they looked at the Statue of Liberty as if they thought it no more wonderful than a palm-tree." Well, well! We wonder how many palm-trees that man has seen. The Drifter wasted several hours thinking about palm-trees and reporters and the Statue of Liberty. He went out to the S of L in one of the little boats that leave from the Battery, and chose a particularly unfortunate day, as part of the Democratic Convention was going out to compare it to a palm-tree too.

* * * *

THEN the Drifter went home and read Beebe's "Jungle Peace." He saw the sun drop into the jungle with tropical quickness, leaving for a moment the clear, golden sky. There was the quiet of sunset. Then darkness and the night noises of the jungle. He followed the fairy-like moonlit trail through the jungle. He sniffed the delicate and penetrating odors of orchids, crushed leaves, decaying wood. And then his imagination played him a trick, and he smelled (although psychologists say one can't recall smells) smoke, gasoline, dust, and hot asphalt. Some of us who admire so prodigiously our "wagons that go by themselves, boats th[illegible] tower up into the clouds" would be heartily bored in the most marvelous of jungles unless we had a Beebe there to interpret. The Drifter's wrath increases when he reads that "the burden of understanding New York with its skyscrapers, its subways and elevateds, its automobiles and its throngs is too much for them." Do we superior New Yorkers understand New York? We know how to follow the green or black line in the shuttle, but pray what do we "understand"? And if we did, might we not know more about life if we knew the answer to the question of the great black frog of the jungle, Wh-y? Wh-y?

* * * *

PLEASE don't send in applications for membership in a back-to-nature club. The Drifter has no intention of starting one. He has an adequate appreciation of the comforts of civilization and a highly developed fear of many of the crawly things of the jungle. But he does wish for the sake of the peace of that aforesaid half of his mind that his fellow-beings wouldn't consider themselves the be-all and the end-all of the universe. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Married Women's Titles

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You note the fact that Susan B. Anthony introduced Lucy Stone on some public occasion as "Mrs. Stone." Mrs. Stone was the name by which my mother was known to all her friends and neighbors and to her associates in reform work. It was the name by which she wished to be called. She had no objection to the change of title that indicates whether a woman is married or single. But she regarded the loss of a woman's name at marriage as a symbol of the loss of her individuality, and she would have none of it.

She spoke with warm indignation of the woman in "Bleak House" who had been Mrs. Captain Swosser and Mrs. Professor Dingo and was now Mrs. Bayham Badger. She said it was like a slave who was Cuffee Smith if he belonged to Mr. Smith, and Cuffee Jones if he became the property of Mr. Jones.

Before her marriage, she consulted several eminent lawyers, including the Hon. Salmon P. Chase, who was afterward Chief Justice of the United States. They all told her that there was no law requiring a married woman to take her husband's name; it was only a custom. It is said that my father's family were rather glad to have her keep her own name. His elder sister, Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell, was the first woman in modern times to take a medical degree—a thing looked upon as altogether shocking. The family thought they had enough odium to bear because one woman named Blackwell was practicing medicine, without having another woman of that name lecturing for woman's rights in a bloomer dress.

When Massachusetts gave women school suffrage in 1879, my mother let herself be deprived of her vote rather than sacrifice her principles. She would not register as Lucy Blackwell, and the authorities would not let her register as Lucy Stone. I have seldom seen my father more indignant. He proposed that he and I should go before the registrars and make oath that we had known this woman for many years, and that her name was Lucy Stone. Of course, it would have been useless. She lost her vote because a small Boston official thought he knew more about law than the Chief Justice of the United States.

In recent years, I am sorry to say, Massachusetts has adopted an enactment in regard to the re-registration of women after marriage which requires them to use their husbands' names; but there was no such provision at that time. Sooner or later it will be repealed.

Chilmark, Mass., July 24 ALICE STONE BLACKWELL

La Follette in California

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On May 5 a group of earnest men and women gathered in a ramshackle hall in Long Beach for the purpose of forming an organization which they hoped would aid in the election of Robert M. La Follette to the Presidency next November. Although at that time the possibility of La Follette's running was speculative, if not remote, this group with vigorous confidence set to work and founded a La Follette for President Club. It is only fair to say that the founders were not representative of the citizenry of Long Beach or of Southern California as a whole; the meeting was inspired and given zest almost wholly by a few farmers of the Northwest, those Nonpartisan Leaguers whose efforts for progressive political action have earned the profound admiration of every one whose heart hungers for true political emancipation.

The organization has grown; at each meeting the crowds get larger and the enthusiasm for La Follette waxes higher.

All of this has taken place in the city of reactionaries and stand-patters where not so long ago Eugene Debs was denied the right to address a public meeting.

The writer tells this with the hope of inspiring other communities to do likewise. He knows of communities whose conditions should be much more favorable for the forming of La Follette clubs, and he appeals to the progressive citizenry throughout the land to choose the psychological time, unite upon a common footing, and send Robert La Follette to the White House next November. All that it requires is union.

A few words to the extreme radical, he who is called "red" but whose heart is intrinsically white. The time has come for you to realize that diplomacy is a necessary instrument and that much can be gained by using a little of it now and then. I am addressing this especially to those extremists who see in Robert M. La Follette but another capitalist a little disguised. You fail to recognize the true virtues of the man, his unimpeachable record for justice and fairness, and above all the certainty that he would protect you in the exercise of your full right of citizenship.

Let us, in this hour of test, forget that we have separate grievances and differences of opinion. Now is the time for discussion but not for dissension. The hope of any movement lies in the solidarity of its supporters. Let us for once make a united effort to enact a theory we are wont of preaching.

Long Beach, California, July 17 ALBERT VAN AVER

"Mother of Exiles"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In view of the passage of the recent immigration law further restricting the admission of aliens into the United States, I most respectfully suggest that a congressional committee be appointed and instructed to proceed to Bedloe's Island, New York, armed with crowbars, sledges, and chisels, and wrench from the base of the statue of the Goddess of Liberty the bronze tablet to Emma Lazarus, which bears the following lines from her fine sonnet The New Colossus, written in 1883:

> "Keep ancient lands your storied pomp!" cries she
> With silent lips. "Give me your tired, your poor,
> Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
> The wretched refuse of your teeming shore.
> Send these, the homeless, tempest-tost to me,
> I lift my lamp beside the golden door."

Either that, or reverse the position of the goddess and turn her back to Europe.

Superior, Wisconsin, July 10 JOHN A. CADIGAN

Contributors to This Issue

ARTHUR WARNER, associate editor of The Nation, has made a special study of La Follette's political record during the past forty-five years.

POUL NÖRLUND, deputy keeper of the Danish National Museum at Copenhagen and author of historical and archaeological essays, led the Danish Archaeological Expedition to Greenland in 1921.

JAMES P. WARBASSE is president of the Cooperative League of America and editor of Cooperation.

ANNA LOUISE STRONG, who has spent the greater part of the last three years in Russia, is the author of "The First Time in History," recently published in America.

H. A. OVERSTREET is head of the department of philosophy at the College of the City of New York.

ELISEO VIVAS is a young Spanish critic who contributes frequent articles on contemporary Spanish literature to current periodicals.

"The Modern Quarterly aims to attract enlightened readers who are at once radical and metaphysical, serious and educable. It is consistent in its demands upon the intelligence of its readers and its effort to bring the whole range of human affairs under its vigorous scrutiny. It is well informed . . . . contentious and courageous."—The Nation.

THE MODERN QUARTERLY

Scientific—that is the word which characterizes the present age. Science has been applied to every phase of modern thought, but here for the first time a scientific approach is made toward literary criticism. If you are scientific—and you must be to be modern—then you cannot afford to miss this frontier approach entitled:

SOCIOLOGICAL CRITICISM OF LITERATURE
by V. F. Calverton with an important preface by Ernest Boyd

IS AMERICA RIPE FOR A LABOR PARTY?
Three articles on the present labor situation by James O'Neal C. E. Ruthenberg V. L. Reynolds

—continuing Adolf Moor by V. F. Calverton
—A Revolutionary Interpretation of Philosophy by Haim Kantorovitch
—Materialism and Art by George Plechanoff
—Poems and Book Reviews

THE MODERN QUARTERLY
P. O. Box 322 Baltimore, Md.
I enclose $1.00 for a year's subscription to The Modern Quarterly
" " $5.00 " The Nation and The Modern Quarterly for a year
" " $ .35 " a single copy of The Modern Quarterly

Name .....

Address .....

PLEXO
"TOILET LANOLINE"
—the year-round skin treatment

This wonderful emollient is used with great success by noted skin specialists for pimples, blotches, facial eruptions, roughness, abrasions and chapped lips and hands. It protects the delicate skin surfaces against trying weather conditions and by supplying nourishment to the facial nerves and skin cells effaces wrinkles and restores the bloom of youthful health. "Toilet Lanoline" is especially recommended for cuts and burns and for relief of pain after exposure. "Toilet Lanoline" is a remarkable skin softener and preserver. A delicately scented preparation that is safe for SMALL CHILDREN.

PREPARED BY
PLEXO PREPARATIONS, Inc.
NEW YORK
Sole Agents and Distributors
General Drug Co., N. Y., 94 N. Moore Street

If Some Grim Tragedy

By NINNA MAY SMITH

If some grim tragedy had smote me down
I might have risen spent
From the chastising rod, yet in some way Magnificent.

But life moves tranquilly without event
Day after wearisome day,
Save for the little rodent cares that make Me small as they.

Books

The Value of Personality

A Living Universe. By L. P. Jacks. George H. Doran Company. $1.

The Lost Radiance of Christianity. By L. P. Jacks. George H. Doran Company. $0.75.

Seeing Life Whole. By Henry Churchill King. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

The Reconstruction of the Spiritual Ideal. By Felix Adler. D. Appleton and Company. $1.50.

THERE seems something curiously futile about most philosophies. They are so endlessly talky. They lose themselves in a maze of words. The sciences, on the other hand, are powerfully silent. They do not argue. They make their experiments and present the results. What philosophy needs, apparently, is to learn how to talk less and do more. Curiously enough, there is a settled view that philosophy cannot be experimental. Philosophers themselves accept this view.

> You ask us to test our conclusions as do the scientists. But how can we? Philosophy has no brass instruments; no measuring rods; no laboratories. Philosophy is a thing of the mind, with no tests save the pure canons of logic.

And so the philosopher, a little sadly, a little shamefacedly, perhaps, resigns himself to talk.

But is this true? Philosophy is a critical consideration of our basic assumptions. Is it not possible to put a basic assumption to the test, to see how it works itself out? In a little book called "The Living Universe" Dr. Jacks proposes this. There are just two fundamental philosophies, he contends: that one which assumes the universe to be dead and that one which assumes it to be alive. How shall the one or the other of these philosophies be proved? By arguing? Not at all. Even at the best there are realities which speech is powerless to express. Reality in the last analysis can only be acted. You cannot prove that beauty is beautiful to one who sees no beauty. The proof of beauty is the living appreciation of it. You cannot prove that sex love is a great and transforming experience to one who is physiologically immature. The proof of love is in the loving.

So Dr. Jacks holds we cannot prove by the logic of the tongue or pen that the universe is either living or dead. The only proof is in living as if it were the one or the other. By the fruits of that living we shall know. And here is where philosophy becomes experimental. We have, let us say, talked this matter over for hours. We have matched argument with argument, point with point. Let us now end it all and put it to the test. Live as if the universe were dead; and see what happens. Live as if the universe were alive; and see what happens. If the one experiment lands us in confusion and self-destruction, while the other brings transforming and heightening experience, we have our laboratory test.

It is somewhat in this manner that Dr. Jacks puts to the test these two fundamental philosophies. Our actual philosophy nowadays, he holds, as taught in the schools and lived in our business and political lives, is the philosophy which assumes a dead universe. From that fact follows our dominant technique —exploitation. We use nature, master her, control her. And it is no wonder that we have no compunctions about using human beings, mastering, controlling them in our interests. That we are essentially a political and economic civilization is symptomatic. Political units (nations) seek power; profit-makers seek power. Our civilization is quarrelsome because it is dominantly a civilization of exploitation.

Suppose we tested out the other philosophy, not by talking about it but by acting it. Instead of mastering, using nature, physical and human, we should then, with a kind of joyous appreciation, seek to coact with all nature. Instead of a preponderating interest in domination we should have an interest in growth and wider association. Education, instead of emphasizing personal success, would emphasize development. Nations, instead of aiming at power, would aim at welfare.

Here, then, is a working hypothesis which Dr. Jacks proposes. Can it be put to the test? He is not despondent as are many post-war writers. He feels that the hypothesis is being put to the test even now and is working. There is one powerful movement he holds, which indicates that civilization is taking a new direction. The military era is being succeeded by an era of intense interest in education. The basic interest of education, however, is not in domination but in development. In the end such a newly directed civilization will mean the suppression of the exploitation motive, which treats all that is not ourselves as if it were a means to our private ends; it will mean the increasing substitution of the motive of joyous association with realities that are truly living.

It is because Christianity has in large measure lost this sense of joyous association with a living universe that it has become the thing that it is of solemn "duties," magical ceremonials, and terrifying eschatologies.

Dr. King, also, joins forces with the "living-universe" philosophy. He develops his argument, however, in a different way. Where Dr. Jacks says, Try out the "dead-universe" hypothesis and see how it works, Dr. King says, consider all the sciences and philosophers whither they point. And considering biology, psychology, ethics, and philosophy, he finds them all pointing to what he holds to be fundamental in the Christian view of life. One is grateful for the very liberal and humanistic view which Dr. King takes of Christianity and particularly for his defense of a Christianity of the man Christ as over against a Christianity of the Old Testament. But when it comes to a reasoned view of the universe, one must confess that his selective principle seems to be worked overhard to find in the sciences and philosophy supports for the particular theistic view of the universe that has come to be known as Christian. The book, however, has many fine insights and is to be commended for its vigorous effort to see life not from some partial point of view of religion or of science but from the point of view of all man's authentic experiences.

Felix Adler, on the other hand, has no confidence in metaphysical approaches. He must find whatever spiritual reality there is in the universe through the spiritual quality in himself and others. Finding that, he has no hesitation in believing that the universe is spiritual, a society of spiritual personalities. But for Adler, as for Jacks, there is no real knowing save through acting. The spiritual in me is found precisely in the degree to which I act toward others as if they were spiritual. Here again we have the setting up of an hypothesis and the testing of it through specific action. Dr. Adler has illuminating things to say about marriage and social reconstruction. At times the thought is made unduly obscure by what seem to be quite unnecessary metaphysical subtleties. But throughout there runs the challenge of the single basic assumption: Treat humanity in all situations—marriage, business, industry, politics—as if it were spiritual and the world will find an end of its sorriest troubles.

There is much with which one might honestly differ in all these books, but they are significant as defenses of the supreme value of personality and of the livingness of reality by men who nevertheless are in profoundest sympathy with the scientific viewpoints of our day.

H. A. OVERSTREET

A Spanish Woman Novelist

Mariflor. By Concha Espina. Translated from the Spanish by Frances Douglas. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The Red Beacon. By Concha Espina. Translated from the Spanish by Frances Douglas. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

THERE is something in the literature of modern Spain which seems to articulate in an almost inaudible manner the frustration and the futility of its life. In Baroja, in Azorin, in Perez de Ayala, or, better still, in those early records of passion of Unamuno which his later fame has overshadowed, we invariably catch a common note: a subtle vein of melancholy, of regret, similar to, although less precise and more sophisticated than, the sober sadness over the failure of life to bloom which is, in our own literature, the leading motive of Sherwood Anderson. A time there was, amply recorded, when Spanish literature seemed to overbrim with brutal joy. The Spaniard was then successful through a desperate activity in chasing from his consciousness the ghost of disillusionment. And while his life was spilled in remote fields of action, his literature, reflecting the exaltation of his life, was a record of sword gashes, revenges, and a repressed lust often too violent to hide itself under the name of mysticism. Today, tired, perhaps, or perhaps spiritually as well as materially bankrupt, his literature has but one theme, disillusionment.

This is the reason why tragedy—that is to say, the failure in a vital aspiration—seldom is to be found in modern Spanish literature. The modern Spaniard—Unamuno is perhaps the only exception—has no really vital aspirations. His is the weariness of a lack of ideals. But if one does not find tragedy in modern Spanish literature, in the best of it one finds the elements of greatness. For it springs—in Baroja and Azorin this is surface clear—from an ineluctable conflict between two permanently opposed interests within the artist: from the conflict between the artist's desideratum for a truly adventurous and noble fulfilment of life and his Sancho Panza longings for comfort and safety.

In Concha Espina, however, these elements of greatness are not to be found. As a technician she seems supremely gifted. She is unusually articulate and sensitive enough to echo the subtle moods of the earth and the sky as well as the petty sufferings of her puppets. But the conflict of truly vital and radical interests, which alone lends a tale of the moment the color of permanence, cannot be found in her. The only grace that raises her from a novelist of sentimental trash into the ranks of interesting mediocrity is a faint sense, of which she seems to be seldom conscious, that the life she describes is adumbrated by the weariness of acknowledged futility. Her theme in both these books is poverty, which drives the sentimental wants of the individual to a conflict with the interests of the family and of established custom. Poverty circles over her creatures with the ever-nearing flight of a hawk, finally clawing them down to submission. It is here that she fails. Her understanding of life is too tenuous to make us feel that the failure of her victims to triumph over poverty is the tragic denouement of what might have been a nobly successful life. Her heart's desire is vulgar. There is no difference between her idea of happiness and that of the shopkeeper. This world would be, for her, the best possible if we could manage to eliminate poverty from it. Then the beautiful girl would be able to marry the sensitive young poet, rather than sell her charms to a rich elderly man who can save her family from its dire needs. Confronted with the possibility of such a Utopia we cannot help feeling grateful that human stupidity perpetuates so mean a thing as poverty, for it occasionally lends the only glimmer of meaning to human life.

It is true that Concha Espina is "the foremost woman novelist of Spain today," as she has been called. But it should be remembered that since the death of the Countess of Pardo Bazan there has appeared no woman writer capable of doing work of permanent human significance. The fact that she is the recipient of a prize from the Academy merely attests her ideologic and artistic respectability. There is, therefore, very little excuse for the translation of these two books into English. For though writers of universal merit are few today in Spain, there are, nevertheless, several more deserving of the honor of translation than she.

The translations have been well done.

ELISEO VIVAS

Some Essayists

Modern Essays. (Second Series.) Selected by Christopher Morley. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

The East Window and The Car Window. By Bert Leston Taylor. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Pearls & Pepper. By Robert Palfrey Utter. Yale University Press. $2.50.

The Mancroft Essays. By Arthur Michael Samuel. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

Now That I'm Fifty. By Albert Payson Terhune. George H. Doran. $2.

Summer Ghosts and Winter Topics. By Felix E. Schelling. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

Beauty, Truth, and Humour. By Henry Charles Duffin. Oxford: Basil Blackwell. 4s. 6d.

MR. MORLEY announces that he has chosen these essays for an "imaginary undergraduate," more aptly described by our grandfathers as the young person, but it is my most earnest recommendation that they be read by the generation which produced the other collections here reviewed. If there be a millionare bootlegger anxious to emulate the Medici, I hereby urge upon him the service of distributing the "Modern Essays" to the writers under discussion—not excluding Mr. Morley—as an act worthy of the supreme patron of belles-lettres. For if they do nothing else, the essays in this volume demonstrate beyond question or doubt that it is possible to write entertainingly and significantly without imitating the two saccharine saints who opened and closed the nineteenth century. Mr. Morley shows again in his preface and slight introductions the influence of that stilted, Stevensonian geniality and the lulling, Lamb-like love of life which are considered the sine qua non of essay writing by most gentlemen nearing their grand climacteric. His paragraphs abound in "high-minded publishers," "nicest people," "high-spirited trade organs," and "most amiable of men." The undergraduate, male and female, is anything but imaginary to me, and I venture to proffer the opinion that the "promissory pupil" of today is sufficiently different from the collegiate literary enthusiast of Mr. Morley's year to call such "kindly humor" sentimental slush. Nevertheless, this young person will enjoy enormously nearly every one of the essays in the book, because behind the mannerism Mr. Morley chooses to affect there is genuine literary appreciation and an understanding mind.

B. L. T., "requiescat in pace," was blessed with broad sympathies and good taste, and he also possessed enough native wit to show through the dressing-gown of an adopted manner. Seated at the East window, however, he drew it close around him; when traveling he naturally discarded the encumbrance. A literary Baedeker would mark him with a double star—modern but worth while. Mr. Utter, on the other hand, saves part of his work from the state of boredom which only the repetition of a no-longer-popular style can produce less through his modernity than by virtue of his youth. Mr. Utter is still one year shy of fifty, and there is resiliency as well as vigor in his thinking.

Fifty is such a silly season. It is the period when life is so thoroughly a matter of routine that nothing untoward happens. And this absence of accidents is set down by the smug ancients as owing to their accumulated wisdom and mellowed experience. Then out of the fulness of their maturity these mad wags dispense "wise saws and modern instances." Seated in their comfortable studies they seek to forget their commercial, political, or academic occupations by recalling their Elia and their Tusitala. Wrapped in their humorous sadness they ooze out the contemplations "blasted with antiquity," and their style is like the style of a poor relation, a fawning imitation of the patron's manner.

When in his fictitious letters he goes behind the nineteenth-century humorists to an earlier form, Mr. Samuel displays qualities of intelligent apperception and independent speculation. As for the others, "I learned," confesses Mr. Terhune, "that I have unsuspected powers as a bore." Messrs. Schelling and Duffin have not learned that yet, although it is more obvious. When an American bore puts his Touchstone philosophy into print, he is generally dull; when an English one does it, he is stupid.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Tant' Alie

Tant' Alie of Transvaal; Her Diary, 1880-1902. Translated from the Taal by Emily Hobhouse. London: Allen and Unwin, Ltd. 6s.

MEVROUW ALIE BADENHORST, born de Wet, of Mahemsvlei, District Potchefstroom, Transvaal, in the year 1900 found herself alone on her farm with her children and her Kaffir servants, her husband a prisoner of war in the camp at Simonstown, and the future dark and uncertain. On April 21 she got a letter from him, describing the sea and sea-shore landscape, both so new to his inland-bred vision, and telling her of friends, of the camp life, and of his thankfulness that he had not, as yet, been told off to the batches of prisoners being dispatched to St. Helena. He closed his letter, as usual, with affectionate greetings to all his people, "From your husband, who never forgets you." Then for a year she heard no word, good or bad, and as a means of escape from the sorrow and anxiety of her life, she "began to write this book." She went back to her childhood, and put down the story of her life up to the capture of Cronje and the exile of her husband, and then carried the narrative forward until July 3, 1902, when, peace having been made, her husband and the others came home again. "In two steps I was beside him with the cry: 'How old you look, how thin! How are you, how are you?'" And with their farm in black ruin, but with hope renewed in both by the joy of their reunion, they begin again their life, and the story ends.

I say "the story" advisedly; for although the book is virtually a diary, and though she appends by way of epilogue a special affirmation of its absolute truthfulness, Tant' Alie of Transvaal has given us a story as fascinating as any novel, a "human document," as Miss Hobhouse says Olive Schreiner called it, of unusual interest and importance. We live with her through the awful suspense, the needless suffering, the senseless indignities, the physical hardships which the Boer War brought to her and her sisters on the lonely farms and in the unspeakable concentration camps. To Tant' Alie, both her God and her country were fundamental, living realities; her passionate love of both colored and conditioned every hour of her adult life.

But in plain, vigorous phrases she gives us an unvarnished account of war as it appears both to the fighters and to the non-combatants of the invaded country. Sacred as is to her the cause for which her men are fighting, there is no war-glamor in her mind or in her book. "O that my grief," she writes, "were engraved with a pen of iron so that our children's children might know of it."

She went through the long, terrible months with a courage and gaiety and a ready helpfulness for all who had need of it, very remarkable in consideration of her own continuous illness, and the equally continuous tension under which she lived. Always she was keenly alive to and comforted by natural beauty. Her joy in the loveliness of early morning in the veldt is moving. Product of a simpler, less sophisticated age and culture than our own, she read little but her Bible and her hymns; she shared with the rest of her people a childish horror both of the sea and of hospitals; she loved and hated and believed without analysis and without subtlety. But, in reading these pages, we realize the dignity, the mettle, and the greatness of her type and of her race.

Miss Hobhouse, whose beautiful work for the women and children in the concentration camps is not forgotten, has done the world a service by her publication of this book. Her translation reads smoothly, and she has been careful to preserve the simplicity and decision of the original manuscript.

RUTH S. ALEXANDER

Euphues His English

Last Essays of Maurice Hewlett. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THE career of Maurice Hewlett was curious. He began at the apogee. His early romantic novels, "The Forest Lovers," 1898, and "The Life and Death of Richard Yea-and-Nay," 1900, caught the fancy of the times, and fixed him with precision as a late nineteenth-century euphuist and romantic. Subsequently, Hewlett experienced almost an uninterrupted diminuendo until his death, though he produced a score of books of poetry, fiction, and essays. He ended in unread celebrity with the bitter complaint that he had been immolated for the sins of his youth.

At the beginning of the war Hewlett retired to "Broad Chalke" in the Wiltshire country, and occupied himself with essays and reviews, producing four volumes of fugitive pieces. The fourth now appears as a posthumous collection of "Last Essays."

That Hewlett has had somewhat less than his due, and that he has been esteemed for the wrong things, is true. Yet there is some color for his misjudgment. The character he gave himself in "The Forest Lovers" is apparent in "Last Essays," even after one remarks the lapse of twenty-five years and the difference between a costume novel and a little essay for Mr. J. C. Squire's London Mercury. There still lingers about his pages a faint perfume of the nineties. He still wears his erudition like a crimson cloak. And in his style, ever studied, proleptic, elliptical, there is the dexterous and unremitting effort to capture a distinctive and curious manner, calculated, like Pater's, "to bring a highly qualified matter into compass at one view." Hewlett is capable of the boldest flights of cleverness and pastiche. Thereby one measures the distance he falls short of finished artistry.

In "Last Essays" he says a word regarding his French interests, Beaumarchais, Cardinal de Retz, Madame de Maintenon, Pierre de L'Estoile, and La Bruyère. He touches upon the current novel and ballad-origins, daffodils and the instincts of human nature dramatized by young ladies who have babies without husbands.

One catches Mr. Hewlett best, however, in his sophisticated return to origins. Latterly he was interested aesthetically in the English peasant, turning back with Mr. Belloc and Mr. Chesterton to the purview of history and society of a romantic Tory.

"I believe in Poverty, Love, and England," he wrote. And again: "I want men to be gentlemen, and women to be modest, I want men to have work and women to have children."

Thus Hewlett engaged in a rear-guard action with the spirit of the times, while his own spirit pensively refreshed itself upon the lineage of the Wiltshire shepherds.

GERALD HEWES CARSON

Exploiting Jefferson

The Thomas Jefferson Bible. Edited by Henry E. Jackson. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

IT is one of the ironies of history that while the theologues and pulpiteers of the land were fulminating against Jefferson for being an atheist, an infidel, and an enemy of Christ, he himself should have been occupied each night poring over the "Gospels" and clipping from them what he considered "the most sublime code of morals which has ever been offered to man." And it is another of those ironies that Jefferson's modest little anthology, to which he himself would not add one word of comment or interpretation, should now be offered to the world doused and almost drowned in unrelieved blather. The so-called Jefferson Bible itself occupies little more than eighty pages, but its editor, Dr. Henry E. Jackson, president of the College for Social Engineers, manages to make of it a volume three hundred and thirty-three pages in length! This he accomplishes partly by inserting in the anthology a passage which he is convinced Jefferson would have included had he known his own mind; partly by presenting the "Bible" in the Weymouth as well as the King James version; and largely by adding a gratuitous and attenuated preface in the best manner of the Chautauqua orator.

Typical of the preface is the passage in which Mr. Jackson laments the character of our heroes, and offers us a brand-new set to worship. Taking the Beatitudes as his measuring rod, but first changing one of the verses beyond recognition, adding another of his very own coining, and then labeling them all to suit his taste, he selects the ten worthies whom he considers the most conspicuous embodiments of the virtues described. Here they are in beatific order: Mental hospitality—Abraham Lincoln; internal resources—Francis of Assisi; self-control—Moses; healthy dissatisfaction—Socrates; intelligent sympathy—King Alfred; respect for persons—William Penn; capacity for cooperation—Confucius; public-mindedness—Joseph Mazzini; passion for justice—John Bright; duty of happiness—Robert L. Stevenson!

To speak with restraint, it is deplorable that what Jefferson affectionately called his "wee little book . . . which I call the 'Philosophy of Jesus'," should have been so unhappily exploited. It deserved better at the hands of posterity.

LEWIS BROWNE

Before Sudermann Found Himself

Das Bilderbuch Meiner Jugend. Von Hermann Sudermann. Stuttgart and Berlin: Cotta.

NONE of us who defied the Solomons of criticism and quaffed long ago the heady mixed wine of "Die Ehre" and "Heimat"—alas, how soon those glorious concoctions lost their "kick"!—has ever outgrown, surely, a feeling of gratitude to the genius who stirred a little audacious naturalism into a pitcher of sticky melodrama and made the stuff fizz and snap and tingle till we almost imagined we were getting something new. And "Frau Sorge," too, had a certain fragrance of dreariness which no one had put into fiction before. Neither the playwright Sudermann nor the novelist Sudermann fulfilled the promise of his first work; but the first work was too good to allow us to forget him. He has published an overconscious record of his life to his first regular occupation—the editing (and nearly all the writing) of a small liberal weekly with a rural circulation. These "Confessions" are as frank as Rousseau's—just how frank that is, we are not quite able to measure, since men have been known to confess to weak and ugly actions which they never committed. It might have been foreseen that the son of a man who wept because he burned a hole in his Sunday trousers, and of a woman who put her boy through school and the university by peddling milk, would develop a uniquely racy mingling of cowardice and courage, of romantic yearning and hustling enterprise. Sudermann sowed wild oats by the bushel, loafed, whined, and blundered for a long time before he came into his own. We should feel better satisfied if we could hear the other side of his quarrels with various aunts, cousins, and others; and in general there is a hardness about the book, be it confession, defense, vituperation, or the more objective passages, which is annoying. But nearly every page is alive. We have known something about some of these matters from various novels, and we are glad to have them all together here. There is a hint of a continuation, which is interesting.

ROY TEMPLE HOUSE

Books in Brief

A Perfect Day. By Bohun Lynch. Thomas Seltzer. $2.

Not in a very long time have we met anyone as insolently happy as Mr. Lynch. He is in perfect health; he is a summer guest in a luxurious country house so perfectly managed that the servants read his thoughts down to the point of presenting a tankard of beer at the very moment he desires it; he has just been left a legacy; his beloved wife is on the point of returning from a long journey, and he is preparing to present her, as a surprise, with the house they have long dreamed of. Since in "A Perfect Day" there can be no conflict but only a crescendo of contentment, the book is something of a tour de force. It is, however, quite a successful one because Mr. Lynch is too acutely conscious of the unusual character of his good fortune to write a "glad book" and because there is enough cynicism in his determination to accept his happiness without worrying about those who have less to keep him from being, like the professional optimist, depressing.

Government of the West Indies. By Hume Wrong. Oxford University Press, American Branch. $3.50.

A concise outline of the constitutional and governmental systems of the British colonies of the Caribbean that is of especial value at this moment when our own islands in that region are clamoring for more democracy and a greater amount of self-determination. The author, who is assistant professor of modern history in the University of Toronto, notes that there is a high degree of particularism in the British West Indies, and he thinks that geographical and social differences make political federation a still remote possibility.

Fenceless Meadows. By Bill Adams. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

The Middle Passage. By Daniel Chase. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Bill Adams left the sea more than twenty years ago, he tells us, physically incapacitated for living there any longer. But he is still tramping the deck in spirit, and in this volume of short stories he has set down some authentic records of sea life, especially of the old sailing-ship days into which his personal experiences reach back. Sometimes too sentimental and sometimes too melodramatic, Bill Adams is nevertheless closer to reality and better worth reading than the author of "The Middle Passage." The latter seems to know the sea too, but he has intruded into some good pages of sea adventure in the golden age of the clipper ships a love episode of only moderate interest.

International Relations Section

Get Rich Quick in Poland

By ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Warsaw, May

HOW long the swollen borders of Poland will continue, and how soon they will be dissolved by another war, is a matter on which the financiers of the Entente appear quite cold-bloodedly to be gambling. Neither business men, peasants, nor politicians count on permanence, but are rather attempting to make hay while the sun shines by exploiting the territory to the limit. The chivalrous and patriotic Poles, led easily on to desire a bigger, brighter Poland, are beginning to find that they are pulling the chestnuts out for their flattering friends in France, with rather more danger of burned fingers than they yet appreciate.

The recent Italian loan of 400 million lire, for instance, is for ten years, which appears to be the limit of the time chance which foreign financiers wish to take. It bears 10 per cent. It is accompanied by the condition that Poland must purchase 40 per cent of all her tobacco, which she sells through a state monopoly, from two specified Italian firms. It is common comment in Warsaw that these firms will make in four or five years out of Poland a profit amounting to more than the entire loan, which will thus be repaid three times or more during the ten years.

The natural comment of an arriving American on this transaction is that these two favored firms must stand well with Mussolini, if the power of the Italian banks is thus used to enrich them; but such a comment meets only a blank stare in Warsaw, for they are completely accustomed to similar deals with all the Entente nations. These nations are not treating Poland as a colony, since for a colony one assumes some responsibility; but rather as a temporary field for exploitation, which need not be either preserved or built up. France, which profits most, has large concessions in the oil-fields of Galicia and is exploiting them in a method designed to take out as much in as little time as possible, without building up any permanent industry in a territory which may sooner or later cease to be Polish, and hence pass from her control. While the Polish Government is anxious to have new borings made and refineries built, France insists on exporting the oil in a crude state and building up refineries in France instead of Poland. With ten thousand workers employed in extracting oil, barely sixteen hundred are employed in any work of refining, where over thirty thousand might profitably be working if Poland refined her own oil. France even succeeds in obtaining preferential treatment over Polish citizens, in that she is allowed to export oil duty free, while Polish companies must pay for export customs.

All countries in Eastern and Central Europe have adopted the fashion of high or even prohibitive customs on luxuries, in order to keep their money in the country and prevent the fall in the currency. But a special convention between France and Poland compels Poland to accept all the French wines, silks, and perfumes that may be sent her, charging no more than pre-war duties. Only French wine may be imported into Poland; the Polish Jews now growing grapes in their vineyards in Palestine can send none home to their folks. France demands and secures a tariff 40 per cent lower than Germany has, so that German firms, shipping to Poland, often send via France to save duty.

England's special province is the great forest country of East Poland. Here lies the Bieloviezhe, the special hunting preserve of the former Czar, one of the oldest and most famous forests in Europe—thousands of square miles of primeval timber, on the borders of Russia and Poland. The inhabitants around are White Russian, but the territory was given to Poland by recent treaties. It is cheerfully stated in Warsaw that England consented to this extension of Poland's borders for the sake of getting the forests on cheaper terms than she could hope from Russia. Aurochs (European bison) and wild boar and wolves by thousands are still raised on this preserve of the old Czar; but the stand of timber is being ruthlessly cut in the reckless way we have known in American woods, without the replanting and careful cutting that are Europe's traditions. Small Polish capitalists made the first profits from it. They obtained rights to cut government timber in return for giving half the cutting to the state. This right applied only to special areas planned by experts for the purpose of improving the forests with rights of way and by the removal of dead areas. But wholesale bribery of local inspectors enabled the lumbermen to bring out the best timber recklessly. With a sinking Polish mark which made their freight bills and wage rolls practically nothing, they bore the wood out to Danzig and loaded it on ships for England. One typical lumberman, as described by a friend, had "in 1916 only his ten fingers" and now has six million dollars.

From the beginning Englishmen were prominent sharers in these stock companies, though at first they had to be organized as Polish corporations. But the present stabilizing of the mark, with consequent stable freight rates and wages, together with the rising cost of bribes, has frozen out the smaller Polish firms. Hence comes a big concession to England, arranged only a few weeks ago and giving to a big English company the rights to the greater part of these thousands of miles of forest.

The Poles have rather courted this situation, though it does not now entirely please them; and Polish capitalists are taking advantage of it on much the same kind of temporary basis of quick returns. Since the Great War, one slice of territory after another has been added to Poland with the consent of the Entente, mainly for the purpose of injuring Germany or Russia, but occasionally for mere lack of concerted will to oppose some new annexation by the Poles. So at present from 35 to 40 per cent of both the territory and population of Poland is not only non-Polish, but distinctly anti-Polish. All the fringes of the country are inhabited by annexed and none-too-willing citizens, who maintain a placid belief that the next turn of the wheel will hand them to some other nation.

I overheard three or four White Russian peasants, in the stables of a Polish landowner, discussing a regulation which had obliged one of them to sign himself as a Pole. "But we are not Poles; we are White Russians," said one emphatically. "Since the land is now Polish, we also are Poles," said the other. "It does not matter to be Poles for a while. When Russia comes back, we will be Russians again."

Such is the general expectation in Eastern Poland. The Polish Government tries to counteract it by dividing up the estates of old Russian landowners, and establishing colonies of Polish soldiers "to stiffen the frontier." But the territory is too vast to be thus stiffened. It comprises perhaps one-fourth of Poland, throughout which the young men drafted to the army must first learn the Polish language in order to understand the commands.

But, meantime, fortunes are being made! In Upper Silesia the old German state mines, seized by the Polish Government, were organized into a private stock company, with French capital owning half the stock and the Polish state the other half. Korfanty, that famous patriot leader of the guerrilla attacks on German towns which were finally successful in taking Upper Silesia from Germany against the will of its inhabitants—Korfanty now represents the Polish state in the big coal trust and has become one of the richest men in Poland.

A scandal like our own Teapot Dome is starting in the Polish Senate, where they are investigating Kukharski, formerly a minister of commerce and industry, and before that of finance, who lent two million Swiss francs of state funds to a Polish-French stock company, which obtained from the Government a confiscated Russian textile firm of world renown. Later, Kukharski allowed the loan to be repaid in Polish marks, which had depreciated to ten or fifteen thousand dollars. Still later, he was discovered to be financially interested in the company himself.

Oil, timber, and coal are going out of the land, in ways which build up no enduring industry but rather rob the territory. There are a few Poles who see this, but the majority are still dazzled by the dreams of Polish greatness by the aid of the Entente and with the friendship of France. But if, ten years or so from now, Russia or Germany or both begin to reach out for lands which are still theirs by population and desire, it will probably matter very little by that time to the business groups in the lands of the Entente. They are taking the high profits that go with risk; they are basing their plans on uncertainty and getting while the getting is good.

A Letter by Matteotti

THE causes of the assassination of the Italian Socialist Deputy, G. Matteotti, were described in an article by James Fuchs in The Nation for July 30. His careful inquiry into the financial corruption of the Fascist regime as well as its electoral intrigue and terrorism, and his readiness to publish his findings, directly brought about his death. It is interesting to reproduce in this connection a letter by Signor Matteotti himself, printed in the London Statist for June 7, giving some of the slain Deputy's opinions and facts:

In the Statist for April 26, 1924, some data are given in regard to Italian finances; but these data the Italian Government has published in order to give an optimistic impression, and unfortunately they are insufficient for an exact estimate, and they cannot survive criticism.

It is said that the deficit of the budget in the financial year 1921-1922 amounted to about 7,000 millions in Italian lire, while the deficit in the first year of Fascist Government (1922-1923) is said to be only 3,000 million.

As a matter of fact, the deficit for the year 1921-1922 was really 15,760 million, but more than 12,500 million referred to extraordinary war expenditure and to the purchase of provisions (Chapter 64/71 for the Italian army, 95/96 for the navy, 164/240 for the Treasury), the payment and accounting for which had been delayed until 1922. Excluding these expenses, the real deficit for the year 1921-1922 must be calculated at no more than 3,255 million. Between this deficit and that of the Fascist year (in which all war expenses have ceased) there is a difference of only 214 millions, that is to say a very small improvement.

It is true that the estimates for 1922-1923 had been for a deficit of 4,000 million, but the improvement to 3,000 million was the result of the simple fact that the revenue of the "douane" had been estimated erroneously as 250 millions instead of 1,208 millions, to which this revenue really proved to amount. This was merely an error and indicates no improvement, because in the year 1921-1922 the same revenue was 1,059 millions as compared with an estimate, equally erroneous, of 151 millions.

It is perfectly true that "all the usual statistical indices of the conditions of the country indicate a constant progress in Italy"; but that has nothing whatever to do with Fascism, for it is merely the result of a development which began several years before the Fascist regime. When, for instance, it is said that the Government of Mussolini has diminished expenditure, that is not true. The expenditure for the year 1921-1922 was 24,851 millions, as compared with 21,000 million and 20,000 million in the years 1922-1923 and 1923-1924; but the first of these years included, as we have already said, some exceptional war expenditure. The number of the Ministries has been reduced, but not the expenditure.

The number of employees in the military and civil service has been reduced from 115,000 to 110,000 (excluding the employees of the railways); that is to say in a proportion almost equal to that of the last year of the ancien régime; the expenditure, however, has increased by more than 100 millions of lire; and in the Department of Signor Mussolini (Foreign and Home Office) the number of the employees has increased by more than 1,000. Only in the Railway Department has there been a great reduction of the employees engaged during and immediately after the war; but the chief aim of this reduction was to get rid of the employees who were not Fascists. Indeed, in the first year of Fascist administration more than 16,000 railway employees were engaged on a permanent basis to take the place of the temporary workers sent away for the sake of "economy."

The deficit in the railway budget has really been reduced from 1,258 millions (in the year 1921-1922) to 906 millions (1922-1923), but it is necessary to add that, if the cost of coal had been as high as it was during the Government of Signor Giolitti, the railway deficit of the Fascists would have reached the highest sum ever reached before, that is, more than 1,400 millions.

The only great financial "reform" of the Fascist Government is the suppression of the inheritance tax; and we consider this a grave error. If the number of citizens who pay income tax is increased, that is no particular merit of the Fascist Government, but merely the continuance of a tendency, observed also in the year before, when the number of the income-tax payers increased by more than 50,000. The Fascist "merit" consists only in having included in the tax-roll even the lowest paid workmen of public administrations, whose wages were reduced by 5 and 10 per cent.

In conclusion we may say that the financial conditions of Italy are improving continually, but not in consequence of any reduction of expenditure effected by the Fascist Government. The improvement is really due to the fiscal measures of the preceding governments, which increased the income from taxes from 2,050 millions in 1913-1914 to 7,400 in 1919-1920, and to 12,700 in 1921-1922. This sum has not been increased in the first year of the Fascist era, 1922-1923. It is certain, however, that the weight of these taxes (that certainly will give Italy a budget without deficit in a few years) is really very heavy considering the economic condition of the country. . . . The cost of living is still rising, while wages are diminished by about 15 to 20 per cent. . . .

G. MATTEOTTI

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 20, 1924 No. 3085

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 173
EDITORIALS:
Mr. Davis Accepts 176
Stepping on Haiti 177
British Humor 177
Hunting Red Witches 178
JOSEPH CONRAD. By H. L. Mencken 179
LA FOLLETTE IN WASHINGTON. By Arthur Warner 180
NEW MEXICAN MELODRAMA. By Helen Black 181
THESE UNITED STATES—XLVIII. NEW HAMPSHIRE: NOT YET ABANDONED. By Ralph D. Paine 183
FROM THE BOOK OF EXTENUATIONS. By Edmund Vance Cooke .. 186
NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
Modern Marriage and Ancient Laws. By Arthur Garfield Hays 187
PARTY GOVERNMENT EBBS. By William Hard 189
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 190
CORRESPONDENCE 191
BOOKS:
Colonies of England. By Charles M. Andrews 192
A Momentous Voyage. By C. Hartley Grattan 193
The Tragic Lift. By J. W. Krutch 194
Coal Mining. By Winthrop D. Lane 194
In Argentina. By Ernest Herman Hespelt 195
A Musical Chronicle. By Henrietta Straus 195
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Labor in Greece. By George Saranton 197
The Conference: An Analysis 198
Bossing the Far East 199

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR
IRITA VAN DOREN, LITERARY EDITOR
ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

JOHN W. DAVIS has appeared before the United States Supreme Court seven times since he returned from his ambassadorship in London in 1921 and resumed private practice. Almost every one of these cases cuts into an important social issue. To summarize them is to summarize the choice John Davis made when he faced the question of the character of practice which he would enter. The New York World has been chalking to his credit cases which he argued, when Solicitor General, in the routine discharge of his duties. These are cases in which he appeared by his own choice. Let voters who doubt The Nation's objection to John W. Davis study this list:

1. United Mine Workers vs. Coronado Coal Co. (259 U. S. 344). Mr. Davis attempted to recover triple damages from the national union for injury sustained in a local strike, which he claimed was a conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce in non-union coal.
2. Pennsylvania Coal Co. vs. Mahon. (260 U. S. 393). Mr. Davis defended the coal company against a Pennsylvania statute to prevent sub-surface mining where life and property would be endangered.
3. New York City vs. N. Y. Telephone Co. (261 U. S. 312). Mr. Davis defended the telephone company.
4. Pennsylvania & Ohio vs. West Virginia. (262 U. S. 553). Mr. Davis appeared for interests seeking to prevent West Virginia's use of its own natural gas.
5. American Bank vs. Federal Reserve Bank. (262 U. S. 643). Farmers Bank vs. Federal Reserve Bank. (262 U. S. 649). Mr. Davis defended the Federal Reserve System's effort to curtail the power of the State banks.
6. Window Glass Manufacturers vs. United States. (263 U. S. 402). This was a suit under the Sherman law, brought by the United States against the glass manufacturers' and the glassworkers' union. Mr. Davis represented the manufacturers—not, as often reported, the union.
7. United States vs. Coffee Exchange. (263 U. S. 611). Mr. Davis appeared for the Coffee Exchange in a suit by the United States under the Sherman law.

MORE THAN ONE OLD-PARTY Congressman has called in recent weeks to renew his friendship with editors of The Nation and solicit aid in winning indorsement in his district by the La Follette forces. Such calls are signs of the times. Representative Fiorello LaGuardia, after ample time for meditation upon the exigencies of metropolitan politics, has read himself out of the Republican Party and into the La Follette independent camp, and his election in New York City seems assured. La Follette's magnificently clean-cut statement in opposition to the Klan will not, we believe, hurt him as much as the wary politicians predict. There is a mass of old-fashioned decency in this country which will respond to such frankness. The victory of Jack Walton in the Democratic primary in the Klan-ridden State of Oklahoma is eloquent evidence of the decline of the Klan in the region of its erstwhile glory. Klan-indorsed candidates won in other States, but other issues were dominant. All Oklahoma knew that the Klan had impeached Walton and put him out of office because of his spectacular fight on it, and if he wins the election, as he did the primary, it will mean that Oklahoma is disgusted with the Klan. The political year may end better than the dismal prophets assume.

WHEN THE KAISER insisted that the United States had entered a Gentleman's Agreement in 1897 which virtually made us a part of the Entente, serious historians replied "Stuff and nonsense." The Kaiser was, of course, wrong; but the revelation on August 7 at the Williamstown Institute of a secret "executive understanding" made by President Roosevelt in 1905, just before the close of the Russo-Japanese War, makes one rub one's eyes and wonder. Tyler Dennett, who had been rummaging around among President Roosevelt's "private papers," discovered a strange document, known in diplomatic parlance as an "agreed memorandum." According to the New York Herald-Tribune

> The agreement, concluded by a personal representative of Colonel Roosevelt and a Japanese envoy just before the opening of the Portsmouth peace conference, gave Japan a free hand in Far Eastern affairs to the extent of justifying it in extending a protectorate over Korea, and even in assuming charge of Korea's foreign affairs, and in return it extracted from Japan a pledge not to covet the Philippines.

JOHN VAN ANTWERP MACMURRAY, chief of the division of Far Eastern affairs in the Department of State, recognized the authenticity of this document, but insisted that

> It was in no sense a treaty. It was a wholly personal understanding as to the attitude which President Roosevelt, in the exercise of his executive discretion, was prepared to take under given circumstances, and, important as it was in determining the relationship of this country to Far Eastern questions then at issue, its importance may not be in the fact that it bound our government to anything, but in the fact that the Chief Executive had definitely formulated the policy upon which he might be counted to act.

State Department officials may be interested in such technicalities. The ordinary citizen will realize with horror that President Roosevelt thereby made the United States a partner in the subjugation of Korea and a partisan at a peace conference where it supposedly acted as neutral. Do the "private papers" of our Presidents contain any more records of such secret diplomacy?

THE GERMANS seem to have been the hit of the London Conference. After Americans, French, and British had wrangled for weeks and become rather tired of one another, they sent for the Germans, rather dreading the event. The Germans arrived, and apparently were pleasant to lunch with and tactful in conference. They did not growl back when Ramsay MacDonald sternly greeted them with an announcement of his impending departure on the noon train for Scotland. They liked MacDonald and liked Herriot and liked the Americans, and accepted most of the ingenious technical compromises which had been worked out without them. (A summary of these compromises, borrowed from the valuable Bulletin of the Foreign Policy Association, we print in this week's International Relations Section.) Only on one point did they insist: that the French and Belgian troops be withdrawn from the Ruhr. That was one of the points which everyone had been dodging energetically. It was "outside the agenda." Sooner or later, however, it had to be faced, and the German insistence upon it as a necessity of their internal political situation rather helped matters. Herriot wanted to withdraw from the Ruhr, but he too feared his domestic enemies, and the danger of a reactionary outbreak in Germany provided him with ammunition. So the conference ends in excellent good-will. The Dawes Plan is launched in a most auspicious atmosphere.

THE FLURRY OVER THE POLITICAL and diplomatic questions involved in the Russo-British negotiations has obscured the solid achievement of the business men and experts who hammered out the trade agreement which is incorporated in the general treaty. England will be doing more than merely "signing a blank check" even if she ratifies the treaty before the details of the debt and the loan proposals are worked out; she will be putting into operation a complete machinery of commercial intercourse elaborately designed to meet the needs of a capitalist and a communist government engaged in friendly trade. The agreement gives Great Britain most-favored-nation treatment in the matter of tariffs and general trade facilities, and her vessels will have the same privileges as Russian ships in Russian ports. It gives England the same right as Italy to carry on coastwise shipping between certain specified ports in the Black Sea. It gives diplomatic immunity to the persons and offices of the Russian Trade Delegation in England except in their capacity as commercial agents. It guarantees Russia's right to claim as property of the Soviet Government all ships of Russian registry that come into British ports no matter who the present owners may be. It allows for the separate negotiation of treaties or trade agreements by Russia with the British dominions, including the Irish Free State and India.

THIS AGREEMENT MEANS MUCH to England, which, through a dozen different trading corporations, is carrying on a lively commerce with Russia in machinery, lumber, manufactured goods, and flax. It would mean something to the United States but for the sheer insanity that runs through our Russian policy. Already several companies, incorporated under our laws and authorized by the Russian Government for trade in the United States, are carrying on business with American exporters and manufacturers. But, thanks to Mr. Hughes, our ships in Russian ports must pay for wharfage, piloting, and other facilities five or six times the amount paid by Italian or British vessels. The tariff levied on our goods is higher. Our agents and business men have neither ordinary consular services nor the protection of an American passport. All this because Mr. Hughes seems to believe, in the face of considerable evidence, that Russia has no government.

YOU CAN COUNT ON ENGLAND to produce from within her own borders as severe critics as will be found among her worst enemies. We commented a few weeks ago on a British judge who dared to commend the butchery at Amritsar. Promptly Mr. George Lansbury stood up in the House of Commons and made the following motion:

> To call attention to the following statement reported as having been made by Mr. Justice McCardie in the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice during the trial of the libel action brought by Sir Michael O'Dwyer, late lieutenant-governor of the Punjab, against Sir C. Sankaran Nair, formerly a member of the Executive Council of the Viceroy and Governor General of India, viz.: "Speaking with full deliberation and knowing the whole of the evidence given in this case, I express my view that General Dyer, in the grave and exceptional circumstances, acted rightly, and, in my opinion, he was wrongly punished by the Secretary of State for India"; and to move that an humble Address be presented to His Majesty praying that he will cause the removal from the bench of the High Court of Judicature in England of Mr. Justice McCardie, on the ground that he is unfitted to carry out the judicial duties attaching to his high office.

The motion was, to be sure, not pressed. Prime Minister MacDonald felt that discussion of the subject would only add to the harm already done by the "objectionable" comment, which was, he said, "delivered at the conclusion of a lengthened and somewhat heated trial; and the very form in which it was couched shows that the learned judge was not informed as to what took place."

IN INDIA the decision of an English judge supporting the Amritsar action is reverberating; Japan is raging with the insult of national inferiority thrown in her face by the United States; China is resentful over the domineering interference of the Western Powers in dictating when and how she shall turn over Czarist Russian property to the Soviets after her recognition of Soviet Russia. All, according to the Oriental papers, are affronts which white superior peoples feel they can safely deal to an inferior people. "Asia for the Asiatics" is a cry that is gathering in volume. "The cry of Asiatic unity," declares an editorial in Forward (Calcutta), "does not emphasize a Monroe Doctrine for Asia; it does not enjoin the law of exclusion. Asia does not want to expel others, she wants to live herself. . . . The Orient has common sentiments, common traditions, and common ideals. The mighty mission of every Asiatic youth is therefore to recover the rights which the Orient ought to have always exercised, to restore the equilibrium between East and West, and to strive for Asiatic independence to the most complete success, as leading to the world peace." Japan in her present humiliation talks of an Asiatic Doctrine with Japan playing the part of Uncle Sam in the Monroe Doctrine. Tagore said recently that her hurt has been the greater because she felt as a result of her immense progress in Western civilization that she had been accepted as Western while the rest of Asia remained Oriental. He added that the rebuff will probably be good for Japan and for the unity of the peoples of Asia.

EVERY COUNTRY, we suppose, has to have its Bernhardis. We have Rear Admiral W. L. Rodgers, retired, late chairman of the executive committee of the general board of the United States Navy. Rear Admiral Rodgers has been stirring Williamstown with his demand that we arm for a war which he, relying on Henry Pratt Fairchild's statistical tables, predicts as coming one hundred years hence—on that day, to be exact, when some still-to-be-born doctor emerges from the delivery room victorious and announces that the population of this country has reached a total of 200,000,000. "If our successors remain a virile people, as the world fills up they will remain armed to take what they want at the expense of others," says the admiral. "If there is any manhood left in the American people" we will—upon reaching the 200,000,000 mark—go to war "in order to keep our place in the world, protect our population, and give it a place to go to at the expense of other nations." It is a little difficult to argue with a gentleman who after retiring from a busy life in the navy mounts a Berkshire hill and looks one hundred years into the future. There is really nothing to do but to cry "Hurrah!" to each of his impressive predictions. After all, if the rest of the war-mongers would confine their efforts to a future a full century distant this generation could plug along in very pleasant peace.

WHETHER JUDGE CAVERLY of Chicago gives the boy murderers of Robert Franks the maximum penalty or not the case marks a new attitude toward crime and criminals. Defense lawyers often assume the attitude: "My client may have committed this crime, but let's see you prove it"! Clarence Darrow, defense lawyer for Loeb and Leopold, said in effect: "My clients did the deed, and we are going to find out the reason—not the reason they think they did it, but the causes in their training and character, of which they themselves are not aware." It is true that only rich prisoners could afford the expensive psychiatrists who made this analysis; but through their wealth these prisoners have demonstrated the kind of justice every prisoner should have. The prosecuting attorney's rage is natural—for a man who takes evident delight in inflicting punishment. Not this case alone is at stake but his profession. When crime becomes a matter for pathologists, when we cease talking in terms of guilt and begin to talk in terms of psychological cause and prevention, lawyers for criminal prosecution—or defense—may no longer be needed.

HENRI DUMAY, publisher of the Quotidien, the Paris radical daily newspaper which played so large a part in putting Herriot in office, served his newspaper apprenticeship in America, on the New York World, in the days when American newspapers still lived adventurously. And he has just performed on the other side of the ocean a feat of which James Gordon Bennett, who sent Stanley across Africa and the Jeannette toward the Pole, would be envious. Frenchmen were vastly interested in the fate of Miguel Unamuno and of Soriano, the Spanish intellectuals whom the dictatorship exiled to a tropic island. Dumay accordingly chartered a yacht and set sail to free them. He landed on the tiny island of Fuerteventura, succeeded in rescuing the Spaniards, and set sail homeward, with a front-page story as well as the two exiles aboard. As a story his feat lost its "edge" through the fact that while the two exiles were sailing toward Madeira and safety the Spanish Government amnestied them. But as a gallant venture, in the best tradition of the heroic days of journalism, Dumay's act deserves its niche in the hall of newspaper fame.

NO SOONER DO AMERICANS stop taking advertising seriously—those at least who read the American Mercury and the cynical paragraphers of the daily papers—than Britishers fall into the dismal habit. The English reviews reported the International Advertising Convention recently held at Wembley with a reverence that was depressing. Mr. St. Loe Strachey's leading editorial in the Spectator was respectful enough to herald at least a second Milton. The Manchester Guardian issued a resplendent supplement in black and gold in honor of the convention. And the source of all this eloquence, the convention itself? Here is a sample of its deliberations, part of an address on church advertising:

> The willingness of the newspaper editor to cooperate with the churches is shown in the report of the "Back to the Bible Bureau" of Cincinnati, Ohio, for the year 1923. That report shows that 1,500 newspapers are printing Bible texts and verses every day in the year, and more than 90 per cent of these newspapers are carrying these vital messages on their editorial pages. This is an editorial feature carried by the newspapers in preferred positions at their own expense. The director of the bureau, supported by a wealthy churchman of Cincinnati, estimates that more than $3,000,000 of reading-matter space had been contributed by the newspapers to the publication of Bible texts.

Is it unfair to accuse the advertising profession of what a pungent old Socialist used to call "cashing in on Christ"?

Mr. Davis Accepts

MR. WILSON at his best seldom surpassed the beauty and the occasional eloquence of Mr. Davis's speech of acceptance. It more than bears out the belief of The Nation that Mr. Davis's nomination brought to the front a speaker of rare ability and charm. What a relief that is after these years of senseless and meaningless rhetoric from the pens of Harding and Coolidge, words intended to conceal thought or to hide real purposes or to cover up the fatal lack of genuine education and of brains. To find now a candidate who not only respects the King's English but uses it with literary skill must rejoice even those who, like ourselves, prefer another leader. It lifts the whole debate to a higher plane to have a keynote struck like this, to have an opponent who delivers hard blows with perfect chivalry. You can see him saluting with his rapier before he makes his touch. You can see him combining skill with grace and complete courtliness to his adversaries, and yet perceive the iron wrist which guides the stroke. More than that, you can feel the genuine indignation with which he, as an American, resents the insult and indignity put upon his country by those who have dragged our good name in the mire and allowed corruption to reach the very sanctuary of our government. Neither Mr. Coolidge nor his associates, so lukewarm in denunciation of evil, can read Mr. Davis's indictment of them and not feel the heat of his steel. At more than one place he lunges with a power and force not to be countered when he seeks to indict or to convict. If the whole issue were that of honesty in government, without regard to the issues which shape public and private honesty; if it were all a matter of fine personality in the candidate; if there were not profound and far-reaching economic questions involved, we should be willing to grant that the Democrats had a candidate with a compelling appeal to the public.

But there lies the hitch. When we pass beyond John W. Davis, the prosecutor, we strike a minor key. He tells us nothing that is new and has few remedies to suggest. He rightly would have Calvin Coolidge burn with indignation at the wrongdoing of his party associates, but when it comes to the wrongs of great masses of Americans there is no burning indignation on Mr. Davis's side and no advocacy of deep and far-reaching remedies. He does not answer completely the one question which counts today: "Under which king, Bezonian?" What the American people want to know is whether this man really puts property above human rights, whether he stands with the aspirations of the masses or whether he is with those whom privilege and fortune have placed in such advantageous positions as to disadvantage the rest of the citizenship. It is not enough to denounce the Republicans for truckling to privilege and misusing the machinery of go-ernment to make the strong stronger and the rich richer. He speaks for a party whose hands are not clean. He says, for instance, brave and welcome words about race prejudice as "alien to the spirit of America," yet his party is held together and rendered dominant in all our Southern States only because of a most un-Christian race prejudice. What if he should speak out against that? Mr. Davis waxes eloquent as to the Constitution: "I would hold in contempt any public official who took with uplifted hand an oath to support the Constitution, making thereby a mental reservation whereby a single word of that great document is excluded from his vow." But, like everybody else, Mr. Davis knows that sacred document to be violated constantly in the disfranchisement of millions of Americans because of the color of their skins. Will he have us understand that if elected he will right that wrong, that he will help cut down the Southern representation in Congress as the Constitution specifies shall be done? If he does, the South will disavow him overnight. Will he, if elected, obey the spirit as well as the letter of the prohibition law or will he not?

These are searching and vital questions that transcend beauty of diction and personal rectitude. It is not enough for this man to say that he is one of the progressives who "think of every governmental policy first of all in its bearing upon human rights rather than upon material things." For it was this same John W. Davis who, although he speaks out now against the use of injunctions in labor disputes, remained on the board of directors of the Santa Fe Railroad during the last railroad strike when that road, one of the "bitter-enders," profited by the Daugherty-Wilkerson injunction, the most outrageous ever issued, which would have taken from labor every right that it had won. John W. Davis was silent then. More than that, he was the company's advocate in the famous Coronado Coal Company case before the Supreme Court. Had he won that case he would have smashed the United Mine Workers irretrievably—their human rights would then have come long after the property rights of those whose retainer he took. If he is under a different flag now it must be made known to us in far clearer language than he has yet used.

Take the railroads, too. Mr. Davis has nothing to say about them save to declare that the farmer is entitled to "adequate service of transportation at reasonable rates." Of course. Why not? Everybody will agree to that and to his similar generalization that the railroads should be adequately paid for the service they render. But what does it all mean? How does it help us toward the solution of one of our most deep-seated problems, brought to the front again last week by the greatest of railway mergers? What has the director of the Santa Fe to say upon the great question of railway regulation, upon the responsibilities of railway ownership?

Elsewhere too we have the politician's tendency to the general statement which offends no one and leads nowhere. In the matters of a tariff for revenue only and the League of Nations he is clearest and most specific. No one can read those passages and not know where Mr. Davis stands. He is for our entry into the League. He refuses to believe that the "fatal word never" has been written across our foreign policy as to the League. He is sure that the League will survive. He does not care much about the terms of our adherence or the language in which they are clothed. "Deeds are of more consequence than words." But in order to square himself with the platform of his party he specifies that he does not wish America to join the League "until the common judgment of the American people is ready for the step." Then he utters the extraordinary nonsense that "we waited for this judgment to ripen in order that we might enter the war"! The plain people had nothing to do with our entering the war; they had elected a President because "he kept us out of war." And when Mr. Davis declares that his party conducted the war "without scandal or corruption," he presumes too much. It is no defense to say that there have been no convictions as yet. There are certain things which do not have to be proved in a court of law and this is one of them.

Finally we return again to the question of this man's point of view—this man who came back from his ambassadorship and chose the seats and the service of the mighty, who since that time has argued seven cases before the Supreme Court, in every one of which he stood for special interests, even appearing for concerns which sought to prevent the State of West Virginia, his own State, from using its own natural gas. He has not a word for the fight against monopoly, which La Follette puts in the forefront of his campaign. There is not one syllable in his entire speech to recall Woodrow Wilson's "New Freedom" with its passionate and moving appeal to the American people to rise against the big-business mastery of the Government of the United States, to take the control out of the hands of Wall Street, in which Mr. Davis by open and honest choice has sought and found his livelihood, under whose flag he enlisted in 1921. Wall Street hated Wilson because of that demand of his for freedom and deliverance. We very much fear that Mr. Davis will not win his way as a pa'adin of the people, nor rank as a real Progressive, until he forsakes generalities and wins not the approval but the bitter hostility of the forces that dominate Wall Street.

Stepping on Haiti

HAITI is too small to stay in the headlines. The juggernaut of American imperialism is rolling on, crushing the life out of the proud Negro republic, and the American people are unaware of the bitter crimes being committed in their name.

We, the American people, conquered Haiti in 1915. There has been no legislature, no legal government in Haiti, since Smedley Butler, now settling the affairs of Philadelphia, appeared pistol in hand before the Haitian Senate (too boldly patriotic to do the conqueror's will) and dissolved it. No elections have been held. A puppet government has held power, ruling in the interest of American economic development, and ruling brutally. One branch of the government remained in Haitian hands—the courts. The Americans or their puppet government might issue decrees muzzling the press and forbidding criticism of the conqueror's acts; the courts almost invariably refused, as patriots should, to hold Haitian editors guilty. Again and again the complaint has been made that the courts were partial, and preferred Haitians to marines. Naturally, what Haitian would not? Now this last bulwark of Haitian freedom is being destroyed. On July 28, by decree, the illegal Council of State abolished the permanent tenure of the magistracy. Henceforth insubordinate judges can, and will, be removed by executive fiat. Doubtless we shall read in navy publicity that the courts were corrupt and the magistrates ignorant; the fact is that the magistrates are being dismissed because they were too patriotic.

Elections should, constitutionally, have been held last January. Without sanction by the marines or the puppet government many Haitians insisted on exercising their constitutional rights and voting. A Senate was elected. This Senate, although never sworn into office by the powers that be, has just met. It was particularly aroused by the action of the American authorities in negotiating, in behalf of Haiti, regarding a frontier dispute of long standing between Haiti and the Dominican Republic. It is reported that traces of oil have been discovered in the disputed territory, which makes the negotiations particularly interesting. Faced with the possible alienation of their land by their conquerors the Senators drew up this protest:

> The Republic of Haiti is still under the military occupation of the United States and the Government which rules there is not the free expression of the people's will. It is the duty of the Senate to protest against the initiative of this Government in undertaking, in the present circumstances, to settle the Haitian-Dominican dispute.
>
> The Senate, in the name of the people from whom it obtains its powers, and under reserve of the authority of the High Court of Justice, declares void and of no effect any act which transfers Haitian territory to a foreign state, company, or individual without the formal consent of the authorized representatives of the nation; and declares that any citizen participating in such an arrangement is a traitor to his country.
>
> (SIGNED) Cauvin, César, Charmant, Honoré, Sandaire, Télémaque, Sylvain, Glémaud, Hudicourt, Senators.

Americans applaud such courage and independence when little nations display it against other great nations. Are they blind and dumb when a weak people attempts to preserve its integrity against their own race?

British Humor

FOR many years, with a wistful sort of humility, Americans have been making fun of the British sense of humor. We have been trying to persuade ourselves by cracking jokes about English jokes, that our breed of jokes is the best. But patriotism must faint before the attacks of science, and science has now come along, in the form of Dr. C. W. Kimmins, of the University of London, to tell us the truth about American versus British humor.

Dr. Kimmins is, to be sure, an Englishman, but we must not suspect him of anything so frail and human as a national bias. He has spent a lifetime investigating the causes, symptoms, and variations of humor among the races, nations, sexes, and age strata of mankind, and he has just laid his findings before the British Association for the Advancement of Science, meeting at Toronto. According to Dr. Kimmins humor begins to divide into its higher and lower branches when the child reaches the age of twelve. After that the humor of English children expresses itself largely in the form of witty and smart retorts, while "stories and jokes of gross absurdity are far more common with American children." This is only natural, after all, when we contemplate the nature of adult wit in this still slightly uncouth land of ours:

> The nature of the environment, social outlook, and the advance of civilization must of necessity have a profound effect on the things we laugh at. . . . It stands to reason . . . there must be a great difference between English and American humor. A new country, without professional humorists . . . with a comparative absence of tradition and convention and therefore with every opportunity for great freedom of expression, must of necessity have a different type of humor from that of an old country bound by tradition and anxious, above all things, to keep well within social conventions. The rapid growth and extraordinary prosperity of America have produced a fertile soil for the development of a habit of exaggeration and what has been termed "an exuberant form of lying."

But if the subtler forms of humorous expression elude us as a nation, we may still find within ourselves the seeds of civilized growth. For the female, even on this side of the Atlantic, betrays an early appreciation of wit and the humor that lies in words. From the age of seven girls turn to riddles and verbal jokes, while their brothers, following more primitive patterns, still hoot at the misfortunes of others. At the age of eight boys begin to take an interest in words and riddles, "but they are still far behind the girls in this respect."

> The feeling of superiority as a fertile source of laughter now makes its appearance in the accounts of the mistakes of younger children. The girls here, as at other ages, associate stupidity with the boys, but there is no reciprocal action.

But the funniest thing in all the world, it appears, to young and old, black and white, male and female—even to Englishmen in their less responsible moments—is the human hat. Funnier than corpulence, funnier than a long nose, funnier than a custard pie, the hat as an appeal to laughter is the world's best bet. A big hat on a little head, a little hat on a big head, a hat rolling along a muddy street, a sat-upon hat, a derby hat, a silk hat—these are things that bind the nations of the world together in one comic brotherhood of grotesque adornment. "A suit of clothes," says the scientist, "rarely provokes laughter; it simply appears as a natural extension or suburb of the body." But the hat is an excrescence, a foreign body, a mistake. And the Englishman wears it just like the rest of us.

Hunting Red Witches

NOT long ago one M. M. Campbell was haled to court in Montreal charged with selling bogus passports for the territory of the Soviet Republic. Campbell, who used to hang people at cut rates, in competition with the official public hangman in Canada, specialized in passports for the Ukraine, which he sold for $5 each, along with visas for $3. Many Ukrainian workers resident in Canada and eager to return to their reconstructed country purchased Campbell's worthless scraps of paper, some of them putting the savings of years into a futile passage for Odessa on a steamship line recommended by Campbell. Finally one of his victims swore out a warrant for Campbell's arrest, and, after various postponements, he will be tried in September.

Campbell's "passports" were provided for him from a passport mill in Washington conducted by an "Extraordinary Diplomatic Mission of the Ukrainian People's Republic," and our United States Department of Labor has been deporting radicals on "passports" issued by the same mythical mission. The "Ukrainian People's Republic," the transitory "Government" organized in the Ukraine in 1918 by Simon Petlura, with some initial aid from the German invaders, vanished from view finally in 1920, after a fugitive career of horrible pogroms and destruction. Since the peasant uprising of that date chased Petlura over the border, he has not exercised sovereignty over so much as a Ukrainian garden-patch, and his ectoplasmic "Government" is not recognized by any Foreign Office. Apparently the Petlura Mission is one of the group of Russian diplomatic ghosts that cluster about the Czarist division of the American State Department.

The Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement of 1921 was specifically adopted by the Canadian Government in July, 1922, and under it none but official agents of the Soviet Government may issue Russian passports and visas in the British Empire. Yet the Canadian Government has never taken any steps to suppress Campbell's unauthorized consular activity. It is now more than four months since an official agency of the Soviet Government, headed by Mr. Alexander Yazikoff, established itself at Montreal. It came on the invitation of the Canadian Government, and was warmly received by representative business men, but not by the Canadian Government. Its baggage and papers were held up at the custom house; its mail was rifled by espionage agents. On March 25 Premier Mackenzie King notified Mr. Yazikoff that the Soviet Government was officially recognized by the Canadian Government, but to this day Mr. Yazikoff's library is still locked up at the custom house. Books and packages addressed to him are still being opened and read, under the supervision of a former Czarist official, in a search for "revolutionary propaganda." Mr. Yazikoff brought with him some 4,500 volumes. A good part of these were Russian technical and scientific works which he hoped to exchange for similar volumes published in Canada and the United States. He had an adequate statistical library for his official use. In addition he carried a miscellaneous assortment of books for his personal reading, ranging from tales by Kipling and Jack London to political treatises by Lenin and other Russian leaders and reports of proceedings of Russian congresses. Among some of these volumes for his personal use the purists of the custom house professed to scent propaganda. A number of the volumes are freely on sale in translation in Canadian bookshops. Mr. Yazikoff's volumes are, of course, in Russian, but these considerations had no weight with the fearful customs authorities. Their brave North American attitude is that if Mr. Yazikoff is permitted to place on his shelves Russian copies of Lenin's "Soviets at Work" or Trotzky's story of the revolution, revolutionary uprisings may take place.

Mr. Yazikoff can wait. He went to Canada to look into the possibilities of purchasing agricultural machinery and draft animals, and he knows that Soviet trade missions in London, Rome, and other places have had to go through similar periods of espionage before they could get down to the business of organizing trade. But can Canada and the United States wait? How long are we to continue hunting red witches and paying respect to diplomatic ghosts? Here is Mr. Campbell in Canada and the unfrocked priest who conducts the "Ukrainian Mission" in Washington; and in the Berkshire Hills at Williamstown college professors and army officers and "publicists" are solemnly listening to lectures on Russia by that discredited propagandist, Boris Bakhmeteff, ambassador to the United States of a government that died eight years ago. Eight years ago! The Soviet Government has survived eight years, and the United States, through Charles E. Hughes, still declines to recognize its existence, and we and Canada still take our information from such as Boris Bakhmeteff and M. M. Campbell.

Joseph Conrad

By H. L. MENCKEN

THE effort to put Conrad with the romancers, now visible among the newspaper anatomists pawing his corpse, only shows how little meaning remains in the old categories of romancers and realists. The obvious fact is, of course, that the man was a realist of the realists, for all his fondness for violent passions and outlandish scenes. "Under Western Eyes" and "The Secret Agent" are actually more realistic, in every rational sense, than anything Zola ever wrote; as for "Falk" and "Typhoon," they are so realistic that reading them is intolerable to tender minds. "To make you hear, to make you feel—before all, to make you see": that was, first and last, the aim of their author, and he proceeded to the business, not with arms waving and gonfalons flying, but with sharp eyes and a steady hand. Read the death of Nana, so scandalous a generation ago, and then turn to the death of the helmsman in "Heart of Darkness": Which is the more vivid, the more real? Where, in all Arnold Bennett, is there a place you remember with more glaring clarity than you remember the bridge of the Nan-Shan, whirling up the China coast? The old romance, with its stiff etiquette and its tinsel sentimentalities, is dead, and Conrad gave it its death-blow. He put logic into the inordinate and order into the incomprehensible. If a new Scott arose, he would give hard study to "The Rover" and "The Point of Honor"—or he would be laughed at.

Conrad's realism, indeed, went far beyond meticulous representation; it struck for the inner reality of things as well. The world as he found it had got rid of many of its old certainties, but it had taken on some new ones that were almost worse. As the ethics of Tupper had gone out the politics of H. G. Wells had come in. Men no longer believed in an anthropomorphic Deity, half amiable grandpa and half prohibition-enforcement officer, but they still believed that they knew the purpose of human life, the destiny of man—they were still full of a new and pseudo-scientific cocksureness, as idiotic at bottom as the worst dogmatism of a Calvin or a Swedenborg. It was against this dogmatism that Conrad launched himself, and against whatever was left of the older brand. Upon it he played the hose of his irony. Against it he patiently arrayed his devastating facts. His execution was excellent. Certainties dissolved into doubts, and then into absurdities. A whole theory of knowledge went to pieces, and with it a whole canon of ethics. There emerged at last his own aloof skepticism—not complacent and attitudinizing, like Anatole France's, nor bitter and despairing, like Thomas Hardy's or Mark Twain's, but rather the serene skepticism of the scientist, with no room in it for any emotion more violent than curiosity.

Conrad was forever setting himself problems, and forever coming to conclusions that left them unsolved. His method is clearest in such stories as "Lord Jim," "The Point of Honor," and "Victory"—all of them studies of human motive, and all of them ending with question marks. "He passes away under a cloud, inscrutable at heart, forgotten, unforgiven, and excessively romantic." The complete antithesis, obviously, of the conventional last chapter—the novelist wholly purged of his old omniscience. But none the less illuminating for all that. For if Conrad never answered the riddle, then he at least stated it superbly; he at least took off all its wrappings of false assumption, and revealed its inner essence. "Youth," in the ordinary sense, gets nowhere. The protagonist is a youth who does not act logically, but only instinctively. What he does would surely shock a school-teacher. But he comes out of his fantastic adventures in the end as the most real boy, perhaps, in all fiction, save only Huckleberry Finn. It is, indeed, an almost faultless piece of representation, for in it the author performs the difficult feat of getting rid of himself entirely.

As I have said, this aloofness was not in accord with the spirit of the time. The fashion that came in with the new century was for far greater assurance, even for cockiness. The methods of the laboratory began to invade the ivory tower of the novelists; if they abandoned the old scheme of rewards and punishments, it was only to adopt the new psychology, with the Freudian rumble-bumble as its final flower. Conrad stood clearly outside all this, and the fact, perhaps, is sufficient to explain his slow acceptance. Even today, though he sells, I doubt that he is genuinely read, in the sense that Wells and Bennett used to be read. He remains, for the most part, a sort of affectation, like James and Proust. Some of his books, because they happen to tell thumping good stories, have a certain mild vogue; the rest, including the best, are seldom heard of.

Efforts are often made to put the blame for all this upon what is alleged to be his difficult style. It is argued that his English, acquired relatively late in life, is stiff and obscure—that its English leaves often grow on a Polish stem. The doctrine seems to me to be nonsense. His style is not only not obscure; it is extraordinarily vigorous and clear. There is never the slightest doubt about his meaning, and more often than not he expresses that meaning in phrases that are full of melody and color. What ails the readers who find him difficult is simply that they are looking for something he hasn't got to offer, to wit, certainly, the professorial manner, the easy smugness of a Howells or a Bennett. The thing before him is not a demonstration but a problem. He is trying to throw light upon it from all sides, to get at the mystery that is in it. It interests him enormously, but it also puzzles him. He does not dogmatize about it; he speculates. The whole proceeding is as disconcerting in a novelist, to the ordinary novel reader, as it would be in a surgeon or a politician.

But even speculation could be borne if it ended in discovery—if the final chord was the comforting tonic of C major. But it never is. The reader, having gone to the book to learn something, is dashed at the end by being asked something. More, there is a dismaying tone in the question, as if no answer were really expected. Such violations of the code do not make for popularity in novelists. Conrad will be read by multitudes, perhaps, when all the folk-philosophies are abandoned and skepticism comes in. But that, I fear, will be a long, long while ahead—perhaps long after English is handed over to paleogrammarians.

La Follette in Washington

By ARTHUR WARNER

WHEN La Follette was sworn in as a United States Senator on January 4, 1906—after the congressional session had begun—he found himself in a different Washington from that which he had left fifteen years before. The country had experienced a vast commercial growth. Great new industrial corporations and trusts had come into being, and business more than ever was pulling the strings of government. Senator Sawyer was gone, and the other old-time, individualistic, self-made "roughnecks" were giving away to smoother, more sophisticated, less open manipulators of public affairs in the interest of bigger business.

So, also, the attitude toward La Follette himself had changed. Washington no longer smiled patronizingly upon him as an over-idealistic young man whose ardor for honesty and the people's rights would presently cool, but it was not alarmed at the prospect of anything which he could do there. His assignment to committees must have reminded him of his earlier experience in the House. He expressed only one preference: a place on the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Naturally he did not get it, but as compensation he was made chairman of the Committee to Investigate the Condition of the Potomac River Front, which in all its history had never had a bill referred to it—and had never met.

One of his early speeches was on the Hepburn bill, which La Follette regarded as a futile and dishonest attempt to make the public think that something was being done toward regulating railroad rates. He had talked scarcely ten minutes before he discovered that his Republican colleagues had all walked out on him, excepting only the presiding officer and Senator Kean of New Jersey, the latter having been left on guard. La Follette, realizing the intended rebuke, interrupted his prepared speech to interpolate:

> Mr. President, I pause in my remarks to say this: I cannot be wholly indifferent to the fact that Senators by their absence at this time indicate their want of interest in what I may have to say upon this subject. The public is interested. Unless this important subject is rightly settled, seats now temporarily vacant may be permanently vacated by those who have the right to occupy them at this time.

There was a round of applause from the well-filled galleries, and presently the absent Senators began returning to their seats.

La Follette had little sympathy or support in the Senate until the administration of Mr. Taft. Then the supineness and retrogression of the President caused the gradual emergence of a group of insurgent Republicans who naturally fell in step with La Follette. Failure to revise the tariff downward was the chief cause of the revolt. La Follette, to be sure, had always proclaimed himself a believer in a protective tariff, defining this as a duty on an article sufficient to offset the amount by which its labor cost in the United States exceeded that abroad. He failed to see any true application of such a principle in the Payne-Aldrich bill, besides which it manifestly was not the "downward revision" promised to the country by Taft. A decade later La Follette assailed with equal vehemence the Fordney-McCumber tariff of the Harding administration.

The Democratic landslide in the election of 1912, combined with the speedy disruption of Roosevelt's Progressive Party, left La Follette much alone again when the Wilson administration came in. This loneliness increased with the outbreak of the World War, especially with the entrance of the United States into the holocaust. Early in 1915 La Follette placed himself on the side of peace by introducing a resolution to call a conference of the neutral nations with a view to ending the carnage. The year after he stoutly opposed our huge naval appropriations. Also he demanded democratic control of our foreign policies by Congress in place of what he regarded as their autocratic and dangerous handling by the President alone. He opposed the arming of our merchant ships as likely to draw us into the war without authority from Congress. He refused to support our declaration of war against Germany, and took an equally uncompromising stand against the draft law; he proposed that the question of sending the drafted army to Europe be submitted to a popular referendum. The espionage act received his unqualified condemnation.

La Follette voted in favor of appropriations for equipping and caring for the army, on the ground that our soldiers, once in, should be protected and assisted in every

La Follette Was For—

The woman suffrage amendment to the Constitution.
The prohibition amendment to the Constitution.
The child-labor amendment to the Constitution.
Establishment of the Parcel Post.
Extension of the Postal Savings System.
Establishment of better conditions for seamen.
Eight-hour day for government employees.
Establishment of the Tariff Commission.
Establishment of the Federal Trade Commission.
Establishment of the Department of Labor.
Publicity for campaign expenses.
Howell-Barkley bill for abolishing the Railroad Labor Board.

La Follette Was Against—

Payne-Aldrich tariff in Taft's administration.
Fordney-McCumber tariff in Harding's administration.
Establishment of the Federal Reserve System.
Establishment of the Court of Commerce.
Esch-Cummins railroad law.
Ship-subsidy bill in Harding's administration.
Volstead act.
Declaration of war against Germany.
Conscription.
Espionage act.
Treaty of Versailles.
Four-Power Treaty.

possible way. He believed, though, that money for war purposes should be raised by taxation rather than bond issues. "It is impossible to issue bonds without inflating the currency, depreciating the value of the dollar, and increasing prices," he wrote in La Follette's Magazine in September, 1917, thus clearly forecasting the precise difficulties with which the nation was later confronted. La Follette was bitterly assailed by the press for a speech touching on the war which he made in St. Paul on September 20, 1917. The Senate was asked to expel him, but after hearing the evidence it held him to have been within his rights.

After the armistice La Follette raised his voice strongly in favor of amnesty for political prisoners. He fought the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles, calling the League of Nations "a sham and a fraud." He hotly denounced our "unconstitutional" war upon Russia, directed by the President without declaration of hostilities or authorization of Congress. As an epitome of the whole ghastly world tragedy he declared in 1920: "I challenge any man to name one new privilege, one added right which the common people of this or any of the Allied countries are to gain as the result of the war."

Just as La Follette has stood unflinchingly against militarism, he has set himself against the collateral policy of financial imperialism which in the last decade our national government—at the behest of business and the bankers—has been pressing upon the Latin American republics to the South. In a speech in the Senate in July, 1916, he said:

> I believe every dollar that goes into a foreign country, and every man who goes into a foreign country with his money looking for profits, should accept the laws of the country as the arbiter to which he will appeal for justice if he feels at any time that he is required to protect his rights in that country. . . . Now, if this new doctrine that the flag shall follow the investment of the citizen is to prevail, then our government is to be called upon to guarantee the speculative investments of its citizens in the countries where the governments are weak, and so to make those speculative investments worth face value.

Brought up in an agricultural community, La Follette has always been alive to the needs of the farmer. But he has been no less sympathetic toward the welfare of the city worker, and is a proved friend of organized labor. The seamen's law is his most important individual achievement in labor legislation, but he has also been instrumental in obtaining an improved employers'-liability law, a measure limiting the hours of railroad workers, and an eight-hour day for government employees. La Follette took the side of the coal miners in 1919 when Attorney General Palmer was trying to put them in jail. He came out against the Esch-Cummins bill in the Harding regime, both because he objected to establishing a fixed financial return for the railroads and because he disapproved of the functions of the Railroad Labor Board. In the session of Congress just ended he supported the reforms proposed by the Howell-Barkley bill.

La Follette's career in Washington is his career in the Senate; his six years in the House were only a curtain-raiser. He is now in his fourth successive term in the Senate, having been there almost a score of years. A survey of his record during that period leaves the conviction that no other man prominent in national life in this century and in this country has for so long a time devoted himself so courageously, unswervingly, and intelligently to the public welfare.

(This is the second of three articles on La Follette's political record. It was preceded by an article last week on La Follette in Wisconsin, and it will be followed next week by an article on La Follette in America.)

New Mexican Melodrama

By HELEN BLACK

AFTER an intermission of one year the curtain rose, July 22, on what is probably to be the last act of that thrilling melodrama of the great Southwest in which Carl C. Magee has for five years been the principal actor. There may be an epilogue; there is a remote possibility of a further act. But by all the rules of dramaturgy, the plot has thickened to a masterly climax and its resolution is now in process.

The piece might be called "Smashing the Gang," and in the beginning it had all the elements of tragedy. When Magee, entering the newspaper-field as an Albuquerque editor, began to launch blows at the Republican machine so firmly intrenched throughout the State of New Mexico, he was fighting alone against heavy odds. He was a stranger in the State and had very few friends. He was attacked mercilessly. There were attempts on his life. He was faced with financial ruin, embarrassed with lawsuits. For years his fate was uncertain.

But for one coming on the scene now it is hard to take the performance so seriously. The happy ending seems inevitable. Magee is beginning to triumph. His friends are gaining power. In the governor's chair is a Democrat whom he helped to elect a year ago when he ceased fighting from within and left the ranks of the Republicans. Democrats are filling many important offices, and Magee's ardent followers are counted by thousands throughout the State. The fight is still on, but it is a battle of wits between the retreating enemy and the hero-editor with a constantly increasing group of backers.

Yet the play is exciting although the outcome seems sure; there is always the chance that the unexpected might happen. The flavor of old Spanish frontier days still lingers here, and even legal procedure in the State of New Mexico is eventful.

The scene on July 22 was laid in the courtroom at Las Vegas, San Miguel County—still a stronghold of the Old Guard—where a year ago Magee was convicted of libel and contempt in a trial that was characterized by the Governor as "more of a persecution than a prosecution." The same judge presided, David J. Leahy, in appearance the typical police judge, admirably suited to the role of villain in the show. The atmosphere was tense; there were many friends present, but there were also foes. Some of Magee's adherents had asked the Governor for a special guard at this trial, and somehow one felt it might have been advisable.

The sheriff was a handsome Spaniard, quite the dashing representative of the law made famous in fiction. The lawyer for the prosecution came decked in a ten-gallon black sombrero, with all the hatred of his clients for Magee concentrated in his dark face. And the editor, tall, good-looking, smiling, unconcerned, slouched in his chair, seeming to dare the opposition to do its worst.

The theatrical touches were many in the proceedings. Magee was on trial for contempt. In an editorial concerning last year's trial for libel, he had said that Judge Leahy was directly controlled by the political boss of the county. In another editorial he had said that the court was "a slaughter-house for the blind goddess of justice." He was facing trial for these remarks, and the judge ruled that truth of the statements might not be made a defense. What was there left to say? Last year Magee's two attorneys were suspended in this court while pleading his cause. This time they decided that no response should be made by attorneys or defendant.

But when he was asked whether he had anything to say before sentence was pronounced, Magee could not resist. "Only that I deny I am being given due process of law, and I deny that this is a court."

"Guilty of direct contempt of court," was Judge Leahy's retort, and then he, too, decided to speak his mind. For nearly an hour he denounced Magee and anyone who had ever befriended him. He was a "political harlot," "an infamous criminal," "a low-down lying crook," "a mangy yellow cur," "an assassin," "a skunk," "worse than a horse thief."

Magee was sentenced to jail for three months for direct contempt of court and three months each on the other two counts, sentence to begin immediately.

So between two sheriffs, Magee was led out of the courtroom. Following him came a crowd of his friends, those who had met him with a band when he arrived the night before, and they gathered in an angry threatening mob. There was talk of storming the jail; but Magee's lawyer begged them to be calm. Any violence would do more harm than good to the prisoner. He was safe in the jail, even though the judge had refused his plea for a special guard. Two of his friends were to stand outside all night within range of his voice if he called for help. He would eat no food in the jail but receive his meals from the homes of his good friends outside. And tomorrow he would be out surely. So the crowd scattered in groups through the town, talking, watching, and waiting.

Meanwhile the news had been telephoned to the Governor at Santa Fe, and from his office it spread like wildfire through the corridors of the Capitol. Clerks and officials on their way to lunch greeted each other excitedly. "Have you heard? Magee's in jail!"

In the Senate chamber the railroad brotherhoods of the State were gathered to discuss the presidential campaign, but all other business was forgotten when this news arrived. A delegate moved: "That the Governor be urged in the name of organized labor of the State of New Mexico to pardon Carl Magee unconditionally with the aid of the militia, if necessary, Mr. Chairman." There was loud applause.

But Governor Hinkle needed no urging; the pardons were already signed, and the adjutant general was soon on his way with them to the jail seventy miles distant. And as though to omit no touch of romance, the messenger was overtaken by a storm. Heavy rains made the roads nearly impassable. Word reached Las Vegas that a bridge had been washed out and the adjutant general was marooned by the wayside. A delegation set out to his rescue, but returned without finding him; and then just at the moment of deepest gloom he dashed into town in his high-powered car. There was an immediate move to the jail and preparations for a noisy welcome at the prisoner's release. But something was wrong with the pardons; there was none covering the direct contempt charge. Magee must spend the night in a cell.

About midnight he was roused by his jailer with word that a posse had come to rescue him; but the twenty automobiles proved to be only a crowd of soldiers returning from a party. The prisoner returned to a peaceful sleep and his guard of friends kept watch outside.

Next day came a writ of habeas corpus from the Supreme Court of the State ordering that Magee be brought before them for a hearing on July 24. So the following morning he was taken to Santa Fe; technically "taken," but actually driving his two guards over the mountain roads at a pace that drew a protest even from those courageous gentlemen of the law.

"Seventy miles in two hours and a half. Not so bad," said the prisoner as he stepped out at the capital.

Before the Supreme Court that afternoon there appeared again the handsome sheriff, the lawyer with the ten-gallon hat, the prisoner lounging sleepily in his chair. But this was in Santa Fe, and the courtroom seemed crowded only with friends. They swarmed up to greet Magee when, after a three-hour hearing, he was released on bail pending a decision as to whether the Governor's pardons were legal. This opinion has not yet been rendered.

Magee, however, is back on the job writing editorials. He wrote them even in prison and slipped them out by friendly callers. He is speaking his mind, frankly as usual, and caution is not one of his characteristics. He has not yet learned to choose his words with one eye on the libel court, despite his experience.

"The old machine is ready for the scrap-heap. . . . The people must finish up the job now by cleaning up the courts. This politico-judicial-financial tyranny must be smashed at once and forever in this State."

The curtain is falling. How one wishes it were not all a play; and that tyrannies so valiantly crushed to earth might never rise again.

Contributors to This Issue

H. L. Mencken is one of The Nation's contributing editors.

Helen Black is living in Santa Fe and has been on the staff of the New Mexico State Tribune.

Ralph D. Paine, well known as an author of sea stories and boys' books and as a journalist, has been a member of the New Hampshire Legislature and for many years a resident of that State.

Edmund Vance Cooke is a contributor of poems, stories, and occasional articles in the line of progressive thought to leading magazines and weeklies.

Arthur Garfield Hays is an attorney practicing in New York City.

Winthrop D. Lane is the author of a book, "Civil War in West Virginia," and a recent pamphlet on "The Denial of Civil Liberty in the Coal Fields."

George Saranton is a contributor of articles on Greek affairs to various periodicals.

These United States—XLVIII*

NEW HAMPSHIRE: Not Yet Abandoned

By RALPH D. PAINE

THE literary tradition of a rural New England consisting of abandoned farms, queer, flat-chested spinsters, and faded wives who go insane because of solitude and Puritan complexes has found its focus, to a large extent, in rock-ribbed New Hampshire. Contending with a hard climate has made us a patient folk, unemotionally enduring the buffets of fortune, but we grow a little weary of a certain condescension among outsiders. It is quite the fashion to ask what's the matter with New Hampshire and then start another survey or investigation.

During the brief summer thousands of motor tourists stream over our highways to visit the White Mountains. They come from regions as remote as the Pacific coast. It is a flamboyant invasion that scatters millions of dollars among hotels, camps, tea houses, garages, and small-town merchants. New Hampshire piously thanks God for this bountiful source of revenue, but reserves comment. Of this multitude of transients some are decent people who deserve to be at large. They have manners and intelligence. Many others, however, offend the landscape which they have not eyes to see while they step on the gas in order to arrive somewhere else for no particular purpose. And as they go tearing through noble gorges and verdant valleys or past lakes whose ripples brightly beckon they glance with pity at the natives of New Hampshire.

In their opinion we are the ultimate hicks. Poor stupid clods who have never learned to put pep into life and jazz it up! Slaves to a plain white farmhouse on a windy hill, and a hundred acres of tillage, woodland, and meadow, with a thousand a year cash income as the measure of material comfort. Always struggling to pay off the mortgage on the old homestead, so it is alleged, speaking a curious Yankee dialect, counting a journey as far away as Boston as the event of a lifetime.

Do we envy these birds of passage? Well, not enough to say so. Your New Hampshire farmer is not easily fooled by the buncombe and bluff which the city dweller accepts as a doctrine of existence. He is not sufficiently up to date to live beyond his income and be satisfied with keeping one jump ahead of his creditors. As one result, the tenant farming which has blighted the Middle West is a negligible factor. Ninety-three per cent of our farmers own their land. Only 37 per cent of the farms are mortgaged, the literary tradition notwithstanding.

The rural population is steadily decreasing, no doubt of that—12 per cent since 1900, or 22,000 fewer sturdy men, women, and children on the soil of their ancestors, but the total valuation of the farming lands of the State has increased considerably during this time. The picture has its melancholy aspects, but it is not so dark as the sentimental fictionist delights to paint it. It was sagacious to abandon a great many of these farms. They belonged to the pioneering era of American history. Changing economic conditions have made it impossible to wrest a livelihood from them. They are too small, isolated, and sterile. It is better to let them grow up in timber for the benefit of posterity. The pathetic cellar hole by the roadside or the weather-beaten set of buildings given over to decay are often mute memorials of an obsolete social fabric, like the sod house of the prairie or the log hut of the Kentucky frontier. They may invoke the tribute of a sigh, but their day is done excepting as they attract the pilgrim in search of a summer home.

But wherever in New Hampshire there is mellow soil and convenient access to markets you will still find modest prosperity and contentment. Few good farms are being abandoned. The older generation is able to make both ends meet and a little more. New Hampshire was almost untouched by the adverse conditions which have put the Western farmer flat on his back in recent years. Never affluent and with little to lose, it steers a course that avoids the rocks and manages to pinch through. The State University is sending its agricultural experts into every rural nook and corner to teach better methods of farming. Other agencies are working in the same direction. New Hampshire will not surrender without a stiff battle. It does not have to be told that its one asset beyond price is the people of its farms and villages and the things they stand for.

The drift to the industrial cities is slowly devitalizing the old stock with its rugged virtues of industry, thrift, stubborn independence, and respect for law. This is the profound tragedy of it. If the salt have lost his savor, wherewith shall it be salted? Certainly not in the polyglot mill communities of Manchester, Berlin, or Dover. These are in no wise typical of New Hampshire. Their rotary clubs or chambers of commerce shout the get-together, booster jargon of Seattle or Dallas. Their politicians are as fat-witted, selfish, and inefficient as elsewhere. Their backgrounds of dignity and tradition have been obliterated by the rising tide of French Canadians, Irish, Greeks, and Slavs. Massachusetts is ever so much worse off. Vermont has almost escaped the curse. Maine has preserved much of its native integrity because it is still a vast wilderness province.

New Hampshire is a small State of 450,000 people who reflect, to an intimate degree, the prevailing currents of an American life which had its rise in the very beginnings of the nation. Past and present rub elbows. Industrialism is a canker and the summer tourist has been both a bane and a blessing. The countryside has been infected with shabby ideals, a vulgar code of behavior, and a slangy, slipshod dialect from New York and Chicago that is spoiling the English speech, pure and undefiled, which New Hampshire received as a heritage from its forebears. The younger generation imitates these invaders and refuses to be buried alive on a farm. It prefers the bondage of a white-collar job with small hope of advancement. For an eloquent comment, the average age of the owner of a New Hampshire farm is fifty-three years. One-fifth of them are sixty-five or over. They have grown old behind the plow. And yet it heartens one to find a certain number of educated, upstanding young men returning to the acres that their childhood knew. With their practical knowledge and wider point of view they are the hope of rural New Hampshire. One of them, a neighbor of mine, started a poultry farm and cleared $10,000 in the third year of operation.

* Reproduction forbidden. Quotation limited to 300 words. Copyright, 1924, The Nation, Inc. All rights reserved.

There is an automobile in almost every country dooryard and few of them are bought on the instalment plan. The next time you are driving through New Hampshire, please note how trim, well-painted, and comfortable most of these farmhouses are. Grinding poverty is not reflected from such homes as these. Miracles of economy are performed. It is in the blood. There has never been enough money to go round. But what percentage of city folks are as well off at the end of the year?

More than half the population is still rural, living on farms or in the villages whose characteristics have survived the changes of the modern scene. This is the real New Hampshire, when you sift it from the urban rubbish. Nowhere can it be observed to such advantage as in the State legislature, which meets every two years. This assemblage has made New Hampshire famous, like Mount Washington and Lake Winnepesaukee. We have long boasted of it as the largest legislative body in the world, with 419 members in the lower house. It supplied Winston Churchill with excellent material for novels written after the fact. Gone is the epoch, however, when the Boston and Maine Railroad was said to purchase New Hampshire patriots in carload lots and a Jethro Bass could deliver the goods in the room of the Pelican Hotel, renowned for its red plush furniture. The legislature has become honest and unromantic. There are no more leaders, good or bad. Politically New Hampshire is as unproductive as an abandoned farm. It once sired a Daniel Webster. Now it sends a George H. Moses to the United States Senate.

A novelist would find poor pickings under the State House dome at Concord. The lobbyist is branded as a suspicious character who has to watch his step. Several years ago the writer served a term as a member of the Appropriations Committee. The chairman was the last of the old guard which had carried New Hampshire in its breeches pockets. A patriarchal person, white-bearded, soft-spoken, he maintained the ancient rites, a secluded room in the Eagle Hotel, whispered conferences, confidential bargains.

But a progressive Speaker of the House, young and unterrified, defied this "Uncle Jim," mocked his dynasty, and figuratively stood him upon his ancient head. He was outvoted in the very committee which he had hand-picked and dominated for a generation. The State finances were snatched from under his thumb. He became no more than a ghostly reminder of a time when New Hampshire politics had been intensely practical. He was no better and no worse than the other leaders of his day. A zealous watchdog of the treasury, he opposed every modern scheme of welfare for the common good.

Shorn of the glamor of that picaresque era, the New Hampshire Legislature is a social club for the plain people, a biennial party for getting acquainted in a leisurely manner. In this respect it is worth all its costs. Numerous bills are passed, most of which are superfluous and inconsequential. They are never extravagant. The rural members see to that. Every dollar appropriated is squeezed until its shrieks echo along the Merrimac Valley. The pleasant familiarity of a session whose weeks stretch into months is seldom disturbed by a Governor with brains or gumption enough to make himself seriously annoying. If an able man happens to hold the chair, it is the exception to prove the rule. The average type is a rather elderly banker or lawyer who desires the honor for the sake of his progeny and is willing to foot the bills. The salary of $2,500 is not apt to attract younger men of parts who have to make their way in the world.

The Senate, of twenty-four members, is cut more or less from the same cloth for the reason that its electoral districts are divided according to taxable wealth, and not population. This makes the worthy senators view with alarm any departure from things as they are. Their chief pastime is killing what may be called popular legislation as passed by the lower house. Membership in a State senate of this description means boredom to tears unless one happens to be built that way.

The teeming House of Representatives is the place to study and enjoy mankind. As a body it mills about with a vast deal of waste motion because of its unwieldy size. It grinds a small amount of grist for the number of hands employed. Every attempt to decrease its numbers by the enactment of a constitutional amendment has been pugnaciously defeated. The men from the farms and villages refuse to be robbed of the prize of going to the legislature. It is an honor which custom decrees should pass in rotation from one substantial citizen to another. As a rule it shows a greedy spirit to expect more than one term at Concord. The emoluments consist of $200 for a term of perhaps three months and railroad transportation. It is to the credit of some of these incredibly thrifty legislators that they save a few dollars of this impressive salary after paying their living expenses in Concord. A population of 600 entitles a village to send a representative regularly. A village of three hundred people rates a member every other session, or one-half member per session, to work it out arithmetically. Above the 600 mark the community acquires another representative for every increase of 1,200 souls. As a consequence, Manchester sends 68 representatives, Nashua 23, and Concord 18. This is absurd. It might be inferred that the few cities, with such topheavy delegations, could control legislation for their own ends. It doesn't work out that way.

The Manchester contingent, composed largely of French Canadians and Irish ward politicians, is usually rent by internal dissension and too ignorant to achieve results. The balance of power is held by the canny men from the rural districts. The brains and common sense of New Hampshire still come from close to the soil or from the simple environment of the small town. A refreshing, interesting lot of men they are. In a benighted age of standardization they have maintained an individualism which refuses to be card-indexed. They cannot be led unless they know precisely where they are going. Many of them were isolated from neighbors until the "flivver" banished the barriers of poor roads, intervening hills and mountains, and sparsely settled regions. They have had unhurried rainy days in the barn or long winter evenings by the fireside to think and talk. They are self-taught in the best sense of the word.

The wives and daughters, no longer shut in and deprived of stimulating contacts, are more energetic and ambitious than the menfolk. Nowhere will you find groups of women more genuinely cultivated and alive to modern trends and values than among the clubs of the little New Hampshire towns. They do not belong on Sinclair Lewis's Main Street nor are their husbands Babbitts. It was Waldo Frank whose lively fancy depicted the wretched New Hampshire housewife as gazing from her kitchen window only to pick out a tree from which to hang herself. This was not meant to be humorous. It was in line with the accepted legend.

And so our farmer comes to Concord with a pretty keen desire to make himself useful, realizing that his women will prod him on and scrutinize his legislative record with great care. He is mostly interested in keeping taxes down and diverting the available funds toward good roads and better schools. It is appealing, in a way, to find how heavily this question of taxation weighs upon him. In the districts where rural depopulation is going on the burden falls more heavily each year upon those who are left behind. And the chief fiscal problem of the household is gathering together enough cash to pay the tax bill.

However, when a new educational law was passed in 1918 whose purpose was to reorganize the public-school system of New Hampshire and raise it to a par with far richer States, these legislators from the farms and hamlets supported it earnestly. They were willing to pay the price as soon as they felt they would receive their money's worth. It signified that they hoped, more than anything else, to make their children contented at home and to give them some of the advantages of the city-bred youngster. For once rural New Hampshire was pulling together.

The writer was appointed a member of the State Board of Education, which had the task of putting this new system in operation. He made a speech at a meeting of the State Grange to an audience of a thousand farmers and their wives. Flattering himself that he had put the argument across, he sat down with that specious glow of satisfaction that sometimes rewards the amateur spellbinder. Later a competent-looking woman with a piercing eye cornered him in the hallway and spoke as follows: "I have had to attend a lot of meetings this year, Mr. Paine, as president of our woman's club. And it does seem as if 'most everywhere I go I have to listen to you make a speech. Of course that can't be helped. But I must say I do get sick and tired of hearing you say this new Board of Education serves without any salary. Now, you know as well as I do that if you were wuth anything the State would pay you for it."

There you have the genuine New Hampshire flavor. This admirably candid woman wasted no breath in weasel words but went straight to the point. Alas, she was quick to suspect the other person's motives and wonder what there was in it for him. This is a flaw in a catalogue of splendid native qualities. It has thwarted most of the efforts to bring about cooperation in government, in improving the conditions of agriculture, in reducing the cost of living. It is found in rural communities elsewhere, but New Hampshire has been a soil peculiarly congenial.

Some of these legislators come from the North Country, beyond the White Mountains, where little towns exist twenty to forty miles from a railroad with great stretches of forest between them. This is a stalwart, clannish breed, with force of character above the average. The north countrymen have always been conspicuous in New Hampshire affairs. One may fitly call them the Highlanders of this old New England commonwealth.

Others come from the southeastern border, where the sea pounds the reefs and forelands of a granite coast. They recall the stately mansions of Portsmouth, built by shipping merchants and captains whose topsails gleamed in ports exotic and far distant, or Paul Jones and the Ranger fitting out for a famous cruise in the English Channel. New Hampshire wrote its pages in the briny chronicle of Yankee ships and sailors that won maritime supremacy for this nation in its infancy. Now Portsmouth is awakened from its drowsy peace by the crews of the gray war-ships at the Navy Yard and the wealthy cottagers of Rye Beach, whose motors fill the old square in July and August.

To Concord also come the men from the western counties of the Connecticut Valley, whose farms are fertile and never abandoned unless for a goodly sum per acre. They ask no sympathy and are doing very well, thank you. The White Mountains sends its hotel-keepers and merchants to the legislature, dapper, worldly persons who have learned how to capitalize scenery for all the traffic will bear.

Most worth while are the farmers from the hills, slow-spoken, round-shouldered, who strive tenaciously to keep their places going with a few cows, a gnarled orchard, some hay to sell, an acre or two of potatoes. Their social center at home is often the little red schoolhouse. They look askance at new-fangled ideas. They are cast in the mold of their ancestors, who marched from Nottingham Square and Durham to the battle of Bunker Hill.

These are the folks for whom a term in the legislature is a memorable experience. It is inaccurate to call them taciturn. They are not given to incessant chatter, but they love to sit and talk. And it is good talk, shrewd, seasoned, meaty. The outside world has accepted Calvin Coolidge as the typical Vermonter, compared with whom a clam is fairly garrulous. The New Hampshire folks are not like that, the Lord be praised. There is blood in their veins and not ice-water. And in other respects they are quite human and likable. Their so-called reserve is merely a habit of having something to say before they say it.

New Hampshire is very much in transition between the old and new, somewhat fettered to the past, but by no means blind to the future. Its textile mills, which are the sinews of its industrial life, are seriously menaced by Southern competition. It is not impossible that the cities may be sapped of their strength by an economic revolution of this kind, and the conditions of former days more or less restored. This would mean various industries fostered among the smaller towns, employing native labor amid wholesome surroundings. The undeveloped or abandoned water-power of a hundred little rivers is waiting to be utilized. Meanwhile tired business men buy New Hampshire farms and the campers flock to every wooded lake.

On the whole, New Hampshire is not yet bound over the hill to the poorhouse nor is its vigorous native stock submerged beyond rescue. It utters no loud cries for help and intends to work out its own salvation. Robert Frost has said it very well in these lines:

> The glorious bards of Massachusetts seem
> To want to make New Hampshire people over.
> They taunt the lofty land with little men.
> I don't know what to say about the people.
> For art's sake one could almost wish them worse
> Rather than better. How are we to write
> The Russian novel in America
> As long as life goes so unterribly?
> There is the pinch from which our only outcry
> In literature is heard to come.
> We get what little misery we can
> Out of not having cause for misery.

From the Book of Extenuations

By EDMUND VANCE COOKE

The Serpent

Eve's tongue may wag and Adam's heart may harden,
Yet I claim credit and I ask no pardon
For anything I did inside the Garden.
I might have stayed there my eternal days
And merited small blame and less of praise,
For I was equal in the social swim
With angels and the saucy seraphim.
I was encompassed in the primal plan;
I was no sixth-day afterthought, like man,
But was considered when the world began.

Eve is ungrateful, as is woman's way,
And Adam—simple simian of clay—
Proclaims a grudge which lasts until this day.
Yet were it not for my work, what were they?
Brood-beasts they were, male man and female woman;
I saw their plight and brought them that acumen
Which made them sinful, but which made them human.

Cain

An Artist I! I loved the hue and shape
Of peach and pear, of pomegranate and grape
And in my gratitude for Autumn's hoard
I builded me an altar to the Lord,
And on it made mosaic of the tints
Which the ripe-breasted season tells, or hints:
Gold, crimson, purple, and the softer glints
Of all the myriad ecstasy of fruits!

Mine was no barbecue of slaughtered brutes;
My cairn of beauty was a living jewel!
But Yahveh asks for offerings crude and cruel,
The blood of beasts, the scent of entrails burned,
So Abel's was accepted, mine was spurned,
And in that spurning all my toilsome art
Was scattered to the winds. That hurt my heart
And Abel's smile laid salt upon the smart.
"If blood be grateful to this God," I cried,
"I see a way to make him satisfied!"
. . . . . .
It was about that time my brother died.

Moses

No pyramid was builded of the groans
Of driven slaves to glorify my bones.
No golden chamber and no jeweled shrine
Houses the dwelling-place which once was mine.
No lash drove labor to a dreary doom
That I might shrivel in a vaulted tomb.
Thus did the Pharaohs, who held my tribe,
And now their treasure-tombs become a bribe
To itching, alien fingers, which have stripped Corpse of its coffin, coffin of its crypt.

But I, beyond the loots of love or hate,
I have no sepulcher to violate!
Yet, bounded by no metes of time or place,
Welded of my own will and Yahveh's grace,
Behold my cenotaph, the Chosen Race!

Ruth

Poor Boaz thinks that he arranged that parley
Which first we held among the fields of barley,
When all my humble words had hidden meaning
And his the fullest beard of all my gleaning.
He thinks I did him honor when I crept
And snuggled at his feet the while he slept,
And when he woke, without a hint of sin,
I claimed protection as his near of kin.

And so next day, as I had hoped he'd do,
He claimed me as his own and passed his shoe.
Dear Boaz! he's a man and so, in sooth,
A twisted finger-ring for little Ruth.

So I remind him often how he harried me,
Pursued and worried me, till off he carried me
And, spite of my disclaimings, kissed and married me,
And swear that womankind is most unfortunate
Hedged in a world beset by men importunate!
For, as Naomi says (and nothing's truer),
Pursued man loves to think himself pursuer.

David

I have been drunk of life's commingled wines,
Of lilied loves and rose-red concubines.
I have known battle and the white-hot charm
Of holding death at bay with this right arm.
I have known pomp and purpled pride and cries
Of clamorous applause against the skies.

I have been overwrought and overjoyed,
I have been sated, surfeited, and cloyed.
In my own life I've lived so many lives
Its flames are cinders, yet one spark survives.

Gold, glory, greed! I loved you not for long;
Wine, women, war! seductive, but not strong;
One passion lasts—the deathless lust of Song.

New Morals for Old

Modern Marriage and Ancient Laws

By ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

"ARE we married?" This was a query recently put to a New York lawyer. The woman wanted to have been married, but wished not to be married any longer; at the same time she rather objected to a divorce. The man did not care much about it, so long as he could marry, or marry again, without too much inconvenience arising from the earlier entanglement. The lawyer's answer was so obvious that it might have been made by a layman: "How do I know?"

The two had been living together, had called each other husband and wife, and had in general passed as such, but at the beginning of the relationship each had felt that if one wanted to be free the other would not hold him or her; it was agreed that they should have no financial responsibility for each other and that there should be nothing about the arrangement which would make it last "till death do us part." In speaking of themselves as "husband and wife" they had intended the words to represent merely a formula of their own.

Now common-law marriage as recognized in New York State consists in a meeting of the minds—a contract. Thus, if two people live together as husband and wife this may be evidence of a common-law marriage. No formal agreement is necessary. But if there has not been even a private agreement of marriage their living together would be unimportant. If they wished to separate they would need no divorce, for they would never have been married. By passing as husband and wife they might gain the social advantages that come from a recognized relationship, and, since there had been no definite agreement, they might save the inconvenience of divorce if they wished to separate. Difficulty arises only when both parties do not agree that there was no agreement. Sometimes one party claims there was and the other that there was not. Then the very indefiniteness of the tie means added difficulty and publicity in breaking it.

In order to avoid future disagreement one couple made a contract in which they stated that they lived as husband and wife in order to avoid social stigma, but that as between themselves there was no agreement of marriage. The situation was trying because they always felt they were living a lie. Their answer was that society foolishly demanded either a penalty or a form and they preferred to provide the form. Fortunately, neither ever had to swear to the status and they felt that this contract—which provided for future maintenance of the wife and custody of the children—solved the problem or doubt of a life-long relationship. To those who made ethical objection, they answered that they were willing to contract on matters which concerned their wills, but knew it was contrary to human nature to contract on matters which concerned their emotions.

Not long ago in New York City a young woman who had scruples about promising to love a man forever expressed to the city clerk her unwillingness to use the form of marriage ceremony which he had produced committing her to love, honor, and cherish the man for the rest of his or her life. She said she was in good faith willing to contract to marry, and that she would do the best she could to make the marriage successful, but that was all; to which the clerk answered that if she were entering marriage in that spirit she should not be married at all. He was finally persuaded that the parties could be tied merely by agreement on her part to become the man's wife and on his part to become her husband.

If the law seems full of vagaries on the problem of entering marriage it is still more perplexing and technical when it concerns the question whether or not two people are still legally married when one has obtained a supposed divorce—so much so that it is not at all uncommon for a lawyer to be faced by a client asking whether or not he, or she, is really married. Some years ago a man was married in Philadelphia and later, having separated from his wife, went to New York. She obtained a decree of divorce in Pennsylvania, the papers having been served on him in New York. He married again and died a generation later, leaving a considerable fortune and three children by his second marriage. The first wife, or her attorneys, then discovered that the original divorce was not legal, since the Pennsylvania courts had not acquired a jurisdiction which would be recognized in New York. Since the man had left the estate to his "wife," there were complications. As the question involved the meaning of a will, the matter was one of intention and it was not difficult to prove that the deceased intended as his beneficiary the woman whom he regarded as his wife. But had he owned real estate at the time of his divorce the first wife might have had a dower interest, and had his status become one of public importance his enemies might successfully have charged him with bigamy.

Ordinarily, people are satisfied with a decree of divorce. It gives them the desired social status. Its technical legality becomes of importance only in connection with estates or the legitimacy of children. But a difficult question arises in case of remarriage. Legality depends upon the jurisdiction of the court. This can be acquired by personal service of papers upon the defendant within the State or a voluntary submission to the jurisdiction by appearing in the case personally or by attorney. But State courts claim and recognize their own jurisdiction even though papers are served outside the State. Under these latter circumstances, suppose a divorce granted a man in Utah is not recognized in New York. If he remarries in Utah he will have one wife there, while in New York another woman would be his wife and he would be obliged to support her there. If his wife in New York married again, she would be guilty of bigamy. In Utah it would be his duty to live with one woman. New York would attempt to make it his pleasure to live with another, and this on the ground of morality, for, although, ordinarily, the law of the place of the new marriage (in this case, Utah) would apply, yet this would result in his having two wives in New York. So on legal grounds we disregard the divorce, and on moral grounds we negative the second marriage.

Foreign divorces raise the question not only of jurisdiction but of recognition by treaty of a judgment of the particular foreign country. For instance, judgments of French courts are not absolutely binding upon the courts of this country, as are the judgments of sister-States. In the case of Russia, where any two parties by agreement or a single person by request may become divorced, there is no treaty whatever. Occasionally, cases arise where persons abroad have obtained a decree for a rabbinical divorce. Under the old Jewish custom a rabbi could pronounce a divorce and the law of the state permitted a decree to be entered upon his pronouncement. Some states and countries make bids for the divorce business; not long ago an advertisement appeared announcing that a divorce might be had in Yucatan for $25, not, of course, including the expense of travel. Questions of the effect of interlocutory and final judgments, of the provisions of a divorce decree forbidding remarriage within a certain period, of the bona fides of residence, of the jurisdiction of the court, of treaties with foreign countries may make it difficult to answer the question whether or not two people are legally married.

All this confusion represents a beating of wings against a cage—an endeavor to obtain a legal paper with a red seal which will avoid a situation which two people find intolerable. We are tending toward a new moral conception of the marriage relationship, well expressed by Premier Zahle of Denmark when submitting a new liberal divorce law: "It is based on the fundamental conception that it is morally indefensible to maintain a marriage relation by legal statute where all the real bonds between the parties are broken. This is a measure which certainly means a great step forward in the recognition of marriage as a moral relation."

Marriage is a status resulting from a civil contract, but very few people who enter into it know what this contract is. It assumes certain rights and obligations. What are they? That the wage-earner will provide. This is enforcible, at least theoretically. What else? That the parties live in an emotional and mental state designated by an agreement "to love, honor, and cherish," and, sometimes, "obey." This is obviously unenforcible. (I make this assertion despite the recent Texas case in which a husband obtained an injunction restraining his wife's employer from flirting with her.) The contract continues for life, subject to termination for causes which depend chiefly upon the place of residence, actual or acquired. If they live in South Carolina and stay there, the contract is indissoluble. In New York the contract may be terminated for adultery, unless the other party has likewise sought refuge outside of marriage; in Alabama, for habitual drunkenness; in Nevada, for neglect to provide for one year; in Kentucky and New Hampshire, for joining a religious sect which believes marriages unlawful; in New Jersey, for extreme cruelty; in Wisconsin, if the parties have voluntarily lived separately for five years; in Massachusetts and a host of other States, for desertion; in Pennsylvania and Oregon, for personal indignities or conduct rendering life burdensome; in Vermont, for intolerable severity; in France, if the parties have other emotional interests; in Denmark, by consent; in Russia, by request. Of course, in most of these states there are other grounds, but the result is that either party can bring about a situation which permits divorce or can make life so intolerable for the other that he or she consents to it. But these grounds must arise subsequent to marriage; the agreement cannot be made in advance.

In life the duration of marriage depends upon the desires or consent of individuals. In law it is perpetual, subject to termination not by agreement made at the outset, or by later consent, but by court decree. At the time of entering into marriage people usually know merely that somehow, somewhere, some time there is a way out if the situation becomes too strained. Technically, since the contract is for life, a divorce is granted for a breach. Thus there is an implied term, as there is in every contract, that relief is granted for a breach—but what constitutes a breach depends not upon the terms of the contract or the law of the place where the contract is made but upon the jurisdiction where relief is sought—a matter of which the parties ordinarily know nothing when they make the contract. Convention seems to demand that the parties know not what they do.

Modern society, this summary seems to show, has been moving toward freedom of contract in marriage. Those phases which concern the state, such as economic provision and children, must be conserved. But time was—and still is in some places—when marriage itself was a tribal or a state matter. Then it became a family matter, determined by the parents, and property and family rights and interests were the important considerations. But parents, knowing by experience that there can be no happiness without security—although there might be unhappiness with it—failed to take into sufficient account the emotional content, and, particularly in the Western World, there developed a certain freedom of contract in making a choice. Today, when people have come to recognize the necessity of sexual and social compatibility, which cannot be determined in advance, there has come a demand for a further freedom of contract, to which society has responded by more liberal divorce laws. The laws which permit a divorce where parties have not lived together for a certain length of time make the duration of the marriage relation really a matter of consent. They mean in effect that a contract of marriage contains an implied term that it is to continue until the parties consent to its end, and in human relations this means until one party demands its end.

If a person proposed that the law recognize a marriage contract which was to continue until either party desired its termination, he would be regarded as a wrecker of our institutions; but society is doing this very thing—obscurely, perhaps, as an after-effect, not as a preconceived design; blindly, and not with intelligent forethought. Many have suggested that marriages be made harder and divorces easier. But how revolutionary would seem a suggestion that marriage contracts be made in advance, conforming to the teachings of experience, providing for maintenance and custody of children and limited by the understanding of the parties; that those who, for religious or ethical reasons, wished to enter into a life contract be permitted to do so; that those who wished to enter into a contract to terminate by joint consent or at the option of either party likewise be permitted to do so? An objection that this would be dangerous assumes that people choose the present form only because compelled to do so. Individuals are breaking from the old conventions, and the law, usually a laggard by a generation, is following them. In forty-three States desertion is a ground for divorce; in twenty of them, desertion for one year. In seven States, failure or neglect to provide is a ground; in four of them, the period is one year. In some States, if the parties live apart for a certain length of time—in three of them for five years—that is ground for divorce. Is not this divorce by agreement? And by implication, since living together requires the willingness of two parties, the result is a contract which may be ended by either of the parties at any time he or she sees fit—after an intervening cooling period. Thus does freedom creep in by the back door.

Does this work harm to society? There is little difference in the marital or social conditions or in the welfare of children in Norway and Sweden, where there are liberal laws, and in England, where divorce is a long, complicated, and expensive process. No one could discover that he had crossed the State line from New York to Pennsylvania by observation of the state of society, the happiness or apparent duration of marriage, the welfare of children, or the social conventions of the people. Yet in Pennsylvania there was one divorce for every 10.2 marriages in 1922 and only one for every 22.6 in New York. In South Carolina there are no divorces; in Oregon, the number of marriages to one divorce was 2.6; in Wyoming, 3.9; in California, 5.1. In the District of Columbia, the banner section, there were 35.8 marriages to one divorce. There, as in New York, the only ground is adultery. Yet San Francisco society seems as stable as that of Washington. Of course, the figures do not mean that seven times as many Washington couples as California couples, and four times as many New York couples, make a success of marriage or live together when it has ceased to be a success; but rather, that New Yorkers and Washingtonians solve their marital troubles elsewhere than at home. Thus, in Nevada in 1922 there were more divorces than marriages, because people married in other States repented in Nevada.

Whatever effect it may have on society, the extension of grounds for divorce which has taken place in the last decade, and the modern improvement in communication and travel, which opens other States or foreign countries to an increasing number, brings about a situation by which people, though not free to contract, do avail themselves of means which have the same effect. Revolutionary changes occur unnoticed, while our delusions persist and our sense of conservatism is gratified.

Party Government Ebbs

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

FEW topics are more alluring to the political reporter than the rising swells and declining ebbs of parties and of party government. At this moment in the United States the political reporter surely is bound to see party government at an ebb which has declined to a level lower than at any other moment in our day.

Mr. Davis in his speech accepting the Democratic nomination at Clarksburg was able to make a considerable point of the violence of the Republican attack upon what the Republicans called the "executive autocracy" of Woodrow Wilson, while within three years thereafter the Republicans submitted with a servile tameness to a total defiance of their party by Calvin Coolidge and proceeded to reward his "autocracy" ultimately by a nomination granted to him almost unanimously at Cleveland.

Mr. Davis in effect maintained that Mr. Coolidge was less of a party man than Mr. Wilson. The charge has merit. Mr. Wilson and his party in Congress went along together. It can be said that Mr. Wilson overbore his party. It could also be said that Mr. Wilson consulted his party and, if he overbore it, at least did not act until he was sure that he would be able to overbear it.

The result was that under Mr. Wilson a Democratic White House and a Democratic majority in Congress were in harmony and produced during Mr. Wilson's first administration an admittedly massive and epochal amount of new legislation which became historically important on the statute-books of the United States.

If the first basic origin of this result was to be found in the will power of Mr. Wilson, the method of it and device which promptly and successfully brought it into existence was a party with leaders and sub-leaders and followers and sub-followers acting ultimately, harmoniously, and effectively for themselves and for the country in a spectacular illustration of party government at its fullest.

Mr. Davis looks back to those days with pride and with approval. He contends that the Republican Party lacks the internal harmony which the Democrats had under Mr. Wilson and which Mr. Davis regards as the indispensable preliminary to success either in legislation or in administration. Mr. Davis's implication is that the Democratic Party still has such a harmony and is still a party, while the Republicans have ceased to be a party and while the La Folletteites admit that they are not yet a party.

Incidentally it is to be noted that Mr. Davis in his speech accepting his nomination pays virtually no attention to Mr. La Follette. He makes, it is true, one allusion to the "panaceas" of "radicals"; but since he calls them "dreamy radicals" the reference can hardly be thought to be to the senior Senator from Wisconsin. Mr. Davis's chariness in putting on the gloves with Mr. La Follette, while he delights to put them on with Mr. Coolidge, has both an outward significance and an inward significance. Outwardly Mr. Davis admits that Mr. La Follette is the puzzling and upsetting element in the situation. Inwardly he has not yet apparently made up his mind just how to solve that puzzle and just how to get around that upset. He makes it perfectly clear in his private conversation that he intends to bang and buffet Mr. Coolidge. Just what he will try to do to—or about—Mr. La Follette he has reserved for future consideration and decision.

In any case it is manifestly open to him to claim that the La Follette following is not yet a party and that it contains within itself elements in irreconcilable conflict with one another on the League of Nations and on other aspects of foreign affairs and on the question of monopoly and of public ownership and on other highly important domestic questions with no organized and recognized body of authority within it to bend these elements to common action if they should happen to slip into power.

The La Follette following, it is alleged by its enemies, and it must be admitted in candor by its friends, would be only a small fraction of its present bulk in this campaign if it were not the diversified following of one man who is followed for a multitude of unconnected reasons.

The Republicans gloat over that fact and call themselves a party relatively to the La Folletteites; and the Democrats, through Mr. Davis, gloat over the "autocracy" of Coolidge and the endless unresolved divergencies of opinion and of action between Mr. Coolidge and his party colleagues in Congress and call themselves a party relatively to the Republicans.

It has to be admitted that Mr. Coolidge has not behaved as a party man. The White House has often transformed party men into individualistic magnates. It has transformed Mr. Coolidge into a peculiarly determined individualistic magnate with a suddenness and completeness perhaps unprecedented. He not only insists upon differing from the mass of his party colleagues in Congress, but he insists upon making his own minority views the test of loyalty to the party in general. His immediate friends regard the approaching November election as an occasion on which the people will empower Mr. Coolidge personally to make all other elected Republicans bow to his sole will. They talk about this election less as if it were an election for the choosing of a President than as if it were a plebiscite for the naming of an emperor who thereafter would rule by himself.

That sort of thing, whatever its merits, certainly cannot be called party government. The La Folletteites are followed by a mob. The Republicans are one man pulling a cart with occasional squealing brakes on it. Neither performance is party government as taught in the books and as proclaimed to be necessary by tradition and by Mr. Davis.

Let us look, for a moment, however, at Mr. Davis himself. He is the candidate of the Democratic Party for the highest office in the land. Yet he is not—in any true political sense, in any true party sense—a leader of the Democratic Party. In Britain, the modern cradle of parties and the classic nursery of their present development, Mr. Davis could not conceivably with his present political standing and acquaintance become Prime Minister. He has not been elected to anything for many years. He is not familiar with the immediate inside Democratic Party situation. He was selected in New York City for two reasons among others. The first is his undoubted high personal ability. The second was precisely that he is not an insider but happily and harmlessly an outsider to all the recent troubles and experiences and developments which his party has suffered and survived. He is in his way as much an illustration of the resort to one man as Mr. Coolidge is or as Mr. La Follette is. He has been called in not because he is the fruit of the party but because he is to be its gardener.

If this sort of situation be compared with the situation which in Britain invariably produces a Prime Minister from among the party leaders who are most covered with the immediate dust of the party struggles in Parliament, it becomes readily apparent that in this country at this time the classic conception of party government is far indeed from realization.

In such circumstances the followers of the prospective third party naturally hug to their bosoms at least the idea that in their efforts to establish such a party they enter a field where their rivals, as parties, as party organizations capable of truly party government, are not as strong as they were but are in fact in a manifest decline.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has at last discovered why musicians are not good conversationalists. He learned from his friends the cellist, the pianist, and the clarinettist, who spent a whole evening talking Brahms in his hearing. "Re mi fa do ti," the clarinet would suggest. "Ti do re la sol," corrected the cello. "Fa la la la; la re ti sol-l-l," commented the piano, laughing at them both. Then they would all three talk at once, very politely and comprehensibly. Before one movement was finished, the Drifter felt so left out that he was ready to deliver an oration on any subject. But no one suggested a subject, only went on quoting measure after measure in perfect harmony for two hours and a half. Afterwards the clarinettist said in slow English: "I like the adagio best." The cellist smiled vaguely. "Goodnight," said the pianist to his confederates and to the Drifter. All the Drifter's prepared observations about ensemble and themes and tone quality seemed superfluous. They had all been said.

* * * * *

A COMPOSER the Drifter used to know would frequently alarm his family by rushing to the piano, playing a phrase or two, then swinging round to wait for an answer. If his remark was quoted from a song some one would usually recognize it. "Batti, batti, Don Giovanni," of course meant "You are all just a little insane." But if the phrase was original it might mean anything from "How melancholy I feel" to "Let's go to supper."

* * * * *

FEW actors regard their own extemporaneous conversation as much worth listening to. It is hard to stop being earnest and still feel important. One can keep on walking and dressing like a dreadfully clever cynic, but as for talking it—why, Oscar Wilde himself spent months writing those lines. Yet the actor can't resist imitating them. Now if you think it hard for him, pity the poor musician! To improvise Mozart, translate his measures into speech, and then fit them into ordinary human converse—this is another matter.

* * * * *

IT is all very mysterious to the Drifter. He admits that when the music-wise begin their learned discourses he sometimes pleads ignorance and escapes. "Give the Drifter something he can understand," he will implore, "a folk-song, or some good simple jazz." But jazz, it appears, is no longer simple. On the contrary, it is a highly cerebral form of expression, beside which the classics are relatively primitive and emotional. Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung" is a mere nursery rhyme, to judge by the new critics, compared with the "Limehouse Blues." Mr. Seldes's "Seven Lively Arts," to which the Drifter turned in the glad expectation of finding sympathy for his low-brow loneliness, expounded jazz in technical terminology of cross-rhythms and orchestration. Still the Drifter refused to believe. He tried a brief explanation of jazz by one Virgil Thompson in the Mercury and learned the formula for "blues" harmony—memorized it carefully. Here it is: "Subdominant modulation with alternations of tonic major and minor." He also learned that "the chromatic (or diatonic) succession of dominant ninths so dear to Franck and Chabrier has become popular, and the mediant or sub-mediant tonality offers a pleasing relief from the more obvious dominant." After reading two pages and a half about counter-melodies, glissandi, instrumental balance, "the contrapuntal style enforced by disparate combinations," and much, much more, the Drifter comes out little the wiser. . . . Yes, he is wiser, wiser and sadder. He has lost all illusions about the happy spontaneity and careless freedom of his once-loved jazz.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

(Letters on the series New Morals for Old have poured into the office of The Nation. It is impossible to print more than parts of a few of them, but those we have selected and printed below present some of the varying and conflicting views of our readers. Other letters on the series will appear in a later issue.)

Old Immorals

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Would it not be a good idea to reverse the title of your series and say Old Morals for New? Herodotus when writing about Egypt rather disapprovingly reports the Egyptians' absolutely unrestrained sexual practices in their temples. The theology of the Egyptians as well as of the Greeks themselves is certainly free from prudishness. Certainly there was no place in old Greece for men like John Roach Straton. As Mephisto-Goethe put it:

Man darf das nicht vor keuschen Ohren nennen,
Was keusche Herzen nicht entbehren können.

New York, June 1 ERNST WALDSTEIN

We Break Up the Home

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: My immediate reasons for discontinuing my subscription to The Nation are seven in number—they are seven out of the eight articles under the general caption New Morals for Old, recently appearing in your periodical. Under the guise of progress these atrocious sex articles seek to do away with all the gains of civilization as to home and family, reverting to a selfish individualism which can only destroy the generations yet to be. I do not object to these articles so much as immoral —that does not particularly bother me one way or the other— as because they tend to break up what I believe to be the main support of civilization—the monogamous home. As a member of the Book and Periodical Committee of our local public library I felt obliged when the first of these articles appeared to recommend the removal of The Nation from our library tables as a menace to the youth of the community, and the immediate cancelation of the subscription.

Kennebunk, Maine, August 15 ROBERT P. DOREMUS

Bertrand Russell and the Jewish Law

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Russell ventured on a trip of discovery in an ill-equipped craft. He landed on many distant shores and gleaned information everywhere. I am only concerned with the impressions he gained in the spiritual land of Judea. He makes the statement that "religious Jews have observed dietary laws far more scrupulously than what seem to us fundamental principles of morality." Just the opposite is true. Religious Jews accept the authority of the Torah (Bible) and of Jewish tradition. Had Mr. Russell followed the elementary rule of verifying his sources he could have convinced himself, from any English Bible translation, that whereas sexual offenses like incest and adultery, which Mr. Russell cites, are capital crimes, offenses against dietary laws are mere torts. Moreover, Jewish tradition requires of its adherents that they face certain death rather than transgress the prohibitions against murder, incest, and idolatry. No such importance has ever been attached to the dietary laws either in theory or in practice. On the same page Mr. Russell quotes Leviticus for the levirate law that occurs in Deuteronomy and lays down axiomatically that "this custom originated in ancestor worship."

There is no justification for such a view in either the Biblical sources or in the results of modern anthropology. The sources give the following reason: By marrying his brother's childless widow the "levirate" helps to perpetuate his dead brother's name since the first son born of such a union would step into the latter's place as his heir. Thus the family property was kept together and the dead man's aspirations came to life in his first-born.

This interpretation is generally accepted among modern anthropologists. The desire of man in all stages of society is to perpetuate his own kind; therefore if he dies without issue, the wife should at least marry his brother so that there should remain some trace of his memory in society.

On page 498 Mr. Russell contrasts the commandment "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," which he presents as an example of highest "Christian" ethics, as an "end of life," with the injunction of the Decalogue, "Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day," a mere "rule of conduct." He suggests that the morality that ought to exist would lay down ends of life rather than rules of conduct and that the belief in the importance of the latter is superstitious.

These lines, apparently the pivotal center of Mr. Russell's critical review, are in fact its weakest part. Had he but troubled to read his Bible he would have discovered that, unfortunately for his arguments, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" occurs in Leviticus, which, in spite of the ingenuity of modern Bible critics, is still generally considered to be a part of the Old (Jewish) Testament.

New York, May 12 M. JUNG

Parasites or Partners

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In her otherwise excellent article Elsie Clews Parsons does not describe fairly the status of the home-staying married woman. Mrs. Parsons summarizes this part of her article in the following words: "Wifely parasitism is holding its own. . . . Where income permits the wife continues to be the consumer, the husband the producer."

The notion that a married woman is not obliged to contribute to the family income because she is married is disappearing so fast that its traces are hardly visible; but the fact that the married woman stays home whenever it is possible, i.e., whenever her husband's earnings permit it, is still very much with us. This is so for economic and physical reasons.

In spite of the large number of institutions and inventions that purport to, or actually do, ease the task of the homekeeper, keeping house without servants takes up most of a woman's day. It may be admitted that the woman who has to do only her housekeeping and cooking, and has no young children to care for, has a few free hours each day. Should she, as Mrs. Parsons suggests, seek outside work for these hours, unless it is essential economically? In my opinion this would be quite unfair. The woman who keeps house has no day off. Cleaning and cooking must be done every day. The fact merely is that the woman gets her day of rest spread in small parcels through the week. Seeking work for these hours of leisure would be equivalent to the husband's seeking a second job for Sundays and holidays.

Where the married woman must go to work in order to keep the family above the starvation-point, the result must be either a thoroughly neglected home or, more usually, double work for the woman—outside work during the day and housework at night. I will say nothing of the woman who has to care for one or more young children, besides her housework.

Mrs. Parsons mentions the fact that in Europe the wife's contribution to the family income is taken for granted much more than here. It is so for the same reason that it is taken for granted here among the very poor. The difference is that there are more people in Europe on this low economic level. The results in Europe are the same as here: neglect of the home and children and overwork for the woman.

Brooklyn, May 21 DORA C. SHAPIRO

The Sex Equality of Our Ancestors

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Charlotte Perkins Gilman repeats in The Nation the old fiction of man's domination of women by "religion, law, and family authority." But this has occurred only during comparatively brief periods of civilization, ancient and modern. For most of the time nearly all our forebears and nearly all the peoples of ancient states preserved an equality between women and men. In ancient civilization this was the equality of slaves. The proletariat of early Rome and the colonii of the pagan empire and the serfs of the Christian empire from Theodosius onward, constituting by far the most numerous and prolific part of the population, retained complete sexual equality because neither man nor woman had any other status than that of slave or serf. The same thing is true of all medieval Europe after the fall of the Roman Empire. At least five-sixths of the population were peasants and serfs, chained to the soil, but were enjoying complete sexual freedom. They mated naturally and voluntarily. Monogamy was common and was expected and approved, but marriage was unusual and most of the serfs were under legal disability of marriage. The monogamous male was a valuable asset to his mate and she suffered if he deserted her or if he were taken away by a press gang for the navy or by conscription for war or by death. But she was under no legal bonds to him and if she could get along better without him she was quite free to do so. Moreover, there was no such differentiation of tasks, virtues, or duties between the sexes as Mrs. Gilman describes. They shared in common the labor of the fields and the merrymaking of the holidays, and one sex was as chaste as the other. There was no "double standard."

The point is that it is from this stock that nearly all of us are descended, and not from the aristocratic few whose domestic institutions are described by Mrs. Gilman. Strict monogamous marriage augments the nervous organization of posterity, but the groups that practice it for many generations become so unfertile that their numbers tend to decrease. Most of the blood now in the veins of Americans results from the complete sexual freedom of the medieval serfs, modified by a few generations of religious, monogamous marriage. Hardly a trace of it comes from any remote ancestors, whose marriage customs demanded "compulsory motherhood."

New York, June 7 R. H. TOWNER

Clarifying and Interesting

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: That is such a good article of Mr. Krutch's in The Nation on Sex and Fiction that I can't keep still about it. I've read it several times. I particularly like his handling of Huxley—his attitude of not blinking the obscenities, but just trying to account for them. And that was a neat phrase about "Adam Bede." Altogether a most clarifying and interesting article. I wish I had written it!

New York, June 25 DOROTHY BREWSTER

Books

Colonies of England

Herbert Levi Osgood, an American Scholar. By Dixon Ryan Fox. Columbia University Press. $1.75.

The American Colonies in the Eighteenth Century. By Herbert Levi Osgood. Columbia University Press. Vols. I, II. $5.50 each.

George III and the American Revolution: The Beginnings. By Frank Arthur Mumby, Fellow of the Royal Historical Society. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

NO one should attempt to read Mr. Osgood's volumes on colonial history without first familiarizing himself with the admirably sympathetic and appreciative tribute which Dixon Ryan Fox has written in memory of the author. Suggested originally by certain of Mr. Osgood's students at Columbia University and its cost defrayed by donations from a number of them, this little volume admits the reader to the inner life and purpose of a very lovable man, of great modesty and great ability, who more than any one else has revolutionized the writing of our earliest history. Without other ambition than to tell the truth of the colonial story and to do so under the most exacting self-set limitations of scope and presentation, Mr. Osgood devoted the best years of his life to the single task of interpreting the institutional character and development of the American colonies in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

Rightly deeming all other comprehensive treatises on the period as faulty and superficial, because based on inadequate information and still more inadequate understanding, Mr. Osgood spent more than thirty years in contributing by every means at his command to a revaluation of the place that the colonies occupied in the British scheme of things and in the evolution of American political and institutional ideas. He brought to his task the powers of a great teacher, an indefatigable investigator, and an interpreter of penetrating wisdom and unbounded zeal. He formulated his own philosophy of the subject, emphasized his own methods and views in the classroom, spread widely his ideas in printed statements and articles, and aided generously and cooperatively the work of those who received their historical training at his hands. Unlike Lord Acton, who, though wise of counsel and stimulating as a promoter of other men's historical work, never wrote a book, Osgood gave permanent form to his conception of colonial history in what will eventually reach a total of seven capacious volumes. These volumes, characterized by fulness of knowledge, fairness of treatment, insight into the deeper springs and processes of historical development, and profound understanding of the influences at work guiding the actions of men, are in themselves a notable and worthy life-work.

Mr. Osgood had no desire to afford entertainment to what is known as the reading public. He wrote for scholars and by scholars will his results be appraised. His volumes were conceived in study and reflection and only by study and reflection can they be mastered. They were not intended to be the play-time companions or solaces of the leisure hour. Though Mr. Osgood had no lack of respect for the public as a reader of history, he believed that the historian should have the subject and not the public in mind.

The first three volumes, which appeared in 1904 and 1907, exposed in elaborate and complex form the plan that Mr. Osgood had already presented in sundry earlier articles. They showed that he had no interest in narration or description as such, but was concerned with the evolution of government and institutional organization, because it seemed to him that the political and constitutional side of the subject should be given first place, inasmuch as only through law and political institutions could social forces become in a large sense operative. Now, in 1924, six years after his death, appear the first two of the remaining four volumes, which are to carry the subject to 1760, the eve of the pre-revolutionary period. It is not much to the credit of American publishers that the manuscript should have had to be hawked about and finally should have been rejected by all of them. But business is business, and institutional histories that call for mental effort are not among the best sellers. In this country historical scholarship meets with little encouragement and reaps little reward, unless it is expressed in such alluring form as to make it salable for a profit.

The new volumes resemble the others in plan and treatment. They exhibit the same fixedness of purpose and are marked by the same severe limitations. Their content is very substantial, the treatment thorough and methodical, and the results are always dependable. The characterization of the personages dealt with is almost invariably sound and illuminating. In one respect the later volumes differ from the earlier. As Mr. Osgood advances into the eighteenth century, he deals more with action than with form, with operation than with structure. There is less analysis and more movement. This is not as true, however, of the chapters devoted to the British system of colonial management, where no attempt has been made to go beyond an analysis of function and structure and no effort made to study the British boards and departments actually at work in shaping the colonial relationship. These chapters leave upon the mind an impression of remoteness to the British system which in some ways is to be regretted,

Mr. Mumby's work entitled "George III and the American Revolution" is wholly unlike that of Mr. Osgood both in plan and purpose. Yet it, too, is worth while in its way, for it is interesting in that it gives an insight into the working of the human mind in times of crisis. It contains the story of the years from 1760 to 1776 (a second volume is to follow) in the language of contemporary correspondence, British and American, with a running commentary or nexus of events supplied by the editor. The volume will be read with considerable pleasure by many to whom Mr. Osgood's pages would be mentally painful, infinitely more important though they are. The impressions are agreeable, but inevitably of slight significance, and the work as a whole runs along a very narrow surface. The problem of the American Revolution cannot be solved in this fashion. The text is entertaining, but one feels that the method is wrong and that Mr. Mumby himself does not always understand the issues at stake. Else he would not have spoken in his commentary of Pitt as championing the "cause of American freedom," which he never did, or of the colonies in 1766 as a "united nation," which they were not even in the moments of gravest emergency. Nevertheless, Mr. Mumby's work will serve its purpose.

CHARLES M. ANDREWS

A Momentous Voyage

Journal of First Voyage to America. By Christopher Columbus. Albert and Charles Boni. $3.50.

LONG after the technical historian has abandoned an interpretation, either through increased information or because of a reexamination of materials, the inefficient professional and the casual reader continue in error. Often such a condition is excusable on the ground that the revision is buried in obscure journals or that the weight of tradition militates against a general and rapid acceptance of the new position. These reflections are relevant in connection with the momentous voyage of Columbus. In many of the most excellent textbooks on American history it continues to be axiomatic that Columbus voyaged because the Turks closed the trade routes to the East. Some years ago A. H. Lybyer of the University of Illinois published a paper in both English and American historical journals in which he definitely proved by the study of the fluctuations of prices and supplies of Eastern commodities in the markets of the Italian city states that the Turkish conquests had practically no influence on the trade. He further cited material tending to prove that the Turks extended courtesies to merchants desiring to cross their territories. He noted that the lack of any sharp rise in prices indicated a steady supply of Eastern commodities and he showed that when the Italian market collapsed it was from a different cause: the coming to power of the Atlantic seaboard commercial states.

This bit of research pushed the genesis of the attitude resulting in the voyage back into the socio-intellectual situation resulting in the expansion of Europe. The Italian city states had a practical monopoly on the trade routes to the Indies via the Near East, and so monopolized the trade. With the rise of Atlantic seaboard cities and nations to commercial prominence the dominance became irksome and they cast about for some way out of the situation. Cultural progress favored a release. The reports, somewhat fabulous to be sure, of travelers were becoming widely circulated. The crusades were not unimportant in stimulating curiosity and generating desires. There was a distinct revival of Alexandrian geography and astronomy (e.g., the writings of Ptolemy and Strabo), and many advances in cartography were made (see the letter from Toscanelli to Columbus, Note I of this volume). There were a series of important improvements in nautical instruments having to do with determining distances and position on the earth. The compass was known in the ninth century. There were important advances in ship-building. Chance and purpose had led to important discoveries.

The total expression of these various forces was the expansion of Europe (cf. Shepherd, Expansion of Europe. Political Science Quarterly. 1919). It thus appears that Columbus's voyage was only a part, albeit a very momentous part, of a general movement having its roots deep in European history and resulting in a tremendous release of energy which has not ceased even to our own day. Here, more than in the fabulous Renaissance of Symonds, originated the forces making for modern times. For very directly out of the expansion came the commercial revolution—a response to extended markets—and such intellectual activities as ethnology, ethnography, comparative religion, and all concerns implying a diversity of peoples and customs, and extending even to literature and manners. And it was but a short step to the industrial revolution and its extended influences.

If such a perspective seems to dim the luster of Columbus's achievement it is unfortunate, for to the people of the United States and to Europeans as well it is perhaps the most significant of all the voyages in the general movement of which it was a part. It stands as a beacon in the path of an historical movement. It marks the beginning of white men's activity in North America, and from that place were many important forces set in motion and to it were many of the strengths of the Old World carried. The implications of this man's achievement are astounding.

In this bare, matter-of-fact, but often thrilling record we catch a glimpse of his personality and realize dimly the impact of the new scenes on his curious mind. Columbus was intensely religious and referred all happenings to the will of God and sincerely desired to convert the discovered peoples to Christianity. He was a canny man who, so far as his knowledge extended, noted the commercially valuable products available and tried diligently to locate sources of gold. He was loyal to his backers and never neglected formally to claim each island for Spain. He had ethnological interests in that he set down his observations on the religious practices, property laws, marriage customs, and so on to the best of his understanding. He was kindly, preferring the gentle natives to the warlike ones, and honest, for he prohibited unjust barter between his sailors and the natives, and he forbade plundering. He noted that the natives seemed to practice communism, but he thought that monogamy was the rule except among the chiefs. Though he rather favored the use of clothing he was not blind to the beauties of the naked body, male and female. In fact, setting aside his religious bias and his constantly lamented lack of botanical knowledge, he seems to have had the catholic and tolerant mind necessary to the explorer.

Even in the abstract by Las Casas published in this case the romance of the adventure does not escape, it is so essentially a part of the story. This voyage must always remain one of tremendous interest to Americans, and there is no better way of keeping it alive than the publication of the "Journal" of the man who conceived and carried it out.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

The Tragic Lift

The White Ship. Esthonian Tales. By Aino Kallas. Translated from the Finnish by Alex Matson. Foreword by John Galsworthy. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Country People. By Ruth Suckow. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

A BRIEF preface by Mme Kallas tells the history of the Esthonian people and explains the dark color of her tales. The story of this people's enslavement begins with the forced introduction of Christianity in the thirteenth century, when German Knights of the Sword and another order of knighthood, founded with the Papal blessing, subdued the land and asserted their superior rights as Christians by reducing the conquered people to an absolute serfdom in which they were as completely deprived of legal protection as an inanimate object. Then, at a later period, Peter the Great handed them over to the only nation which would continue to deny them their most elementary rights long after every other country of Europe had granted its peoples some recognition of their status as sentient beings. So the story of their wrongs does not end until after the Great War had freed them from Russia. During the periods covered by these tales the peasant was still virtually the property of his lord; without warning men were torn from their wives and children to serve twenty-five years in the Czar's army; the merciless lash punished the slightest infractions of discipline, and even the famous, half-legendery jus primae noctis was occasionally enforced. Thus the stories are stories of the grim things which men and women, with the needs and feelings of human beings, are called upon to endure under a regime which assumes for them less sensibility than that of the beasts which they drive to the field.

From such material anyone might draw pathos and tears, but it is the final achievement of art to rob painful things of their pain, and this test Mme Kallas meets. Her stories are not pathetic, and they exalt more than they harrow. In the first place she has given to them some of the simple dignity of the legend in which terrible things are made more terrible by the calmness with which the inevitable is received and the dark conditions of life accepted. But she has done more than that: She has given them the lift of tragedy by making the dignity of the sufferer more striking and memorable than the suffering. She tells of brides condemned to Siberia on their wedding day, of mothers robbed of their children, and of hardened sinners dying with bonfires lighted upon their chests to forestall the fires of hell, but by the touch of her art she robs such things of their pain, setting the patient strength of humanity over against the sorrow that it endures and showing that man can bear whatever burdens his fellow-man may put upon him. Nor will the humanity which she describes give up wholly its right to all that is implied by "that sad word, joy." Like the defiant flowers which nature sends through the hard earth to flourish for a few weeks in that cold Northern land, love and the joy of life snatch a moment to flaunt themselves between calamities, and thus humanity stubbornly reasserts its nature in spite of an insistence, continued for centuries, that it shall sink into the dull passivity of the beast.

In the dialogue, A Bathsheba of Saaremaa, the author achieves the maximum of dramatic tension in the story of a young wife who betrays her husband to the conscription in order that she may become the darling of an overlord, but Gerdruta Carponai is the story most typical of the spirit of the book. Here a terrible visitation of the plague leaves destitute upon the seashore but two survivors—a girl of the people and a young man of the master class. They have suffered every calamity, but the irresistible force of life turns their predicament into a brief idyl and they found a family—a family, it is true, destined to be fishers and slaves, but one which, like its founders, will continue to live in spite of all and to vindicate once more the eternal hope and eternal fortitude which give to man his dignity and make his story not a tale told by an idiot but a tragedy written by a master.

The method of Mme Kallas is the dramatic one which befits the violence of incidents taken from the history of a people which lived precariously and upon which calamity, sudden and definitive, was likely to fall. Miss Suckow, dealing with a more tranquil life, chooses for her short novel of the German farmer of the Middle West the form of a simple chronicle. In it she can summarize the lives of three generations and depict a tragedy (if tragedy it is) not of decisive violence but of attrition. In her story no passions rise high, her characters measure their achievement by solid, material things, and the pity is chiefly that men and women who have worked so hard for a living should live so little. She traces the history of a family from the grandfather who came as a settler to the grandchildren who go their separate ways in a changing civilization, and their story is typical. Change comes but it comes slowly. The purchase of a Ford marks an epoch in the life of the second generation, but a Victrola comes only with the third, and meanwhile the elders, worn by labor, drop aside. Their lives are without the terrible sufferings which Mme Kallas describes, but they are also without the passionate defiant joys. Happier but less intense they live their lives in labor and pass on to each succeeding generation a little more comfort and a slightly changed civilization.

Miss Suckow's method is no more showy than her story, but it has the advantage of wide observation, absolute honesty, and the knack of selecting just those incidents calculated to picture to the imagination the life which she is describing. Moreover, she has no ax to grind and she neither satirizes nor idealizes. No more unprejudiced record has been written of this particular epoch and this particular region. It gives an impression of completeness without being either ponderous or dull.

J. W. KRUTCH

Coal Mining

Miners' Wages and the Cost of Coal. By Isador Lubin. With the Aid of Council and Staff of the Institute of Economics. McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc. $2.50.

MEN passing to and fro around the mouth of a coal mine make a picture of great interest. Their lamp-laden caps and grimed faces suggest what they do inside. They are casual as they move about, as casual as hod-carriers with their burdens, yet they are familiar with the inside of the earth. They know what it is like in those cavernous labyrinths, where most people would lose themselves: labyrinths that sometimes reach miles from the light. For coal miners the mystery of tortuous interiors has fled. What do they see in there? What do they do? How do they feel? Do they like to get back to the sun? Just how are they different from other people?

It takes a little from the romance of the picture, but adds to its interest, to know that these men are all definite tradesmen. They are as definitely tradesmen as bricklayers and tinsmiths. They know what they are about, and each has his own tasks. Coal mining is not a single craft. It is many crafts. At least thirty different trades are followed in getting coal out of the earth and ready to ship from the mine. The man who bursts down the face of the vein with explosives, the man who runs a small car up to the pile of broken coal, the man who lays the track for this car, the pumpman, the trimmer, the screener—all these and others compose the motley crew who dig the world's fuel. What is the machinery for determining the wages of soft-coal workers? This is of interest, first, because it has a bearing on the sufficiency of our supply of mined coal; second, because it affects the price that people pay for that coal, and third, because it touches the conservation of the coal resources of the country. If people took a greater interest in what goes on around coal mines and how mine workers and operators adjust their multitudinous differences, steps toward economy and greater smoothness of operation might be taken.

Nearly everybody knows that there have been exhausting coal strikes in the bituminous fields in recent years, making some homes and some offices cold, and that representatives of both the mine workers and operators meet every so often to adopt a wage scale and compose other disagreements. The occasion for the meeting of these representatives is called the Interstate Joint Conference. Underlying its negotiations is a fairly well-recognized principle. This is the principle of competitive equality. Operators interpret this principle to mean that wage rates in all parts of the widely separated coal-fields are to be so fixed that every operator can compete successfully with every other. This means fixing the rates in relation to every factor that affects the cost of producing coal and getting it to market—differences in size of seam, impurities in the coal, water in the mine, freight rates to market, and so forth. It means adjusting rates for each subdistrict and even for each mine. This is a colossal and impracticable task, but it is the theory underlying the operators' interpretation of the rule and their demands at wage conferences. Miners' representatives have tended to interpret the principle of competitive equality to mean that wage rates and other conditions were to be made sufficiently uniform to place all operators on an equal footing as regards these conditions, thus giving them an equal start in regard to certain fundamental factors, and leaving to the operation of natural advantages and competitive skill, rather than to willingness to cut wages, the determination as to who will make most profits and win.

Mr. Lubin traces these interpretations through the various stages of fixing the wage rates, and describes the wage-rate structure in detail. This, the greater part of his book, is too large a matter to be summarized here. He finds that the principles adopted for adjusting wages have not served the purposes for which they were intended, that the wage-rate structure is unwieldy and wasteful, that mines are kept in existence which have no economic justification, and that the present chaotic condition of the bituminous industry is due in part to the method of fixing wages. As an improvement he suggests eliminating the system of differentials, that is, the system by which wages are adjusted to all sorts of local and varying factors; he enumerates some of the advantages that would come from this. Would not the admission of the United Mine Workers, he also asks, into the non-union battlefields of West Virginia, Alabama, and other places have a steadying influence? Here disturbances and bloodshed are common; here wage cuts and wage increases may be expected with every significant fluctuation of the market. Mr. Lubin does not attempt to answer this question, but says that whether the stability that would come from unionizing the whole industry, with the resulting labor monopoly and the threat that such a monopoly would have of shutting off the country's coal supply completely some time, is worth the price is a matter of personal judgment. He points out further that students of labor refer to the railroad brotherhoods as illustrations of the circumspect use of such a great power. His book is an illuminating analysis of a complex matter, refreshingly free from prejudice. Opponents of the United Mine Workers will find in it much justification for the existence of this misrepresented but desirable body. The book is not easy to read, and, despite the romantic nature of the coal miner's job, its perusal had better not be attempted except by serious students.

WINTHROP D. LANE

In Argentina

La que no perdonó. By Hugo Wast. Buenos Aires: Agencia General de Librería.

THIS most recent work of the Argentine novelist shows a return to the manner of his "Flor de Durazno." It is the portrait of a woman against a background of provincial life. The region Wast depicts is the semi-tropical northeast of the great South American republic, the languid city of Santa Fé and the surrounding country periodically flooded by the Paraná and its tributaries.

Wast has selected the elements and characters which are indigenous to this region and has arranged them into an harmonious and picturesque group. He has attempted to give a cross-section of the entire social structure—the landed aristocracy, which rules with an almost feudal authority; the middle class, still despised in Argentina because it has not yet become an hereditary estate but derives mainly from a generation which has worked upward from the laboring into the professional class or dropped downward from the aristocracy into the small office-holders' class, and the lowest class, that of the native-born.

The figure of Mercedes dominates the story. She is a Doña Perfecta with the bigotry of righteous susceptibility in place of the narrow religious intolerance so carefully analyzed by Galdós. She ruins her life by rigid adherence to her technical rights just as persistently as Anna Karenina ruins hers by repeated yielding to her passion. Like her Spanish sister, Doña Perfecta, her will is inflexible. Once a course of action has been decided upon, nothing can stay its execution; every cycle of thought must be concluded for good or ill. Thus, when she discovers that Hernandarias is faithless to her as a husband, she applies herself so intently to the collection of evidence that the resulting wall isolates her and makes forgiveness impossible. She retires to her estate, where, were she even a trifle less meticulously conscienced, she would yield to her great love for Dr. Monzón. But she is consistent, so consistent that one might be tempted to consider her the exaltation of a principle, did she not finally cry out with anguished heart against her very righteousness and show herself near the clay of everyday humanity in the admission that her daughter's death was the price of her own reconciliation. By contrast she calls to mind Willa Cather's lovable and appealing "Lost Lady." Mercedes is all but a demonstration of how unattractive and unlovely a good woman becomes by the overscrupulous adherence to a moral code.

Wast's style is direct and straightforward and, unlike that of most authors of Latin blood, it is quite free from ornamentation. His books are full of episode and action. He loves tales of adventure. In "La que no perdonó" such scenes as the illicit cock-fight which provides certain elements of Santa Fé with the same sort of excitement as the bootleggers enjoy in this country, Pablito's and Judith's wild chase after the runaway colt, the 'gator hunt, the dance, and the ensuing fight at the rancho of Don Bachi where the phonograph replaces the old-time guitar bear out his statement that he would rather write a "Treasure Island" than a "Penguin Island."

ERNEST HERMAN HESPELT

A Musical Chronicle

My Long Life in Music. By Leopold Auer. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $5.

FORTUNATELY, Leopold Auer has been endowed with a fine sense of self-perspective, so that instead of merely glorifying himself in his memoirs he has been able to weld the salient points of his career into a sort of subjective account of the great musical world of Europe and Europe's musicians for the last seventy years. It is a remarkable chronicle, beginning with his childhood in Hungary, that country of violinists, where one almost expects each and every little boy to be born with a fiddle in his hand. But though young Auer began his career, as many another has, as a strolling player, he had a wise and ambitious father. And so the money earned by intermittent travel was spent on intermittent study—first at the Conservatory of Budapest, then at Vienna, and finally at Hanover, with Joachim.

Soon the student merges into the virtuoso, and after that, life takes him to the Grand Ducal towns and fashionable spas of Germany, to Paris under the third Napoleon, to London during the season, to Vienna, Constantinople, and, above all, to Russia. Those chapters devoted to Russia are perhaps the most valuable, as they cover practically the whole musical development of that country from 1868, the period when Glinka's opera, "A Life for the Czar," was the only so-called national music and musical activities outside of the theater were confined solely to those of the Imperial Musical Society, through the awakening of a national consciousness by Tchaikovsky and the Neo-Russian School, up to the present day, with its ultra-modern tendencies as exemplified by Stravinsky (with whom the professor is apparently out of sympathy). This development was even more amazing and rapid than our own, for the musical Russia of the sixties was far from being the musical Russia of today. All the operatic and concert life was controlled by the director of the Imperial Theaters of Moscow and St. Petersburg and by the Russian Musical Society. Even the great conservatories of these two towns, directed respectively by Nicholas and Anton Rubinstein, were members of this society. The faculty of the St. Petersburg Conservatory was composed of such notables as Anton Rubinstein and Leschetizky for piano, Henri Wieniawski for violin, and Charles Davidoff for cello; while two graduates from this institution, young Tchaikovsky and, later, Arensky, both taught at the Moscow institute.

> The trend was all in favor of Russian youth . . . which was no more than right, and there was a general desire to depend no longer on artists from abroad. . . . The young artists graduating from the two great institutions with special honors were retained to join their respective faculties, and so no violence was done to the older traditions.

This policy of encouraging the native youth finally culminated in the rebellion of the younger element against the classic principles of Anton Rubinstein, who was director not only of the Petersburg Conservatory but of the Russian Musical Society as well. A new school thus sprang into being, based on principles of nationality, and called by its members the "young Russian School." These members were known as the "Five," and consisted of Balakireff, their founder; Rimsky-Korsakoff, a young officer in the Russian navy; Cui, a professor of military engineering; Borodine, a professor of chemistry; and Moussorgsky, a young officer of the Imperial Guard. These "Five" met at the house of Balakireff, who criticized their works, and taught them harmony, counterpoint, and orchestration. Later they found a patron in one Balaieff, a rich lumber merchant, who founded a Society of Symphony Concerts of which he was the president and sole member. He paid all the expenses involved by this new propaganda for the music of the nationalist composers, and commenced by engaging the orchestra of the Imperial Russian Opera, under the direction of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Their device was "National music and nothing else!" Tchaikovsky was occasionally represented on their programs, but was never identified with them.

Besides this life behind the scenes the professor gives us interesting sidelights on his pupils, Heifetz, Elman, Zimbalist, Seidl, and others. He winds up by praising our own native talent as second to none, and decrying our attitude toward it and the tonal art in general. The book is packed with quotable material, a remarkable feat, considering the fact that his souvenirs and data were left behind in fleeing from Russia. Even so, it is the richest volume of musical experience that has yet come to us.

HENRIETTA STRAUS

A Reasoned Application in Marriage of a Neglected Basic Principle

A PLEA FOR MONOGAMY

BY DR. WILFRID LAY

I + I = I

THERE is a mode of marital relationship which Dr. Lay and other leading psychologists agree can make all marriages between physically normal people an entire success. In this book the practice is explained and developed for the first time, and every man and woman will find it of the highest significance in their own lives.

The book may be obtained at any bookseller's or direct from the publishers.

Price, $4.00

BONI & LIVERIGHT GOOD BOOKS 61 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK, N.Y.

What La Follette's State Is Doing

By CHESTER C. PLATT of Madison, Wis.

One reviewer has called this book a sequel to Dr. Frederick C. Howe's "Wisconsin, An Experiment in Democracy." It is not a campaign book, and when written the author did not know whether La Follette would be a candidate for president or not. The object of the book is to show that Wisconsin liberals, imbued with the La Follette spirit, have made this state one of the best governed in the union, and the progressive reforms adopted here have promoted and not hindered the commercial prosperity of the state.

Here are the titles of some of the chapters. Part Time Schools, Unemployment Insurance, University Extension, The Legal Status of Women, Cooperative Movements, Public Ownership, Taxing Unearned Incomes.

The volume contains over 300 pages. Has been carefully indexed and is illustrated with portraits of many Wisconsin progressives. Price $2.50. Order through your bookseller, or by mail of the publishers, Batavia Times Press, Batavia, N. Y.

International Relations Section

Labor in Greece

By GEORGE SARANTON

THE young republic of Greece has recently been shaken, not by internal political dissension or by her historic enemy the Turk but by the entire mass of her laboring class. To understand this situation it may be well to glance back over the development of the labor movement in this highly unsocialistic and unindustrial commonwealth.

Up to 1909 trade unionism had only begun to penetrate the ranks of the workers in that very considerable modern Greek industry, the merchant marine. Working conditions and hours of service in this field were exceedingly unsatisfactory and they are still so in many cases. But a strike in Piraeus in that year by the crews of the Greek steamers, then inaugurating the principle of collective bargaining, resulted in a veritable state of war with the Department of Police. The strike was lost except that the workers gained the right to decent food on the steam and sailing vessels.

In the political field labor was equally undeveloped. For several years Platon E. Drakoules was the solitary voice in behalf of the working class in the midst of a prevalent spirit of nationalism and militarism. But at last a socialist party was formed and was ably led for some time by a Mr. Sitheres, who was also a Representative in Parliament from a southern Macedonian constituency and very recently the holder of the portfolio of the Department of Agriculture. The party is now affiliated with the Socialist International, but it does not yet enjoy a permanent place in the House of Representatives and its entire membership amounts to about 5,000.

The real hope of Greek labor, however, is the Hellenic Federation of Labor. This organization is modeled after the British system, is affiliated with the Labor International and with the International Labor Conference, and is a union of practically all the railway and merchant marine men. But most of the workers are still unorganized and their conditions are deplorable. This is true of the people engaged in wheat, tobacco, currant, olive, and wine cultivation, as well as in mining. The number of well-built factories is small; it is not uncommon to see spinners, machinists, weavers, and other factory workers, both men and women, working for long hours in dark, gloomy, and ramshackle buildings. The cost of living is desperately high, the rental for an ordinary room in several towns ranging from 20 to 25 drachmas a day. Before the World War a single unskilled laborer could earn from four to five drachmas a day and could eke out an existence even in a town; now the average daily wage runs from 40 to 50 drachmas, but the prices of the necessities are much higher in proportion. The only two classes of wage-earners which have fared slightly better are the office employees and the domestic servants. The condition of the agricultural workers in Thessaly has been particularly pitiable. Women are not as yet admitted to the ranks of the trade unions, while their minimum number of hours of work is usually ten.

A serious labor crisis occurred in August, 1923. A general strike, well-nigh universal, began on the 18th and lasted for ten days; the Revolutionary Government under the leadership of Colonel Plasteras proclaimed martial law, declared the labor unions illegal, and succeeded in suppressing the strike by force. All the union offices were seized, their furniture and archives were removed, and their bank deposits confiscated; the leaders in the strike were all arrested and a special court martial was convened to try them. With the return of normalcy, however, the status quo ante of organized labor was restored, and the situation continued to lie in abeyance until May 1, 1924.

A few days before the beginning of May of this year a request for permission to hold a labor parade was refused. Immediately the workers of Athens and Piraeus were aroused and they held a mass meeting on the 1st. A detachment of troops which attempted to disperse them was met with violent resistance, as was the fire department when it sought to give a helping hand to the soldiers. The result was a panic, in the course of which numerous semi-fatal injuries occurred, followed by the arrest and imprisonment of about 250 persons. Government departments proceeded to investigate in order to discover and try the leaders, who, the Government asserted, were the authors of such ominous signs as "Down with the Militaristic Republic" and "The day is not distant when we will crush the bourgeoisie and found a republic, including not only Greece but the entire Balkan Peninsula." The Greek Federation of Labor threatened to call a general strike unless the arrested comrades were set free at once. It was said that the leaders of the affair were encouraged in their attitude by the simultaneous resumption of diplomatic relations between Greece and Russia as well as by "foreign propagandists roaming the streets of the classical city."

At all events, a strike was proclaimed throughout the country, the labor men blaming the Government for the clash of May 1 and for not releasing their colleagues. On the same day, however, a strike had been already ordered by the Society of Tramway Employees of Athens and Piraeus. Soon the movement assumed serious proportions; sympathetic strikes were ordered from north to south and by the end of the month, despite the weakening opposition of the forces of the state and especially of the Prime Minister, A. Papanastassiou himself, it spread as far as Macedonia with its numerous tobacco workers. Seamen and dockers caused steamers to be tied up for days in the harbor of Piraeus; then the bakery workers joined; even the boatmen called a strike of sympathy. Both camps were as obstinate as Greeks can be.

By a strange coincidence, it was at this period that Athens was welcoming the first Russian Soviet official in the person of Mr. Ustinov. Conferences were being held between the members of the Cabinet, the affected companies, and the union chiefs. The General Federation of Labor through its executive secretary, Mr. Evangelou, accused the ship-owners of trying to force the authorities to take possession of the vessels and so place the labor unions in direct opposition to the republic. Piraeus was on the eve of martial law with companies of soldiers and sailors patrolling its streets. Seamen, tobacco workers, bakery employees, cigarette-makers, all clamored for shorter hours and more pay; the ship strike became general, the Seamen's and Masters' Union being one of the strongest to join. On June 11 the brotherhood of the employees of the Peloponnesian railroad and those of the Hellenic joined the striking groups. Various mills in Piraeus and in other cities were also closed.

At last an agreement was reached on June 14 and the strike was brought to a close with a few gains for the proletariat. One of these was the promise of the Democratic Union, the party in power, that they would introduce the eight-hour day without any exceptions aside from those imposed in seasonal occupations. This they actually did by a bill which became law on July 2. The daily newspaper of the Communists, however, Rizospastes (the Radical), has not fared so well; its publishers and editors were brought to trial on the charge of inciting the populace toward the "overthrow of the republic." But the Government has released the imprisoned laborites and has begun to execute the long-promised sequestration of the uncultivated tchifliks and other fallow lands in Thessaly and some parts of Macedonia and has turned them over to tenant farmers. This last measure was first proposed by the Venizelists in 1910, but, owing to the intervening vicissitudes, it had become a dead letter until recently. The spirit of the press is shown in the following extract from a signed editorial article on the first page of the leading Athenian daily, the Eleftheros Logos; the writer, after referring to the undoubted influence of revolutionary Communists, Greek or foreign, in the whole imbroglio, goes on to say:

> Nevertheless, the responsibility of the Government in the current labor crisis is great; particularly that of the chairman of the Council of Ministers, who really begs the question in trying to shift the whole burden to the Communists. Before their assumption of power and even after, the directors of the Democratic Union did not miss the slightest opportunity for claiming a monopoly of friendliness to labor and of socialistic and democratic ideas in general. We are not blaming them for this fact; indeed, we wish their intentions were sincere. . . . Unfortunately, demagogy was the essence of it all. The final outcome of the strike was the resignation of "Thunderbolt" Kondylles, Minister of War, lieutenant general, and the Prime Minister's right-hand man in all the recent events, who turned against his chief with the accusation that he had shown an excessive submissiveness to the demands of the labor unions.

The Conference: An Analysis

NEWSPAPER accounts of the compromise solutions reached at the London Conference, written from day to day, have necessarily been so confusing that we reprint the following clear summary of the course of the conference up to the arrival of the German delegates, prepared for the Bulletin of the Foreign Policy Association by James G. McDonald:

The United States emerges from the conference to find its citizens designated to act as chairmen of most of the vital arbitral commissions. Under the guise of unofficialism, now worn transparently thin, our Government is pledged to play a decisive role in administering the receivership of Germany and indirectly the economic rehabilitation of Europe as a whole.

Of all the questions which divided the Allies, none was more difficult than that of German default. Herriot came to the conference committed to the maintenance of the French claim that, as in the case of the Ruhr, she had the right in the future to impose sanctions on Germany without the assent or cooperation of Britain. MacDonald was just as unqualifiedly committed to the non-acceptance of this claim. But both premiers were determined to secure agreement on this as on the other major issues. From the more than two weeks of intense study and conference emerged an ingenious and apparently workable compromise. Nominally the Reparation Commission, which has hitherto been controlled by France, retains its right to declare Germany in default. But when the Reparation Commission is voting on the question of default an American citizen, named by the commission itself if it can agree unanimously, or, failing that, by the president of the Permanent Court of International Justice, "shall take part in the discussions and shall vote."

Any member of the Reparation Commission "may within eight days from the date of [a given] decision appeal from that decision to the Arbitral Commission composed of three impartial and independent persons whose decision shall be final. The members of the Arbitral Commission shall be appointed for five years by the Reparation Commission, deciding by unanimity, or, failing such unanimity, by the president of the Permanent Court." The president of the Arbitral Commission shall be a United States citizen.

Moreover, the Allied governments pledge themselves "not to take sanctions in regard to Germany unless a default" has been declared under the conditions laid down. Even in such case the governments will act with "the consciousness of joint trusteeship for the financial interest of themselves and of the persons who advanced money" through the loan to Germany. More specifically, the Allies promise "that in case sanctions have to be applied in consequence of the default by Germany, they will safeguard any specific securities which may be pledged to the service of the loan." They also recognize that the interest and sinking-fund charges of the loan are "entitled to absolute priority in relation to any resources of Germany on which a general lien may have been given to the loan, as well as in relation to any resources that may arise as a result of a plan of sanctions."

In one respect the Allied agreement involves a definite going beyond the terms of the Treaty of Versailles which limited Germany's obligations to make reparations in kind to the ten years, 1920 to 1930. France, fearful that on the expiration of this period she may not be able to secure essential coal, and more particularly coke, from Germany, insisted on guaranties. Others of the Allies were just as anxious that reparations in kind should not be used as an excuse for stifling German industry. The compromise agreed upon seems to be fair to both Germany and France. The Transfer Committee, which under the Dawes Plan is the custodian of all payments made by Germany on the reparation account, and which controls the transfer of funds to the Allies, is to be authorized "to employ the funds at its disposal in payment for deliveries on ordinary commercial conditions of any commodities and (or) services provided for in programs from time to time prescribed by the Reparation Commission after consultation with the Transfer Committee." The German Government is asked to accept "the establishment of a special committee not exceeding six members and consisting of an equal number of Allied and German representatives" to carry out these transfers. Differences of opinion betweeen the Allied and German members of the committee are to be settled by arbitration. This same principle is also applied to possible disagreements which may arise between the Transfer Committee and the German Government in reference to other phases of the problem of reparations in kind. The arbiter in this case is to be of neutral nationality, if the German Government so desires, and to be chosen "by agreement between the two parties" or, failing such agreement, by the president of the Permanent Court.

The French urged that procedure be provided to remedy defects which may later develop in the working of the Dawes Plan. The Allies therefore agreed on the following procedure: "Any government complaining of such defect may submit the question to the Reparation Commission which will transmit it forthwith for inquiry and advice to a committee consisting of the agent general for reparation payments, the trustee or trustees for railway and industrial mortgage bonds, the railway commissioner, and the commissioner of controlled revenues."

This committee shall report to the Reparation Commission which, for the purpose of considering such report, shall convoke the American member who shall have the right to vote. "If the Reparation Commission arrives at a unanimous decision, it shall invite the German Government to adhere to it, and if an agreement is reached with the German Government on the subject the necessary measures shall be carried into effect without delay. If the Reparation Commission is not unanimous, or if any decision it takes unanimously is not accepted by the German Government, any of the parties interested may submit the question to a committee of three independent and impartial experts, chosen by agreement between the Reparation Commission, deciding unanimously, and the German Government, or, in default of such agreement, by the president of the Permanent Court."

It is, however, provided that this method of changing the Dawes Report "shall not apply to any question in regard to the disposition of funds paid to the account of the Agent General or any other matter which falls solely within the competence of the Transfer Committee."

If the Transfer Committee is equally divided on the question whether there have been German maneuvers to checkmate cash transfers, the question shall be referred to an independent and impartial arbiter to be selected by the Transfer Committee itself, if unanimous, or failing unanimity, by the president of the Permanent Court. If, however, "the funds at the disposal of the Agent General for Reparation Payments are at any time accumulated in Germany up to the limit of five billion gold marks . . . and the committee has by a majority decided that the concerted financial maneuvers (referred to) have not taken place . . . any member of the minority of the committee may within eight days appeal against such decision to an arbitral tribunal whose decision on the matter before them shall be final. The arbitral tribunal shall consist of three independent and impartial financial experts including a citizen of the United States of America, who shall act as chairman."

Bossing the Far East

THE opposition of Mr. Hughes to the recent Chinese-Russian treaty is discussed in the following statement by L. M. Karakhan—who negotiated the agreement with V. K. Wellington Koo—given out at Peking through the Rosta News Agency:

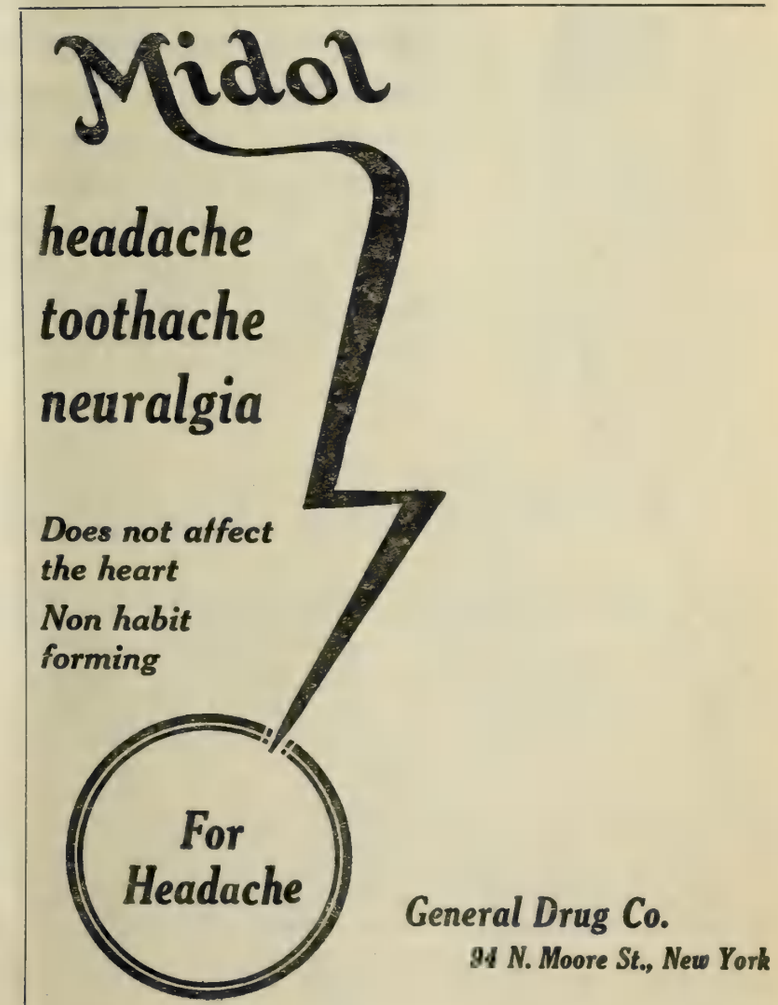
Mr. Hughes has evidently decided to punish China, so he is now against a preliminary customs tariff conference, he advises France not to ratify the Washington agreements, and, lastly, he proposes to revise the entire Chinese policy of the United States. And, as all things evil proceed from the Bolshevists, Mr. Hughes wishes by one and the same stroke to chastise the Soviet Government; because of the evil influence it has on China he has decided not to recognize it.

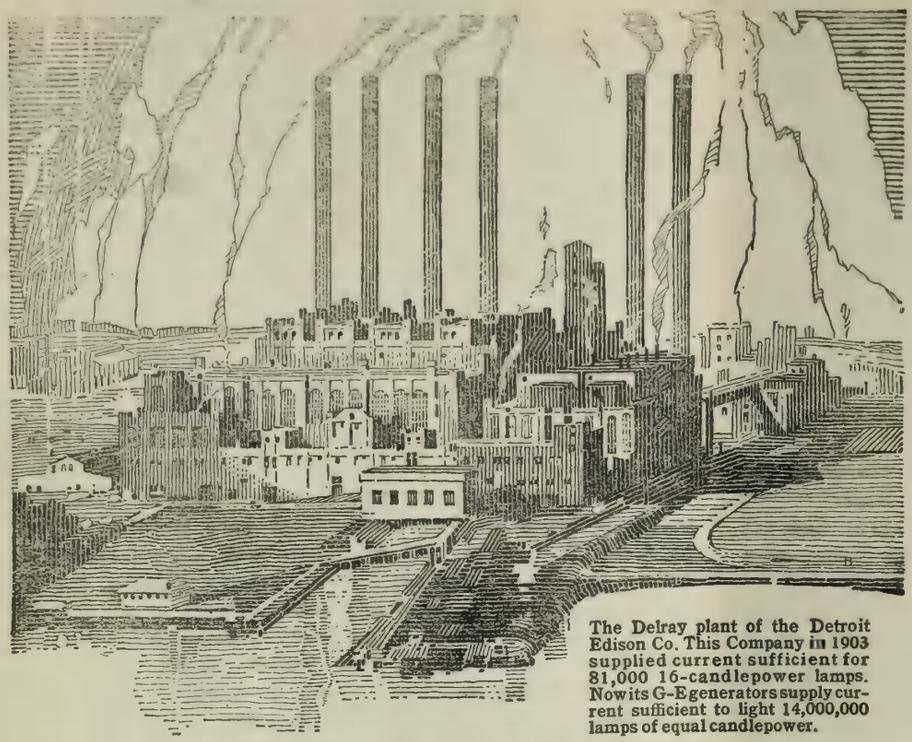
However, the Soviet Government views quite calmly the present policy of Mr. Hughes, well knowing that there is not a single honest and reasonable American who understands the interests of his or her country who supports the shortsighted Russian policy of the present chief of the State Department. Numerous are the governments which the Soviet Government has already outlived, and it will certainly without injury to itself outlive the present rulers of America.

What is of more interest is the attitude Washington assumes toward China. Though I have not seen the Chinese note to the American Government relative to the Chinese Eastern Railway, I imagine it was couched in Mr. Koo's usual courteous and refined style, and I seriously doubt whether there could be any ground for a charge of audaciousness. Possibly, the State Department saw audaciousness in the fact that China refused to recognize the right of America—and, for that matter, of Japan and France—to interfere in the affairs of the Chinese Eastern Railway. It should be recalled, however, that this audacious proposition is based on the treaties between China and Czarist Russia and was supported, too, by the agreement, signed on May 31, 1924.

Indeed, no countries but China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics have anything to do with the Chinese Eastern Railway, and all the other Powers must know that we will not allow them to interfere with our business. I don't care even to know to what extent their charges are based on the Washington resolutions. The latter are non-existent in our eyes—for that matter, they evidently do not exist even for the Powers which signed them. At any rate, as far as China is concerned, things went no further than promises and blackmail, nor does anyone seem to have any intention of carrying out those decisions. Now Washington—which gave birth to the resolutions—goes the length of recommending that France refuse to recognize the child it itself gave birth to. There is no doubt that Paris will hear this with a sigh of relief, as France has for a long time looked upon the result of the Washington conference as an illegitimate child.

It is not, naturally, a question of bolshevist influence on the Chinese Government. It is foolish, indeed, to try and explain by the influence of the Soviet Government any step of the Chinese Government which is not to other people's liking. The Chinese people is very well able itself to see what benefits and what harms it, who are its enemies and who its friends, when its honor and national dignity are violated and when its rights are respected in deeds, not in words. No alien influences are needed for this. The work of imperialist agents in China, who have a complete disregard for the Chinese people, is itself the best school the people can go to for a right understanding of their interests.





The Delray plant of the Detroit Edison Co. This Company in 1903 supplied current sufficient for 81,000 16-candlepower lamps. Now its G-E generators supply current sufficient to light 14,000,000 lamps of equal candlepower.

Pillars of Progress

In 1922 the American people used one billion dollars' worth of electrical energy. And every five years the demand for this energy doubles.

Think what this increasing use of electricity means in brightened homes and in products manufactured. The General Electric Company takes pride in equipping modern electric light and power plants; their chimneys are pillars of progress.

You will find this monogram on all types of electrical equipment used by power and light companies. The General Electric Company designs and builds all types of large electrical machinery for the generation, transmission and distribution of electric power.

GENERAL ELECTRIC

HOFFMANN SCHOOL
for Individual Development
386 Fort Washington Avenue, New York City
DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL
Rebecca Hoffmann, Director
Dr. Nathan Peyser, Educational Director
Children 4-10 years Bus Service

BASH BISH LODGE, Copake Falls, N.Y.
A Camp for Adults
IN THE BERKSHIRES
Less than 2 hours' ride from New York
TENNIS, BATHING, DANCING, ETC.
Rates $32.50 per Week—$6 per day
Address RUBENSTEIN & LEIKIN
Bash Bish Lodge Copake Falls, N. Y.
Tel. 31, Ring 4 City tel. Intervale 2667

FOR RENT—OUT OF TOWN—UNFURNISHED

100 year old Farmhouse. Every modern convenience yet original spirit retained. Six bedrooms. Three baths. Living room 25 x 25. Fireplace. Steam heat—electricity. 2-car garage. 5½ acres of real country—protected. To rent by year $1100. Wonderful for winter week-ending or commuting all year. Exceptional oportunity. Must move. Hutchison, Box 391, Greenwich, Conn.

THE RUSSIAN INN
33 West 37th St., N. Y., near 5th Ave.
LUNCHEON DINNER SUPPER
Unique After Theatre Entertainment
Music and Singers

SPEAKERS: We assist in preparing special articles, papers, speeches, debates. Expert scholarly service. AUTHOR'S RESEARCH BUREAU, 500 Fifth Avenue, New York.

EXPERIENCED research secretary wants part time position. College graduate. Experience in educational and philanthropic institutions. Address Ellsworth, 142 East 18th St., City.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
BELL SYSTEM
One Policy, One System, Universal Service

STEINWAY
THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

THE NATION'S Index to Vol. CXIX

January—June, 1924

is now ready. One copy will be sent to each library on the subscription list of The Nation. Other subscribers who wish a copy should send their request to the Subscription Department.

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York City

CANCER How it is caused and how it can be prevented. By J. ELLIS BARKER. $3.00
E. P. DUTTON & CO. 681 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

THE CALIFORNIA SCHOOL OF GARDENING FOR WOMEN

Offers a two years course in practical gardening, including the propagation and care of flowers, shrubs, fruit and vegetables, the laying out and management of small gardens as well as large estates.

At Hayward, California (one hour by train or motor from San Francisco). Principal: Miss J. Walrond-Skinner, N. D., Hort., F. R. H. S.

Tuition $250. Term begins Jan. 15, 1925. Only six students will be taken the first year. Write for information now and make application to the Principal, Hayward, California.

MARX'S CIVIL WAR IN FRANCE has now for the first time been published in cloth binding: in the same volume is the COMMUNIST MANIFESTO by Marx and Engels. Both are invaluable historical documents. Price 60c. postpaid. Ask for book catalog.
CHARLES H. KERR & CO., 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago

Any Change of Address

should be mailed to our Subscription Department at least two weeks before it is to become effective. This will insure uninterrupted delivery of The Nation to you, and will materially lessen the pressure of work in our office. When notifying us be sure to give both old and new addresses and stipulate the exact date upon which you desire the change made.

SUBSCRIPTION DEPARTMENT
The Nation
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK, N. Y.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 27, 1924 No. 3086

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 201
EDITORIALS:
Our Southern Neighbors 204
The New Peace in Europe 205
Mr. Coolidge Stands Pat 205
The Saga of the S. S. Iceberg 206
ART AND REVOLUTION IN MEXICO. By Bertram D. Wolfe 207
MEXICO'S CREDIT: THE VITAL ISSUE. By Rafael Nieto 209
THE JEW IN MEXICO. By Anita Brenner 211
FREEDOM OR IMPERIALISM? By José Vasconcelos 212
LA FOLLETTE IN AMERICA. By Arthur Warner 214
CLARKSBURG, WEST VIRGINIA. By William Hard 215
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 216
CORRESPONDENCE 217
POEMS. By Babette Deutsch 218
BOOKS:
Realism and More. By J. W. Krutch 218
Elizabethan Studies. By Samuel C. Chew 219
The Latin Genius. By Lucien Price 220
Expanding Europe by Contraction. By William R. Shepherd 220
Books in Brief 221
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Calles Speaks 222
Mexico's Debt 223
England and Egypt in the Sudan 224

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR
ASSOCIATE EDITORS
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER LUDWIG LEWISOHN
FREDA KIRCHWEY, MANAGING EDITOR
IRITA VAN DOREN, LITERARY EDITOR
ISABEL LA MONTE, ADVERTISING MANAGER
CONTRIBUTING EDITORS
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

MATTEOTTI IS DEAD. Fascist soldiers march through the streets of Rome singing ribald songs revealing, as clearly as did the assassination itself, the spirit that dominates Italy today:

Out of Matteotti's body
We make sausages now.

But not all Italy sings and marches with the soldiers. The London Daily Herald tells of an incident in the Italian Parliament at its last session that shows the hold the dead Socialist has on the spirit of the people:

> The president read out, according to custom, the list of members' names. When he came to the letter M he hesitated a moment, and then, in muffled tones, uttered the name "Matteotti."
>
> In the profound stillness that reigned even in the galleries one could literally hear almost the heart-beats of members. Then a ringing voice called out:
>
> "Here!"
>
> Everyone turned in the direction from which the cry came in consternation and alarm. Mussolini was white as a sheet. The president, in his embarrassment, rang his bell, and the Socialists, as well as all the other members of the opposition, now shouted with one voice:
>
> "Here! Here!"
>
> The Fascisti were silent: for Matteotti was indeed there—in spirit.

SENATOR WALSH broke the rule that notification speeches should never say anything worth repeating, and in formally notifying John W. Davis that the Democratic Party had selected him as its presidential nominee Mr. Walsh made some comments in regard to Mr. Davis's law practice. He said:

> The head and front of your offending hath this extent, no more, that since retiring to private life you have been employed professionally as a lawyer by gigantic business interests whose policy and conduct have aroused quite general indignation, have repeatedly been the subject of the severest censure by the press, of investigation by the courts and Congress, as well as State legislatures, and have given occasion to no little legislation deemed necessary to protect the people from their exactions.

So far Senator Walsh sounded rather like a La Follette campaign orator reciting the history of Mr. Davis's law practice. But he continued:

> It is an unjustifiable inference that your views on matters of public concern approximate those of your employers or that, called to high public office, you would, upon any consideration, accommodate your own to theirs or grant them aught beyond justice. You owe them nothing, not even gratitude. You gave them service. They paid you.

MR. DAVIS'S BIG-BUSINESS law practice was not an accident. He chose it when he returned from his ambassadorship in England, and he is proud of it. Before his nomination, in an interview with the Brooklyn Eagle, he said:

> I have a fine list of clients—what lawyer would not want them? I have J. P. Morgan & Co., the Erie Railroad, the Guaranty Trust Co., the Standard Oil Co., and other foremost American concerns on my list. I am proud of them. They are big institutions, and so long as they ask for honest work I am pleased to work for them. Big business has made this country what it is. We want big business.

The question which the American people must face is not whether Mr. Davis is an honest lawyer or whether he has a right to work for Wall Street firms—no one doubts that right—but whether we want as President a man whose chosen profession is the defense of such interests, who honestly believes that the big-business system is what the country needs. The New York World, before it was won over to its present policy of apology for Mr. Davis, added another question:

> Mr. Davis [it said] is confronted with an ancient doubt, based on long democratic experience, as to whether a man in public office can with a perfectly free mind approach questions involving the interests of his old business associates. When those business associates are interests as powerful as the Morgans, who have connections vitally affecting not only domestic questions but the foreign policy of the nation, the problem becomes acute. The very size and power of the interests involved make a connection like Mr. Davis's wholly different from that which might arise out of having a few corporations, even large ones, as clients. The people who feel that Mr. Davis as President would have too many difficult problems of conscience . . . have a keen appreciation of how difficult it is for any man in public office to secure disinterested advice that reaches beyond the honest opinions of his old friends and associates.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIB.

IF THERE IS ONE thing certain in this life it is that Governor Bryan's acceptance of his nomination for the Vice-Presidency gave heart disease to nobody. During the convention he and his brother were bitterly opposed to the nomination of any such reactionary as John W. Davis. Now he acclaims him as "that trained diplomat, that experienced statesman, that champion of the rights of humanity, that progressive Democrat, John W. Davis!" The rest of Governor Bryan's speech is in keeping. He is for peace, but until widespread disarmament he wants an "adequate army and navy," as if any official or general or admiral in history ever agreed on what constituted adequate preparation. For the farmer the Governor's heart bleeds, and he outlines a lengthy program for his relief. Some of the specifications are excellent, especially those for the reduction of the tariff. For the rest, we have the usual political platitudes and the politician's customary preelection devotion to the welfare of women and children and labor. All of which, we venture to say, will butter few political parsnips this year.

HOW MANY VOTES are controlled by the Lucy Stone League we have no idea, but we hope that Mr. Coolidge is not counting on them to make up that sweeping majority predicted by Mr. Butler and his other campaign backers. If he is, he had better suggest to the officials of his Administration that they refrain from committing pontifical errors about the legal names of women. "The law in this country," said J. R. McCarl, Comptroller General of the United States, "that a wife takes the surname of the husband is as well settled as that the domicile of the wife merges with the domicile of the husband." Well, the Comptroller General is wrong. In most States vestigial remnants of the common law insist that a husband's home must be his wife's—whether she lives there or not. But names, however illogical it may seem to Mr. McCarl, behave differently under the law. By numerous court decisions and the declarations of noted judicial authorities, women may continue legally to use their own names after marriage. In fact, any person may have as his legal name the name he uses habitually and in good faith; he may sign and receive checks under it and insist that other persons address him by it. It is wholly a personal matter, and the young woman who refused to go on the government pay roll under her husband's name should carry her case to the courts and confound the officials who so solemnly declared: "The separate legal entity of the wife is not so generally recognized as to accept the maiden name rather that the surname of the husband. It is today the main distinction between a single woman and a married woman. . . ."

PRESIDENT BARTOLOME MARTINEZ of Nicaragua has paid off the debt on Nicaragua's national railroad, thereby recovering possession—from American bankers—of this one symbol of national sovereignty. Customs and internal-revenue offices and banks are still in alien hands, and the American marines remain. The American minister continues to be the uncrowned monarch of the country, to whom politicians look for approval of their ambitions and their strategy. Fair election measures recommended by the expert commission sent from Washington two years ago have been ignored by the Nicaraguan congress, and for that reason the progressives, now accidentally in possession of the executive power, cannot hope to win the presidency for the four-year term beginning next January. Martinez, who was elected as vice-president in 1920, rose to the higher office on the death last year of Diego Manuel Chamorro, one of the regular Conservative organization. Under the brief regime of this progressive a peasant-labor movement has sprung up, and the Pan-American Federation of Labor has hopefully sent a commission to give it encouragement. Great meetings have been held, rejoicing has been general among men who toil twelve hours for twenty cents a day. But the polls will be manned by the reactionaries, and Nicaraguan progressivism seems doomed to an early eclipse.

CIVIC ASSOCIATIONS and religious bodies may protest, but it is probable none the less that the people of Philadelphia would be glad to see the last of Smedley Butler of the Marines. As good and typical Americans they undoubtedly prefer corruption and even vice to autocracy. They prefer misrule and mulcting by their own home-grown politicians to being bullied, however efficiently and honestly, by an imported dictator. The forces opposing Butler are not, of course, put in motion by an outraged populace; they spring rather from an outraged political machine, protesting and groaning and sadly in need of its customary lubrication. But behind the machine, making possible its effective opposition, is the dislike and irritation of ordinary people who consider themselves neither marines to be ordered about nor subject natives to be bullied. Political corruption has always found a welcome and a home in the dominant Republican organization in Philadelphia; long ago Lincoln Steffens branded the city "corrupt and contented" and proved the justice of the charge. But the opponents of the machine, the discontented, will never conquer the politicians by the methods of Butler. They can do it only by competing with the machine, by winning the interest and loyalty of the people, by producing more freedom, more prosperity, a greater sense of general participation in the job of government. Neither Butler nor Mussolini can establish efficiency and honesty by brute force.

WHILE THE POLITICAL SIDE OF the British labor movement is represented by the Labor Party and its industrial side by the Trades Union Congress, its cultural aspirations have found expression in the Workers' Educational Association, which has just been celebrating its coming of age. The distinguishing feature of this society, born at a meeting of a small group of cooperators and trade unionists held at Toynbee Hall in July, 1903, is the contact it has established between the universities and the manual workers. In its tutorial classes, administered by joint committees on which the universities and the trade unions are alike represented, adult wage-earners pursue their studies under the direction of teachers from Oxford and Cambridge as well as from the newer English universities. The aim throughout is not to make the students better qualified technically for their daily job, nor to train them directly for labor leadership, but by broadening their minds and stimulating their intellectual interests to enable them to play their part more effectively in laying the foundations of a better social order. The W. E. A. long ago lived down the prejudices which it encountered at the start—it is significant that Bishop Temple of Manchester is succeeded in its presidency by Fred Bramley, secretary of the Trades Union Congress. Today the national Board of Education gives it financial assistance.

THERE ARE WAR-TIME reparations other than those payable in financial currency, and the British Government is about to clear its account of one of them. The statue of Edith Cavell, erected near Trafalgar Square in London, was an insult to her memory. Her dying message to the world, "Patriotism is not enough," has taken its place among the great sayings of history. If any career had a unique epitaph ready to hand, it was surely hers. Yet, on the monument intended to do her honor, one may look in vain for these words. In place of them we find the banal and inappropriate slogan "For King and country," with a figure of the conventional British lion to intensify the slander upon a self-sacrificing woman whose devotion to humanity transcended all national barriers. This wrong is about to be righted. F. W. Jowett, who as First Commissioner of Works in the Labor Government has the supervision of such matters, has given a favorable response to an appeal recently addressed to him, and has decided to inscribe "Patriotism is not enough" on the front of the memorial. It is also reported that there will be placed, immediately beneath, another passage from Miss Cavell's last words, "I hate no man." If the new Government had done nothing else, it would have justified its existence by thus repairing an attempt to turn an invocation of peace and good-will into a perpetual consecration of the war spirit.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR is an Irishman and a journalist and so, little as we like censorship here or abroad, we must grant him a better right than most to object to the importation into England of D. W. Griffith's film "America." This particular picture is a piece of beautiful, stirring, convincing, patriotic bunk. It tells the story of the American revolution in the terms of our schoolbooks before the days of war-time deletions. It makes heroes of the Americans and devils of the British. The only Englishman represented as having a spark of right feeling is William Pitt, who stands alone in the House of Commons and defends the rebellious colonies; but since William Pitt never performed that particular rite, even this one bouquet begins to wither under scrutiny. For the rest—proud, uniformed English troops march by thousands to ultimate defeat against straggling bands of barefoot farm boys; helpless populations die by flame and tomahawk; the atrocities are all on one side and there are many of them; and the beautiful Tory heroine turns patriot long before the end. Mr. O'Connor thinks the film is "calculated to cause a bad relationship between British and Americans." Perhaps it is. But most of the ill-feeling will be stirred up in the United States, which is out of reach of Mr. O'Connor's rod, and a small dose of good, thick American propaganda might do the British schoolboy no harm as a corrective for his own patriotic education. Mr. Griffith is going to England to fight for "America"; it should prove an interesting siege.

SUPPOSE THE UNITED STATES had a national university. Suppose that university and the Government should together undertake to publish the books which they most wanted the general public to have. What would be the earliest titles in the series? To think of the probable taste of the twenty-ninth and thirtieth presidents of the Republic, and of their Cabinets, is not encouraging in such a connection. Let us look over the volumes already published by the University of Mexico, under government subsidy, at a price which should make them, though attractively printed and bound, accessible to many readers. There are three volumes each of Plato and of Homer and two of Plutarch; one of Aeschylus, of Euripides, of Dante, of "Faust," of the New Testament in Spanish; a volume of tales by Tolstoi and of biographies by Romain Rolland—Beethoven, Michelangelo, and Tolstoi. In the introduction to this last, the former Minister of Education, Vasconcelos, says that the series is later to include other classics, down to Ibsen and Shaw. The books are for the most part without annotation, but they are well and spiritedly translated. In such a fashion Mexico replies to the charge that it is settled in illiteracy, and the revolutionary government to the charge that it is hostile to the achievements of the past. Is it pathetic that a precarious administration in a racked country has decided to give its people Aeschylus and Tolstoi rather than bulletins on the hookworm and the potato? Perhaps it is statesmanlike. At a time when Mexico has virtually no publishers and few contacts with the great world of thought and feeling, the Government and the university are supplying the need with a large sagacity.

WE SHALL NOT WAIT until Wednesday morning to hear the election returns this year, and the Tuesday-night extra editions of the newspapers will lose a substantial proportion of their sales. We—several millions of us—will sit at home listening to returns over the radio. It is difficult to grasp the meaning of this intrusive mechanism and appreciate the changes it is working in our social habits. The attempt of Messrs. Doheny and Fall to have their indictment annulled on the ground that members of the grand jury might have been prejudiced by Senator Walsh's radio speeches is another revelation of the influence of the radio. To them, of course, it was just another possible avenue of escape. Any member of any grand jury, in this radio age, may hear any radio speech; and if corruption continues, as it probably will, men will have to speak out against it—in Congress, in the newspapers, "over the air." Such a brazen attempt to escape the toils of the law will not succeed either in freeing the oil men or in reducing the utilization of radio. Radio will spread, not decline. "Revolutionize" is an overworked word; but it is no exaggeration to say that the cheap automobile, the telephone, and the radio are revolutionizing American home life.

THESE ARE DAYS when one thanks God for every shade tree. Accordingly they are good days in which to plan for further planting. We are, at best, a bit slow about tree-planting in this country; France began systematic tree-planting along its national roads in the reign of Francis I, more than three hundred years ago. Indeed, France has a national register of trees planted on the main state highways, which she has kept ever since the year 1599. The last census showed 2,950,238 such trees shading the French national roads. Tree-planting is recognized as an integral part of road-building. When a contract is let for a new state road the specifications include the trees to be set out, and the contractor is responsible for his trees for two years after he sets them out; if they die he is obligated to replace them, and he is not paid in full until the two years have elapsed. It is a wise system, one which America, in its growing interest in the conservation of its natural resources, would do well to emulate.

Our Southern Neighbors

THE Mexico most familiar to us of the United States is the border country of towns built to serve our own vices. There is another Mexico, a Mexico which has deeper roots in this continent than we, a Mexico, largely of Indian blood and Indian tradition, which would have a right to say to the businesslike Americans who seek to "modernize" it: "If you don't like us, why don't you go back to Europe, where you came from?" That Mexico has suffered much from our attempt to impose upon it the standards of our industrial civilization, and it is not yet clear whether it will be permitted to follow its own course of development, or will be forced to follow channels charted by the world's greed for its oil and mineral wealth. That Mexico expressed itself in the Maderist revolution of 1911, and for more than thirteen years it has gallantly struggled, in the face of our misunderstanding, dislike, and interference, now armed, now economic, to save Mexico for the Mexicans.

Its struggle has a significance that transcends the boundaries of Mexico; other Latin-American countries which are feeling the iron of American capital have followed it with a life-and-death interest; and for us in the United States too it has a historic meaning. That is why The Nation has for years devoted what must have seemed a disproportionate share of its space to Mexico; that is the reason for this special Mexican number. We should like to believe that through our pages we have helped to interpret the revolution on our Southern frontier.

Our relations with Mexico have entered what is perhaps their most critical stage; they have become, once more, friendly. The principles of the Mexican revolution were safer when American capital and the American Government stood aloof from Mexico than now. The United States represents in the world today, more than any other government, the principle of the sanctity of property rights. Again and again the clear legal mind of Mr. Hughes has made plain this intense preoccupation with the forms of legality which safeguard property rights. In our attitude toward all the Latin Americans it has been clear; toward Soviet Russia and Mexico it has been disastrously apparent. We refused to recognize the Obregon Government until it had made terms, first with the oil men and then with the international bankers—terms which will weigh hard indeed upon the poverty-stricken masses of Mexico, terms which have already forced the curtailing of Señor Vasconcelos's broad plans for the education of his people. Mexico has had to modify the stringent interpretation first given to the famous Article 27 of her 1917 constitution, which nationalized the subsoil and provided that foreigners might not acquire land, mining, or industrial concessions unless they waived all special treaty rights as foreigners.

Mexico's mineral wealth has been her hope and her despair. It provides an enormous potential revenue for the Government, but it has fallen into the hands of foreigners who have no interest in programs of social and educational reform. The rich oil deposits which were discovered only a quarter of a century ago did nothing to raise the condition of the Mexican peon. Foreigners invested more than half a billion dollars in exploiting them, but the wealth went abroad and the Mexicans learned only the slave side of industrial "progress." When the revolutionary Government attempted to tax the oil exports and use some of the wealth derived from Mexico's soil for Mexico's own people the foreigners protested, shut down their oil wells, subsidized bandits to attack the Government, did everything in the power of conscienceless capital to hinder the reform program. The era of that open struggle has passed; the Mexican Government is on treaty terms with the oil men, and receives a considerable income from oil taxes; but another treaty has robbed her of the benefits of it—the oil revenue goes to pay the interest on bonds, dating back to Diaz's day, held by the international bankers.

The program of land reform also has led to international difficulties. In Diaz's day international speculators bought up the soil of Mexico; the primitive holders of the soil were dispossessed of their fields and reduced to peonage; huge estates and cruel or absentee landlords became the rule. The revolution restored to the peons their lost rights—unequally, to be sure, and often to the accompaniment of force and brutality. But the restoration of the land to the people is a process which still continues and which is likely to be the most permanent achievement of the revolution—as is the case in Soviet Russia and in several other European countries which suffered less violent revolutions. It is a process which we of the United States should observe and ponder. For, as Isaiah Bowman, director of the American Geographical Society, remarks:

> If the present processes continue unchecked we shall have the case of Mexico repeated in other countries where we are making heavy investments . . . . Investment made regardless of the social and political life of the country involved is gambling, not business. . . . If the people own less and less of the land it is only a question of time until they take it back by force or by changing the fundamental laws, which amounts to the same thing. In the resulting revolution the foreigner loses like the native. . . . No fundamental study of Latin-American problems has yet been made by any branch of our Government. We have dealt so far only with manners, the amenities of life, and the opportunities to do a profitable business.

As Mr. Bowman suggests, a certain amount of violence is almost certain to accompany any attempt to restore the land to the people. That violence may be minimized; it will hardly be eliminated, and where foreigners have bought up the land it will lead to international complications. Such an instance is the present dispute between Mexico and England. Mexican officials attempted to nationalize the ranch owned by an American-born Englishwoman; she, aided by other foreigners, offered armed resistance; eventually, she was shot. It may have been agrarian revenge; it may be, as the Government charges, that forces hostile to it deliberately provoked the incident in the hope of forcing intervention. Mr. Schoenfeld, the American chargé d'affaires handling this incident, acted with tact and sympathy; and the affair is fading from memory as it should. An attitude of brusk bullying, such as England and the United States all too frequently assume on such occasions, might have led to a repetition of the dreary events of the past decade. We may hope that we have turned the corner. If the industrialized governments and peoples could absorb the spirit revealed in the article by the former Mexican Minister of Education which we print in this issue of The Nation, there would be no difficulty in maintaining friendship with our southern neighbors.

The New Peace in Europe

IN the first place, it is at least a negotiated peace and not a dictated one which has been concluded in London. In the second, the tone and spirit of the conference were different from those of any other since the war. In the third, there was a determination to reach a successful conclusion, and as a result of all this we have the beginning of a real peace. A step forward has been taken which ought to be a milestone in the return to sanity and good-will in Europe, a beginning of the end of bitterness and hatred, a first genuine move toward readjusting relations in Europe. When it is recalled that only last fall Europe seemed drifting rapidly into a new war—the present Lord Thomson, the Secretary of State for Air in Mr. MacDonald's Cabinet, wrote in The Nation last January: "The French Government should be made to understand that, in the last resort, force can be met with force"—it is evident that a far-reaching change has come over Europe. French, Germans, and English have met on an equal footing, negotiated in a friendly and fair way, without threats or saber-rattling, have come to respect and value each other in the process, and have shaken hands at the conclusion of the negotiations. If this is not a cause for world-wide jubilation we do not know what could be.

At the same time we are under no illusions as to the settlement. It has been a series of compromises in which Germans and French have been controlled by fear of their respective parliaments. We do not doubt that M. Herriot instead of evacuating two towns on August 18 would gladly, so far as he personally is concerned, have ordered all the troops out of the Ruhr. Fear of Poincaré and the Nationalist forces in the Chamber compelled him to insist upon a year for the evacuation of the Ruhr and the righting of that hideous wrong to an innocent and ill-treated labor population with which, as an individual, M. Herriot without any doubt has the profoundest sympathy. Treaties and agreements that are built upon such compromises are usually as if erected upon shifting sands. Nor are we certain that the agreement itself is possible of execution by the Germans. When so profound a student of European affairs as Mr. Maynard Keynes declares that the compromise is unworkable, we very much fear that the Germans may have committed themselves to a program beyond their power in their compelling desire for some kind of basis for progress and the financial and commercial upbuilding of their country, with the inevitable result that they may before long again be accused of Punic faith. That is in a measure guarded against by the system of arbitration proposed in the case of a default; but the mischief is done as soon as it is spread abroad by the hostile press that the Germans have welshed again. We share the opinion of the Union of Democratic Control in England that the principle underlying the whole reparations problem is morally wrong and politically unwise, and we find it difficult to see how payments can be made by Germany on the scale demanded of her without unsettling economic conditions in Europe. And yet we do not see what else could have been done by all concerned save to accept the Dawes plan and try it out.

To us, however, the most sinister aspect of this settlement is the increased power over Europe it gives to American finance. We are well aware that the conduct of the individual financiers in London has been helpful, straightforward, and above board. It has happened that in insisting upon the terms for the marketing of their bonds they have fought the battle of common sense and justice. These American bankers are themselves largely pawns in the game. By force of circumstances we are being maneuvered into a position where Europe and England are becoming literally vassals of our money market, and that is anything but a fortunate situation for the world. The danger of it can only be offset by enlightenment, friendly good-will, and the absence of economic and military imperialism in the Government at Washington.

To Ramsay MacDonald, in our judgment, belongs the chief credit for what has happened. We are well aware that Mr. Coolidge and Ambassador Kellogg are throwing bouquets at each other and that there is much ado in the press about the wonderful role played by the Americans during the negotiations. We would not withhold from Caesar one iota of the praise that is due him; to Owen D. Young, General Dawes, Col. Logan, Ambassadors Houghton and Kellogg, and all the other Americans, we record our unstinted praise and our admiration. But the day when the change came over Europe was the one on which Ramsay MacDonald, the pacifist and internationalist, took office. From that hour the new spirit has arisen; from that hour the menace of war, so apparent in England in November, 1923, began to disappear. We hear from some quarters much criticism of Mr. MacDonald because he, a minority Prime Minister, has not achieved greater domestic reforms. We have no hesitation in recording our opinion that the treaty with Russia and the settlement of the reparations problem, incomplete and temporary as they are, are none the less achievements to make it possible to say that the British Premier has justified his ministry one hundred times over. It will stand forth for these things alone as a great and noble-spirited Government of England.

Mr. Coolidge Stands Pat

MR. COOLIDGE has embraced the only course open to him—he has stood pat brazenly. In accepting the Republican presidential nomination he declares all is well with America and with his Government. No one reading it would dream that his and Mr. Harding's administrations have been stamped with corruption, that he himself was compelled to drive two of his Cabinet into retirement, one of whom has not dared to face his accusers, while a third Harding departmental head is under indictment for bribery. Absolutely false is Mr. Coolidge's assertion that "wherever there have been suspicions of guilt, involving members of any party, I have caused them to be investigated and presentation made to the grand jury." He lifted no finger to uncover the wrongdoing; his Department of Justice, far from being on the qui vive to follow up the slightest trail, did its best to hamper every action of the investigators, an assistant attorney general sitting in the inquiry room as a defender of the accused! Nor has the President had the manliness to urge the quashing of the indictment of Senator Wheeler, whose fellow-Senators proved that indictment to be a deliberate frame-up by Republican office-holders and party officials. Yet the President says: "I propose to use every possible effort to resist corruption in office. The American Government must be clean"! Mr. Pecksniff could have done no better.

As for the rest, Mr. Coolidge displays well his party's achievements, often overstating, exaggerating, and glorifying, notably Mr. Mellon's conduct of the Treasury. The inevitable decrease of expenses as we moved away from the war is recorded as a superb achievement. He even takes great credit to himself for the financial bill passed by insurgents and Democrats, expecting the public to forget that he declared that he would never, never sign any bill which varied an iota from the Mellon proposals. Who would dream of that on reading these words: "A new tax bill was passed this spring carrying still further reductions and under its apparent [italics ours] influence there seems [sic] to be the beginnings of another increase of prosperity"? Equally misleading is his declaration as to our Latin-American neighbors that "at their request we have undertaken to compose their difficulties." As if Mr. Wilson had not refused to recognize Huerta, Mr. Coolidge dares to say: "We also indicated the adoption of a policy of making it worth while for a government so to conduct itself as to merit our recognition"! Not one word to indicate how his Secretary of State browbeat Mexico's Government in the interest of America's oil barons; not one word as to the way our Government has become the advocate and chief asset of our oil and other business men, from Turkey and Rumania to China.

Even this misrepresentation is surpassed by Mr. Coolidge. Speaking for the party which has done more to establish special privileges, to grant governmental favors to private individuals, to create monopolies, to turn the very government itself over to the great capitalists (who have for generations filled the Republican campaign treasury and obtained what they asked in the way of legislative favors), Mr. Coolidge writes: "We oppose the artificial supports of privilege and monopoly because they are both unjust and uneconomic." This from the pen of one who in three separate places upholds and glorifies the protective tariff, that sinister harlot-mother of trusts and of monopolies! Indeed there is no limit to Mr. Coolidge's glorification of Republican idols. The half-loaf Washington armament conference was "sublime"; he and his party saved "American agriculture, labor, and industry from the menace of having their great home market destroyed through dumping . . ."; "there was an avalanche of war-worn peoples and suddenly cheapened merchandise impending upon us."

It is useless to go on. These are not all hypocrisies or deliberate falsehoods. They are the words of a pigmy at a great task. They are the record of a mind utterly incapable of understanding many of the problems that confront it. They are the inconsistent and inconsequent flounderings of a man who deserves all pity. Fate has pitchforked him into a place beyond his intellectual power. A merciful defeat is what his best friends should wish for him. Meanwhile, we are profoundly grateful that the Republican doctrine of crass and corrupt materialism, of government by favor and government by privilege, is thus set forth. Mr. Coolidge has stood pat. He and his party are without that vision for lack of which a party perishes. For them there is nothing new in the world, no new sail upon the horizon. Mr. Coolidge has nailed his party's colors to the mast. It is the historic black flag, and it declares war upon every progressive ideal. It serves notice that, if Mr. Coolidge should remain President, the ship of state will continue to head directly for the shoals of corruption, of selfishness, of greed, and of human exploitation.

The Saga of the S. S. Iceberg

A MONTH'S voyage on an iceberg, ending in its wreck and the landing of the crew on the uninhabited and icebound cliffs of Greenland—this is the strange sea saga sent from Reykjavik, Iceland, by Helen Augur, printed in the New York Herald Tribune of August 18.

Thirty-one men sailed away from Denmark more than a year ago in the steamship Teddy. They went to explore the east coast of Greenland—with an eye to its possibilities for colonization! What they discovered or decided in that regard we are for the present left in the dark; for their adventures homeward bound have eclipsed the rest. Anyhow the Teddy and its sailors bold started back on August 9 of last year from a point about 75° degrees north latitude. It was a poor moment to trust themselves to the Arctic waters, for it is at that season that the ice-fields around the Pole, thawed by the long, long day which is the northland's summer, begin to break into bergs and drift southward, augmented by great masses which break off the Greenland glaciers as they reach the open sea.

Just the same the Teddy's crew set forth. They had made hardly more than fifty miles to the south, and about the same distance east from the Greenland coast, when they found themselves icebound. The Teddy was a stout ship and for a month it endured the crunching and grinding of the ice all about, but could make practically no progress in any direction. Then the leakage was so great that the crew could no longer fight against it with the pumps. Presto! They abandoned the Teddy and, setting up ship on the nearest iceberg, continued their voyage. A strict nautical regime was followed. The deckhouse of the Teddy was set up on the S. S. Iceberg, with all the instruments for navigation, and the position of the new ship was regularly taken and charted. Everything was neat and shipshape except for lack of engines below and rudder and propeller astern.

But, like the Teddy, the S. S. Iceberg leaked. Only it leaked at the top instead of the bottom; its main deck began to melt. The first man to wake in the morning would reach his hand down from his hammock and after taking soundings would advise the others whether to turn out in high or low boots. A watch of two men was set for protection against polar bears. "It was a question," says the account, "whether the bear or the crew would get a free meal." All of which sounds amusing, but it was amusement with about a 100 to 1 chance that the curtain would be death in an icy sea for all hands. The one hope was that the S. S. Iceberg would drift along the Greenland shore so that somehow its crew could escape over the ice floes to the Eskimo settlement of Angmagsalik, some 600 miles down the Greenland coast from the point from which the Teddy had set out. The optimistic leader of the crew gave out the slogan: "Angmagsalik by Christmas."

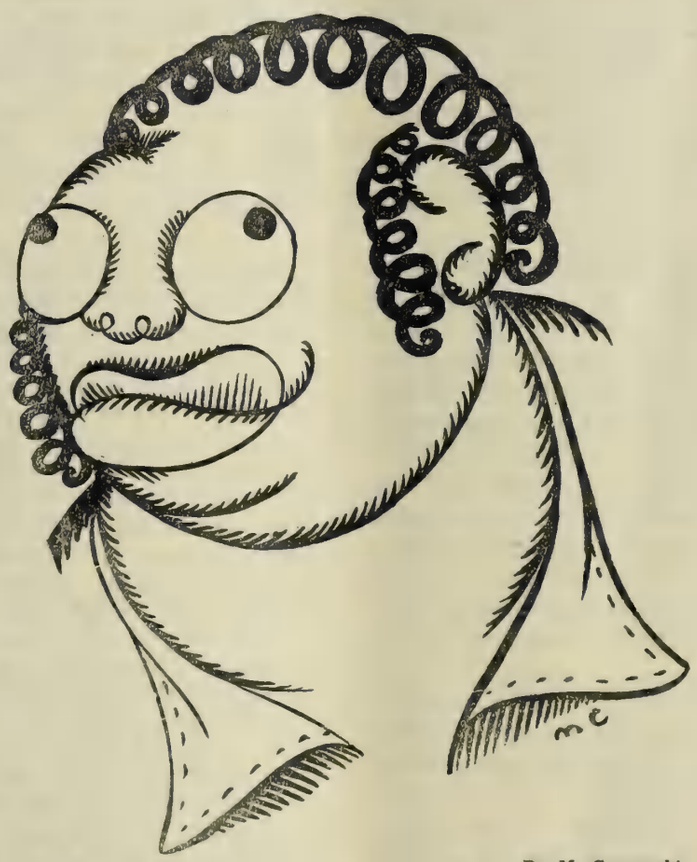
Then the S. S. Iceberg split in a roaring Arctic tempest; its deckhouse was rent apart as a chasm opened up. The crew slipped overboard in their sledges, intrusting themselves to the field of broken ice about them. What hope was left? Any? But here blind chance intervened in their behalf. A favoring wind carried the treacherous ice toward land. Before them rose "Greenland's icy mountains"—forbidding, but a chance for life. They scaled the walls; by good fortune they found an Eskimo bear hunter; they were saved.

Art and Revolution in Mexico

By BERTRAM D. WOLFE

THE Mexican revolution is a very patchy and unsystematic affair. Like most institutional changes in a world of conflicting forces it lacks the unity of a picture, the logic of a rational system, or the structural consistency of a poem. Government in the interest of worker or peasant in two or three states—notably in Yucatan and Veracruz; fragmentary attempts at the installation of political democracy; sporadic distribution of ejidos, or bits of large estates, to landless peasants; a government without unity, made up of a curious intermixture of liberals and conservatives; a political power representing not a single class but an uncertain balance of power between the partially awakened workers and peasants on the one hand and the influence of foreign capital, especially that of American interests, on the other—such is the unsystematic reality of the moment in Mexico.

Only in the work of the philosopher, the artist, and the poet have the effects of the revolution assumed system and unity. The new content and form of art and poetry, perhaps because artist and poet always seek unity in composition and consistency in structure, seem to be the most complete, the most logical, the most "revolutionary" of the by-products of the Mexican revolution.



By M. Covarrubias

A Caricature of Diego Rivera

The delightful and amusing results of this inexorable logic in artist and poet are: the Communist Union of Painters and Sculptors and the League of Revolutionary Writers.

Neither of these organizations is quite what its name suggests. The first would seem on the face of it an organization of painters of Communist propaganda posters and the second a league of writers of legends to go with the posters. But in reality the first is an organization of artists according to the critic's acceptation of that word, and the second, of eager young men most of whom have published a book or two and who try to write—principally poetry. Aesthetically, the first assumes tremendous importance because it includes (I am almost tempted to say "it consists of") Diego Rivera, Mexico's greatest painter and, in the judgment of competent foreign critics, one of the biggest figures in contemporary art. The dominant and dominating figure in the other organization is the poet Carlos Gutiérrez Cruz, a fair-sized figure among the young poets of Mexico, but Mexican poetry for the moment is at a low ebb and Mexican painting at high tide.

Says the Statement of Principles of the Communist Union of Painters and Sculptors, which, by the way, is affiliated to the Red International of Moscow:

> We believe that the solution of the social and material problems of the painters and sculptors of Mexico, identified as these problems are with those of the rest of the world's workers, will naturally bring with it the solution of the problems of aesthetics, for in this way we will take part as an active element in collective life, something we have not hitherto done, and our work will thereby become the logical reflection of the popular character.

The union believes in the "overthrow of the present social mechanism," and these wielders of brushes and pens paradoxically enough believe in "employing force" against the force used by the bourgeoisie.

Diego Rivera and his comrades refuse to paint for the "bourgeoisie." He has told me many times that he believes their taste is execrable and that the secret of the "bad art" of bourgeois painters is their obligation to paint the fat possessor of shekels and his fat wife and to try to make of the painting at the same time "a good likeness" and a portrait that "favors the sitter." Consequently Rivera paints only for the Revolutionary Government, or, rather, for the more revolutionary departments of the Government, for as I have said the Government is not a unit. In practice, he painted murals for the Department of Education under José Vasconcelos and for the Department of Agriculture under De Negri. When General Calles becomes president Rivera hopes to get an opportunity at "the biggest wall I ever had" on some big public building where all the workers can come and enjoy his painting. The Communist painter's vision of the cooperative commonwealth is not unlike the vision of heaven in Browning's Andrea del Sarto.

> Four great walls in the New Jerusalem . . .
> For Leonard, Rafael, Agnolo, and me
> To cover . . .

While Manuel Lourdes, painter for "the bourgeoisie," gets 8,000 pesos for the portrait of Horacio Casasus, Diego Rivera earns precisely twelve pesos a day and often works twelve, fourteen, and even sixteen hours a day with feverish intensity to earn it. Twelve pesos are six dollars; a sign painter in the United States earns more. I tell him so.

He laughs and answers, almost reprovingly: "That's several times as much as the average worker here earns. And he works much harder than I. I love my work. He does not. He should be better paid than I."

The statutes of the League of Revolutionary Writers express a similar attitude. They too are "in accord with Moscow," although none of their members, so far as I know, have joined the Communist Party. They too believe that the artist and poet should get a living wage out of his trade, no more and no less. The second article of their aims reads: "To render effective the concept that the writer is a worker." And the third: "To study and devise measures for making the pen a means of livelihood for any man who may be able to wield it."

Gutiérrez Cruz recently published a book. It was poetry, some part of it good poetry. It was badly printed on cheap green paper such as is used here for broadsheet ballads. It had no cover. It was sewed together with thread. It had been printed to sell at five centavos per copy.

"I used to publish my books for the bookshops and libraries and well-to-do book-buyers," he informed me. "But now I write for the peasants, and five centavos represent a big sum to them."

"How about your poetry living in the future? Can it survive if it's printed and bound that way?" I queried.

"When you read it," he told me, "you will find that it is intended to survive in oral tradition among the peasantry. The Indian is fond of proverbs, of bits of accumulated wisdom and poetry, of little poems of two or three lines usually made up of a single pictoric image like a Japanese hai-kai. Our Indians have their own hai-kais in which is stored the accumulated wisdom of our race. But their wisdom is old. It is out of date. So I have tried to give them a new store of wisdom and fresh images. They will pass into oral tradition and the name of their author will be forgotten."

"Do you intend to publish all your books that way in the future?"

"Principally. My next book will be printed on cheap paper to sell cheaply, except for about fifty copies. They will go to the critics of the press. The critics won't review a book unless it's dressed according to the conventions."

Although Diego Rivera is naturally the bigger figure, there is much spiritual kinship between this boy Cruz—he is only 25—and the great painter. In fact, two of Rivera's recent paintings were inspired by verses of Cruz. One of them is called The Embrace. It adorns one of the walls of the patio of the Secretariat of Education. It portrays a worker and a peasant, each in the characteristic costume of the country, holding each other in close embrace, and as an integral part of the pictures one reads the verses, which in crude and ametrical translation I append:

> Toilers of field and factory,
> Disinherited of liberty,
> Make stronger the bond
> That unites you in struggle and suffering
> Into a firm embrace of force and love . . .
> After that embrace
> You will no longer pay tribute nor homage,
> And the field and the factory
> Will give all of their fruits
> To you.

It was the sight of this painting that, according to Rivera, inspired the Minister of Agriculture, De Negri, to engage him to paint the walls of the Agricultural College at Chapingo.

The other painting inspired by verses by Gutiérrez Cruz is also in the patio of the Secretariat of Education, but it no longer bears the verses. They were too revolutionary even for a revolutionary government department, and although the picture remains, the verses were erased by presidential order. Roughly translated they read:

> Comrade miner,
> Bent double by the weight of the earth,
> When your hand extracts metals
> Fashion them into daggers
> And then you will see
> That all the metals are for you.

Such is the "revolutionary ideology" that forms the background of some of the most important art and some not very important poetry that is being produced in Mexico. Whether it is the first flush of the dawn or only the red after-glow of a revolutionary sunset, no one can yet decide. The artists themselves have their own opinion on the matter as well as their own conscious theories of their respective arts. I shall close this article with a translation of some of the theories of Gutiérrez Cruz written especially for my use and for the readers of The Nation:

> To create a new type of aesthetics in harmony with the new developments in the aspirations and activities of humanity, it is necessary to dispense with certain elements which are generally thought necessary to a work of art.
>
> The principal of these elements is preciosity. The poets of the new lyricism must rid themselves of preciosity because it has no value outside the circles of the "refined"—authentic enemies of nature and of equality, absolutely incapacitated for noble and laborious activity.
>
> Communistic literature, then, will not be precious but sober, clear, simple, virginal, as are the spirits of the folk who have need of it, as are the peasants in their life and in their thoughts. We must have a faith in the work of nature, free of all artifice. The adherents of preciosity detest the rudeness of nature and the natural. All their thought is conditioned by an acceptance of the unnatural condition in which the fruits of the earth are monopolized by the little group which makes up the class of "refined tastes."
>
> The new lyric is imbued with the passion of the despoiled ones. Its tragedy lies in the lyric woes of the oppressed; it seeks beauty in picturing a world more beautiful not in the dubious "golden age" of the past, but in a golden age which it sees in the future. Hence it dispenses also with the romantic claptrap of the "far away" and the "long ago" and it looks for suffering and beauty in the "here" and "now"—or the here and tomorrow morning.
>
> Born as many of them were in a bourgeois environment, educated to bourgeois aesthetic taste, not all of the members of our League of Revolutionary Writers are yet able to adjust themselves to the simplicity which is the essential quality of the new lyric. They write libertarian lyrics in the manner to which the bourgeois intellectual is accustomed. He accepts the lyric because he recognizes the to him authentic aesthetics and craftsmanship of it, and then he is either puzzled and shaken or won over by it, or at the least quite properly scandalized.
>
> Naturally the device "art for life's sake" or, perhaps, "art for the freeing and beautifying of life" comes nearer to being our motto. The "bitterness" and the "love" of which a voluptuous and elegant poet talks has nothing in common with the bitterness of the folk who suffer and the love of the comrades who fight for their fellows. Their poetry is a flight from what they find inharmonious in the life around them; our poetry is an attempt to fashion the life around us into a harmony. That is why we are revolutionaries.

Mexico's Credit: The Vital Issue

By RAFAEL NIETO

VERY little has been written outside of Mexico on the Mexican banking problem. And the scanty literature on the subject, including the books and pamphlets written in the Los Angeles Branch of the University of California by experts and savants in the service and pay of Mr. Edward L. Doheny, constitutes mainly a bitter criticism of the work accomplished by the Mexican revolution and a challenge of the state bank of issue which the Mexican Government has been trying to organize.

Alvaro Obregon, President of Mexico

Around the establishment of a central bank of issue the chief financial struggle in Mexico has centered. Article 28 of the Mexican constitution prescribes a compulsory control of the bank by the state. The big financiers—Mexican and foreign—oppose with tooth and nail the loss of this formidable financial power. And the labor leaders and radicals contend that if the future right to issue paper money and to control the credit system of the country through the weapon of the new central bank is to be held by the big financial interests, all the tears and sufferings and misery of the Mexican people in a protracted strife to conquer economic freedom will have been in vain.

At the close of the Diaz regime there were in Mexico twenty-four banks of issue: the two most important, in Mexico City, were controlled entirely by foreign capital, French, English, and Spanish; the other twenty-two were scattered through the states and operated on small amounts of capital, mainly Mexican and Spanish. Even before the revolution this unscientific banking system had proved a total failure. Señor Limantour, General Diaz's able Secretary of the Treasury, accepted responsibility for the failure and tried without success in his last years to substitute a single central bank of issue for the multiple system then in operation.

The old banks of issue generally had their bills discounted and their loans in a state of stagnation; their debtors, working on a system of many-times-renewed credits, were always the same; as a general rule, the banks' own directors were their principal and in many cases almost their only debtors; and several banks of issue in the states had granted their directors loans for amounts larger than their own working capital.

In February, 1908, Señor Limantour, alarmed by these discouraging symptoms, assembled the representatives of all the banks, and several reforms in the banking law were approved, the principal of which would have deprived the provincial banks of the right to issue paper money, and have turned them into credit institutions without the privilege of issuing money and with the right to make loans for longer terms than those allowed to the banks of issue. This measure, ill-conceived and worse executed, was wholly ineffective, for only two of the smallest local banks became credit institutions of this sort.

As the result of the irresolute and weak banking policy of the Government and the inability and corruption of many of the high officials in the banks of issue, these corporations reached the revolutionary period, with very few exceptions, in a state of total demoralization, and certainly more than half of them in a condition of practical bankruptcy. It has been said that the old banks of issue were ruined by a compulsory loan of fifty-three million pesos imposed upon them in 1916 by the Government of President Carranza. This is not true; the large majority of the banks of issue were already ruined long before Carranza's Government imposed such a loan. By 1913 they had ceased to fulfil the legal obligation to exchange their notes "at par, at sight, and to the bearer," and in January, 1914, under the Government of Victoriano Huerta, the depreciation of their notes had already reached an average of 30 per cent. In December of the same year their notes were quoted at no more than 35 per cent of their nominal value; and in September, 1916, before the compulsory loan to President Carranza's Government, the average of their notes on the market was below 25 per cent of their face value.

It has been said that the banks of issue lost large sums of money through their compulsory acceptance of the paper money circulated during the revolution. This is only a partial truth applicable to a minority of the banks; most of them speculated with the paper money and obtained more or less illegitimate profits; and if in some cases they reported losses in accepting depreciated paper money in payment of credits, in many cases they canceled their own liabilities with the same depreciated currency.

President Carranza's Government granted the banks in 1915 a reasonable term in which to adjust according to the old banking law their stocks of gold and silver to the proportion legally fixed in respect to their circulation of bank notes, and none of the banks could do it, although the term was extended until 1916. At the end of this year, when the Government's paper money reached the extreme limit of depreciation and had practically ceased to serve as money, President Carranza, in a moment of supreme national necessity, took the fifty-three million pesos which the banks kept in gold and silver in their vaults. Since then and until now the only means of exchange in Mexico has been gold and silver coin.

Plutarco Elias Calles, President-elect

A Mexican writer of conservative tendencies who has bitterly opposed the work of the revolution, Don Francisco

Bulnes, acknowledged the banking disaster previous to the Mexican social upheaval. He says:

> I was the first to submit, in the year 1904, to the budget committee in the Chamber of Deputies . . . a report on Mexican banks, in which I foretold that they were marching to their doom; and so it happened, for long before the revolution all of them were legally bankrupt, some of them in a tragic and others in a fraudulent way. My report was read by the committee and submitted to the Secretario de Hacienda, Sr. Limantour, in the presence of Attorney Pineda. There was not a single voice raised against it; it was approved with the resolution that it would remain in the files without being published, to prevent a financial panic in the republic.

In 1916 the Mexican Government ordered an official investigation of all the banks of issue. This process, justified by the condition of the banks, lasted until 1921 and entailed the analysis of all their books and documents. The result was a confirmation of the fact that the entire system was rotten and broken down by its own internal disease, the revolution being nothing more than the agent which revealed its inner and progressive deterioration. President Obregon's Government could pay the banks tomorrow the fifty-three million pesos taken by President Carranza's Government; but probably not three of them would be able to adjust their cash stocks to the limit prescribed by the old law, nor give back their deposits, nor pay their notes "at par, at sight, and to the bearer," as the law requires.

After including in Article 28 of the Mexican constitution of 1917 the provision that the new and only bank of issue should be under the state's control, President Carranza's Government sent to the Congress a draft of a law to regulate the organization and operation of the new banking institution. The law left a wide margin for the cooperation of private capital and private financiers but kept for the Government the control required by the constitution.

Then began a bitter campaign on the part of the conservative press and the big interests against state control. The opposition was so powerful that for two successive sessions the Chamber of Deputies was unable to discuss the law. Finally in 1921 President Obregon's Government took up the question again. The same opposition to state control developed, and every kind of inducement was offered the Government to leave the new credit institution in the hands of the old bankers and financiers. Fortunately, neither President Obregon nor the congressional committee yielded, but the problem had to be postponed again. It was expected meanwhile to negotiate with foreign creditors regarding the settlement of the national public debt.

And here the French bankers tried to take advantage of the inexperience of Adolfo de la Huerta, the Mexican Minister of Finance. During the conferences which took place in New York with the International Committee of Bankers, Señor de la Huerta paid no heed to the persistent instructions from President Obregon to obtain first of all the money necessary to organize the central bank of issue as well as the funds needed for the irrigation works of the country, as the only means of meeting afterward interest payments and the amortization of the public debt. On the contrary he effected a compromise on the debt and accepted verbal assurances in regard to future loans. Later on the French bankers forced the Mexican Minister of Finance to accept a curious project: Through the nominal advance of $6,000,000—which was to be held in France—and the subscription by the old Mexican banks of the amounts due to them by the Mexican Treasury, the long-projected bank of issue was to be started. The Mexican Government was offered shares and doubtful profits, but the whole Mexican banking and financial system was to be left in the hands of the French financiers. The Mexican Government would not even have the right to appoint a single member of the board of directors of the new bank, notwithstanding the constitutional insistence on state control. President Obregon rejected the draft of the French financiers, although he signed the general agreement.

And the problem is still unsolved. It has not been possible to establish the bank of issue. There are no bank notes in Mexico nor any state paper money, and checks and bank drafts are used so sparingly, owing to the low level of bank deposits, that they hardly contribute to the amount of money in circulation. The currency circulating in Mexico—gold and silver coins—is inadequate to provide for the necessities of production and distribution. And consequently credit, already seriously affected by the political instability, becomes worse through lack of the medium of exchange. There is probably at present no other country in the world where the usual rate of discount, even with a mortgage guaranty, varies between 18 and 36 per cent per annum. And of course, in such conditions, the economic life of the country languishes and starves.

The old bankers reckon with this. Their own interest drives them to make more and more acute the credit crisis in order to force the Government again to turn over to them the control of the Mexican finances. A commission of bankers and experts have been working for some months on a plan for regulating the non-issuing banks. So far they have not touched the question of the central bank of issue; but they promise to submit a proposal on the matter.

Since 1916, when Mexico's paper money went through its worst crisis and finally disappeared, the Mexican Government has maintained a monetary commission, with an entire banking organization, which has since been operating in the market on the same lines as a bank. This state bank (for it is nothing else), working almost without capital of its own, has nevertheless made profits of over ten million pesos, has established a sound banking credit, and has been a success in many lines. Of course its success has been due in part to the economic and financial power of the state, but this is an additional argument to oppose to the idea of delivering a new central bank to the private bankers, since that economic and financial power would be the most important factor in the success of such a state-controlled bank of issue. Indeed the monetary commission would only need a little more freedom and a not very large injection of capital to fill, with a certainty of success, the place of the long-projected state bank.

Mexico is already paying, perhaps at the wrong moment and to her disadvantage, interest on her public foreign debt. One might think that the international bankers could lend Mexico a few million pesos more to organize a state bank, without imposing restrictions which would lessen her financial freedom. But if the international bankers refuse, the new Government must turn the monetary commission into a Banco de la República Mexicana; and, notwithstanding serious handicaps, begin with its own means to expand the circulation of money to reestablish credit, and to put on a sound basis the financial autonomy of the republic. Mexico needs an independent economic development with the aid of foreign capital, but she can never accept submission to the capitalists of the world.

The Jew in Mexico

By ANITA BRENNER

MEXICO faces, in her work of reconstruction, the untangling of an amazing number of racial problems. She must reconcile the East and the West, the primitive and the ultra-modern. All castes, all creeds, all stages of "progress" must be merged into a coherent whole. And yet, curiously enough, Mexico lacks the universal "Jewish question." Here, as in several other Latin-American countries, there is no Jewish problem because ostensibly there is no Jew. To the average Mexican, the Judío (Jew) is purely a Biblical demon. He is the traitor who betrayed Christ. And as such he burns him in effigy during Holy Week, and as such he curses him and shudders at his name. Serapia, my old nurse, had always solemnly assured me that all Judíos were horned and tailed and drank children's blood; and I did not know until we had left Mexico that by all rights we ourselves should possess the wicked little horns and carefully concealed tail.

Even today, with the exception of some members of the upper middle classes and the intellectuals, Mexico still believes the old church myths about the Jew, and, what is still more wonderful, Mexico believes that all the Jews are either damned or in Jerusalem. This in the face of the fact that the Jewish population of Mexico City alone numbers several thousands. Jewish immigrants are flooding Mexico, from Poland, Russia, Germany, Austria, Turkey, Arabia, even Palestine. Yet all of them are called simply extranjeros—foreigners—or more specifically Rusos, Alemanes, Turcos, Árabes.

Precisely because he is excluded by certain immigration restrictions from entering the United States the Jew in Mexico is rapidly becoming omnipresent. As a peddler he travels through the entire country with his pack of socks, ties, dry-goods, hardware, saint-images, and crucifixes—"literally fulfilling," said one with a smile, "the old accusation of selling the Christ." The Eastern Jews, who have a long-established semi-colony in Mexico City, practically monopolize the silk and rug markets. The old-timer, usually a French, German, English, or Spanish Jew, is to be found in the big businesses, the banks, the importing and exporting houses, the mines and haciendas. The educated newcomer from Germany, Russia, England is a doctor, a lawyer, a teacher. In the foremost ranks of labor leaders are found Jews; doing scientific research work are Jews; Jews hold important and highly trustworthy government positions. It is even said that the prophet of Mexico's renaissance, the dreamer and revolutionist Madero, was the son of a man who prayed every morning in Hebrew with phylacteries upon his forehead.

The Jew is everywhere, but astoundingly unperceived. He is never known as a Judío to Mexicans, and often he is incognito to his own people. Because he likes Mexico and its people he very rapidly identifies himself with it. Nearly all the immigrants succeed eventually in reaching their Mecca—America. And yet each one returns. He comes back to Mexico from gefüllte fisch and synagogues, bringing perhaps a Jewish wife, perhaps a new stock of merchandise, a sprinkling of English, and an agglomeration of American ideas. But he makes his home Mexican, and he speaks Spanish, dropping his comfortable Yiddish even within the family. And in a startlingly short time he has become part of the country he has adopted.

Not very long ago I was dancing at the house of a friend with a young man who seemed quite Mexican in his speech, his manner, his appearance. And within a few moments he had placed himself, Daniel Levy, with smiling Mexican courtesy, "at my service." Upon another occasion I had dropped into one of the large curio and book stores of Mexico City for a chat with a most agreeable, supposedly Spanish gentleman who hunted books from the top shelves for me. I inquired for Zangwill's "King of Schnorrers." He regretted very much that at present the book was not in stock, but if I desired he could constitute himself a genuine King of Schmoozers (schmooz is to talk) for me.

It is practically an historical axiom that the Jew thrives on prejudice, on persecution; tolerated, he loses the intensity of his race consciousness, tends to disseminate and assimilate. But in Mexico the assimilation of the Jew is more than a tendency, it is the key of his future in the new land. Not only does the Jewish tradition of race preservation struggle—if one may put it so—against a wholly unexpected tolerance; it is completely disconcerted, undermined, by the Mexican attitude of indifference. And, somehow, there hardly seems any point in being a Jew and declaring so passionately when no one prohibits it. The whole procedure becomes a little ridiculous.

The Mexican attitude of casual tolerance does not, however, limit itself to religious fields. Personally, socially, he does not hate the Jew, and consequently the Jew cannot despise him, as he always has despised the Gentile in other lands. If there is no hate and no contempt, there is no reason for aloofness. That is why Mexico City, with its very large Jewish population, has no Jewish community. In fact, the extranjeros are divided among themselves, first in two large groups, the Eastern and Western, and each of these in itself, through differences of nationality. While the Easterners have made an attempt to preserve their race individuality—they have a synagogue, rabbis, a Hebrew school—the attempt takes on a character of pathos. Their zeal has a broken backbone, and their struggles are fruitless. The immigrants, in Europe the most orthodox of all Jews, become in Mexico actually indifferent to the lack of both rabbi and synagogue. They accept Mexicans on a friendly, even an intimate footing. Gradually, unconsciously, because by the outsiders they are not considered primarily as Jews, they themselves forget the all-embracing character of their religion. They drift, hardly realizing where, and not particularly concerned.

There is even a strong element which does understand the nature of the disintegration that is going on and which is glad of it, deliberately advocating it. These "liberals" say that the race, in spite of its prophecies, has no divine mission to fulfil in the modern world. They say there is absolutely no reason why the Jews must continue to preserve themselves a race apart. They say that they have suffered far too much already for the sake of an outworn religion and because of a great deal of blind stubbornness. And while the majority of the Jews do not echo their words, their attitudes mold themselves on these doctrines.

But whatever the opinion, whatever the conclusion, the situation exists; it is not the manifestation of certain Jews. It is a deeper phenomenon, it is part of the social reorganization of Mexico. It is explainable and inevitable. Even did the Jews not wish themselves acclimatized, adapted, and molded into the future Mexico, they would be powerless to prevent it. A synagogue and a rabbi could serve only retardation purposes. Intermarriage is certain, simply because Jewish men are many and Jewish women few. In spite of rabbis, Jewish homes, papers, and clubs, the Jew will be forced into the fiber of the coming Mexico. He is losing himself in a race that is finding itself. For Mexico, all Latin America, is today breaking into its first stride, is literally being born. The complex elements that have for several hundred years made Mexico a land of many peoples are beginning to web together. The Jew here is at his world-old task of disseminating, underpinning, pushing, spreading the new civilization. If he has ever had a purpose, a special mission, this of welding, because of his remarkable fitness for it, is surely the "divine role."

That the assimilation of the Jew in Mexico is desirable, undesirable, moral, immoral, a religious betrayal, rank apostasy, or an enlightened salvation—these phrases are hardly relevant. Words can do no more than clarify a movement that is stronger than all the preservatives in the world. Consciously or unconsciously, unwilling, acquiescent or deliberate, the Jew in Mexico, whether he is Arabian, Turkish, Russian, English, Polish, or German, whether he is merchant, teacher, peddler, or artist, educated or ignorant, is becoming as Mexican a Mexican as the descendant of the conquistador or the son of the native Indian. He is giving and will give, to the Mexico of the future, not only his work, his money, or his brain, but literally himself.

Freedom or Imperialism?

By JOSÉ VASCONCELOS

GROWTH is the law of life; but modern nations undergo a kind of growth that was hardly known to the older civilizations. In the past we find a brilliant civilization like that of the Greeks and around it peoples that were classed as barbarians, not only because they had not assimilated the Greek culture but mainly because they were so different and lived so apart that they could not unite to promote progress. The Greeks and the Hindus developed advanced civilizations in the same centuries without even knowing each other. The Romans enlarged the Old World, but they still ignored Asia and had no knowledge of the important civilization of the American continent. Civilization was a local, a racial phenomenon; it was Hindu, it was Greek, it was Roman.

In modern times we cannot say that civilization has been English or French or Italian; it has been all that, as well as Spanish and German and Russian; it has been European. And now Asia is drawn in and there are nations like Japan and India that contribute in invention, in work, and in thought to the shaping of the present world more than many nations of European origin. Practically, one may say that there are no barbarians in the present day. There are still some savages, but there are no barbarians. Civilization has become a universal fact. It embraces the world. We should not be alarmed, therefore, when we read about the decadence and the failure of European or Occidental civilization. Should the culture of one nation or group of nations collapse it would not mean anything so catastrophic as the breakdown of the Roman Empire. It would mean the temporary exhaustion of a certain mass of beings, and the appearance of younger and stronger elements to continue the same universally organized struggle to conquer nature for the benefit of life.

In all ages the problem of religion has been to liberate the soul. Two opposite systems have always been advocated by the different religions and philosophical schools, two ways, we might say, of getting rid of the body: one is to satisfy its needs, the other is to suppress them. Epicureans, Buddhists, Moslems have advocated pleasure in one way or the other as a means of attaining bliss or at least of satisfying the body in order to free the soul. Christian ascetics, Gymnosophists, Thebaidans, Puritans have advocated abstinence. Modern societies distinguish themselves from the old types of civilization by the fact that they want to see not only the privileged person, the saint, in a position where he can choose his way of salvation, but every man. Liberation of the masses is the cry of modern times; full liberation, both economic and spiritual. Some narrow-minded, materially inclined writers of sociology have tried to eliminate the religious factor from social life. This is my main objection to Darwinism, Marxism, and modern Leninism. These systems of thought have been unable to grasp the human problem as a whole. Their whole thesis is upset if we ask what they are going to advise the masses to do after food and comfort are conquered. In that very moment the religious problem would reappear bright and overwhelming.

The old economic world did not allow the serf, the toiler to make any choice in life; it was only the privileged few that could get time to think. Culture was a luxury. At present we want to see every man in a position to think philosophy and practice religion. To do this is the intrinsic natural right of every human being. When organized religions, allied with the powerful of the world, have preached submission and salvation through sacrifice in hard, cruel, selfish toil, religions have become the instrument of the god of wrong. They have condemned the souls, not only the bodies of the exploited. In the modern world slavery is still the natural condition of the majority of men. The Chinese coolie, the Hindu peasant, the peon of Latin America, the toilers of many industries of these United States and of Europe; all those that are forced to put 101 per cent or even 80 per cent of their life's energy into the conquest of food and shelter are slaves no matter what they may be called. They are slaves even if they happen to have bank accounts; because a slave is not only the man that has a master but also he who lacks leisure to care for his soul.

In many ways modern societies are harsher than the older civilizations. Nowadays, for example, we do not allow anyone to escape from the servitude of work except the rich. Beggary has become a crime. In the old days it was a virtue. The objection to this change would be slight if our industrial system did not create so many superfluous needs that we have to pay by sacrificing the soul to the body in the form of long hours of money-making toil. In a real civilization a modest, clean life should be purchased at the expense of only very few hours of work. At present practically nobody is allowed to go poor and naked and free from one end of the world to the other; the police would interfere. Yet, the other kind of loafing, the useless loafing of the satisfied, is not only allowed but held in esteem. But I do not take this last situation tragically. I believe it shows a tendency toward the second solution for the salvation of the soul, of the two I mentioned. The present-day world chooses the solution of happiness and plenty as opposed to the ascetic, sorrowful old way of turning from life. This would mean that although at present it is an outrage to allow the rich to live practically idle while others toil until they lose their very souls, yet the purpose of social development is to allow every man to become more or less idle and free from care so that he can use brain and heart in mental and aesthetic joys. Civilization will have to advance before we can do this without going back to savagery through laziness and misconduct.

There are men, we know, who find pleasure only in the toils of business and material aggrandizement. They should be allowed to work as much as they please provided they do not injure others with pirate activities that deprive them of the benefit of work. Such men, natural-born laborers, should not be allowed to become masters; they should remain among the caste of toilers and merchants. They are useful to the community provided they are not allowed to rush everybody into the mad struggle for more money and more material effort. They should be honored, but their surplus should be devoted to social enterprise, not to individual aggrandizement.

This is fundamentally what we mean when we speak in Mexico about the atrocities of capital. We have not been a nation: we have been a colony, first, of the Spanish conquerors, at present a colony of the wealthy local and foreign exploiters. We know that our land must be worked, we know that our minds must be trained, but we want our riches to increase the wealth of the world for the benefit of mankind, not for the pleasure of a little group of men. We struggle for a fairer distribution of wealth and for a more humane treatment of the Indian and the common toiler. We wish to nationalize natural resources in order to keep them useful for the many. We think there should be a limit to land-holdings, that there should be a limit imposed by law to the owning and disposing of wealth by individuals. We undertake to cut the claws of the wolf in us before we can go ahead with ideals and progress. We impose the eight-hour law because thus the toiler will be able to awaken his soul. We believe in the freedom and equality of individuals, of races, and of nations. Among us some call themselves liberals, others call themselves socialists or laborists or agrarians or even communists and reds; but we all have the common, deep conviction that every human life ought to be made happier.

Money and wealth should be created and protected but only to be used for the service of the people, for the service of mankind. The endeavor to attain this sort of progress—even through blunders, violence, and hopes—is the essence of the Mexican revolution.

This will explain, at the same time, why it is that we have not and cannot have race hates or race prejudices in our generation in Mexico. If we work for humanity how can we shelter petty grievances, narrow prejudices, against any race or nation? The oppressed majorities of all countries must come together, not for revenge and destruction but to start the campaign for the freedom of all.

Our message of love is addressed to the generous souls of America. It is the message of people that have their own traditions, their own type of civilization, their own individuality, and who struggle for a free, independent, happy future. It comes from people who love life, but who love independence even more; people who are struggling to secure not only political but also economic freedom. We would not deserve the friendship of the free of America if we were otherwise.

Today nations have become closely bound in wealth and purposes and the only common enemies of free human souls are imperialism, greed, and despotism. These are the enemies of the smaller nations and also of the citizens of the United States, the bigger nation. Imperialism always becomes oppressive at home before oppressing abroad. And the growth of knowledge, the splendor of thought, the expansion of real culture stop as soon as a nation uses its power and vision to enslave or exploit its fellow-beings. The misfortune of the oppressed reflects its shadow on the face and soul of the oppressor. This is why the majority, the vast majority, of the people of the United States wish to see their banner true to its original purpose of freedom and love—the freedom that could not be found in the Old World, the brotherly love that created the Union, the love for the world that carries so many of your citizens and so much of your wealth to serve whenever there is a world calamity and to help wherever human souls clamor for help. We Mexicans are few and poorly armed, but we are with you in the fight for liberty and truth! There is no ill purpose in the heart of any of us. We are becoming one with all Latin America, but this coming together of peoples is like the growth of the state into the nation; it is the overflow of the nation into the broader scope of the race. It is a sailing into the ocean of a common language in order to shape and organize what we call a race, or rather a type of civilization. The union we seek is not aimed at political and international selfish purposes. We preach loyalty to a certain emotional conception of life. We know that present nations have been shaped by geographical conditions and war; we claim this to be a materialistic arrangement that no free soul can accept as final. There is the possibility of another way of organizing peoples in which emotion and beauty will rule among free and intelligent souls. And no nation will want to conquer the other because no one will wish to make civilization one-sided by absorbing and dominating the other. Everyone will understand the advantages of a many-sided expression of life. For this we strive; this is the meaning of Latin Americanism.

José Vasconcelos

La Follette in America

By ARTHUR WARNER

BEFORE 1911 La Follette belonged to Wisconsin. Since then he has belonged to America. His record in his home State gave him a country-wide reputation, but it was not until he agreed to run for the Republican presidential nomination against Taft that he became a national political leader.

Taft's approval of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill alienated the majority sentiment of the country, and his administration was not half through before progressive Republicans gagged at the thought of his renomination. La Follette was the recognized leader of the anti-Taft movement, and at a conference of progressive leaders in Washington on April 30, 1911, the prevailing sentiment was that the man from Wisconsin should be put up against the President at the national convention the next year. Friends of Roosevelt assured La Follette that the ex-President would not—could not—enter the lists. More important, word was brought to the Wisconsin Senator from Roosevelt that, although he could not openly oppose Taft, he thought La Follette ought to become a candidate for the nomination against the President.

"Fight La Follette on every foot of ground in every Northwestern State"

—From the Coolidge Campaign Headquarters

So La Follette announced his candidacy, and in the summer of 1911 began his campaign for the nomination. By autumn his candidacy had made astonishing headway, so much so that Roosevelt, apparently, was struck for the first time with the thought that Taft could be beaten. Thereupon reports to the La Follette headquarters indicated a changing attitude on Roosevelt's part. He refused to say definitely that he would not accept a nomination. La Follette's supporters—the more prominent among whom were friends of Roosevelt also—were thrown into a quandary. The campaign languished. But La Follette had gone into the contest with every intention of sticking—and he stuck. Besides Roosevelt was not a true progressive in La Follette's eyes. As he wrote later:

> Roosevelt is deserving of credit for his appeals made from time to time for higher ethical standards, social decency, and civic honesty. He discussed those matters strikingly and with vigor, investing every utterance with his unique personality. . . . He often confessed, however, a distaste for and lack of interest in economic problems, and his want of definite conception always invited to compromise, retarding or defeating real progress. . . . It was for these reasons that, after a service of seven and one-half years as President of the United States, he left no great constructive statute as an enduring record of his service.

Gradually the Roosevelt men in the La Follette camp began to edge away. George W. Perkins and Frank A. Munsey, both wealthy men personally, set out to raise a Roosevelt campaign fund, and the movement in behalf of the ex-President grew. On February 2, 1912, La Follette made an address before the Periodical Publishers' Association in Philadelphia. It was a terrific arraignment of the commercial and financial despotism under which the nation had fallen, but it was too downright for his audience. La Follette was not feeling fit at the time, and he talked too long in a vain effort to get hold of his hearers. A tremendous flood of press criticism followed; absurd stories were circulated about La Follette's physical condition. His "shattered health" served various persons as an excuse to desert him for Roosevelt.

In point of fact La Follette was a man of amazing strength and energy. He has said that during the 1901 session of the Wisconsin Legislature—his first year as Governor—he worked eighteen hours a day, and in campaigning he has always been a glutton for toil. In 1904 he stumped Wisconsin for two months, taking only one meal a day from a table and speaking most of the time between nine o'clock in the morning and eleven at night, chiefly outdoors. When the Aldrich currency bill was up in the Senate he took the lead in an attack in which he spoke for nineteen consecutive hours without stopping!

What happened at the Republican National Convention of 1912 is familiar history. In spite of the mushroom boom for Roosevelt, La Follette went there with thirty-six delegates pledged to support him, enough, he thought, to give him the balance of power in a closely divided convention. But the Roosevelt forces found themselves in a decided minority; they charged fraud in seating the delegates, and eventually withdrew. La Follette stayed with the Republican Party. He did not support Roosevelt, Taft, or Wilson, but Wilson carried Wisconsin.

In spite of isolation in his own party and the passions aroused against him during the war, La Follette has been growing steadily in political significance and power since 1912. Slowly the public is catching up with him. At the recent Republican National Convention Representative Cooper said that twenty-six out of thirty-one demands in the platforms that the La Follette forces have presented for adoption by their party every four years since 1908—always contemptuously rejected—have bit by bit become the law of the land. La Follette has been a leader, not a straggler in the march of new ideas across the country. He was early a believer in woman suffrage, and while Governor of Wisconsin made notable use of women in public office. He has long disapproved of the use of injunctions in labor disputes, and has lately taken the most advanced position of any man in Congress in regard to limiting the abuse of the power of the United States Supreme Court in declaring federal laws to be unconstitutional. In case of such a decision he would, by amendment to the Constitution, give Congress the power to repass and validate such a law if a two-thirds majority could be obtained in its favor.

In the effort to discredit him with the voters the business-controlled newspapers of our cities have united in a virtual conspiracy to ignore to the greatest degree possible the speeches of La Follette in Congress, and have applied to him their least complimentary epithets, especially such old favorites as demagogue and windbag. It would be hard to be less accurate. Obviously a man who time and again has risked political extinction by going counter to accepted beliefs and popular hysteria is anything but a demagogue. And windbag? La Follette's speeches are long—too long. He has never learned the art of selection and condensation. But if by a windbag is meant a mouther of mere words, nobody who has studied La Follette's addresses would dream of using that term of him. La Follette's life passion has been for facts. He loads—and overloads—his utterances with them. Way back in the days when he was district attorney of Dane County, Wisconsin, he recognized the power of facts, and prepared his cases accordingly. Writing of this experience later, he said:

> It is facts that settle cases; the law is always the same. And this rule applies to things of larger importance than criminal cases. Facts count high everywhere. Whether the matter in hand is railroad legislation or the tariff, it is always a question of digging out the facts upon which to base your case. In no other one thing does a public man more surely indicate his quality than in his ability to master actual conditions and set them forth with clearness. Neither laws, nor opinions, nor even constitutions will finally convince people; it is only the concrete facts of concrete cases.

Yes, La Follette is a gourmand for facts and figures. Neither is he afraid to use them with John Smith and Jane Doe—the plain, ordinary voter.

So La Follette has emerged through forty-five years of public life until today he is the most commanding and significant personality in the country in relation to progressive political development. The Farmer-Labor convention in 1920 wanted him as its presidential candidate. He declined, partly, it would appear, because he doubted if the gathering was sufficiently representative of organized labor, and partly because he felt the time was not ripe for an independent movement. Today he believes the country is ready. He is ready too. Of the new Progressive Party one may say what he himself said of the earlier movement which he led in the days of Taft: "It expresses the hopes and desires of millions of common men and women who are willing to fight for their ideals, to take defeat if necessary, and still go on fighting."

(This is the last of three articles on La Follette's political record. There was an article on La Follette in Wisconsin in the issue of August 13, and one last week entitled La Follette in Washington.)

Clarksburg, West Virginia

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

A HILL-BILLY, an old one-gallus boy, stood in the rain throughout Mr. Davis's refined and lofty speech and incessantly shouted: "Hoo-ray for our boy!"

Previously, while Mr. Davis was doing a mock rehearsal of his speech for the motion-picture men and was waving his hand energetically, a neighbor endeavored to encourage him by shouting "Louder and funnier!"

Clarksburg met all trains. The train might come in the evening or in the middle of the night or in the faint dawn. Clarksburg might not know who was on the train. It might not know that anybody was on the train. Nevertheless Clarksburg, with committees, with motor-cars, with a mob, sometimes dense enough to block the whole large open space in front of the station, and usually with a band, was there to meet that train.

The committees put all visitors into the motor-cars. The band played and started the motor-cars on a parade through the town. The town stood on the sidewalks and watched each new string of visitors, bursting into applause from time to time for fear that some visitor really distinguished might go unapplauded.

From time to time and from point to point the motor-cars would drop the visitors at the hotels to which they had been assigned or at the houses of the citizens upon whom they had been billeted.

Clarksburg was not merely welcoming Mr. Davis back home. It was welcoming the world to Clarksburg and proving that it could accommodate the world and entertain it.

In the lobby of the hotel this writer was greeted by a committee chairman. Hospitality and a protecting kindliness beamed from his face. He said:

"You are carrying a copy of The Nation. Put it in your pocket. Don't carry it. If they see it on you around here, they'll Ku Klux you."

Hospitality and humanity beamed from the faces of all his fellow-townsmen in the hotel lobby and on the streets.

This writer emerged from the hotel to pay a call. A citizen was sitting in his motor-car in front of the hotel. He at once said to this stranger: "Where do you want to go?"

Arriving there, we entered a house where six or seven coal magnates and gas and oil magnates were doing honor to Davis Day. One of them played the piano. Several of them sang. One of them, in a cleared space between two rooms, was doing the heel-and-toe dance of the mountains.

"He is the greatest natural-gas expert in these parts," said his companions.

"He does heel-and-toe dancing more suppley, more intricately, more artistically than any professional alive," said, and says, this writer.

A huskily square-shouldered and jovially round-faced man was watching him. This man walked over to this writer and said: "Hard, you write more rot about coal from New York than almost any other writer. Why don't you come and look at the coal? I'll protect you from all the other fellows that have read your writings."

That evening this writer met another coal operator. The introduction was: "Hard, here's the best coal-mine manager in West Virginia. He can shoot the spots off a playing card every time at fifty feet."

"I never pull my gun on anybody," said the man thus described.

"That's it," said his introducer. "He only practices at the cards, and he gets out coal."

A third man, standing beside him, said: "Hard, you're not only always wrong about coal but you were totally wrong in the articles you wrote about Ireland in the Metropolitan. I'm a non-union operator and an Irish Anglican. I want to educate you."

He and his friends then discussed many other writers. They knew their writings. They were better readers, wider readers, than if they lived in New York.

They were perhaps what in New York would be called "far from the world." To arrive among them from Washington one goes through many hours of heavily wooded wilderness hills. Then one comes to a region of gentler hills, knolls, humps, more cleared off, with pastures assuaging the fierceness of the forest and with the pastures now showing brilliantly green. There stands Clarksburg. Is it far from the world? New York indeed is far from Clarksburg. Clarksburg is not far at all from New York. It knows New York by going there. It knows New York by reading. It is aware of the world. What is the world? Is it Clarksburg and New York or is it only New York? Clarksburg knows both. It has the advantage. New York can be provincial. Clarksburg is sophisticated. It has a double sophistication. It knows and admires the metropolis; and then, knowing it, admiring it, it is not awed by it and is glad to be Clarksburg.

In a business block, high up in it, in the rear of it, there was the apartment of a man of much money. Here he had his pictures, his piano, his perfect radio set, his sleeping quarters, an enormous refrigerator, filled with an infinite variety of foods, and a cooking stove. Here he did his own cooking. Here he provided marvelous meals for politicians and for political correspondents attending Mr. Davis's notification. He roasted chickens. He composed salads. He brought out delicacies which he had bought in Paris.

"Why not live in Paris all the time?" he was asked.

"There's more fun in Clarksburg," he replied.

This writer tarried. Several motor-car loads of married couples arrived shortly after midnight and danced till three to the music of his lavish records on his lavish phonograph. He looked on at the happiness of his neighbors and was happy. He bade us good-night. A few hours later he arose and cooked breakfast for some more pilgrims who loved his food—and him.

This writer summoned to his hotel room a telegraph messenger boy to get a dispatch. The boy arrived, received a coin to inspire him to run, and was asked if he was a good runner. He replied "I'm a singer too. Will I sing for you?" He lifted up his voice and sang.

Clarksburg sheltered us, fed us, danced for us, sang for us, and for itself. Mr. Davis sank into being only one Clarksburger. He was not the show. Clarksburg was the show.

It finally produced from among its visitors a great diplomat. This gentleman was a national political personage. He stood on the railroad-station platform. He was going away. Thinking of Clarksburg's hospitality to him he was overcome. He flung his arms about one of his Clarksburg hostesses and soundly and emphatically kissed her. Turning, he saw her husband. He did not hesitate. He flung his arms about him and kissed him too.

Here's blowing a kiss to you, Clarksburg!

In the Driftway

THERE are certain advantages in a democratic state installed after a thousand years of rich and reckless kings. Francis I of France, for example, built himself a palace covered inside and out with noble and intricate decorations; at the expense of his hard-worked subjects he brought sculptures from Greece and Rome, he had his own dashing figure painted by Titian and Clouet and half a dozen others, he assembled paintings and friezes and furniture—and the polloi turned his priceless collection, palace and all, into the Musée Nationale de Louvre, where breathless Americans pay a franc to walk up and down the corridors, gasping with delight and weariness combined. Likewise the Duke of Luxembourg set his palace in the midst of a garden laid out lavishly and with loving care, and now the poor Parisian and the poor American student walk side by side there in the evening while rose trees and pale willows and evergreens and copper beeches give proof of the skill of the duke's gardeners. There is, of course, a double pleasure in the walk: one may justly admire the gardens, but the Drifter confesses also to a sly delight at the scorn with which he and his ilk would have been regarded by the duke and duchess; he pictures those gay persons, brightly dressed, walking along these paths, and their memory makes the paths more desirable, particularly since they are no longer here!

* * * * *

WE have little that corresponds to these once-royal parks and palaces in America. George Washington was, to be sure, a well-to-do English gentleman. His estate is now a public park and museum, and the Drifter is indissolubly attached to the quaintness of Mt. Vernon, but nobody would pretend that it compared with the Louvre and the Jardins des Tuileries. Central Park in New York and Druid Hill Park in Baltimore and the Metropolitan Museum of Art and many others are beautiful and important institutions, but they somehow lack the flavor of an institution that has been wrested by main force from a king. In the latter, the plain man, like the Drifter, can sit back and smoke his pipe, admiring the king's taste and smiling because a royal guardsman does not come and throw him out. In Central Park he needs only to fear a policeman, human like himself, and that only after some vulgar crime like walking on the grass or feeding peanuts to the bears.

* * * * *

IT does not seem feasible to begin a thousand years of royal spending in America. Even the Drifter can see that kings have their poor qualities as well. But evidently the next great revolution, when at last it comes, will, as part of its duty, take over the estates of Mr. Rockefeller at Tarrytown and the house of Mr. Morgan on Fifth Avenue, and all the American antiques which by then Mr. Ford will have assembled in Detroit, and turn them into public parks and museums. The Drifter does not pretend to approve of such a high-handed procedure nor does he think for a minute that the joy of trespassing with impunity on Mr. Ford's property will equal that of walking about on the land of Francis I. But in a young country with no past to speak of it is doubtless the best that can be done.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Stay East, Young Man

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Chamber of Commerce and our papers sent out glowing accounts of the wonders of California, but recently I have not noticed any warning to the people to stay away on account of the terrible drought we are having. We get letters asking us to conserve water, lights, etc. Farmers in some parts of the State have abandoned their farms for lack of water, but the papers say almost nothing about this. They let the poor fellow in the East and Middle West come plowing out here over the dusty desert in his little old Ford. I went by an employment agency yesterday and saw many of the victims lined up for jobs.

Puente, California, August 1 Jessie Y. Kimball

The Croatian Peasant Movement

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Will you be good enough to publish these brief complementary notes to the article entitled The Gandhi of the Balkans printed in your issue of June 4:

The peasant movement in Croatia is not carried on by an "illiterate peasantry." On the contrary, almost all the Croatian peasants can read and write and are well-educated—not only as the result of an ancient culture but also through reading regularly their newspaper Slobodni Dom (the Free Home) and the many publications of the Peasant Party—with a circulation of from thirty to forty thousand copies.

The peasantry in general and in Croatia in particular does not represent a "mass" movement. Only a great number of human beings who do not possess individual ideals of life can be called a "mass." But the Croatian peasantry has always held ideals of social justice and of peace and freedom, and now it fights for these ideals with a courage, perseverance, patience, and intelligence such as unfortunately we cannot always find among other classes of society. In our opinion the peasantry forms the soul of each nation, and not only its body.

The immediate aim of the Peasant Party of Croatia is not a Balkan federation but rather an Adriatic one—the federation of all peoples now subjugated or threatened by the present Serbian militarist bureaucracy in Belgrade. The Adriatic federation can and must be completed and enlarged into the Balkan and Danubian federation extending from the Bohemian Mountains to the Adriatic Sea.

The present Serbian rulers are not only autocrats, crude absolutists, but they are, almost without exception, dishonest grafters and exploiters of their own Serbian people, and the tyrants, murderers, and exterminators of all others—the non-Serbian peoples and national groups.

The Croatian peasant movement has organized literally all the Croatian peasants (four million) in Croatia, Slavonia, Dalmatia, and in Bosnia-Herzegovina; half a million Hungarian and half a million German peasants now under Serbian rule, and many thousands of Czechs, Slovaks, Ukrainians, and Rumanians, dispersed through the former South Hungary, now called Voïvodina.

This peasant movement is already taking deep root in Montenegro, in Macedonia, and even in Serbia—and therefore the foundation and the settlement of a peaceful peasant republic on the Adriatic and on the Danube is a question not of many years but rather of months.

The governments of the "great Allies" do not follow this movement, and whatever they know about it is quite contrary to the reality.

Moscow, July 3 Stephen Radich,
Leader of the Croatian Peasant Party

A Missionary Protest

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I find your paper such a source of inspiration and suggestion that it grieves me when you leave the path of sanity and join—the others. Your comments on the Japanese exclusion clause have been most admirable, but in the issue of June 4, which just came to me, I find you saying that since the bill has been signed, "The natural step now would be the withdrawal of every American missionary from China and Japan. For them to remain there would stamp us as guilty of the basest hypocrisy." Thus you join hands with the jingoists and super-patriots of Japan who feel the same way. Since when did the missionary take his cue from Congress or the President? And why add China now after all these years of exclusion? Why not include India and other Oriental nations? And whom does it stamp "as guilty of the basest hypocrisy"? Certainly not the churches or the missionaries who have been fighting against the bill. We did not hesitate to help the Russians when our Government refused to recognize their Government. We do not cease sending assistance to Germany even though our Government has been "guilty of the basest hypocrisy" ever since the armistice. For the distinction between physical and spiritual assistance is only surface deep: each is part of the spirit of Jesus. And it is this spirit which the missionary would carry to the people for whom he works. We are Christian missionaries, not American missionaries. One of our greatest problems is how to carry the Gospel untrammeled by nationality and race. These things shadow us always. We cannot shake them off. The Nation would do well if it would help to remove the popular misconception that the missionary is in any way responsible for the acts of his government. We may be ashamed of our friends and Congress, but we are not ashamed of our Gospel. When we are, then we will have ample reason for retiring.

It may interest your readers to know that the Americans here have been all but unanimous in their condemnation of the exclusion clause.

Sapporo, Japan, July 1 William Woodard

A Motto for La Follette

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As a possible contribution to your collection of definitions of progressivism, how about Gladstone's motto at the entrance to the Liberal Club? "The principle of Toryism is distrust of the people, qualified by fear. The principle of Liberalism is trust of the people, qualified by prudence." Whether La Follette has such a motto I do not know. His trust in the people of Wisconsin, ever since I have known him from the middle of the eighties on, might well have been expressed by this motto of Gladstone.

Madison, Wisconsin, July 30 Edward Kremers

Contributors to This Issue

Bertram D. Wolfe is an American who has lived in Mexico City and taught in the Mexican schools.

Rafael Nieto, former Governor of the state of San Luis Potosí and Secretary of the Treasury, is now Mexican Minister to Sweden. He is an authority on economics and finance.

Anita Brenner is a writer now living in Mexico City.

Jose Vasconcelos, the well-known Mexican scholar, until recently Secretary of Education in the Mexican Cabinet, has now been elected Governor of the Mexican state of Oaxaca.

M. Covarrubias, one of the leading young modernist artists of Mexico, is now living in New York.

Poems

By BABETTE DEUTSCH

Old Women

Old women sit, stiffly, mosaics of pain,
Framed in drab doorways looking on the dark.
Rarely they rouse to gossip or complain
As dozing bitches break their dream to bark.
And then once more they fold their creaking bones
In silence, pulled about them like a shawl.
Their memories: a heap of tumbling stones,
Once builded stronger than a city wall.
Sometimes they mend the gaps with twitching hand,—
Because they see a woman big with child,
Because a wet wind smells of grave-pocked land,
Because a train wailed, because troops defiled.
Sometimes old women limp through altered streets
Whose hostile houses beat them down to earth,
Now in their beds they fumble at the sheets
That once were spread for bridal, once for birth,
And now are laid for women who are cold
With difficult plodding and with sitting still.
Old women, pitying all that age can kill,
Lie quiet, wondering that they are old.

Leningrad

Upon his Finnish rock, curled like a wave,
Peter, throned over Neva, watches still
The granite flower of his granite will,
Sprung from that swamp only men's lives could pave.
Stone holds a street stern as an empty nave;
And, as though stained by some forgotten kill,
An arch like the red mouth of a great cave
Yawns on red wall, red pillar, and red sill.

Neva is a white beast with glittering fangs,
Imprisoned in a trap of iron cold,
And while she cries, copper on copper clangs:
The bells would give the sky their prayers to hold.
But like one crucified, the dead sky hangs,
Impaled upon a spire of cruel gold.

Books

Realism and More

Gold. By Jacob Wassermann. Authorized translation by Louise Collier Willcox. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

LIKE the story of "The Goose Man," the story of "Gold" has for its theme the evil wrought by the love of power, in any form, as the guiding passion of life. Its central character, Ulrika Woytich, appears first as a rescuing angel in the household of a millionaire miser, and only gradually does it appear that the skill with which she unlocks the coffers of the tyrant master and sets in motion the passions of the family is a power for evil: that the gold, dangerous enough when jealously guarded, is ten times worse when let loose upon the world.

In this thesis alone there is nothing either new or complicated. Wassermann's hatred of the will to power and his exaltation of the less tangible virtues of endurance and brotherly love are as simple as Tolstoi's Charity, but the intensity of his passion and the power which he has of creating character and situation to confront his opposing forces are as unique and, in their way, as effective as the passion and power of the great Russian. Hardly once in a generation does there appear an artist endowed with his torrential energy. In all the nineteenth century only two novelists—Dostoevsky and Tolstoi—equaled it, and perhaps no English writer of fiction ever did. We have had in our language intelligence at least as penetrating, character and incidents analyzed with a steadier, calmer hand, and conditions pictured with a more meticulous exactitude. We have had, in a word, novels more scientific and in addition novels as poetic in their own way, but we have never had any one who could sustain like Wassermann a white-heated passion through such vastly spreading tales.

If one should compare, for instance, "Gold" with "The Forsyte Saga," it would be futile to talk of superiorities on the one side or the other, but neither author approaching, as both do, a study of the power of possession could achieve the effects of the other. On the one side is a mind touched with poetry, but essentially scientific, tracing with infinite care the subtle windings of the instinct he is discussing, revealing every process, and careful that nothing is heightened or shown with a face other than that seen by everyone. On the other side is a mystic in the grip of a great love and a great hatred, torn, tortured, and pouring forth his energy in the form of a legend even vaster than Galsworthy's and producing an effect at least as mighty, asking the reader to accept all manner of violent occurrences, creating characters so intense as to approach symbols, but rewarding us with great heights of dramatic conflict and stirring us with eloquent emotion.

So skilfully does Wassermann handle his gigantic story, covering nearly eighty years of time and touching the crises in the lives of innumerable people, that the reader is hardly aware of its complexity. So cunningly are all the events drawn to a focus that when the two powers come face to face at last for a final struggle over the one representative of the family not yet lost, the battle seems to be for the soul of man itself. The effect is so much dependent upon cumulation that no excerpt can illustrate it, but one passage may give some taste of the author's manner and its masterly poise between the merely realistic and the powerfully symbolic. Ulrika, grown old, has become herself a miser, and the former exuberance of her vertu and love of power for its own sake has dwindled to avarice alone. In the agony of post-war Europe she has put her money into the hands of one of the speculators who are preying upon the ruins of their country, and suddenly she learns that he has shot himself. Insane with rage and despair, she hastens to Berlin in the hope that her former lover, himself a speculator, may perhaps have saved her. When she reaches his house and finds it crowded with the decadent productions of art in its death agony which have been cynically acquired by the owner, a despair descends up her.

> She felt as if she had entered a tropical swamp full of rank, luxuriant vegetation. All these overwrought, glaring, shrieking, ghastly objects looked to her as if a satyr in grim cynicism had gathered together in a heap beauty and ugliness, heaven and hell. Taken together they seemed to her like a face, an unhappy, worn-out face, with a hypocritical smile, denying its decay, scornfully and weakly: the Face of the Times. Suddenly she knew that her journey was a silly and futile undertaking and that she had nothing to hope.

The master enters.

> "Meant to warn you. Forgot. Too much doing at the moment—you ought to have indulged yourself a little. You always wanted to enjoy at others' expense. Great lack of heart. Man with a heart shows it by spending money. Look at me. It runs out of my pockets. And everything bows down. So I can see backs, only backs. Most amusing."
>
> "Very likely," Ulrika answered bitterly; "faces are often troubling. One need only look at you."

> He patted Ulrika's hand again and continued: "Tomorrow it may be my turn. Everybody's turn comes. The downward grade, my good old Ulrika, the great slide. Want to go down into the cellar? You will hear the foundations cracking. Very impressive. Word of honor. Hear it everywhere in Berlin. Every cellar. Pure music. Music of the great slide. Pretty, what?" He was undoubtedly pleased.

Perhaps this passage will in some measure illustrate the nature of Wassermann's triumph, which consists in the fact that he has not only experimented with a new form for the novel but that he has actually created one. Ulrika is at once a definite character and a symbol, a person in a particular story and the embodiment of that glory in power alone which seems to the author the secret of the ruin of his world. And the same may be said of the story as a whole. It never ceases to be in the one sense realistic, yet at the same time it achieves a largeness and intensity which make it the legend which bodies forth the author's vision of the whole world. But again it must be said that the sine qua non of its being is its energy. Anyone might have conceived such an intention; only a genius could have realized the plan. J. W. KRUTCH

Elizabethan Studies

The Elizabethan Stage. By E. K. Chambers. The Oxford University Press. Four volumes. $23.

Two Elizabethan Stage Abridgments: The Battle of Alcazar and Orlando Furioso. An Essay in Critical Bibliography. By W. W. Greg. The Oxford University Press. $7.

Shakespeare's Hand in the Play of Sir Thomas More. By A. W. Pollard, W. W. Greg, E. Maunde Thompson, J. Dover Wilson, and R. W. Chambers. Cambridge: The University Press. $3.50.

TWENTY years ago Mr. Chambers produced his monumental work on "The Mediaeval Stage," a classic of English scholarship. That book he explained as the result of "preliminary investigations for a little book on Shakespeare." What he now offers is "another instalment of prolegomena." The inception of both works accounts for the regrettable but "long since irretrievable" decision not to carry his investigations beyond the death of Shakespeare. The new book therefore ends abruptly at a fortuitous date, leaving many problems unsolved and just touching upon many others, the beginnings of which happen to come within the arbitrary limitation. Perhaps Mr. Chambers will have the courage to carry on his investigations to the closing of the theaters in 1642; meanwhile we are grateful for the abundant and exact information which is here assembled.

Mr. Chambers's plan does not embrace literary criticism nor the study of the plays themselves from the point of view of sources, analogues, motives, or technique save in so far as the texts serve to cast light upon the development of the stage as an institution and upon the social and economic conditions which made such a development possible. Much of his material is of as great value to the social as to the literary historian. A large part of his investigations is devoted to mere antiquarianism—if antiquarianism may fairly be described as "mere." In notes and numerous appendices he has collected an enormous body of original documents bearing upon the composition, production, criticism, and control of the stage. Along many lines he corrects and supplements the results achieved by earlier investigators.

Beginning with a description of court life in so far as it illustrates the taste for pageant and progress, tilt and mask, revel and other forms of spectacle, he passes to the organization of the royal household and thence to the office of the Revels. This in turn leads to an account, both historical and descriptive, of pageantry, the mask, and the court play. In the second division of his book he assembles the documents and other evidence shedding light upon the control of the stage: the struggle between humanism and puritanism, and between the court and the city authorities; the gradual emergence of the actor as a member of a recognized profession; and the economic status of the actor in the life of the community. There follows a history of each company, in chronological sequence, with a chapter on "the international companies" in which the meager records of English actors upon the Continent are brought together. Then comes an alphabetical list of every actor of the period with a statement of what is known of each —an invaluable record. A similarly planned study of each theater leads to the most interesting part of the work, a study of the structure and conduct of the theaters and of the principles of staging both at court and in the public and "private" houses. Here Mr. Chambers rejects the old method of procedure, the attempt to "reconstruct" a "typical" Elizabethan stage, and wisely elects to follow the historical method of inquiry. He shows that at court the Italian mode of presentation, as set forth in Serlio's famous "Trattato sopra la scena," was adopted with certain adaptations, while the public theaters were compelled by the exigencies of their themes to abandon exterior action before contiguous houses in favor of a succession of changing scenes. There is unfortunately no space here to comment upon any details of Mr. Chambers's study of the problems of staging nor to indicate even the greater changes that took place in the modernized theaters of the early Jacobean period.

In general Mr. Chambers is accurate in the extreme. There are a few errors of omission; the MS play of "Edmund Ironsides," for example, belongs within the period, but is not recorded. And there are some minor slips; several plays, for instance, are set down in the list of "lost plays" that are not only in existence but in print. I cannot pretend to subscribe to all Mr. Chambers's speculations and hypotheses; but as he is meticulously careful to note nearly all of these as "guesswork" he will not expect unanimous agreement among his readers. This is particularly the case with the vexed question of Shakespeare's relations with Pembroke's and Lord Strange's companies.

Mr. Greg's essay is too technical a study for more than brief mention here. He examines two examples of the type of shortened plays that closely resemble the so-called "bad quartos" of Shakespeare. His choice of the two texts in question is due to the fact that for "The Battle of Alcazar" there exists a "plat," that is, a summary of scenes, cues, entrances, and exits for the use of the stage manager and prompter, while for the "Orlando" there is a manuscript containing Edward Alleyn's part in the play. By analysis and comparison an attempt is made to reconstruct the original form of both dramas and to arrive at conclusions as to the method, purpose, and result of the abbreviated versions.

The third work deals with a subject of such general, even sensational, interest that some mention of the problem involved has found its way into the daily papers—an unusual achievement for Elizabethan scholarship. A group of specialists have examined anew the "Play of Sir Thomas More" with special attention to the three pages of the MS (147 lines in all) which Simpson and Spedding long ago ventured to ascribe to Shakespeare. Sir E. Maunde Thompson once again applies his palaeographical knowledge to the problem, comparing the handwriting with the authenticated signatures of Shakespeare and attempting ingeniously and, I think, convincingly to show that the differences are such as can be accounted for by changes resulting from lapse of years and changes in state of health. Mr. Wilson compares the system of spelling and punctuation with that of the quarto texts known to be nearest to Shakespeare's own manuscript. And Mr. R. W. Chambers, in a most interesting and thoughtful paper, compares the ideas set forth in these pages with the ideas in similar scenes in the undoubted plays. From this comparison there emerges an amazing likeness, for More, in his speech to the rioting citizens, emphasizes, as Shakespeare always emphasizes, the dangers of anarchy and the value of "degree," and the citizens are portrayed in Shakespeare's fashion, as dangerous to public order when lacking a leader yet essentially good-hearted and open to conviction by arguments founded upon right reason. When these converging lines of argument are taken together with the style of these pages—the vivid, realistic, humorous dialogue of the citizens and the closely knit argument and impassioned poetry of the speech by More—it seems to me that those scholars —and there are such—who refuse to admit that in these pages we have authentic Shakespeare are possessed of a skepticism beneath the penetrability of proof.

SAMUEL C. CHEW

The Latin Genius

The Latin Genius. By Anatole France. Translated by Wilfred S. Jackson. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

THERE is a part in the ballet music of Gluck's "Orfeo" which states the case. Not the plaintive tune which begins and ends the piece, but the legato passage midway, a stately dance of nymphs in fields Elysian. It fills the eye with noble groves and smooth lawns beside a shining water, shades classic and delicate, brows wreathed with myrtles, and the pensive complaint of flutes. It is not Greek; but it is some other age almost as gifted for beauty. It is what Rome might have been had she followed beauty as steadfastly as she followed dominion. It is Hellas twice removed: once through the Imperial City, and again through the Renaissance; Hellas in beauty and laughter, but beauty conscious of art, no longer quite innocent in her lovely nakedness; and laughter, still gay, always brave, but with a note of mockery in it: Gallic mirth. It is not Greece; it is not Rome. Yet it is daughter of both. It is called the Latin Genius.

Gluck, while not a Latin, came under the spell of this influence, and in those strains of his move the spirits of that vanished age, elegant and sophisticated, wigged and sworded, wrists apt to dueling hilt as lips to epigram, and bosoms lodging heaven knows what odd assortment of guests: philosophic speculation, soft intrigue, and sentiments of antique republicans in a world of despots and Bastilles. An age of upper classes coquetting with revolutionary ideas is ever an age preparing to give birth to another. And over it broods the Latin Genius—the savor of that race which was born into a Europe too fevered with Christian pessimism ever to have compassed the joyous innocence of the Greek; yet the nearest to the Greeks that modern Europe can show, for lucidity of mind, sensitiveness to form, and the instinct of beauty.

In a prefatory paragraph Anatole France disclaims any lofty pretensions in the volume of essays to which he attaches this title; yet the title is well given.

> It is [he says] an act of faith and of love for that Greek and Latin tradition, wherein resides all wisdom and beauty, and without whose pale is naught but error and vexation of spirit. Philosophy, art, science, jurisprudence, all, we owe to Greece, and to her conquerors whom she overcame. The men of old time live on and teach us still.

The essays are miniature biographies, packed with careful scholarship, a shrewd sense of the subject's place in his age and the signification of it; demure wit, and a pervading mellowness of tone, genial, tolerant, and bantering, with M. France's favorite joke of looking with eyes of childlike wonderment straight at the objects which Christendom has entered into a conspiracy to pretend not to see. Molière, Racine, Scarron, La Fontaine, Le Sage, the Abbé Prevost, Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, Chateaubriand (and his almost equally gifted sister Lucile), Sainte-Beuve, and Benjamin Constant are among his portraits. The volume has a value as history and criticism worthy of a place in the curricula of schools, and one can imagine jaded pupils, assigned to read it in English, suddenly awaking, surprised and delighted, to a pleasure in their study. It is equally an independent work of literature, one of those delightful volumes to be picked up and laid down like chat with an old friend, always certain of welcome, entertainment, laughter, and wisdom.

Friend Anatole has a peculiar value for the writers of our own adolescent nation, even in, if not especially in, such volumes of essays as this. For some reason which I confess I do not quite understand and would like to see explained, American writers have a dread of erudition. Shun books. Go to life. Be new. Scholarship is a blight. It plucks the rose from the fair forehead of genius and sets a Phi Beta Kappa key there. Perhaps it does, as scholarship is at present understood in these States, but that is a reason the more for learning. And Anatole can teach us. Here is a spirit animated yet thoughtful, one who can toss his immense weight of erudition gaily as a juggler's kit without breaking a single plate. You feel toward him as the father toward the son who had just been naively confessing his escapades: "I am astonished at the range and variety of the things you appear to know." His cultural soil is centuries deep. Ours is shallow and needs enrichment. Life is the material; learning the workmanship.

LUCIEN PRICE

Expanding Europe by Contraction

The Expansion of Europe: the Culmination of Modern History. By Ramsay Muir. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

Studies in Empire and Trade. By J. W. Jeudwine. Longmans, Green and Company. $7.50.

"SOME of our British brethren," once remarked an American jurist, "have a God-given talent for converting a predatory expedition into a moral crusade." Mr. Muir's book appears to exemplify the spirit of that statement, when it describes the expansion of Europe as more or less identical with that of Great Britain. In its earlier forms, the author says, it was "deeply influenced by the war." A demand for a new edition gave him an opportunity to reconsider the judgments made under the stress of conflict. He availed himself of it by failing to discover that they "require any substantial modification."

That the intelligent British public relishes such a work, now that the original motive for its publication as a stimulus to war fervor has lost its force, is altogether doubtful.

What the book purports to provide is a "summary, in the form of a broad survey, unencumbered with detail, but becoming fuller as it comes nearer" to our own time, of the problems of world politics and the imperial expansion and rivalries of the "greater states of Western civilization," as these have affected "the fortunes of the world, and of every individual in it." Since Mr. Muir endeavors to deal with "ideas rather than mere facts," he has striven, he declares, "to bring out the political ideas which are implicit in, or which result from, the conquest of the world by Western civilization, and to show how the ideas of the West have affected the outer world, how far they have been modified to meet its needs, and how they have developed in the process." He draws particular attention to the "significant new political form"—"the world-state," of which "the British Empire is the oldest and the most highly developed example." Finally, he tries to display > the strife of two rival conceptions of empire: the old, sterile, and ugly conception which thinks of empire as mere domination, ruthlessly pursued for the sole advantage of the master, and which seems . . . to be most fully exemplified by Germany; and the nobler conception which regards empire as a trusteeship, and which is to be seen gradually emerging and struggling toward victory over the more brutal view, more clearly and in more varied forms in the story of the British Empire than in perhaps any > other part of human history. . . . That is why I have given a perhaps disproportionate attention to the British Empire.

"The place of honor, as always in any great story of European civilization, belongs to France," concedes Mr. Muir. So also does it in the realms of logical precision and absence of prepossessions about moral missions. Yet, outside of sporadic allusions, he grants to consideration of France as much as ten pages of text out of 354. Spain and Portugal, pioneers in the expansion of Europe, are vouchsafed between them eleven pages, the Netherlands five, Russia ten, Italy four, and Belgium two. Germany, the unspeakable, is characterized and denounced in fourteen. Leaving out of account the initial chapter of twelve pages on the "meaning and the motives of imperialism," the amount of "perhaps disproportionate attention" given by Mr. Muir to the British Empire in the account of the entire course of the expansion of Europe during five hundred years stands in the ratio of about six to one.

The "survey" of the book is "broad"—in the old papal sense that it turns over the earth to British enterprise, instead of to Spanish and Portuguese. It is "unencumbered with detail," or with much else except national self-glorification. "Mere facts" are, indeed, subordinated to "ideas." But the "ideas" take no heed of the actual impress made upon non-European lands and peoples by European civilization as such. Nor do they estimate even remotely the significance of the process of expansion for the life and thought of the European nations themselves.

For the imperial-minded among Mr. Muir's countrymen the work is a species of historical campaign-book of imperial politics. Thoughtless folk in other lands, and individuals who dislike imperialism of the "made-in-England" brand, may call it a piece of "typical British propaganda." If they do so they are mistaken. It is a British product turned out by a British subject who seeks to convert the best there is in the politics of European imperialism into a British monopoly. In it the serious student of history will discover few facts that are serviceable or ideas that are new. He will perceive instead "the expansion" that an agile imagination guiding a facile pen can attain when set over against a contraction of knowledge about what European nations other than Great Britain have done. "Of Europe" he will observe but scant trace, except that Nature happened to place Great Britain near that Continent.

The work by Mr. Jeudwine belongs in quite a different category. It is a curious blend of antiquarianism and historiography concerned with the spread of European commercial and political dominion from the Middle Ages to the close of the eighteenth century. The author of it has delved into all sorts of bygone lore that might furnish data for the compilation of a miscellany. Few readers would wish to go through the volume in consecutive fashion. Dipping into its pages, however, they will rise refreshed with many an interesting item of information about the days of old when piracy and trade, religion and warfare, dominion and civilization were more or less interchangeable terms.

The philosophy of the work is summed up in the author's proposition that > our mental conception of empire predicates a single hereditary ruler to whom all owe allegiance, sprung from an acknowledged family of royal descent, of a supreme race which professes a highly organized religion; and that the word suggests that this stronger race, being firmly persuaded of its moral superiority, when it comes in conflict with and absorbs a politically weaker people, will, so far as may be humanly possible, shape their social and political institutions in accordance with its own interests.

This may sound like a variant of Mr. Muir's "ideas." In point of fact, the spirit of the entire work is altogether unsympathetic to them. Mr. Jeudwine deals with Scandinavians, Italians, Germans, Spaniards, Portuguese, Dutchmen, Frenchmen, and Englishmen as representative of the nations of Europe which widened their power at the same time that they spread their sails. The performance of each he rates in the measure of its actual service to the expansion of European interests and control over the earth. Like the preceding book, the present volume does not tell just what the civilization of Europe accomplished, or how it was influenced, in the process, but it does justify its title.

WILLIAM R. SHEPHERD

Books in Brief

The Parson's Progress. By Compton Mackenzie. George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

Having blazed the trail in "The Altar Steps," Mr. Mackenzie continues to hack away at the underbrush of spiritual uncertainties which beset the advance of a young clergyman. The new novel is a work of unrelieved earnestness; it will invite the plodding reader and those specifically interested in its theme—others are apt to find it rather heavy going.

Wine of Fury. By Leigh Rogers. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

In this first novel the author makes undeniably skilful use of the vivid romance of the Russian revolution. The narrative is washed with a dramatic color derived from the tumult of actual events. A restrained economy of incident and a distaste for mere sensationalism make this book a stirring record of a profoundly interesting historical period.

Josslyn. By Henry Justin Smith. Covici-McGee Company.

A gentle, idyllic account of a shy youth and his experiences in Mid-Western newspaperdom. Cast in a biographical form, the story is nevertheless written in a frankly reminiscent mood. Although one hears something of the brutalizing effect of the reporter's life, the appreciation of beauty is as apparent in the intent of this quiet author as it is implicit in his lines.

If you are interested in

MEXICO

from a scientific, social, commercial, financial or any other point of view

KEEP IN TOUCH WITH US

Read our Bulletin

Our Chamber is a non-political, independent, self-sustaining body, organized and devoted to promote and develop mutual knowledge, good feeling, strong social and trade relations and friendship between Mexico and the United States.

MEXICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES, INC.

WOOLWORTH BUILDING, NEW YORK CITY

International Relations Section

Calles Speaks

SHORTLY before the end of his campaign, Plutarco Elias Calles, President-elect of Mexico, made a speech which summed up the issues before the Mexican people and clearly stated the principles which would guide the new administration.

Those who opposed my candidacy, the capitalist and conservative elements of the country, say that I am an agitator. That is not true. The comrade who preceded me on the platform has given us an accurate description of the present situation of the Mexican proletariat. He has told us of the need for the working class of the republic to establish factories, build up industries, and undertake the exploitation of natural resources which progress demands, and thus increase our common wealth. These are all enterprises which will give our people work and opportunities to earn their living, so that they will not have to wander in forlorn caravans to other countries, only to be exploited and laughed at far from home by men of another race, and then after countless sufferings to return, as poor and wretched as when they set out, bringing with them only disillusion after wasting their energy in foreign lands.

It is true that we need capital in our country; that we need industrial capital to keep in motion the industries already established and to build new ones. I am not an enemy of capital; quite the contrary, I want to have it for the exploitation of our natural resources. But we want capital in a humane sense; we want capital with a consciousness of its mission in the modern world and with an understanding that it is to be used, not to gain mastery over the workers but to fulfil a social duty—not only for greater profit for its owner but for the good of society as a whole as well as of the individual capitalist.

And when capital is brought into this country, I want those who bring it to combine their interests with ours, to live with us and share with us our hours of triumph and our reverses. I do not want them coming in merely to exploit our wealth and our people, in utter disregard of morals, as is typical of what a Tampico worker aptly calls "conqueror capital."

I want to state right here that capital brought into this country in a spirit consistent with the precepts of morality will be absolutely secured by all the necessary guaranties on our part; but only on condition that it lives up to this humane spirit and to our laws.

Those who opposed my candidacy claim that I am an enemy of foreigners, and that on account of my rabid nationalism I do not like them and do not want them in my country. This is another lie.

I despise and detest the foreigner who comes to interfere in our home affairs and meddle in our politics and make fun of our laws and keep his hold on the advantages he has received from reactionary governments. He always pretends that the fact of his being a foreigner and having influence with his government entitles him to this advantage.

But the foreigner who comes to live with us, to share what we enjoy and what we have to endure, to make his home here, to combine his interests with ours—this foreigner will find us welcoming him with open arms and calling him brother.

The reactionary elements are shocked and call me a disturber because they say that I am trying to destroy property in Mexico. That also is a lie.

What is it that I do want? What are we struggling for?

We are struggling to relieve the peasants of their economic burden; to enable them to win back the land which was seized from them at the time of the conquest; to aid them in attaining economic independence; to help them live better lives, creating new needs for themselves which will increase their efforts and mean real progress to our country by raising the level of the largest class. We are struggling so that the peasants can educate their children and give them a chance to make something of their lives, and tomorrow we shall have a generation which, through better material conditions, will be finer both morally and intellectually. This is the only way of attaining the highest ambition of the Mexican people—a richer and happier country.

But the landholders of my country don't want to recognize, don't want to understand, that we are struggling for them and their interests as well. And I want to make it clear that any opposition on their part to the development of this program will be met with force. I say that the landholders will gain by turning the land over to the people of the republic, because the people will have to till the soil granted them, and under the stress of circumstances will become expert farmers. Thus they will be exploiters of land instead of exploiters of men.

When the peasant is economically independent on his own lot of land, he will no longer be the peon who offers himself to his landlord because he is driven by hunger. Wages will rise and labor will be more scarce, and there will be no room in our country for the exploiter of the peasant. The landlord will be forced to adopt scientific methods of agriculture, utilizing machinery, improved methods of cultivation, seed-selection, etc. In this way we can attain also the harmony which has been so lacking in the agricultural life of Mexico, because then the relations between landlords and peasants will not be governed by the hatred between master and slave, but, rather, the progressive agriculturist will find in the free peasant a coworker in the production of national wealth.

My enemies say that I am hostile to religions and cults, that I have no respect for religious creeds. I am a liberal in so broad a sense that I can explain to myself and justify all creeds, because I consider them of value on account of the moral standards which they embrace.

I am an enemy of the priestly class which considers its position in the light of privilege and not of evangelical service. I am an enemy of the political priest, the intriguing priest, the exploiting priest, the priest who tries to keep our people submerged in ignorance, the priest who is allied with the landlord to exploit the peasant, and the priest who is allied with the employer to exploit the worker.

I declare that I respect all religions and all creeds so long as their preachers do not meddle in our political conflicts, spurn our laws, or allow themselves to become tools of the powerful in the exploitation of the weak.

Bitter complaints are also being made that General Calles will destroy the industries of our country. This is another lie. I want the industries to prosper and develop. I ask only for more humane relations between employers and workers. I ask that the employers recognize the new world in which they are living, and I ask them not to regard the worker as something less than a machine and little more than a beast, draining his strength until his body is no more than so much pulp to be cast aside; or, if he dies, I ask the employer not to regard him as just one name less on the pay roll.

And how do we want to bring this about? Not through the anarchy of violence, but within the limits of order and discipline, based on legislation.

Is this legislation new to them? I do not believe this, for surely they know that such legislation exists in other countries.

What is happening is that they are pretending to ignore it; why, foreigners who come here from countries where some guaranty for labor exists are shocked to find our reactionary employers casting aside civilized ideas for the easy gains to be derived from the exploitation of man.

We revolutionists who have carried on these struggles in the name of the rights of the proletariat are bound to defend them; if we did not we should fail to justify the revolution and we would be merely jesters.

My enemies say that if General Calles gets in power he will isolate the country and incur universal hatred of Mexico, because he will not want or be able to establish relations with the other countries of the earth. That also is a lie. We want the most friendly and cordial relations with all the nations of the world. The fact is that we are the one political party with honesty enough to declare in favor of having international relations based on justice and honor. We do not want to have foreign countries interfering with our affairs and imposing their will on us or whatever customs may suit their interests. We are a free and sovereign people, and we have the right to solve our internal problems without foreign influence.

We want to have international relations established on the basis of mutual respect; and we do not want the stronger nation to impose its will on the weaker. We want to have any conflicts that may arise solved by justice alone. These are our ideas. This is what we might call our program. . . .

This the ractionary elements cannot overlook, for I have been preaching to the masses of workers and peasants the obligations they must fulfil if they would win a right to the enjoyment of the fruits of the revolution. . . . Let us give economic freedom to those who have been exploited and persecuted for four hundred years; let us give them education and raise their dignity as men, and then we shall see whether or not they form the basis of a powerful nation. In this way and in this way only shall we be able to build a happy nation respected by all other nations of the earth.

Mexico's Debt

A DECREE signed by President Obregon "temporarily suspending payment on the foreign debt" was published in the Diario Oficial on July 1. In the preamble of the decree the Mexican President explained the financial background of this act. In 1913, he stated, as a consequence of revolutionary disturbances, payments on the foreign debt had been suspended; but in 1921, in order to restore the nation's credit, he laid a tax on oil, intending to apply the proceeds to the renewal of these payments. At the same time his Secretary of the Treasury, Adolfo de la Huerta (who recently led an armed revolt against the Obregon Government), was carrying on negotiations with the International Committee of Bankers in New York. Ignoring instructions from his Government De la Huerta agreed to meet the obligations involved in the foreign debt as well as certain domestic debts by pledging for this purpose > the duties already decreed on the exportation of oil, the tax of 10 per cent about to be decreed on the gross receipts of the railroads, their liquid profits, if any, and, if necessary, other government resources, with a view to assuring a minimum payment during the first year, namely 1923, of thirty million pesos in national gold and, during the four years following, namely from 1924 to 1928, of amounts progressively increased by five million pesos annually terminating the five-year period covered by the New York agreement with the payment of fifty million pesos in national gold.

De la Huerta promised that these amounts should be paid in dollars at the ratio of one peso to half a dollar in United States currency. He also ignored the instructions of President Obregon to contract a loan for irrigation purposes and for the purpose of establishing a central bank of issue; but on his verbal assurance that such a loan would be forthcoming, Obregon ratified the New York agreement and, on September 29, 1922, the Mexican Congress approved it. The loan was not forthcoming, but none the less the Mexican Government attempted to fulfil its obligations. The military uprising coupled with the general depression brought Mexico to a state of bankruptcy in the fall of 1923, but President Obregon "preferred to drag the administration even deeper into poverty rather than touch the funds deposited in the national bank for payment on the foreign debt." In order to balance the budget he reduced government expenditures by some hundred million dollars and risked the popularity of the Government by levying new taxes. The taxes on oil and on the gross receipts of the railroads are being collected and these funds are being added to the bank deposits set aside for the service of the foreign debt.

An actual balance has not been achieved, however, > partly because of the default resulting from the administration of Adolfo de la Huerta as Secretary of the Treasury, and partly because of the military campaign which, besides being a heavy expense in itself, has left us with troops in excess of those allowed by the budget, the cost of which has been progressively increasing the original deficit.

To meet this emergency the Mexican Government asked the International Committee of Bankers for a short-time loan secured by the oil taxes and other definite sources of income. This loan would make it possible for Mexico to balance its books "and assure the fulfilment of the New York agreement now and in the future."

> In order to judge the value of the security offered by this Government, the president of the International Committee of Bankers consulted the American Association of Oil Producers in Mexico on the prospects presented by the oil industry in our country. This association made a report through its president, Guy Stevens, laying down conditions for the prosperous development of the oil industry in Mexico which revealed total ignorance of our legislation and our political situation. As a result of this report the committee disregarded entirely the copious cablegraphic correspondence exchanged for three months with the Secretariat of the Treasury, in which the conditions for the loan were specifically stated, and finally refused its help, suddenly interpreting the attitude of the Government in a sense which conflicted with the interests involved in the New York agreement.

Denied help from this source, the Mexican Government decided that only harm could come to the country and ultimately to its creditors from allowing matters to go on. And so President Obregon, while pledging himself to continue his efforts to obtain funds from other sources, finally issued a decree in these terms:

> ARTICLE 1. We hereby temporarily suspend payments on the foreign debt—except for the necessary arrangements with holders of the bonds affected—which had been renewed by decree of September 29, 1922, approving the agreement signed by the Secretary of the Treasury of the Government of Mexico and the president of the International Committee of Bankers on June 16, 1922.
>
> ART. 2. This suspension will cease when the balance in the federal treasury is restored, by the use either of the funds set aside for payments on the foreign debt or the proceeds of any loan which may be contracted in the future.
>
> Wherefore, I order that this decree be printed, published, distributed, and duly enforced.
>
> Issued in the offices of the Federal Executive Power in Mexico on the 30th of June, 1924.
>
> Mexico, June 30, 1924 A. OBREGON

England and Egypt in the Sudan

EGYPTIAN troops and Sudanese cadets under British orders at Khartum, Atbara, and Port Sudan mutinied on August 9. The revolt was immediately suppressed but the British Government at once ordered warships from Malta and the Red Sea to the Egyptian ports of Alexandria and Port Sudan and military airplanes from Cairo to Khartum. Relations between Egypt and England, already tense, became tenser. The possibilities of an amicable agreement between Premier MacDonald and Zaghlul Pasha, Premier of Egypt, who recently arrived in France on his way to London, became remoter than ever.

At present the Sudan is governed by an Anglo-Egyptian "condominium" in which the British hold the important official positions and determine policy, and the Egyptians provide the bulk of the army which maintains order. The status of the Sudan was left vague when Egypt was established as a nominally independent kingdom in March, 1922, and has been a source of friction ever since.

The Sudan, the vast territory between Egypt and the equatorial lakes, inhabited partly by Arab and partly by various Negro and Negroid tribes, was conquered by the Egyptians in the early part of the nineteenth century. In the period of Egyptian weakness when Great Britain was establishing her military occupation of Egypt the Mahdist revolt, led by a sort of communist Moslem fanatic, broke out in the Sudan and rapidly swept away every trace of British or Egyptian rule except in the Red Sea ports. The Mahdi and his successor ruled the Sudan from 1882 to 1898, when Kitchener, serving nominally as an officer of the Egyptian army, reconquered the territory. On January 19, 1899, the "condominium" under which the Sudan has since been governed was established. It was there laid down that Great Britain was "by right of conquest" entitled to "share in the settlement and future working and development of the Sudan." Under this regime Great Britain and Egypt held joint sovereignty, authority resting in a British Governor General appointed by the Khedive of Egypt upon the recommendation of Great Britain. His proclamations have the force of law. Each of the districts into which the country is divided is ruled by a British governor, and an advisory council, also British, assists the Governor General. The approximate annual cost of the armies of occupation in the Sudan is estimated to be £1,200,000, of which about £200,000 has been met by the British Government, the remaining £1,000,000 by the Egyptian Government.

The Milner Commission of 1920 expressly excluded the Sudan from its discussions, and in its report stated that its suggestions did not apply to the Sudan, on the ground that the Sudan was "a country entirely distinct from Egypt in its character and constitution." In a letter written by Lord Milner to Adli Yeghen Pasha, then Premier of Egypt, on August 18, 1920, this point was made at some length. One sentence ran: "No change in the political status of Egypt should be allowed to disturb the further development of the Sudan on a system (namely, the provisions of the Convention of 1899) which has been productive of such good results." In conformity with the Milner recommendations the question of the Sudan was expressly reserved in the declaration of Egyptian independence made by Great Britain on February 28, 1922. When the "Declaration to Egypt" was announced to the House of Commons Premier Lloyd George said of the Sudan:

> The combined efforts of Great Britain and Egypt were needed to rescue this vast country from devastation and ruin, into which the Mahdi's movement had plunged it. His Majesty's Government will never allow the progress which already has been made and the greater promise of the future years to be jeopardized, nor can His Majesty's Government agree to any change in the status of that country which would in the slightest degree diminish the security for the many millions of British capital which already has been invested in its development. [Italics ours.] Egypt, on the other hand, has an undeniable right to the most ample guaranties that the development of th· Sudan shall never threaten or interfere with her existing water supply, or with that which she may require in order to bring her own territory under full cultivation. Such guaranties His Majesty's Government will be ready to afford and there is no reason why they should in any way hamper or retard the progress of the Sudan.

The "many millions of British capital" to which Mr. Lloyd George referred are chiefly in irrigation and cotton projects. A dam 200 miles south of Khartum, which will at once irrigate 300,000 acres, is scheduled for completion in 1925. Other vast irrigation projects are under way. Much of the soil of the Sudan is enormously fertile. One large Sudan cotton company, in which the Asquith family is heavily interested, was recently bitterly attacked in the House of Commons, and the charge was made that the Asquith interest had influenced British policy. Under British rule the country has been developed. In 1898 the revenue raised from it was 35,000 Egyptian pounds; twenty years later it amounted to 2½ millions.

The Sudan question remained in abeyance for nearly two years. Zaghlul Pasha, the Egyptian Nationalist leader who was exiled by the British in 1921, and was triumphantly named premier in January, 1924, following his release, planned to go to London last spring to negotiate about its status. Reports that even the Labor Government was not prepared to give Egypt a substantially larger share in the real control of the Sudan, however, caused Zaghlul to hesitate. He demanded further assurances that Mr. MacDonald, in the words of Zaghlul's cablegram of May 11, did not intend "to restrict either the basis or the scope of the discussions." Such assurances were given, but Zaghlul was not satisfied and a series of telegrams followed. Zaghlul asked on June 8 that he be assured that "the fact of his having entered negotiations would not be brought up against him" and that the negotiations "would be free from all restrictive conditions."

This correspondence was interrupted by a debate in the House of Lords on June 25. In the course of this debate Viscount Grey, the former Liberal Foreign Minister, said, according to the Manchester Guardian for June 26:

> It was the British who recovered the Sudan, and the Government should make it clear that the question of the Sudan was one between the British and the Sudanese, and was something in which the Egyptian Government had no say at all. In the question of the Nile water Egypt had a great interest, of course, and here there was a case for a joint commission which would insure that neither Egypt nor the Sudan starved each other of water. It might be wise to appoint an American chairman of the commission. He feared there was an impression in Egypt that we had been on the run. If we intended to stop in the Sudan we should make it clear at the earliest possible moment that we intended to do so.

BALDWIN - PHILADELPHIA

are two words which are known the world over where railways have been built.

Baldwin locomotives are making fine records in railway, plantation and industrial service in Mexico. The illustration shows a heavy passenger locomotive built for the National Railways.

THE BALDWIN LOCOMOTIVE WORKS

Philadelphia, Pa., U. S. A.

Mexican Representative:—PAUL G. CHEATHAM, Engineer, 2 A, Capuchinas 48, Mexico, D. F.

The West Coast of Mexico is today not unlike what California was seventy years ago, and, just as the Southern Pacific's vision of the great possibilities of California has been realized, so will be demonstrated the wisdom of its expenditure of——

$14,000,000.00 for improvements in its existing Mexican facilities and the construction of——

One Hundred Miles of New Track Between Tepic and La Quemada which is to effect a connection at Orendain with the National Railways of Mexico and provide a new and short route from the western section of the United States and the West Coast of Mexico to the interior of the Republic of Mexico. It is expected that the Tepic-La Quemada track will be completed by the end of next year.

Prospectors, Investors and Homeseekers should visit this marvelous country and see for themselves its beauties and resources. It is reached by the Sunset Route and the Southern Pacific Railroad of Mexico. The latter operates through a coastal plain averaging thirty miles wide and seven hundred miles in length. It is watered by fifteen large rivers and various small streams, furnishing an abundance of water for irrigation. The soil and climate are favorable to the production of commodities grown in tropical, semi-tropical and temperate zones; and, by diversification, the land may be productively utilized the year round.

When the new track is completed a scenic route of marvelous beauty will be made available and easy of access for tourists who are more and more seeking new and "different" travel attractions this side of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Write for further information

SOUTHERN PACIFIC LINES

Southern Pacific Lines

New York	New Orleans	Houston	San Francisco	Tucson	Guaymas
165 Broadway	Pan-American Bank Bldg.	Southern Pacific Bldg.	Southern Pacific Bldg.	Arizona	Sonora, Mexico

In reply Lord Parmoor, Lord President of the Council, speaking for the Government, said that

> The Government was not going to abandon the Sudan in any sense whatever. It recognized the obligations that had been taken toward the Sudanese, and it regarded those obligations as of such a character that they could not be abandoned without very serious loss of prestige. No change of status in the Sudan would be allowed or carried through without the authority of Parliament.

This statement caused a tremendous uproar in Egypt. Zaghlul Pasha, after commenting on Lord Parmoor's speech in the Egyptian Chamber, resigned. As reported in the Manchester Guardian of June 30, he said:

> We cannot abandon the Sudan—not because it is a colony, but because the Sudan is a part of ourselves, because it is the source of our life, because Egypt cannot live without the Sudan. Force compelled us to abandon part of it. We evacuated reluctantly, but then took it again at the price of very heavy sacrifices of blood and money. We have spent enormous sums in the Sudan, and are continuing to do so, while a numerous Egyptian army is occupying the Sudan to insure its protection.
>
> Under these circumstances, after all the millions spent, after all the bloodshed, after all the sacrifices made, knowing that our very existence depends upon the Nile, we can never, unless we become a dead nation, abandon to others the slightest part of the Sudan.

He then called attention to the fact that he had repeatedly repudiated the declaration of February 28, 1922. He had said he would resign if he could not negotiate except upon the basis of that declaration, and he proceeded to do so. The Chamber, however, unanimously voted its confidence in him, and Zaghlul, after submitting his resignation to the King, who refused to accept it, was persuaded to remain in office.

The crisis in Egypt naturally precipitated discussion in the British House of Commons, in the course of which Ramsay MacDonald made the following statement:

> I have been hoping that the questions still outstanding between an independent Egypt and ourselves might have been settled in the calm conditions of personal negotiations between Said Zaghlul Pasha and myself. . . . I regret that statements have been made to the Egyptian Parliament and action taken to create trouble in the Sudan which can only be explained as an attempt to force my hand and deprive Zaghlul Pasha of the liberty to negotiate. I was looking forward with pleasure and expectation to a meeting with Zaghlul Pasha and discussion with him on the best interests and accepted responsibilities of our respective countries, and I have desired to say nothing which would have limited the freedom of discussion which we ought to claim. But in view of what has happened, it is necessary that I should make it clear to all concerned that I do not believe that this House would accept any arrangement which would break our pledges given to the Sudan or jeopardize the present administration and development of that country. I believe hearty good-will between Egypt and ourselves is of the utmost importance to both of us, and I still trust that those responsible for the governments of both countries will refuse to countenance the impossible demands which will destroy the prospects of such settlement.

Zaghlul was on his way to London, still in a determined mood, to attempt negotiation in this difficult situation, when the outbreaks in the Sudan led to the dispatch of British troops and warships.

National Railways of Mexico

(Mexican Government Administration)

OUR Lines Traverse Twenty-two of the Twenty-eight States of the Republic of Mexico.

THROUGH Pullman Drawing Room Sleepers and Club-cafe Cars, Serving all meals between Houston and San Antonio, Mexico City and Tampico. Also Regular Pullman Service to other principal points.

THE Mexican Capital, only thirty-four hours from the border, is one of the most fascinating cities on the continent—scenic, picturesque, and intensely interesting. Not the least among its wonders is its marvellous year 'round climate, making it not only famous as a winter resort, but a delightful place for a summer vacation.

THERE are other localities and cities where the climate is just as agreeable and with historic attributes and beauty equally appealing.

OUR Land and Industrial Department is equipped to furnish information on agricultural sections and on large and small properties for sale, and to investigate opportunities for investors. Write for our new illustrated booklet, "Agriculture in Mexico."

J. M. CARDENAS,
General Passenger Agent
Bolivar 19, Mexico, D. F.

L. VALDES,
General Freight Agent,
Bolivar 19, Mexico, D. F.

J. B. ROWLAND,
Land and Industrial Commissioner,
Bolivar 19, Mexico, D. F.

S. W. FISHER,
General Agent,
327 S. La Salle St.,
Chicago, Ill.

F. P. DE HOYOS,
General Agent,
3505 Woolworth Bldg.,
New York, N. Y.

J. B. ALEMAN,
General Agent,
309 Gulf Building,
Houston, Texas.

F. TREVINO,
General Agent,
I-G. N. Bldg.,
Laredo, Texas.

F. N. PUENTE,
General Agent,
681 Market St.,
San Francisco, Cal.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1924 No. 3087

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 227
EDITORIALS:
How "Dangerous" Is La Follette? 229
The Helpless Associated Press 230
A Women's Bloc? 230
Yum-Yum! 231
OPIUM AND ENGLAND. By Ellen N. La Motte 232
NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
Communist Puritans. By Louis Fischer 235
DIRECT VOTING FOR PRESIDENT. By William Hard 236
ENGLAND AND RUSSIA AGREE. By Philip J. Rabinovitch 237
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 238
CORRESPONDENCE 239
LOOK OUT. By Edgar Lee Masters 240
BOOKS:
The American Manner. By Johan J. Smertenko 240
Artifice. By J. W. Krutch 241
An Amateur at Literature. By William A. Drake 241
Down to the Sea in Ships. By Oswald Garrison Villard 242
Books in Brief 242
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Anglo-Russian Treaty 243
Russia's Harvest 245

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 86, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

IN A FAIRY STORY, "The Fortress Unvanquishable Except for Sacnoth," Lord Dunsany tells how the all-powerful magician Gaznak long terrorized the people of Allathurion. None dared attack the demon until the brave Leothric, armed with the sword called Sacnoth, penetrated the fortress and with a single whir of the invincible weapon cut off Gaznak's head. Then Leothric looked around him, "and there was no fortress nor sound of dragon or mortal, only beside him lay an old man, wizened and evil and dead." A few weeks ago the Ku Klux Klan had Americans so terrorized that not one of the national political conventions dared even breathe its name. Suddenly Senator La Follette, wielding the sword Common Sense, boldly attacked the Invisible Empire. Mr. Davis followed presently in defying the Klan, and then the irrepressible Mr. Dawes, unwilling that the Republicans should be left virtually as the party of the K. K. K., added a milk-and-water condemnation. Now it is predicted that even Cautious Calvin Coolidge will fearlessly approach the Klan from behind and twist its tail. Having waited, as in the Boston police strike, until majority sentiment showed itself against the Klan, Mr. Coolidge will probably pose as the upholder of "law and order"—the savior of the country. But let it not be forgotten this time whose was the first blow that crumpled the walls of the Invisible Empire.

MEANWHILE OTHER EVENTS are taking place which may bring it about that this Klan, of whose secret power all the political conventions stood in dread a few weeks ago, will have turned into the road toward oblivion by Election Day. The growth of the K. K. K. has been like a rash on the body politic, subsiding suddenly in one place to break out in another. Quackery and commercialism ruined its hold quickly in the Southeastern States, where it first rose to power. But it subsided there only to become virulent in the Southwestern part of the United States and later in the Middle West. Now the Southwest has had enough of it. The victory of ex-Governor Walton, anti-Klan candidate in the Democratic primary for United States Senator in Oklahoma, has been followed by the still more impressive triumph of Mrs. Miriam A. Ferguson in Texas, the fortress of Klanism in the Southwest. "Ma" Ferguson, who won the Democratic nomination for Governor against the Klan candidate by about 100,000 majority, will thus probably become the first woman head of any of our States. The Nation has all along advocated free speech and a fair field for the Klan, and has condemned arbitrary action against it. We have been persuaded that its bigotry and buncombe could not long endure; that, if not martyrized, American common sense would presently repudiate it. Such a process now seems to be at work.

NEWSPAPER GARBLING with a view to bolstering the editorial position of the journal in question appeared at its worst in the summary which the New York Herald Tribune printed on August 17 of the statement of the Federal Council of Churches in regard to National Defense Day (originally called "Mobilization Day"). The head was:

PUBLIC OPINION RALLIES AROUND DEFENSE DAY
Federal Council of Churches Finds Protests Represent Only a Minority, Its Bulletin Announces WIDE SUPPORT PLEDGED
Delay in Giving Out Full Order of War Department Declared Unfortunate

Below this head was a short account, giving the impression that the Federal Council of Churches justified National Defense Day, whereas a reading of the organization's statement in full carries just the opposite conviction. The report contains the material used in the newspaper, but the latter has so divorced it from its context that it is wholly misleading—and therefore untrue. The Herald Tribune prints a regular feature called "The Truth," in which it says it "will be glad to receive and publish corrections of inaccuracies in its columns." We suggest that it apologize here for its garbled version of the report of the Federal Council of Churches, or else print the document in full.

MOST AMERICANS and many Englishmen thought the Irish question settled by the Anglo-Irish Treaty in 1922. But Ulster and Sinn Fein have not yet agreed to agree. Southern Ireland feels that Ulster's obstreperousness is due to the political machinations of the Unionist Party and the House of Lords; Ulster feels that the Free State has always in mind a united Ireland under the rule of Celtic and Roman Catholic influences. Alternate attempts at a settlement, first by force and then by arbitration, finally culminated in the Anglo-Irish Treaty. Article 12 of that treaty postponed the boundary issue, apparently in the hope that time would bring the two parties together. The hoped-for has not happened. According to the provisions of Article 12 a Boundary Commission has been set up, and Great Britain and the Free State have appointed their representatives. Ulster refuses to appoint a commissioner, apparently fearing to lose the provinces of Fermanagh and Tyrone and the city of Londonderry.

IN THIS IMPASSE the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has ruled that an amendment to the treaty is necessary before Great Britain can act for Northern Ireland. When Parliament convenes it will give first consideration to this question. Already it seems to have aroused all the emotion and bad feeling that Irish problems have always stirred. Conservatives and Liberals who negotiated the treaty are particularly eager that the instrument stand as it is without arousing further the old animosities. They feel, if Mr. Austen Chamberlain can be taken as their spokesman, that Sir James Craig and Mr. Cosgrave should meet and settle the question between themselves. The Boundary Commission would then be used only to ratify their agreement. In the event of failure, the London Nation calls it a clear-cut task for the Cabinet to introduce legislation to enable the Boundary Commission to act. The former method seems the preferable because no legislation is going to coerce Ulster and the Free State into cooperation.

ENGLAND LIKES TO BELIEVE, and to publish her belief, that the opium-using populations of her eastern empire are wedded to the habit and to wipe out the traffic would be impossible. Occasional pathetic appeals from native groups tend to throw doubt on the reality of this situation. In her excellent article in this issue of The Nation Ellen La Motte describes the futile efforts of members of British Malaya to rid themselves of imported opium. At its meeting in July the All-India Congress Committee adopted an interesting resolution showing how the leaders of Indian opinion feel about that particular "necessary evil."

> In the opinion of the All-India Congress Committee the opium policy of the Government of India is altogether contrary to the moral welfare of the people of India. The Congress Committee is of the further opinion that the people of India would welcome the total abolition of the opium traffic for the purpose of revenue, and is also of the opinion that the production of opium is out of all proportion to the medicinal requirements of India.

As long as British governments wax fat off the revenues from opium, they will manage to find reasons why the drug cannot be abolished. The peoples of the East look to the disinterested influence of the United States eventually to lift this load from their shoulders.

SOMETIMES IT SEEMS as if the Monroe Doctrine exists solely that it may be invoked whenever we want to do something shady in Latin America. Take, for instance, the statement of Albert Strauss of the New York banking house of J. and W. Seligman and Company before the Williamstown Institute of Politics that the Monroe Doctrine obligates us to collect a loan due a foreign government in Latin America in case the debtor is delinquent. The argument, of course, is that otherwise the creditor government has an excuse for taking measures against the debtor, the justice of which we cannot question. But the fact is that we need only to promulgate a fair and common-sense doctrine in regard our own debts in foreign countries to deflate completely such specious argument. Our Government does not collect debts or validate bad investments for its citizens here in the United States. Why should it do so when they invest their money abroad? Neither does our Government collect for foreign states or their nationals in this country. It has never reimbursed Great Britain or the British for money lent to various of our States, and not repaid, nor has it recognized the right of Great Britain to collect by force. We are glad to note that Leo S. Rowe, director general of the Pan-American Union, took sharp issue with Mr. Strauss. But Mr. Rowe himself went astray in suggesting that our Government supervise the loans of our citizens to Latin America. As Oscar T. Crosby, formerly Under Secretary of the Treasury, pointed out, this means meddling with, and an indirect control over, Latin-American nations. The only policy for our Government is that of "Hands off."

IF THERE IS PATHOS in the breaking up of a yacht which has defended the America's Cup, there is more still in the sale and intended dismantling of the famous Herreshoff shipyard at Bristol, R. I. For a cup defender is a butterfly that spreads its wings for a summer and dies; it is built for one highly specialized competition, and that over it is virtually of no further use. But the Herreshoff shipyard is the mother of all the America's Cup defenders since 1893, having sent forth in succession the Vigilant, the Defender, the Columbia, the Reliance, and the Resolute to vanquish the challengers first of Lord Dunraven and then of Sir Thomas Lipton. The passing of the Bristol shipyard means the end of the Herreshoff genius in yacht designing, and seems almost like giving away a leg on the America's Cup itself. The Bristol plant was established in 1864 by John B. Herreshoff, who later took in his brother "Nat." The taciturn "Nat" has been considered as having the greater mechanical ability, but John B. was a magician in modeling even after blindness came upon him a number of years before his death in 1915. The gradual decay of the Herreshoffs' business suggests that the same standardization which rules elsewhere is crowding individuality out of yacht building too. The brothers wanted, it is said, to build a challenger for the America's Cup, which might have proved strikingly different from the Resolute and its predecessors, since challenging for the trophy means constructing a vessel to cross the Atlantic under its own sail. But for a generation the Herreshoffs fashioned such perfect defenders that they spoiled their chance to build a challenger.

WITH THIS ISSUE Mark Van Doren becomes literary editor of The Nation, and Joseph Wood Krutch assumes the dramatic editorship, succeeding Ludwig Lewisohn. That valued member of the staff is abroad for a lengthy stay and, therefore, joins the ranks of our contributing editors. We are happy in being able to assure our readers that Mr. Lewisohn's gifted pen will continue to add to their pleasure and enlightenment. Irita Van Doren joins Stuart Sherman in editing the new literary supplement of the New York Herald Tribune. It is a happy reflection of the increasing interest in books that the Herald Tribune is planning to develop its literary department on a large scale and has placed the management in such competent hands.

How "Dangerous" Is La Follette?

IF Mr. Dawes did not exist, it is evident that someone like him would have to be created for this campaign. He gives the needed conservative-swashbuckling touch to the battle. He speaks for the type of mind in the National Civic Federation, the society for the preservation unaltered of our Constitution, for our Rotarians and our simon-pure reactionaries of all descriptions. To him La Follette is, of course, the "enemy," and so all the familiar arguments used by the regular Republicans against Roosevelt in 1912 are once more trotted out. La Follette, Mr. Dawes asserts, is launching a "formidable attack" upon the "fundamental principles of our Constitution." He is "leading the army of extreme radicals, has a platform demanding public ownership of railroads and attacking our courts which are a fundamental and constitutional safeguard of American citizenship." His followers are "a heterogeneous collection of those opposing the existing order of things, the greatest section of which, the Socialists, flies the red flag; and into what? Into confusion and conflict of ideas and ideals."

This causes chills to creep up and down the spine of our good but unhappy friend the New York World, which sees in it "a declaration of class war" and asserts that "a more dangerous, a more foolish, a more unstatesmanlike speech has not been made in our time." Bless the World's sensitive soul! Mr. Dawes has been engaged in nothing else than fomenting class war these several years. Founder of the Minute Men in Chicago, most outspoken and determined upholder of the open shop, advocate of smashing the unions and locking up anybody who dares to believe in any ism except his own—well, what other kind of speech did the World think Mr. Dawes would make? Inconsistency has not so far been charged against him, whatever else may be said. He is only running true to form, and if he could prove his charges they would make ammunition from the Republican Party's point of view. If he can "throw a red scare" into the country by denouncing La Follette as a Bolshevik and a near-anarchist, who keeps bad company and is to be known by it, so much the better.

The only difficulty is that the country shows as yet no signs of alarm. The people know, and many regret, that if La Follette is elected he will no more have a well-disciplined Congress of his own faith behind him than would Mr. Davis or President Coolidge, should they be elected. They know that so far as the courts are concerned they cannot be hobbled unless Congress agrees, and that no fundamental change in the Constitution can be made except by the slow and weary process of amendment. The people are aware that Senator La Follette suggests nothing as to the courts more radical than the recall of decisions, once advocated by Theodore Roosevelt. Moreover, it is not likely that the multitude will find their hair standing on end at the prospect of government ownership of railroads—if and when Congress can be won to it—in view of the fact that our northern neighbor, Canada, is steadily moving in that direction by increasing the mileage of its government-owned railroads. Mr. Dawes will, therefore, do well to dwell upon some other of the "dangerous" features of La Follette's candidacy if he would cause his listeners to have gooseflesh. Let him dwell upon the dangers of a political-labor movement, holding up as an example the administration of Ramsay MacDonald in England (but here he must carefully omit to point out that it is this same Labor Government which has made the Dawes plan possible in Europe). If we must have scarecrows, Mr. Dawes ought to give us some with the power to frighten.

But another handicap is the fact that by no means all of La Follette's supporters are Socialists or radicals. As to that we have some expert testimony from the lips of no less an ally and supporter of Mr. Dawes than Nicholas Murray Butler. Upon returning lately from a six weeks' trip to California, he declared in an interview in the New York Evening Post: "You would be surprised at the number of people who say they are going to vote for La Follette. I don't mean people of extreme radical type like the I.W.W.'s, but those who could be described as solid and substantial." They were, he added, people who had become convinced that neither of the old parties was serving the interests of the country. Hence, they were determined to try a new deal. These "solid and substantial" people are not going to be frightened by Mr. Dawes's scarecrows. A good many of them are going to say frankly that even if it is true that La Follette has as radically dangerous ideas as Mr. Dawes believes, they will chance them in order to put into the White House a man of such shining personal honesty as the Senator from Wisconsin. They know that this cry of dangerous radicalism, plus charges of sedition and treason, has been brought against Senator La Follette in his own State, and that his fellow-citizens there have four times sent him to the Senate, the last time with a majority of 375,000. No, we are not afraid that Mr. Dawes's attacks upon Senator La Follette will seriously foment class hatred or increase the various brands of sectional distrust we now have. We feel that such opposition honors Senator La Follette and that the attacks will react in his favor.

The attention that Mr. Dawes is paying to the La Follette-Wheeler ticket is proof of the strides that ticket is making. Many Republican politicians and newspapers are indifferent to Mr. Davis, but are whetting their knives for La Follette. They know that he is the candidate to be feared, though he has no organization, no machine, few leaders to help him, and next to no money. Without preparation, his campaign is progressing much as did that of the British Labor Party in England last fall. Its supporters have their hearts in it; there are no paid machine hacks among them. Before us lies a printed "political bulletin" of the National Republican League. We read:

> Republicans must learn from experience to meet the campaign attacks of the radicals or suffer defeat. To guide us we have the experiences of Republican candidates who were defeated in Republican States by radical forces, and of Republican workers in those sections. From these we learn many interesting things. The radicals have frequent meetings, and in many instances keep themselves personally poor by giving money with the zeal of crusaders to their cause.

Precisely that zeal of the crusader is giving the Republicans their fear of the La Follette forces. They and the Democrats have not one thing new or hopeful or constructive to offer. It is but the old stupid choice of Tweedledum and Tweedledee. The La Follette ticket alone points the way to a wiser and nobler America.

The Helpless Associated Press

UNDER the by-laws of the Associated Press any member may exercise the right to protest against the admission of any other newspaper owner who publishes in his immediate territory, and that protest is final unless overridden by a vote of four-fifths of the entire membership. No feature of the organization of the Associated Press has drawn more fire than this. It has led to suggestions that all news associations be compelled by law to supply their service to any applicant and to charges that the object of this particular by-law was to build up local news monopolies and make the service of ever greater cash value to the fortunate holder. As other news services have arisen, the charge of seeking monopolistic control hardly lies; none the less this by-law constitutes a great weakness of the Associated Press, renders it subject to just criticism, and is actually hindering its own development.

This last fact has been demonstrated anew by a ballot taken in the hope of overriding the protest rights in Baltimore and Rochester—a ballot taken by mail after a three months' argument for and against the contenders for election. Nothing like this contest has, we believe, ever happened before in the history of the Associated Press. The defender and upholder of the sacred protest right was, comically enough, William R. Hearst. The applicants were high-grade newspaper men, the publishers of the Baltimore Evening Sun and of the Rochester Times-Union. Ordinarily any news service would be only too pleased to enrol among its users newspapers of this fine quality, but Mr. Hearst was, and is, the dog in the manger. He refuses to yield to his rivals in these two cities, and the selfishness and shortsightedness of a minority of the membership of what ought to be an enlightened institution upheld him. Of 900 votes cast in the Baltimore fight 565 favored the admission of the Evening Sun and 335 upheld Mr. Hearst. In the Rochester case the vote was 500 for the admission of the Times-Union to 340 opposed. Since these majorities were not sufficient, Mr. Hearst won.

Now the joke of all this is that this William R. Hearst is the same William R. Hearst who was convicted in 1917-1918 by one court after another of wholesale cheating and of stealing from the Associated Press which he as a member was in duty bound to protect and respect. The evidence laboriously compiled by the Associated Press under the personal direction of Melville E. Stone showed that Mr. Hearst had for years been pirating the news for the benefit of his own news service which he was building up as a rival to the Associated Press. It was confidently expected, after the Supreme Court handed down its decision establishing the vital principle that news may be owned in America by those originating it, that Mr. Hearst would be dropped from membership as unfit for continued association with the organization which he had done his best to injure and from which he had stolen deliberately. But its directors had neither the courage nor the sagacity to take this radical step. Mr. Hearst has since gone on buying newspapers with Associated Press memberships, so that he is today more than ever intrenched within the association.

Of course the Hearst employees who carried on the fight were jubilant, and their comment upon it was characteristically materialistic. They felt that all the members ought to rejoice, "because the decisive result increases the value of their memberships." What is worrying the more thoughtful members, however, is the fact that in the cities of Baltimore and Rochester the news furnished to the Associated Press from those cities is supplied to the entire Associated Press membership only by Mr. Hearst, owner and promoter of a competing news service. It is no wonder that the Associated Press directors voted 14 to 1 in favor of the two applicants. The directors are in a ridiculous position; and all because they had not the moral courage to expel this man when they had caught him in flagrant dereliction. As for Mr. Hearst, he must be laughing in his sleeve if he is not laughing out loud.

This is an untenable position for the Associated Press, and it cannot fail to have far-reaching consequences if determined efforts are not made to change the by-law. For that regulation there doubtless was good reason in the early days of the association; it has protected newspaper owners from the founding of "strike" newspapers—newspapers founded to be bought, as a sort of blackmail. But the issue raised in the Baltimore and Rochester cases is of far greater importance to the welfare of the Associated Press than these considerations. Somehow or other a way out must be found if the Associated Press is not to suffer seriously both within its ranks and in public esteem.

A Women's Bloc?

WITH a sure instinct the National Woman's Party invariably challenges public attention and climbs to the top of the first page of the newspapers. Its latest step is to repudiate all men in politics and to come out for a women's bloc in Congress. It will "do its utmost to elect all women nominees, irrespective of their political affiliations, who seem qualified to sit in Congress and who will support the equal-rights amendment and a general feminist program."

This is good publicity; but we doubt whether it is good politics. The Woman's Party has always consistently followed the policy of supporting one issue at a time. It supported suffrage, and suffrage only, until women had the vote; now it is supporting an equal-rights amendment, and will help to elect only one breed of candidate: women who will support that amendment. But votes are needed for the success of such a program, and the Woman's Party asks the voters of the country to forget too many unforgettable facts. Even the women voters are more than women in these days: they are citizens, many of whom have felt the edge of hunger and the burden of economic injustice; they are workers, farmers, housekeepers, not only females and voters. Can the Woman's Party expect these people to support a Republican candidate because she happens to be pledged to the equal-rights amendment? Can they even ask the women supporters of Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Dawes to vote for a woman running on La Follette's ticket?

Before women had the vote it was possible to argue that all issues must stand aside and wait for the granting of that primary right. But once the vote was won, women walked into the field, their new weapon in hand, ready to fall upon any enemy that happened to look inviting. A large number of the more conservative suffragists found themselves in the League of Women Voters, a nonpartisan body devoted to women's interests and interests deeply touching women—chiefly welfare measures, various reform projects, and peace. This organization avoids violently controversial questions like birth control. It opposes the "whole-hog" feministic policy of the Woman's Party. It takes no stand on general economic issues. It has no policy for or against women in office; it works through the men and the existing parties. It has done much good work, but its caution and political aloofness will prevent it from ever becoming a fighting force.

The Woman's Party on the other hand has remained militant. It is not interested in anything but equality for women. It ignores social and political problems which do not touch its immediate program. It took no cognizance of the industrial problem until it stubbed its toe on the question of welfare legislation—endangered or doomed by the Woman's Party amendment—and then it boldly kicked the impediment out of the way, saying: "If equality means wiping out social legislation affecting women, let the legislation go, and good riddance to it." It hopes that it can keep the attention of voting women as steadily fixed on one object as it could that of disfranchised women. We believe that this is impossible; women are going to vote according to the dictates of class interest and personal interest as well as sex interest. There are other revolutions going on in the world besides the women's revolution.

But we agree none the less that no party, left to itself, will allow women an equal chance. Neither labor nor the farmer nor the business man nor the banker is ready to assume executive and political ability in women. They will steadily, perhaps instinctively, resist any such belief. They will accede to women's demands only so far as they wish to please or placate the woman vote. For every party job, for every political office, for every legal change in the direction of equality, women will have to fight as women. Inside the party organizations the women will have to wage their own battle for recognition and equal rights. But the lines will be drawn inside party lines, not across them.

After all, women are an indivisible part of this country's population; they cannot live under a women's Congress and a special set of feminine laws and economic conditions. They, as well as men, suffer when our government is prostituted, and lose their employment when economic hardship sweeps the country. They, like men, have a vote, and like men they will in the long run tend to elect people and parties who represent their whole interest. To be sure, apart from men, they have a special group interest. The Woman's Party amendment is at the moment the one active national expression of that interest. But, whether it is a good amendment or not, it will never be won by asking women voters to forget they are also human beings.

There is no doubt that a large body of active feminist support will swing to the Progressive ticket this fall. Before La Follette was nominated a "Woman's Committee for Political Action" was working for a new political line-up. For the purposes of the campaign these women have merged with the La Follette organization, but they intend to maintain a separate ultimate identity within the progressive movement until equal representation for women is won. They want women to run for office as generally as men, but they would have them run on a platform of general economic progress. They believe that women must be allied with progressivism if they would be free; and that a new party must adopt the cause of women if it would be progressive. It is too early to say whether this particular group will develop power or importance; but some such alliance of active partisan progressivism and feminism appeals to us as the best hope for the women of the country.

Yum-Yum!

HAS the old-fashioned clam-chowder vanished? This is the question which a correspondent puts to the learned editor of the esteemed New York World. We read:

> In Manhattan restaurants the "clam chowder" has been short of clams for many years and is nothing more than a vegetable chowder.
>
> Down on Coney Island, where clams ought to be plentiful and cheap, the conditions are even worse. The other day I yearned to feast on a real clam chowder with clams. After trying three places I gave up in despair. The first bowl of chowder contained no clams, but I thought I detected the taste of them. It gave me an appetite and encouraged me to further search. My second bowl was composed largely of potatoes and a chunk of tomato with the usual cracker on the side. It was potato soup pure and simple.
>
> I then repaired to a place which some years ago prided itself on its "famous clam chowder." I asked the waiter whether he had any clam chowder with clams. "Yes, sir," was the ready response. But what he brought me was a vegetable chowder. I asked him where the clams were and he replied: "They're all cooked up." And, strange to say, they left no taste or odor or trace.

Editor-like, the big chief of the World prints his correspondent's question, but fails to answer it. So we will. In reply to the mournful query, Has the old-fashioned clam chowder vanished? we answer even more mournfully: "In New York City it never existed." We blush for the palate of the correspondent if he thinks clam chowder can be made merely by the use of clams. Of course it is desirable, as he suggests, that they should be among its ingredients. The tendency nowadays to make clam chowder of dishwater and a pinch of salt is to be deplored from every standpoint except the conservation of our natural resources. But there is another ingredient as essential as clams. Clam chowder should be made with milk.

It is the uniform failure to recognize this that leads us to say that clam chowder has never existed in New York City. The Gotham fashion is to serve a water broth, flavored with tomato and bacon, thickened with chopped potato, and—in times gone by—at least garnished with small particles of clam. Now we submit that even in the generous old days when the particles of clam could be tasted, and sometimes observed with a strong glass, this mixture did not constitute clam chowder.

No, the writer of the mournful letter should ship himself somewhere east of Gotham if he would have true clam chowder. We have never sampled the dish in Connecticut or Rhode Island, but we know it is to be had in Boston and other seaports in the State of the Sacred Codfish. There clam chowder consists of thick chunks of clams stewed in rich milk and swimming side by side with slices of potato and onion, the whole seasoned so perfectly that it is impossible to say with what. And in these parts clam chowder has a delectable competitor. It is fish chowder. Made substantially like the other dish, except with generous hunks of haddock or cod in place of clams, this is a chowder fit not merely for kings but even for movie actors, bootleggers, and other multi-millionaires. For a bowl (a plateful would be mere tantalization) of either clam or fish chowder as they make it Way Down East any epicure would walk, hop, or crawl a mile. When we think of it we are prepared to forgive Massachusetts even Calvin Coolidge.

Yum-yum!

Opium and England

By ELLEN N. LA MOTTE

WHENEVER the opium trade is mentioned one inevitably speaks of England. The two go together, hopelessly intertwined, because for a century and a half England has so closely identified herself with this traffic that there is no way of mentioning the one without of necessity speaking of Great Britain's share in it. The lion's share, unfortunately! A country which stands head and shoulders above all other countries, an outstanding figure in a business which shocks the moral sense of the world! True, other countries have engaged in the opium trade, but not to the same extent, nor are they countries with the same power and prestige. Therefore, however much we may admire Great Britain in many other ways, it is impossible for any one with sincere convictions about the immorality of the opium trade to avoid being called "anti-British." If we are to fight this thing out of existence we shall make no headway by concentrating our attention on the weaker, lesser nations and ignoring the chief offender. And the very moment when the great British Empire frees itself from the stigma which it has deliberately incurred, at that moment will the anti-British argument fall to the ground. But until that happens, we cannot fight opium without mention of its principal upholder.

In the first place, Great Britain has three separate interests in opium. As a producing country, India leads in the world output; as a consuming country, Great Britain has more colonies where opium is eaten and smoked than any other nation; and as a manufacturing country, England plays a great role in the manufacture of morphia, heroin, codeine, which are derivatives of opium. France is a manufacturing country, and permits smoking in her colony of Indo-China; Holland is a manufacturing country, and permits smoking in the Netherlands East Indies; Japan is a manufacturing country, and permits smoking in Formosa. China, Persia, and Turkey are producing and consuming, but not manufacturing countries. The British Empire alone plays all three parts, and has financial stakes of three sorts—as producer, as consumer, and as manufacturer. No other country has more than two forms of direct financial interest; some have only one. It is not surprising, therefore, because of these diverse but extremely lucrative divisions of the trade, that we find Great Britain the chief opponent of its suppression.

Roughly speaking, the world's opium output is as follows:

British India	about	1,500	tons	per	year
Persia	"	162	"	"	"
Turkey	"	250	"	"	"
Balkan States (Serbia, Greece, etc.)	"	157	"	"	"
China (output contraband)	"	?	"	"	"

There is no doubt that China is a very large producer, having backslided since 1917 when poppy cultivation was brought to an end. But China is now betrayed and discouraged. The history of her struggle against opium, continued over a century and a half, is sad reading. Suffice it to say, she now seems to have given up the effort, content to settle down under the tons of morphia being smuggled in to her, discouraged over the open traffic in the foreign concessions, and generally beaten in her futile effort to free herself from this curse. At the present moment it is a favorite argument to point to China's shortcomings as responsible for the world's drug situation, and to say that until China reforms the situation is hopeless. But to expect China to take the lead in opium reform—a country whose sovereignty is reduced to the vanishing-point through foreign aggression, a country that must obtain the consent of a dozen foreign countries for gracious permission to raise her customs dues half a cent—is absurd. This talk about China and her "vast" output smacks of an effort to distract attention from other more powerful and responsible countries. There is, however, no doubt that China's production is very large —the nation today may be likened to a drug addict that has relapsed. The insurgent generals and others raise opium for personal gain and as a means of paying the troops. Little of this opium is exported—it is all consumed within the borders of China. If, however, those European Powers with a strangle-hold on China's finances would allow that hapless country to raise revenues through increased customs dues, China might not have to resort to opium in place of cash. But, no, no protective tariffs to interfere with European trade. And loud complaints on the part of the great Powers that nothing can be done about opium in other parts of the world till China "sets her house in order." Thus the snake swallows its own tail.

Persia, Turkey, and the Balkan states (which produce "Turkish" opium) raise the fine opium used in making morphia and other alkaloids. This output has a distinct value for medicinal use, as the Western world understands that term. On the other hand, Indian opium has no such value, for we are repeatedly told that it is not manufactured into morphia, and is therefore in no way responsible for the morphia and heroin which the drug peddler retails in Europe and the United States. Indian opium, therefore, is a superfluous commodity as far as its medicinal value is concerned, and is produced solely for drugging—for eating or smoking as the case may be. Half of the output is retained in India, where it is sold through thousands of shops licensed by the Government, and eaten in the form of pills. The other half is exported to the "opium-consuming countries" of the Far East—to six or eight British colonies, to the French colony of Indo-China, to the Dutch East Indies, to Portuguese Macao, and to Japanese Formosa. There it is used for smoking. And smoking and eating mean enormous revenue to all these colonial governments. Hence . . .

In India the opium revenue amounts to 3 per cent of the total. But Indian opium, when exported to other countries, yields far richer returns. As a money-getter Indian opium is much more important in the colonies than in the country of its origin. Thus, according to Foreign Affairs (London) for November, 1923:

> In reply to Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, who asked Parliament last session for details of the amount of revenue received by various colonies from the sales of opium, the Colonial Secretary supplied these figures:

PROPORTION OF REVENUE DERIVED FROM OPIUM

	Per cent
Hongkong	22.4
Straits Settlements	45.5
Federated Malay States	16.8
Sarawak	14.
Ceylon	0.75
Johore	34.25
Kedah	38.3
Perlis	44.3
Kelantan	23.5
Trenggannu	37.7
Brunei	14.9
North Borneo	12.3

Apart from this direct revenue opium has another value—it attracts labor. Many of these equatorial colonies depend for their labor supply upon Chinese, Japanese, and other coolies, lured by the prospect of unlimited opium. The general prosperity of certain colonies, the successful working of mines and estates, depends upon imported labor, much of it contract or indentured. Whatever destruction of human life this "prosperity" involves is as nothing when compared to the "prosperity" itself. China's millions can always be drawn upon to replace the waste.

Last autumn one of these British colonies, the Federated Malay States, presented a pathetic little appeal, asking that the opium sales be stopped. As a first step they asked that all the opium smokers be registered and that no new habitués be added, after a certain date, as the old ones died off. In Formosa, Japan is putting down smoking by this system of registration and rationing, and as the mortality among the smokers is heavy—at the rate of four thousand a year—within a few years opium smoking will be wiped out in that country. This petition, presented by 2,000 people in the Federated Malay States, was signed by many opium smokers themselves. They said:

> The opium habit is still sapping the vitality of its votaries in British Malaya . . . wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honor may be pleased to direct that the necessary legislative and departmental steps may be taken to give effect to this gradual total abolition of the opium traffic in the Federated Malay States.

This is the Chief Secretary's reply to this "humble petition," as quoted in the Far Eastern Times:

> GENTLEMEN: The subject of your petition is one of extreme difficulty, and will require exhaustive consideration by all the administrations of British Malaya before a final decision can be arrived at as to the best and most practical means of reducing, or, if practicable, abolishing the trade in opium in these countries. I must, therefore, ask you not to look for anything in the nature of a final official reply from me today to the proposals that you have put forward. I propose, however, to mention for your careful consideration some of the most obvious obstacles that occur to me, in the way of giving successful effect, at the present time, to the apparently simple method of gradual abolition of the opium habit advocated in your petition.
>
> (a) In the first place, there is the instinctive objection of the individual to interference by legislation with his personal tastes and habits, for it must be remembered that although you propose to allow all the known opium consumers in the country today to continue to indulge in the habit for the rest of their lives under license, you do not apparently contemplate licensing future immigrants from China who may come to this country with the opium habit already acquired. Of course, if public opinion is sufficiently strongly opposed to any particular personal habit or vice, it is possible that legislative measures may be effective in putting a stop to it; but one has only to look at the difficulties being experienced in America in the matter of alcohol, and the small measure of success that we ourselves can claim in the matter of gambling, to feel grave misgivings on the subject, especially as I think it must be admitted that the general mass of the population in this country is on a lower plane of education and self-discipline than the masses of America.
>
> (b) Then comes the difficulty of the adequate prevention of smuggling. This would require nothing short of an army of officials under present conditions. For prevention to be effective every package, case, parcel, box, or other receptacle coming from China would have to be opened and exhaustively searched, for the smuggling of chandu (smoking opium) is a notoriously easy matter. Moreover, this country has a very extensive seaboard, a great deal of which is sparingly populated, and opium running into it would be the easiest thing in the world.
>
> (c) The problem of immigrant Chinese coming into this country with the opium habit has been hinted at. This class constitutes a very considerable proportion of our available labor force, and any policy which resulted in materially checking the inflow of such labor into Malaya would be nothing short of disastrous.
>
> (d) Lastly, we have to consider the very serious obstacle presented by the existing conditions in China in the matter of opium production. Unfortunately, there is abundant evidence that the state of affairs in China in this respect has gone from bad to worse. . . . Until China puts her house in order, we are confronted by the facts of an unlimited supply of illicit opium within easy access of our shores, and of a large proportion of our immigrant laborers coming with the opium habit already acquired, and therefore providing a ready market for smuggled opium, or refusing to come at all to a country where they cannot obtain the drug. . . .
>
> I trust, gentlemen, that you will not suppose that in stating some of the difficulties that have occurred to me, I have any desire to belittle your proposals, or the public spirit which has doubtless actuated you in making them. At the present juncture I can do no more than give you a solemn assurance that your petition will receive the careful consideration at the hands of this Government which the gravity of the problem demands.

This reply is illuminating. Although lost in a waste of pious words, the central idea shines out clearly—the necessity of opium as a bait to secure labor. Dr. Connolly of Singapore, a staunch fighter against opium, has said: "Great numbers of Chinese artisans used no opium when they entered Malaya from China, but contracted the habit under the British flag." As to the loss of personal liberty, which the Chief Secretary mentions in his first paragraph, we must remember that England itself has passed drastic anti-narcotic legislation, for its own protection, yet the freest people in the world seem to have made no outcry with this interference with their "personal tastes and habits." China, of course, is being played up to the hilt. China would put her house in order in a minute if she were allowed to. This petition is now before the Colonial Office, in London.

But people in England are awaking at last. One by one they are becoming aware of this opium traffic, which has been shrouded in secrecy for so many years that today not one English person in a hundred (outside of the official classes) knows that such a thing exists. A significant question was asked in the House of Commons on March 24, 1924. "What," asked Mr. Hannon (a Conservative, be it noted), "is the amount of opium shipped from India to Hongkong and to the Straits Settlements in 1923? And what steps are being taken to prevent the smuggling of opium into China?" To which question the Under Secretary of State for India replied:

> The only opium shipped from India to these two colonies is that indented for by their respective governments, which for 1923 amounted for Hongkong to 240 and for the Straits Settlements to 2,100 chests of 140 pounds each (15 and 131 tons, respectively). Moreover, all of it was covered by certificates from the governments of the importing countries, in the form prescribed by the League of Nations, to the effect that the opium was required for legitimate purposes and its importation approved. Opium so consigned to the governments of these colonies cannot be smuggled into China before it has reached the colonies.

Whereupon Mr. Hannon asked: "What are the legitimate purposes embodied in the answer of the honorable gentleman?"

To which no reply seems to have been given.

But here we have a complete exposure of what this "legitimate" use means, and of the sanction of this "legitimate" traffic by the League of Nations. It means the open sale of smoking opium, conducted as government monopolies in these various colonies. It will be remembered that Wellington Koo, in 1921, introduced a resolution before the Council of the League of Nations, asking that opium production be limited to the strict medical needs of the world. At the suggestion of the British delegate, the Assembly of the League changed the wording of this resolution, so that opium was to be produced for medical and legitimate needs. These "legitimate" needs supply the revenues we have noted.

Mr. Hannon's question brings out another point—the value of this system of "import and export certificates" indorsed by the League of Nations. All a government has to do is to fill out a certificate, saying that opium is needed for "legitimate" purposes, and the British Government of India honors this permit, and ships out whatever amount of opium is asked for. All these transactions are "legitimate" under the sanction of the League of Nations.

Now the League must not be blamed too harshly for this peculiar situation. After all, what is the League but the nations themselves? And what can the League do if the nations will otherwise? Is England's opium policy within the League likely to be different from her opium policy outside of it? Look at the make-up of the Opium Advisory Committee of the League—every member of that committee represents a country with financial stakes in the opium traffic. And Great Britain, by reason of her triple interest as producer, consumer, and manufacturer, has two delegates instead of one. Is it any wonder that the League has gone on record as sanctioning opium for "legitimate" purposes, and that this vaunted system of certificates for export and import is merely a device to make the thing look handsomer?

Well, things are rapidly reaching a crisis. Public opinion is being mobilized, and the searchlight is being thrown on this opium traffic. The double standard must go. The Western world is determined to protect itself from the dangers of habit-forming drugs, and it will have to extend this same protection to the Orient. There can no longer be discrimination—one lot of people selected for protection, and another lot set apart for exploitation. And if production is allowed for eating and smoking, inevitably the overflow from that output will filter back and overwhelm us, who pretend to a higher civilization. The effect of dangerous drugs is alike upon all individuals, and no one set of people is immune to their consequences. Either opium is good for us all, or bad for us all. We must either allow opium shops in London, Paris, and New York, or we must give to others the same protection that we demand for ourselves.

In November, at the suggestion of Stephen G. Porter, the League of Nations is calling a world conference on opium and allied drugs. Mr. Porter, head of the American delegation which appeared before the Opium Committee last May, laid before that committee the "American proposals," i. e., that the production of opium should be limited to the strict medical needs of the world, and that all other use should be considered an abuse and not legitimate. The one government that hangs back from the full acceptance of these proposals is the British Government. In India, says the British Government, production for domestic use must continue—the eating of opium, a "valued household remedy," must go on. If the greatest producing country, Great Britain, takes this stand, why should not the other producing countries—China, Persia, and Turkey—follow suit? They will have before them the example of the leading Power of the world. If eating opium by the ton is to be considered harmless in India, why is smoking opium by the ton not equally harmless in other countries? Great Britain has a heavy responsibility toward the rest of the world, and her decision in November will mean either victory or defeat in this fight against opium.

It is a pity that this great international conference cannot be held in London instead of Geneva, for what the opium question needs is publicity, and lots of it. Geneva will afford the minimum publicity and London the maximum. If America was calling an international conference of this character, it would be held in New York or Washington, not Pine Bush, Sullivan County, New York. And compared to London, Geneva is Pine Bush.

The opium problem cannot be ended until the British public is aware of the facts. At the present moment the great mass of that public is in ignorance of them, and of the part their Government plays in it. The opium interests fear, and fear rightly, the raising of a great anti-opium sentiment in England. For English opinion is sound. If it once learns the facts, it will react as any honest, sincere people will react, when it knows what this traffic means.

Contributors to This Issue

Ellen N. La Motte, author of "The Backwash of War" and "The Ethics of Opium," has studied the drug problem in Asia, Europe, and America. She is now in England and will attend the international opium conference at Geneva in November.

Louis Fischer is The Nation's Moscow correspondent.

Edgar Lee Masters, author of "Mitch Miller" and "The "Nuptial Flight," novels, is still best known as composer of "The Spoon River Anthology."

Johan J. Smertenko is a regular reviewer for The Nation.

William A. Drake, formerly managing editor of Vanity Fair, is a contributor of verse and literary criticism to various current periodicals. He will edit the review of foreign books for the new literary supplement of the New York Herald Tribune.

New Morals for Old
Communist Puritans

By LOUIS FISCHER

THE Soviet state is omnipotent and omnipresent. Bukharin, the arch-theorist, contends that this is a transitional phase in the development of Communism toward perfection. The Bolsheviks' professed aim is the reductio ad administratum of the functions of the state; they would make government the traffic cop of the nation but not the all-pervading busybody and touch-everybody-everywhere which it is now in Russia. The transitional period, however, may last long. In default of a world revolution it may project itself beyond the present generation and even beyond the next. And in the meantime it is good Communist doctrine to maintain an Argus-eyed, Herculanean-clubbed state. The Soviet Government is alike an administrator, politician, statesman, merchant, manufacturer, banker, shipbuilder, newspaper publisher, school-teacher, and preacher.

Such a state is the highest expression of the anti-individualism of socialist philosophy. The single simian erectus is nothing; it is the class, the nation which counts.

The citizen lives for the state. Mind and muscle must ever be at its service. A Communist who is a loose liver is an anomaly. There is virtue even in a grain of asceticism and in "morality," not, it is important to note, because luxury and license are sinful and lead to damnation and hell but because the excessive gratification of physical desires, be they for sex or for alcohol, and any over-indulgence of one's selfish mental weaknesses reduce the energy and attention which the individual can offer to the state and to society.

The Bolsheviks do not believe in evolution in the realm of politics; they are revolutionists. Eighteenth and nineteenth-century liberalism tended toward the survival of the fittest. But the essence of the Russian revolution is the protection of the under dog, of the proletarian and peasant who, unaided, would not survive in the unequal struggle with the capitalist and landowner. The function of the Soviet state is to support the oppressed majority against the vested and acquired interests of the economically powerful minority.

The doctrine of the survival of the fittest, translated into every-day life, permits freedom of action, as little restraint as possible, the freest play for nature and human nature. Communist doctrine involves the negation of individual freedom; human nature is discounted in the socialist scale of weights and measures; laissez-faire is replaced by discipline, if need be, by force. Only once did the Communists reveal a liberal vein. It was in their treatment of conscientious objectors during the civil wars. Russia has many sects such as the Dukhobors who are opposed to violence on grounds of conscience. Though the Government was engaged in a death struggle, it respected these sentiments. But in all else, whenever its own interests have been at stake, the state has disregarded the wishes and inclinations of the human unit. Liberty of the individual is not as sacred an ikon as it is in the West. To give economic freedom to the mass is a nobler aim. Thus the Communists would explain and justify (but in my opinion this does not justify) the absence of a free press in Russia and the activities of the G. P. U.

The aim of the Bolsheviks was not merely to overthrow one government and to establish their own. This was a means toward creating a new society. To that extent the Bolsheviks are as presumptuous as most reformers. In 1917 they must have argued to themselves much to this effect: "We are a minority. The majority has not invited us to rule it. But we know better than the majority what is good for it." In the interest of the new society a powerful state was set up. The powerful state was privileged to ride roughshod over the individual. The Bolsheviks presume to tell the individual how to act and how to live. This is the "superiority complex" which is one of the most essential characteristics of puritanism. "I am perfect. Watch me. Go thou and do likewise." The Russian Communists are puritans without religion.

In matters of morals the Communists advocate and agitate but do not use force. Only in the case of members of the Communist Party do they interfere if the individual's actions are likely "directly or indirectly to discredit the party." (Such a phrase permits of the widest interpretation and misinterpretation.) Thus in an article in the Pravda on The Party and Personal Life, O. Zortzeva, an official of the Central Control Committee, writes that "not long ago one of the representatives of the Control Committee in the South asked for instructions to combat the evil of divorce." She cites an instance (and there must be many more such instances) where a Communist was required to explain why he left his wife. He replied he could not live with her because she was unfit to mingle in the society of his new friends and acquaintances. The reply was regarded as unsatisfactory. The Soviet state enforces a most liberal divorce law. But the Communists discourage divorce. Within the party it is looked upon with disfavor.

The war, the revolution, the civil wars have worked havoc with the Russian family. It is perhaps no exaggeration to say that family life is crumbling. Trotzky, who has given more active attention to these questions of personal behavior than any other Communist leader, seeks to reinforce the collapsing buttresses of the family. (It will be recalled that Engels, the author with Marx of the "Communist Manifesto," wrote the "Origin of the Family" to prove that the family was a new, unnecessary, and reactionary institution.) Trotzky urges the "communalization of the family household" so as to "disencumber the family of kitchen and laundry." Take the burden of washing, cooking, sewing, child-raising from the family and "the relation between husband and wife will be cleansed of all that is external, foreign, forced, accidental. Each would cease to spoil the life of the other. . . ."

The family life of most Communist leaders would probably find favor in the eyes of the Bishop of New York, and we can imagine that Cotton Mather, if he returned to the flesh and visited Moscow, would hurry to Trotzky, slap him untheologically on the back, and say, "Thou art a man." There was something ascetic and impersonal in the way Lenin used to live. There is something reminiscent of Christian self-abnegation in Chicherin's, Bukharin's, Ra-dek's disdain for good clothes. A Communist is required to contribute to the party treasury all the salary he earns above $95 a month. And even if his writings bring him a supplementary income he must not spend it for luxuries. The Communists are the shock troops of the Soviet regime. They must be like athletes in training. They must not consume mental and spiritual ice creams and pastries.

Alexandra Kollontai, now Soviet ambassador in Christiania, stands for the utmost freedom in sexual relations. But a review in the official press of her book, "Love Among Laboring Bees," stigmatizes her views on the subject as "prostitution" and "intellectual tomfoolery." "It is imperative," reads the last sentence of the criticism, "to guard against the harmful influence of Comrade Kollontai." This is the attitude which in other countries leads to the appointment of vice censors. Russia, fortunately, is too advanced to subject itself to such a humiliation. Only the lives of Communists are censored. In respect to the great mass of the people the Bolsheviks content themselves with preaching.

Trotzky's sermons will certainly do the people no harm. Russians have barely a trace of puritanism. Take the instance of their famous, many-ply "mother" oaths. Beside them the worst product of the British navvy looks pale. Says Trotzky: "One would have to consult philologists, linguists, and folk-lore experts to find out whether any other people has such unrestrained, filthy, and disgusting oaths as we have. As far as I know, there is no other." The Communists have initiated an anti-swearing campaign. In some factories the workers themselves decided to fine anyone who used an "expression." Wherever one goes, in industrial plants, in beer saloons, in clubs, one sees the colored "Don't Swear" poster. Even in the army, where curses once found their most fertile field, they are becoming increasingly rare.

A Communist should not play cards. A member of the party will not, if he is a good Communist, enter a gambling casino. (The Moscow gambling casinos, incidentally, have been closed by order of the Government.) Newly initiated Communists ask their instructors whether they are to permit their wives to powder their faces. A Communist would hardly come to her office with her lips rouged and even non-Communist workers in many Soviet commissariats feel that it is bad form to use the lipstick. Certainly very few if any women Communists dress to fashion. Most of them dress badly. There are more serious things to do than to mind the clothes on one's back. It is unworthy of a Communist, and Communists think it is unworthy of all Russians, to give too much thought to the flesh. I know a non-Communist Soviet official who likes to carry a cane, but he leaves it home when he goes to work.

There can be no let-up, says Trotzky, in the war against alcohol. The Government has abolished vodka, but the bootleg "samogonka" has replaced it. The police arrest men and women (in Russia most of the apprehended bootleggers are women) but force removes as little of the evil here as it does in the United States. So strong is the drink tradition in Russia that even many Communists indulge in the permissible wines and light beers. But the party reminds its members that they must inhibit such desires. It will not do for the best soldiers of the state and the master-builders of a new society to become inebriated, or lose their heads and time in the pursuit of women, or play cards, or stop to adjust their neckties while the foundations of the structure are being laid.

Direct Voting for President

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

THE La Follette personal presidential platform is for the direct nomination and election of the President.

In the Constitutional Convention of 1787 Gouverneur Morris of New York, representing Pennsylvania, favored electing the President by direct popular vote. He was a citizen of one of the larger States.

It is frequently stated that the Constitutional Convention rejected the idea of a direct popular vote for President because it distrusted the electorate. The debates of the convention, however, show that a distrust of the electorate was a small factor in the matter in comparison with a desire to please the smaller States of the proposed new Union and to dissuade them from believing that the new Union would be dominated by the larger States.

The electoral system as adopted not only protected the smaller States but gave them a distinct advantage. This advantage persists and is the reason why any change to a system of direct popular voting is so difficult.

Nevada chooses three presidential electors—two of them to correspond to the fact that Nevada, like every other State, has two United States senators, and one of them to correspond to the fact that Nevada has one Representative in the lower house of Congress. Nevada at the time of the last census had a population of some 77,000 inhabitants.

New York in the last census had a population of approximately 10,400,000 inhabitants. It chooses two presidential electors for its two United States senators and forty-three presidential electors for its forty-three representatives in the lower house of Congress. It chooses altogether forty-five presidential electors.

Let these figures now be used in calculating the answer to the following question: How many people in Nevada does it take to choose one presidential elector and how many people in New York does it take to choose one presidential elector? The answer will be found to be that twenty-six thousand Nevadans are represented in the electoral college by one elector, while it takes two hundred and thirty thousand New Yorkers to have that same representation.

Or, take a broader calculation, involving a large number of States. Take a calculation involving seventeen States on the one hand and, on the other, the one State of Pennsylvania.

Take the seventeen States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Florida, North Dakota, South Dakota, Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, Utah, Idaho, Oregon, Nevada, Arizona, and New Mexico. Together they have a population of 8,762,000.

Pennsylvania has a population of 8,720,000, the figures being those of 1920. Pennsylvania in the electoral college has thirty-eight votes. The other seventeen States, together approximately equaling Pennsylvania in population, arrive in the electoral college with seventy-three votes.

Now let us suppose that all the 8,762,000 people in those seventeen States are earnest progressives. Will they, because of being progressives, be willing to surrender the present system and surrender therefore the advantage in power which they now have over Pennsylvanians?

If this writer were not fearful of being regarded as a cynic with a low view of human nature, he would say that the answer is in the negative. As a reporter certainly he is bound to say that the answer to such questions has been in the negative in the past.

Andrew Jackson six times recommended the abolition of the electoral college in messages to Congress. The recommendation was not heeded.

In the seventies of the last century, just before and just after the Hayes-Tilden struggle, numerous proposals were brought into the Congress for abolishing the electoral college and for supplanting it by some new system.

The situation then becomes the following:

There are enough small States to prevent the ratification (by State legislatures) of any constitutional amendment diminishing the presidential power of the small States.

Meanwhile in the House of Representatives there are enough representatives from large States to prevent the adoption by the Congress of any constitutional amendment diminishing the power of the large States.

Finally, as for the idea of disregarding States and districts altogether and of electing a President by a popular majority or plurality, nationally considered and nationally counted, it falls before the fact that our Southern States would negative it. They do not wish to have a presidential power based on the number of their voters. They have disfranchised a considerable percentage of their inhabitants. They now have a presidential power based on inhabitants irrespective of whether those inhabitants are voters or not. They therefore will resist—and successfully resist—every effort to introduce a system in which a count of actual voters would determine the relative power of a State in the choosing of a President.

Putting these facts together, this writer concludes that the only sort of new proposal which could command enough support to be victorious would have to embody at least the two following characteristics:

1. It would have to concede to the Southern States a count of presidential votes not by voters but by inhabitants.

2. It would have to establish some kind of set-off in sacrifice between the small States and the large States.

This would lead to the following proposal:

Let the presidential election be held by congressional districts, which are based not on number of voters but on number of inhabitants, and let each district count one; and let that be all of it.

This would not disturb the South. It would indirectly advantage the large States by taking away from the small States the two excess presidential votes which each of them now has to correspond to its two United States Senators. It would also nevertheless indirectly advantage the small States by taking away from the large States their power to be so "pivotal" in presidential elections—a power which they derive from casting their presidential votes not by districts but in solid State-wide lumps such as twenty-nine from Illinois, thirty-six from Pennsylvania, and forty-five from New York.

The small States would cease to be excessively represented and the large States would cease to be "pivotal" and "decisive."

It would seem to be fair as between the large States and the small States; but, if this were a fair world, it would not be necessary to write this article one hundred and thirty-five years after the adoption of the Constitution.

England and Russia Agree

By PHILIP J. RABINOVITCH

(Mr. Philip J. Rabinovitch, deputy chairman of the Soviet Trade Delegation in Great Britain, participated in the recent Anglo-Russian negotiations and was a member of the special committee that drew up the trade treaty. At the time of the signing of the agreement Mr. Rabinovitch was in this country on a short visit, and The Nation availed itself of the opportunity to procure from him an exclusive statement on the significance of the treaty and its chance of ratification. The first publication in the United States of the important sections of the treaty itself begins on page 243 of this issue of The Nation.)

THE deluge of comment in the American press on the signing of the Soviet-British agreement presented a somewhat curious spectacle to one with a European outlook upon things. While it is true that some sober voices were heard in the general chorus, the overwhelming majority of the American periodicals displayed an attitude of uncompromising hostility and wasted precious stores of irony in trying to laugh down an accomplished fact. It was amusing to note with what glee some of the most respectable sheets in American newspaperdom hailed the abortive announcement concerning the disruption of the Soviet-British conference and the breakdown of the negotiations, declaring with an air of finality that no other outcome was possible. When upon the heels of this announcement news came of the signing of the agreement, the same press seized upon the catchword launched by Lloyd George, trying to make of the whole thing a fraudulent "fake" even before the agreement was known here either in broad outline or in detail.

It is hardly believable that in their attitude toward the question of the resumption of normal relations with the Soviet Union the stand-pat newspapers are really voicing popular opinion in America, which cannot but watch attentively the development of the relations between the Soviet Union and Great Britain. The Soviet republics have been accustomed to a similar treatment at the hands of the conservative and reactionary press throughout Europe. But that did not prevent most of the European countries from realizing finally that an existing fact does not cease to exist simply by the virtue of non-recognition, with the result that a constantly increasing number of countries have been entering first into trade relations and then into full normal diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union.

It was not simply a change of heart on the part of the opponents of the Soviet Union which brought about this change in the policy of the Western European Powers, but a realistic economic necessity growing out of the conditions created in Europe since the Treaty of Versailles. The economic rehabilitation of Europe demands the reestablishment of normal relations throughout the Continent, and the Soviet Union is certainly not the least factor in the situation. Those parties and political groups in Europe which did not want to realize this simple truth were finally swept out of office with the result that in many of the European countries power has been gained by the forces of labor which consider the recognition of the Soviet Union as a question of immediate importance. It was for this reason that Premier MacDonald's Cabinet could hardly have afforded to adjourn Parliament for the summer without previously signing the agreement with the Soviet Union. It is for this reason, also, that Parliament may be expected finally to ratify it. It is very doubtful whether the opposition parties will present a solid front against the agreement. The Liberal Party is confronted with the alternative of a serious internal split on the question of relations with the Soviet Union. In spite of Lloyd George's remarks his is but a small following in Parliament. The majority of the parliamentary faction of the Liberal Party undoubtedly assumes a more realistic point of view and, like the good business men that they are, they understand that it is better to forget about the old Czarist Government and to take cognizance of the new forces and the new economic relations which have sprung into existence in the Soviet Union. It may even be doubted whether there is complete unity of opinion on this question in the ranks of the Conservative Party, the representatives of which were the most emphatic in their denunciation of the agreement. Some of the Conservative leaders are realistic politicians and it is unlikely that in the present situation they would fling a gauntlet in the face of the labor forces for the sake of pre-war debts, most of which are of a doubtful nature at that.

The timeliness and expediency of the agreement is moreover emphasized by the actual trade relations which have already been carried on between the Soviet Union and Great Britain during the past three years, in spite of all unfavorable circumstances. Small as the scope of these relations may be at present they show a tendency toward rapid development. The Soviet Union is becoming an important factor in supplying British industries with indispensable raw material. The imports of Soviet timber, oil products, grain, flax, etc., into Great Britain are fast growing. On the other hand, the exports from England to the Soviet Union have been increasing constantly in spite of unfavorable conditions in Russia; with the steady improvement which is noticeable in these conditions the imports from England will increase still more. Putting aside the question of old debts, which can have at present no more than a purely theoretical value, no sensible business man can shut his eyes to the possibilities which are offered by the resumption of normal relations with the Soviet Union.

America is far removed from the Russian republics. The economic significance of the Soviet Union has thus far been little appreciated even by America's most enterprising and far-seeing leaders in business, industry, and politics. The campaign against the resumption of normal relations with the Soviet Union may thus be accounted for. But it is absolutely clear to every one with the most rudimentary knowledge of political and economic conditions that this campaign is only an echo of a remote past as far as Europe is concerned.

The Soviet Union found enough strength to overcome armed intervention and boycott on the part of the Western Powers for seven years, and having been thrown back on its own resources it still had sufficient strength to extricate itself from the state of economic disintegration and to a considerable extent to rehabilitate the country through its own efforts and means. It will continue to do so in the future, recognition or no recognition. Under conditions as they are at present it may be said without any attempt at empty boasting that the longer recognition is delayed by a country the less will be its chance of reaping advantages in the process of reconstruction of the Soviet Union.

In the Driftway

NOT often in the course of a Drifter's serene life is the dust of his desk disturbed by more than the mere echoes of the busy whirl of excitement which is the mainstay of existence to his heavier-minded fellow-beings. But lately he has had an experience and, characteristically, he wants to talk about it. Among the office exchanges which daily rise in mountains of black and white and various shades of yellow came a paper from some far-off village. It was unwrapped, and resting quietly near the crease which ran across the center, lay a small, pale creature known to science and to the well-informed as Cimex lectularius. The little insect was greeted with slight screams and every evidence of unfriendliness. He was not, to be sure, much of a cimex. Days of fasting and imprisonment and jolting about in a fourth-class mail bag on the weary journey from Ohio to New York had told upon him, and his frame was gaunt and of a pallor unknown to the Drifter's experience.

* * * * *

LET us hurry to his ultimate disposal. Be it said that it had the virtue of speed, and was altogether lacking in any vulgarity or demonstrations of approval among the staff who were present at the event. The newspaper in which he had made his last journey to this unfriendly bourne was his shroud—the waste-basket his mausoleum. And after all was over and the slight shudders had subsided, the Drifter sat down behind the piled-up exchanges and reflected. What, had there been opportunity for expression, would have been the feelings of the little cimex, betrayed on the hearthstone of this self-styled stronghold of peace among men and beasts—destroyed on the very shrine of charity for all and malice toward none? Well for those that dealt him death that he could speak no warning word. But the Drifter has fears born also of experience. That cimex will rise again. He will rise, phoenix-like, from his waste-basket. He will appear—or some other very like him—and terrorize those sinful hypocrites. He will ride with them in subways, and will walk with them into their offices when they little suspect it. He will haunt their sleeping hours and make of their couches a race course. Let them beware! The cimex has weighed them in the balance, and has found them very badly wanting.

* * * * *

ON the other hand the Drifter has been considering the case of the angle-worm—Lumbricus terrestris is what the dictionaries call him—lately the subject of Mr. Heywood Broun's morning moralizing in his newspaper column. Lumbricus has won a glorious victory, and his tribe—so far as Mr. Broun is concerned—may go on increasing until the last trumpet. For Mr. Broun has reached the brave conclusion that it is inhuman for fishermen to bait their hooks with squirming segments of still living wormhood. Of course it is, and the Drifter has nothing but praise for his distinguished fellow-columnist. But Mr. Broun, in his zeal for the comfort of the worm seems to have rather forgotten about the fish. At any rate he dismisses him with a few curt thoughts, which he says he has from other anglers—to the effect that a fish doesn't much mind being caught. Rubbish! Does Mr. Broun think it's a picnic for a fish to swallow a sharp, barbed hook that hacks its way through the walls of its throat? Does he imagine that a fish really likes to be pulled up out of a cool, quiet lake and dangled off the end of a piercing steel while it struggles madly to tear free? Everyone knows that a fish takes things harder than a worm. He is higher in the animal scale and consequently is more sensitive. Two minutes of suffering in a fish's life are worth twenty in a worm's.

* * * * *

BUT the Drifter thinks he understands, and his pleasure in Mr. Broun's altruistic behavior toward the angleworm is a little clouded. For while Mr. Broun says he has discovered three or four foods that are just as delectable and just as efficient as a worm for luring the timid fish, he seems as yet to have found no adequate substitute for the fish itself. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

La Follette Up to Date

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I note that William Hard in his article Wisconsin and Socialism omits the fact that Senator La Follette favors public ownership of the nation's water-power and of the transportation systems. How does he reconcile these steps with the enlightened individualism which he says La Follette and La Follette's Wisconsin exemplify? Is Mr. Hard satisfied with Wisconsin as it is today under the reign of what he calls individualism? Is the State University any freer than the University of Chicago or Johns Hopkins? Are public utility rates in Wisconsin cheaper than in Pennsylvania, the home of Penroseism? Were there fewer rapes upon civil liberty in Wisconsin during the war than in Texas or Alabama? Are farmers better off than in Minnesota, the much-bossed State? Or are cooperatives more successful in Wisconsin than in Minnesota? As a resident of both Wisconsin and Minnesota, I answer No.

Besides being a brave and exhilarating figure, Senator La Follette also attracts luster to his name by reshaping a policy of regulation held for thirty years to meet new conditions. Isn't public ownership the best form of regulation of monopoly? It can't be worse than the present inadequate system of commissions.

Minneapolis, Minnesota, August 20 M. H. HEDGES

A "Bigoted Protestant"?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: While the Democratic convention was in session Governor Smith was reported to have made a plea for religious toleration. That is precisely what the Protestants ask for—to live and let live. They would be highly pleased to have Governor Smith make that plea in Rome, where the Pope is constantly protesting against the presence of Protestants. It would be interesting to see what would happen if he should make the plea in the Vatican.

The great trouble with those who are constantly denouncing "bigoted Protestants" is that they are insincere or have failed to draw a distinction between religion and politics. If there is an indisputable fact of history it is that the Catholic church is a political as well as a religious organization. It is less political today than in former years, not because of any change of heart, but because of the force of circumstances. It has always fought desperately to hold its political power and doubtless would regain it today if it could. The supremacy of the church over the state is a fundamental tenet of Catholicism. Yet when Protestants, who brought about the separation of church and state, seek to oppose the elevation of members of the Catholic church to political power they are denounced as "bigots"!

I am no Klansman. I have no patience with the organization. But those who are denouncing it as an organization based on religious intolerance would do well to draw a distinction between religion and politics. I am a Methodist, yet would vote for a really capable Catholic for public office provided I could be sure that he repudiated the political program of his church, as some of them do. But I will never vote for a Catholic who upholds the political tenets of his church, any more than I would vote for a Methodist who was seeking to use the church as a machine to promote his political ambitions, to say nothing of one running on a platform, secret or avowed, proposing to use the state to promote the interests of the church. If that makes me a "bigoted Protestant," why, in the words of Patrick Henry, "make the most of it."

Fayetteville, Arkansas, August 15 DAVID Y. THOMAS

Child Labor and Congress

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A child-labor amendment to the Constitution was recently proposed to Congress by a large majority. The amendment provides that "the Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under eighteen years of age." This amendment is unpatriotic, disloyal, and revolutionary. It is revolutionary because no such power has ever before been given to Congress—because it proposes to introduce into the Constitution governmental powers foreign to it, which would deprive the people of the States of local self-government and transfer it, so far as the people of the States are concerned, to foreign hands. Our fathers won by the revolution absolute and complete self-government for the people within the States. They gave up to the Federal Government in the Constitution those powers, and those powers only, which were absolutely necessary to establish and maintain the Federal Government.

Even the Eighteenth Amendment did not give Congress the power to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, but declared that they should not be manufactured. We, the whole people, declared a fundamental principle but extended to Congress no additional powers. If our liberties as a people are ever lost, it will be by giving up the principles recognized in the Constitution, which maintains complete local self-government, with sufficient power in the Federal Government for self-preservation and self-government. To say by amendment that persons under eighteen years of age should not be employed in factories employing more than twenty-five persons would follow established plans of amendment and would, perhaps, be no more subject to objection than would be the prohibition or woman-suffrage amendment. But to empower Congress to restrain, regulate, or prohibit is foreign to the purpose of the Constitution.

Minneapolis, Minnesota, July 15 S. R. CHILD

A Campaign Contribution

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: From my address book I have drawn off fifty names. If these persons read The Nation for the balance of the year—or at least until election is past—it may make some votes for La Follette and Wheeler and add some names to your subscription list.

I am inclosing a check for $50 and hope you will think it enough to cover the cost—or send as many as possible of these, for as long as you can, for the money.

Minneapolis, August 12 J. W. G.

Look Out!

By EDGAR LEE MASTERS

Gentlemen! You who are statesmen and judges,
Legislators, orators, and makers of political platforms;
Guardians of order and the republic,
Heralds of new civilizations in the name of pure moralities,
Great freedoms, ancient and eternal truths—
All of you serious minded, very able, and well-known artificers
For business, but for clean business, of course;
For justice, as you define it;
For liberty, as you define it—
You, in short, who are running us, and the country,
Don't look down on us the poets, novelists, musicians, and such Too contemptuously.
Neither let your self-sufficiency ignore us entirely
As mere dreamers, triflers,
Or worse as ungodly frivolers.
For remember! We are busy, we are among you taking notes.
We are radios, cameras, soul chemists,
Testing and distilling you and your vaunted performances.
And now! Can you tell me who was President
When Edgar Allan Poe died in Baltimore,
After certain politicians got him drunk,
And then voted him in every precinct in that city?
What, gentlemen! Is your memory stumped as to one of your very own?
Very well! I will help you!
Zachary Taylor was then President. . . .
Even so! Zachary Taylor, the owner of one hundred slaves
In New Orleans!

Books

The American Manner

The Best Short Stories of 1923. Edited by Edward J. O'Brien. Small, Maynard and Company. $2.

Brothers of No Kin. By Conrad Richter. Hinds, Hayden and Eldridge, Inc.

The Heir. By V. Sackville-West. George H. Doran. $2.

The Elephant Man and Other Reminiscences. By Sir Frederic Treves. Henry Holt and Company. $2.25.

IN comparing Mr. O'Brien's American anthology of short stories with his British collection a reviewer came to the rare and rapid conclusion that it lacked the homogeneity of the latter volume, and as proof he cited the titles, titles breathing of strange, foreign plots and places, which represent the Jewish and German, Irish and Scandinavian, English and half-breed authors. The evidence is revolutionary and overwhelming. Like all great inventions, this simple means of judging the character of books will transform literary criticism even to the extent of disclosing Shakespeare's Italian and Milton's Romano-Hebraic ancestors. Nevertheless, those who would still pursue the old-fashioned method of determining the nationality of a book by reading it will agree that this year Mr. O'Brien's book has an inner unity which most of the previous volumes have lacked and which can be described only by the word, American.

In the first place there is the American manner. Whether in Mr. Stimson's By Due Process of Law, which is written in the dull, lumbering, eighteenth-century style of Charles Brockden Brown and James Kirke Paulding, or in Mr. Adams's Way for a Sailor, which is jotted down with the 1923 post-expression fire and frenzy, there is the smack of American concoction. For in the American tradition a short story is first of all a story; it is comprehensible, self-sustaining, and, above everything else, complete. And it is complete with a finality that extends beyond incident to thought and mood and moral. We are not left with a sentence like Chekhov's "There is no understanding of anything in this world!"; we have no stories without an end; we are not challenged to carry on the problem, to project a character, or to solve the mystery of life. Hence it is of no small significance that, whatever may be the art form in the lands of their forefathers, Sherwood Anderson and Konrad Bercovici, John Cournos and Theodore Dreiser are as much part of this tradition as Irvin Cobb, Solon Stewart, and Harry Leon Wilson. The deduction here is simple: our best work in the short story loses as art what it gains as a social document, and while our writers seldom inspire they almost always inform.

It is, then, of enormous importance that this information is now given honestly and that the social documents have grown trustworthy. No longer can it be said of those authors who are worth discussing at all that, like Martin Eden, they are shuffling the seven standard plots and playing with the wooden puppets of a shopgirl's Elysium; today they are dealing with genus homo in all his natural manifestations and in his native haunts. Moreover, there is a further unity of content in the stories of Mr. O'Brien's volume. Be they humorous as Flora and Fauna or rhapsodical as Way for a Sailor; be they evidentiary as the work of Miss Suckow, Mr. Goodwin, and Mr. Dreiser or cynical as the tales of Miss Ferber, Mr. Cobb, and Mr. Cournos; whether mystical as The Man's Story by Mr. Anderson or romantic as Seed by Mr. Bercovici, all these stories are concerned with the study of character in an unpleasant and trying, if not actually antagonistic, environment. They take the measure of an individual as a social being and in doing so depict society as well as paint a portrait. Naturally much of this unanimity is due to the personal preference of Mr. O'Brien, who chose his material from more than a thousand stories, but the fact remains that he was able to gather the greatest contemporary names between the covers of his book.

Beyond doubt My Old Man by Ernest Hemenway, to whom the volume is dedicated, is the finest story of the collection, although Jean Toomer's Blood-Burning Moon and Fannie Hurst's Seven Candles might have challenged this ranking had the latter been less smartly theatrical and the first less frankly imitative of Holiday by Waldo Frank. Mr. Hemenway's portrait is a Rembrandt study, rich of color yet subdued, shadowy in background yet clear in outline. And it releases the creative imagination of the reader in these last sentences:

> "Well Butler got his all right."
>
> The other guy said, "I don't give a good goddam if he did, the crook. He had it coming to him on the stuff he's pulled."
>
> "I'll say he had," said the other guy and tore the bunch of tickets in two.
>
> And George Gardner looked at me to see if I'd heard and I had all right and he said, "Don't you listen to what those bums said, Joe. Your old man was one swell guy."
>
> But I don't know. Seems like when they get started they don't leave a guy nothing.

Now, Mr. Richter, as his editors have kindly pointed out, "is of German, French, and English blood, and his ancestors fought on both sides of the American Revolution." And the aforementioned reviewer would find his titles—The Laughter of Leen, Bad Luck Is Good Luck, The Sure Thing and Swanson's "Home, Sweet Home"—one hundred per cent American. Yet his stories, praised be the Muses! are no more American than the Ford car. They are a standardized product that is being manufactured and assembled in every corner of the earth and they appeal equally well to the bourgeoisie of all nations. What pale slavey doesn't dream that the locomotive engineer will blow "Home, Sweet Home" for her; what pimpled bank clerk doesn't imagine himself a hero to his president; what green grocer wouldn't marry a golden-haired maiden who laughed while her heart was breaking?

The tales of Miss Sackville-West, infinitely more suave, subtle, and civilized in execution, are perilously near that standardized quality in conception. To be sure, in Patience she not only rises above the international Richters, but also above most of the work in the O'Brien volume; but that story is her own high mark which the others do not begin to approach. They are too obvious. Her denouements can always be anticipated and her skilful writing is not sufficiently opaque to hide the machinery of plot.

It is the machinery of plot that mars the narrative of Sir Treves. These incidents taken out of a surgeon's case-book offered an unequaled opportunity to portray life in the raw, and the writer muffed it. With the exception of The Old Receiving Room, which is like a battle scene of Delacroix in its frank, repellent beauty, the author's subjects are the unusual slices of life that are false to life because they have a beginning, a middle, and a logical end. As such, they fall into the class of commonplace fiction—banal, sentimental, and dull.

JOHAN J. SMERTENKO

Artifice

The Tattooed Countess. By Carl Van Vechten. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THERE is a kind of romance, midway between sentiment and cynicism, which no American has ever yet written well. In stories of true love we have long been at home, and lately we have come to treat the drama of illegitimate passion without the more obvious sort of moralizing. But the latter is still, with us, a matter too serious for sentiment, and we are still too little familiar with it as an accepted social institution to take it lightly. It must be great and overwhelming before it can justify itself in our eyes, and though we have got to the point where we can read and admire Schnitzler, for example, his spirit is still too strange for us successfully to imitate him. We cannot, as he can, find in loves which are merely light a graceful charm; nor do we catch, as he does, from unions which are merely passing, half mercenary and half mocking, a delicate and wistful fragrance. Passing as we just have from the age of innocence into the first excitement of disillusion we still look for great passions, legitimate or illegitimate, and we have not come yet to the point where, like some of the older, wearier peoples, we can accept sex and gallantry which are veiled only by exquisite manners as the most that man can well expect and as having in their own consciousness of their incompleteness a wistful charm.

It is this fact, perhaps, which explains the comparative failure of "The Tattooed Countess." Mr. Van Vechten has wished, I think, to write a completely sophisticated novel, and he has certainly chosen a completely sophisticated plot, telling of an American countess who leaves Paris in middle age and returns to her native village in Iowa in the hope of forgetting there a love affair with a provincial opera singer. When she, snatching at love once more as her youth ends, becomes passionately enamored of a village boy, and when he, not because he fails to realize the temporary nature of his love but because he sees in her an escape, runs away with her to Paris, Mr. Van Vechten means that we shall see these actions not as mean but as wise. And so, indeed, Schnitzler could make them appear. George Moore, too, might make these people human and real, but Mr. Van Vechten is, in spite of all his efforts, not European enough, and try as he will he cannot, except at moments, vivify his people. In spite of all his grace of style and his wit the book is hardly more than a very clever stunt, an effort to capture a spirit which the author admires, but which he has learned instead of finding bred in his bones.

Various defects might be pointed out. It might be remarked, for example, that the author's knowledge of the world is too obviously paraded, that many tricks of style, including the use of strange words like "sciapodous" and "egrimoncy," give sometimes the impression of intolerable preciosity, and that the solemn references to fashionable places and things amount sometimes to snobbery. But most serious of all, perhaps, is the fact that, like nearly all Americans who are "advanced" in their literary ideas, Mr. Van Vechten suffers from the Main Street complex. Having brought the countess and the boy together he cannot resist the impulse to do a thing absolutely fatal to the non-moral romance, namely, to attempt to justify them. He must prove, what no thorough sophisticate would dream of thinking worth his while, that the life of the village is narrow, bigoted, and morally worse than the great world, and as a result we are treated to one more description of the sewing circle and the gossip party, the speech of the booster and the pronunciamentos of the villagers on the subject of art. The result is a mixture of styles which not even Mr. Van Vechten's skill can hold together. Indeed it is not difficult to detect three manners and to suspect that the mood of the book changed as the author wrote it. The fantastic title seems to belong to the opening portion, which is written in the style of rather extravagant satire; next comes the homely realism of the Gopher Prairie school of fiction, and finally the drama of disillusioned passion.

In spite of the fact that there are not infrequent passages of wit and that, as a whole, the book is amusing reading, it remains one which obviously did not grow but was made, and its artificial character is revealed by many things, including, for example, the rather clumsy documentation which leads the author to mention, one would guess, at least two hundred names of books, authors, pictures, etc., and to rely to a preposterous extent upon the opinions of his persons upon works of art to illustrate their characters. He has proposed to himself the writing of a certain kind of novel, highly sophisticated and stylistically elaborate, but the essentially literary character of his inspiration is evident in almost every line, and he has produced a book which seems constantly more in contact with other books than with life. Mr. Van Vechten wishes more than anything else not to be a moralist, and yet there is no emotion or opinion in all the novel which seems quite so personal and deep-rooted as his moral indignation against the village.

J. W. KRUTCH

An Amateur at Literature

Critical Ventures in Modern French Literature. By Arnold Whitridge. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.75.

A RATHER skimped volume of literary criticism, "padded out" by all the expedients of spacing, margining, and thick paper known to the printing trade, with a title at once banal and misleading, selling at half the price usually assessed for such a work, and containing the opinions of a gentleman wholly unknown at least to one reader on nine French writers, only three of whom can be regarded as talents of the first order, is not a bait likely to arouse the reviewer to a high pitch of excitement. But when one discovers in such an unpromising setting the most sympathetic and illuminating paper he has ever encountered on so generally misunderstood and maligned a character as Sainte-Beuve, one may be forgiven a certain thrill of discovery.

I suspect Mr. Whitridge of being an amateur at literature. At least, though certain of these essays appear to have been published in periodicals before their presentation in a book, they were quite obviously not written with the primary purpose of sale; and they possess a freshness of touch, an intimacy of realization, an absence of literary subterfuge and critical cliché, and a leisured enjoyment in the writing that is not common in the literary profession, as literature is practiced in this ambitious generation. Charles Lamb was such an amateur; Michel de Montaigne was another; and Lorenzo de' Medici was the prince of them. It is to such talented amateurs that we owe the survival of our arts through many a difficult period.

Mr. Whitridge has, as I have observed, written an essay on Sainte-Beuve that is both delightful and instructive. It is also especially notable for the tact with which he disposes of the question of the French critic's unfortunate infatuation for Madame Hugo and his subsequent bad taste in publishing a highly romantic account of it to the world in his volume of poems, "Livre d'Amour," and his novel, "Volupté." The essay on Anatole France, in which the great master is portrayed, not as an ironical Aristophanes, but as a kindly old gentleman with a vast human sympathy and an almost sentimental regard for literature, is similarly engaging, by reason of the same cardinal virtues of understanding and tact. Mr. Whitridge is not so much concerned with the written word as he is with the man; and he cares not at all what might be his "place" in literature. The result is a satisfying and pervading charm.

The essay on Stendhal is interesting, but not notable; I take it that Mr. Whitridge has caught himself nodding over "Rouge et Noir" and is honest enough to confess it. Gerard de Nerval, the eccentric "sanitist," who took his own life that he might discover what passes beyond the veil, proves a more happy choice. Barbey de Aurevilly and Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, both dandies and both unquenchable romantics, also provide him attractive subjects for this intimate and sensitive criticism. His choice of Marie Lenéru among the figures of our own time is almost as felicitous; and the paper on Sacha Guitry is the only one in the book that one feels ought not to have been preserved.

WILLIAM A. DRAKE

Down to the Sea in Ships

Before the Mast and After: The Autobiography of a Sailor and Shipowner. By Sir Walter Runciman. Charles E. Lauriat Company. $4.50.

THIS is a delightful human narrative of irresistible attraction for all who love the sea as well as true stories of adventure and daring. Walter Runciman, grandson of a veteran of Nelson's fleet, son of a ship's captain, ran away to sea at twelve and rose to the command of ships at as early an age as did Marryat's heroes one and all. When the end of the sailing era came Runciman switched over to steamers, and after some very fortunate years as captain and manager laid down his command because of ill-health and went ashore to begin a phenomenally successful career as owner of steamers which won him wealth, fame, a "handle to his name," and great political and business influence—he sat in Parliament with his only son, the Right Honorable Walter Runciman, member of several Liberal governments. No romance written of nineteenth-century sea conditions ever had more stirring material. But that is not all. Every American who is concerned with the problem of building an American merchant fleet ought to read this volume because it explains better than all the dry treatises on the rise of the British merchant sea-power how English sailors won and have kept their mastery of the sea. It ought among other things to make Americans realize that the training of craftsmen to navigate and handle a fleet both as sailors and owners is even more important than the building of a fleet.

Sir Walter himself appears in this volume as an interesting mixture of an advanced liberal and a conservative. Against the Russians and Socialists and all who "whine" about the bad social conditions he rages in true big-business manner. As one who rose from the forecastle he rather glories in the old and brutal methods of managing crews—at least he half defends them, though he is careful to set the seal of his emphatic disapproval upon the methods used on Yankee ships, which, to our shame be it said, have given American captains and mates the reputation of being the most brutal and murderous of any who ever sailed the seas. On the other hand, Sir Walter appears as the ardent champion of Havelock Wilson, the militant head of the Seamen's and Firemen's Union, to combat which the Shipping Federation was formed. As is so often the case, the owners fought Wilson without getting to know him or understand him. Sir Walter did both, came to like and respect him, and even, to the horror of his associates in the business, presided at one of Wilson's meetings. In this, too, there is a valuable lesson for American shipowners. It is significant, also, that Sir Walter admits that not one single reform of the many that have been achieved in the fight to transform the forecastle into something better than a floating hell came from within the trade, but in each instance was forced by rank outsiders who had, with one exception, never been to sea. This should interest those who believe that human institutions, political, social, and economic, can only, or can best, be reformed from within.

Finally, if Sir Walter writes with much naivete and complete appreciation of his success in life, he nevertheless gives a portrait of a fine type of man who succeeded by his own merit, and he proves anew that neither the day of steam nor of the Diesel engine can rob the sea of that romance which will inure to it just as long as men go down to it in ships, whatever their size or shape or methods of propulsion.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Books in Brief

The Principles of Journalism. By Casper S. Yost. D. Appleton and Company. $1.50.

An innocuous volume by the president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors which adds nothing to the existing literature on journalism and is devoid of any new or striking thought. Cautious throughout, it deals in generalities where the specific issues which confront the journalist today might to good advantage have been discussed. It should get a handsome reception from the daily press.

Love Days. By Henrie Waste. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

The story of Suzanna Moore's "love days" is the tale of a woman's search for the ideal man; and it is a work of pure imagination. Promenading her characters through various cities of the world, the author seems to have had multiple points of contact with life, but no points of penetration or comprehension. We are familiar enough with the conscious revolt against realism; but this book is apparently an unconscious revolt; experience and fact are shaped to fit some a priori conception of existence, and the result is pure fantasy produced in accordance with precise realistic methods. As to the mental processes revealed in the book, Turro stated the case quite neatly when he said to Suzanna, "when you are theoretical you are a little too naive to be quite bearable." And Suzanna herself perceived something of the truth when she confided in Ewart that she was like a country with a highly internal development but without any foreign policy, "quite without any conception of one's relation to the outside world. . . ." The heroine is not the only character in the book who furnishes uninterrupted amusement to the reader; and we should, perhaps, thank the author for this. "But then," as Professor Saintsbury has put it, "the farce must be in life conceivable and in literature conscious."

I'll Show You the Town. By Elmer Davis. Robert M. MacBride and Company. $2.

An hilarious story for the tired business man's vacation. Innocent, impressionable heiresses are so gloriously abundant that they fairly clutter up the sidewalks. Male rivals are correspondingly scarce. The only depressing passages are those in which the bachelor reader bitterly realizes how little resemblance the story has to actual life. Entertaining as the book is, it would have been uproarious perfection itself had it been condensed to two-thirds of its present length.

International Relations Section

The Anglo-Russian Treaty

IN this issue and the next we print the most interesting sections of the treaties recently signed at London by representatives of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics and of the British Government. In doing so we omit for reasons of space chapters I and II, which cover the following points: treaties recognized by the two parties as having lost their force, treaties regarded as still in force, multilateral treaties to be applied in the future as between the two parties, provisions regulating fisheries in water contiguous to the northern coasts of the Soviet Union. In our next issue will appear the text of the trade agreement which forms a part of the general treaty. The plenipotentiaries signing the treaty were

For Great Britain and Northern Ireland:

The Right Honorable JAMES RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P., First Lord of the Treasury and Prime Minister, Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs;

Mr. ARTHUR AUGUSTUS WILLIAM HARRY PONSONBY, M.P., Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs;

For the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics:

CHRISTIAN GEORGIEVICH RAKOVSKI, member of the Presidium of the Central Executive Committee of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Deputy People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, Chargé d'Affaires in London of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics;

ADOLPH ABRAMOVICH JOFFE, member of the Central Executive Committee of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics;

ANDREI FEDOROVICH RADCHENKO, member of the Central Executive Committee of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, president of the Provincial Council of Trade Unions of the Donetz Basin;

ARON LVOVICH SCHEINMANN, member of the Collegium of the People's Commissariat of Finance;

MIKHAIL PAVLOVICH TOMSKI, member of the Presidium of the Central Executive Committee of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, president of the All-Russian Central Council of Trade Unions.

CHAPTER III. CLAIMS AND LOAN

ART. 6. In pursuance of the declaration annexed to the trade agreement of March 16, 1921, the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics declares that by way of exception to the decree of January 28, 1918 (concerning the annulment of debts of the former Imperial and Provisional governments), it will satisfy, in the conditions prescribed in the present treaty, the claims of British holders of loans issued or taken over or guaranteed by the former Imperial Russian Government, or by the municipalities of towns in the territory now included in the Union, payable in foreign (non-Russian) currency.

The Government of His Britannic Majesty recognizes that the financial and economic position of the Union renders impracticable the full satisfaction of the claims referred to in the preceding paragraph of this article.

The Government of the Union agrees to meet the claims referred to in the first paragraph of this article in respect of holdings by British subjects or companies other than holdings which were acquired by purchase since March 16, 1921, and were in other than British ownership on that date.

After negotiation between the parties concerned, the terms on which the claims referred to in the first paragraph of this article shall be satisfied will form the subject of an agreement with His Britannic Majesty's Government, which will be included in the treaty referred to in Article 11, provided that His Britannic Majesty's Government is satisfied that such terms have been accepted by the holders of not less than one-half of the capital values of British holdings in the loans referred to in this article.

ART. 7. All questions connected with the claims of the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics against the Government of His Britannic Majesty, or with the claims of the Government of His Britannic Majesty against the Government of the Union, arising out of events which took place between August 4, 1914, and February 1, 1924, are reserved for discussion at a later date. This provision includes claims in respect of:

(a) War loans advanced by the Government of His Britannic Majesty to the former Russian Imperial or Provisional governments;

(b) Gold belonging to the former Russian Imperial or Provisional governments, and handed over to the Government of His Britannic Majesty by either of those governments;

(c) Russian gold handed over to Germany under the supplementary agreement to the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk;

(d) Sums owed by the former Russian Imperial or Provisional governments to British Government departments, or vice versa;

(e) The claims advanced by the Government of the Union on the ground of intervention between November 7, 1917, and March 16, 1921; and also any adjustments made or to be made in the accounts relating to such claims on either side.

There shall similarly be reserved all questions connected with claims by the nationals of either party against the other party, in respect of loss or damage suffered in the territory of the party whose national the claimant is, and resulting from warlike operations or hostile measures during the above-mentioned period.

ART. 8. Claims by nationals (including juridical persons) of the one party against the other party in respect of loss or injury due to events which took place between August, 1914, and the coming into force of the present treaty, other than (1) claims covered by other articles of the present treaty, and (2) claims arising out of normal trading relations between the Government of the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic or governments allied to or federated with it, or its agents, and British nationals, or between the Government of His Britannic Majesty and citizens of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, shall, in view of the admitted preponderance of the claims of British nationals, be finally settled as between the contracting parties by the payment of a lump sum by the Government of the Union to the Government of His Britannic Majesty.

The distribution of this sum shall be effected by the Government of His Britannic Majesty in such manner as they shall consider just. The Government of the Union undertakes to furnish the Government of His Britannic Majesty with any relevant papers or information in their possession which may facilitate the just distribution of such sum.

ART. 9. Each of the contracting parties shall appoint three properly qualified persons to examine the claims of which the settlement is to be effected by the payment of the lump sum provided for in Article 8. These six persons shall make a joint examination of the claims, and shall report to the two contracting parties the amount at which they consider the lump sum should be fixed. If they are unable to agree as to the amount of the lump sum, they shall present separate reports. They will arrange their own procedure, and shall, in particular, be entitled by agreement between themselves to refer the examination of any particular category of claims to two of their number.

Each of the contracting parties shall defray the remuneration and expenses of the persons appointed by it, together with one-half of the expenses incurred jointly.

ART. 10. Being desirous of reestablishing the economic cooperation between their two countries, the Government of

His Britannic Majesty and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agree as follows:

The Government of the Union will, by way of exception to the decrees nationalizing industrial businesses and land, negotiate with British nationals (including juridical persons) in respect of industrial businesses or concessions which have been nationalized or canceled by it, in order to arrange for the grant of just compensation for such claims.

Furthermore a commission shall be appointed to examine the validity and ascertain the amount of the claims.

Each of the contracting parties agrees to assist the commission so far as possible with regard to supplying or collecting papers or information required for the proper accomplishment of its task.

If the members of the commission are unable to agree on a joint report in respect of any particular property, they may present separate reports.

In cases where the Government of the Union concludes an agreement with an individual claimant, the commission shall be informed of such agreement in order that the claim in question may be withdrawn from the competence of the commission.

The commission shall consist of six persons possessing the necessary qualifications for their task, three being appointed by the Government of His Britannic Majesty and three by the Government of the Union.

The commission shall settle its own procedure, which shall be approved by the two governments. Each of the contracting parties shall defray the remuneration and pay the expenses of the persons appointed by it, together with one-half of the expenses incurred jointly.

ART. 11. A second treaty will be entered into which will contain:

1. The conditions accepted in accordance with Article 6.
2. The amount and method of payment of compensation for claims under Article 8.
3. An agreed settlement of property claims other than those directly settled by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

ART. 12. Upon the signature of the treaty referred to in Article 11 His Britannic Majesty's Government will recommend Parliament to enable them to guarantee the interest and sinking fund of a loan to be issued by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The amount, terms, and conditions of the said loan and the purposes to which it shall be applied shall be defined in the treaty provided for in Article 11, which will not come into force until the necessary parliamentary authority for the guaranty of the said loan has been given.

ART. 13. The provisions of this chapter constitute a single and indivisible unit.

CHAPTER IV. MISCELLANEOUS

ART. 14. On the coming into force of the treaty referred to in Article 11, Article 10 of the Trade Agreement of March 16, 1921, will be abrogated, until which time it will be maintained in force, Article 1 of the present treaty notwithstanding.

ART. 15. Documents and papers of every kind, which on November 1, 1917, belonged to individual subjects or citizens of either party, and are now withheld from the owners and are in the possession or under the control of the Government or a public institution of the other party, shall be returned to the owners, or to such representative as they may appoint, within two months from the date of a request to that effect.

ART. 16. The contracting parties solemnly affirm their desire and intention to live in peace and amity with each other, scrupulously to respect the undoubted right of a state to order its own life within its own jurisdiction in its own way, to refrain and to restrain all persons and organizations under their direct or indirect control, including organizations in receipt of any financial assistance from them, from any act, overt or covert, liable in any way whatsoever to endanger the tran-

ANDORRA

CALLED by Robert Morss Lovett in the New Republic

"A beautiful book, a worthy addition to that line of French fiction from Colomba to Maria Chapdelaine in which the passion of romance is subdued to classic dignity and grace, and in which nature forms a noble and enduring background to the heroic quality of mankind."

By the Philadelphia Record

"A masterpiece . . . a really great book."

By the Milwaukee Sentinel

"Harmonious as noble music."

From the French of Isabelle Sandy

Houghton Mifflin Co. Illus. $2.00

What La Follette's State Is Doing

By CHESTER C. PLATT of Madison, Wis.

One reviewer has called this book a sequel to Dr. Frederic C. Howe's "Wisconsin, An Experiment in Democracy." It is not a campaign book, and when written the author did not know whether La Follette would be a candidate for president or not. The object of the book is to show that Wisconsin liberals, imbued with the La Follette spirit, have made this state one of the best governed in the union, and the progressive reforms adopted here have promoted and not hindered the commercial prosperity of the state.

Here are the titles of some of the chapters. Part Time Schools, Unemployment Insurance, University Extension, The Legal Status of Women, Cooperative Movements, Public Ownership, Taxing Unearned Incomes.

The volume contains over 300 pages. Has been carefully indexed and is illustrated with portraits of many Wisconsin progressives. Price $2.50. Order through your bookseller, or by mail of the publishers, Batavia Times Press, Batavia, N. Y.

For descriptive circulars address
CHESTER C. PLATT, 119 W. Main Street, Madison, Wis.

quillity or prosperity of any part of the territory of the British Empire or the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics or intended to embitter the relations of the British Empire or the Union with their neighbors or any other countries. . . .

ART. 17. The present treaty is drawn up and signed in the English language. A translation shall be made into the Russian language as soon as possible and agreed between the parties. Both texts shall then be considered authentic for all purposes.

ART. 18. The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in London as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty and have affixed thereto their seals.

Russia's Harvest

REPORTS of bad crops and famine conditions in various parts of Russia have been widely published. The following official statement of the situation and of the means taken to combat it appeared in a recent issue of Pravda (Moscow). It was written by G. Zinoviev.

The gross figures for this year's harvest will probably amount to not much under 2,600,000 poods, in other words, they will not be much behind those of the previous year's harvest. Nevertheless, it is already evident that the failure of the crops this year has affected a number of provinces more seriously than was at first thought to be the case.

Agriculture has for a long time formed the basis of the whole of our economy. Hence the recent crop failure means a severe blow to the whole economic organism of the Soviet Union. The purchasing power of the peasantry, taken as a whole, however, will probably not be less than it was last year. It is therefore harmful, and in any case premature, to speak of any reduction in the plans of production of our state industries.

There is no doubt, however, that the rate of economic revival this year will not correspond with our earlier expectations. . . . The bad harvest of 1924 confronts us with many new difficulties. Doubtless the catastrophe is not as bad as that of 1921. It cannot be denied that since that time we have greatly increased in economic strength. . . . We have, however, no reason either to remain idle and inactive or to indulge in self-deception. . . .

We talk a good deal of our alliance with the peasantry. Now is the time to realize this alliance through a task which touches the peasants very closely. A friend in need is a friend indeed. The peasantry needs our help precisely now when a relatively little help can rescue whole sections of the peasantry from ruin. . . .

The party must now show the peasants, not with words but by deeds, that it is supporting them in every possible way. The state organs which are under the leadership of the party must prove to the peasants by deeds that the workers' and peasants' state, during the time of need, hastened to help agriculture with all the means at its disposal.

We have already adopted serious measures with regard to providing seed; we must increase our efforts in this direction.

The measures which the government commission, over which Comrade Rykov presides, has adopted must be brought to the knowledge of the peasants.

The granting of agricultural credits is now, in view of the failure of crops, assuming greater importance. The same applies to the agricultural cooperatives and still more to every kind of agronomic help and propaganda. . . .

In order to combat the consequences of the drought, a large-scale program, extending over ten years, for the improvement of the soil has been worked out. . . .

The workers of the largest industrial centers must take, under their patronage the districts most seriously affected by the drought. . . .

The New School for Social Research

PURPOSE: To seek an unbiased understanding of the existing order, its genesis, growth and present working, as well as of those circumstances which are making for its revision.

Registration begins September 29
School Year begins October 6

JOHN B. WATSON—Behavior Psychology.
Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

FRANKWOOD E. WILLIAMS—Mental Hygiene.
Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

DOUGLAS A. THOM—Habit Training in Children.
Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

BERNARD GLUECK—Mental Hygiene Problems of Childhood.
Thursday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

HARRY A. OVERSTREET—The Technique of Influencing Human Behavior.
Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN—Introduction to Social Psychology.
Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

WILLIAM I. THOMAS—Personality Development.
Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

HORACE M. KALLEN—Dominant Ideals of Western Civilization.
Tuesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

A. A. GOLDENWEISER—Theories of Evolution and Progress from Herbert Spencer to Bertrand Russell.
Monday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

DAVID FRIDAY—Principles of Political Economy.
Wednesday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

LEO WOLMAN—The Labor Movement in the National Life.
Monday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

FREDERICK R. MACAULAY — Statistical Method.
Thursday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

JOSEPH K. HART—Theory and Practice in "New Schools."
Friday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

STARK YOUNG—The Art of the Theatre.
Tuesday, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

H. W. L. DANA—Twentieth Century Literature.
Friday, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

Tuition for each course of eighteen lectures, $20.

Write for catalogue to 465 West 23d Street New York City

In addition to our People's Commissariat for Agriculture, the other people's commissariats must bestir themselves and adapt the whole of their work to the situation among the peasants. . . .

For some time past many of our organizations, as, for example, the recent congress of our Youth League, have paid greater attention to the village. This of course does not only refer to organizations which are situated in the agricultural districts, but also to the capitals and other big proletarian centers.

"We have such and such a number of model institutions in this or that town," reports this or the other authority. To this our party must answer: "Yes, but what have you done for the village? Pay attention to the village, think of the peasantry. We are a land of workers and peasants."

The road of the proletarian revolution is not strewn with roses. New difficulties are unavoidable in the course of the complete economic reconstruction of the country. These difficulties are to be overcome and we shall surmount all emergencies only if we succeed this time in rousing to organized work the millions of workers who follow our party.

The working class and the peasantry of our republics are knit together by indissoluble bonds. During the whole revolution the working class of our country exercised a powerful influence upon the peasantry. We must not forget, however, that during the past seven years we have sometimes seen the contrary: the mood of the peasantry has penetrated by a thousand ways into the circles of city workers and found an echo in the factories and workshops, and on more than one occasion created very serious political difficulties. This will be the case now also if the party and the working class do not put forward all their efforts. . . .

As a Doctor Sees It. By Dr. B. LIBER. 173 stories from the intimate life of all kinds of people. Illustrated with 64 pencil sketches by the author.—Seven Parts:—Part I. "In the Sweat of Thy Face" contains stories from the life of the WORKING PEOPLE; Part II. "Poisoned Pleasure" deals with SEX LIFE AND BIRTH CONTROL; Part III. "Pain and Sorrow" speaks about sad situations in life as the doctor meets them; Part IV. "War Echoes" shows the disastrous EFFECTS OF THE WAR among the common people; Part V. "Life Waves" gives a number of unusually interesting pictures and problems; Part VI. "Shop Gossip" is what its title implies, gossip about things of which doctors prefer to talk among themselves; and Part VII. "Between Consultations" takes the doctor away from his work for a while and makes him see other things, but always from the doctor's point of view.

Received as a revelation by the press: A frank volume, frankly illustrated. It should be particularly called to the attention of comfortable people.—N. Y. Sun. Extremely colorful and fascinating.—Fourth Estate. Human documents. Reveal the need of more and better social service work.—Boston Evening Transcript. Some are sordid, others tragic, some gay, all real and impressive.—Industrial Pioneer. Admirable book. Brevity and ease gracefully combined in this portrayal of the humorous and the pathetic. Thought-provoking.—Truth-Seeker. Intensely interesting.—Kansas City Star. Mass of important facts told with first-class literary skill—Upton Sinclair. I wish everyone of the 534 members of Congress had to read your book—Mary Ware Dennett, Director, Voluntary Parenthood League. Clever and entertaining—Atlanta Constitution. It is the blatant reality and tragic death-in-life that a doctor of the city poor has to encounter.—San Francisco Chronicle. Intensely interesting and full of keen clinical and human observation. I compliment you upon your glimpse into people's character and their mode of living.—Haven Emerson, M.D. Absorbingly interesting.—London Spectator. Impressionistic dabs of many phases of life among the lowly of a huge city. Close powers of observation, adroit selection of words and artistic use of pencil serve to fasten these mental snapshots vividly in mind.—N. Y. Medical Week. One is struck with the author's sincerity. Excellent pencil sketches.—N. Y. Evening Post. Remarkable book by a remarkable personality. The author is an artist in drawing human forms.—Freiheit. A rare book. Shows life honestly and frankly.—St. Louis Post Dispatch. Wonderfully fertile.—Seattle Post Intelligencer. Most unique book, revealing inside picture of a doctor's life. Brave, courageous.—Vegetarian Magazine.

THE CHILD AND THE HOME, by Dr. B. Liber. Second, enlarged edition. Most modern ideas on the bringing-up of children. Common Errors, Practical Advice, Instances from Life, Sex, Health and Food Problems.—320 pages; cloth, $2.50; paper, $1.50.

RATIONAL LIVING, an illustrated monthly devoted to health conservation and exposing dishonesty in all healing professions, B. Liber, M. D., Dr. P. H., editor.—August issue out: A Vacation, Labor and Health, Posture at Work, The Healers, a medical novel, Diet of World's Workers, Child Care, Examinations, Normal Sex Life, Exercise, Cancer, Etc.—40c. a copy. —Regular subscription, $2.00.

Subscr. to R. L. and copy of "As a Doctor Sees it," $3.50.

Subscr. to R. L. and copy of "The Child and the Home," cloth, $4.00; paper, $3.00.

Subscr. to R. L. and copies of both books, $5.50 or $4.50.

Address: RATIONAL LIVING, 61 Hamilton Pl., New York.

IN ATHENS 400 B.C.

DIOGENES

Had No Housing Problem:

The Upkeep of His Lantern Was His Only Expense.

IN NEW YORK 1924 A. D.

It Is Not So Simple But

CO-OPERATIVE HOME-OWNERSHIP

Will Reduce Your Rent Burden to Cost of Upkeep

The Bedford Barrow Co-operative Apartments

in Greenwich Village are genuine, non-profit co-operatives.

Thirty-five apartments, 4, 5 and 6 rooms

Initial Investment $1,230 to $2,400.

Monthly Charges $50 to $100 (approx.) (Including mortgage payments)

Each year the net monthly charges decrease

The member's investment increases

Write for Information to:—

Consumers' Co-operative Housing Association, Inc

70 Fifth Ave. Room 411 Chelsea 0432

Pres. Cedric Long 1st Vice-Pres. Franklin C. Wells, Jr.
Sec'y Harry Rappaport 2nd Vice-Pres. Helen L. Alfred
Treas. Adolph Wirkkula

Affiliated with

THE CO-OPERATIVE LEAGUE OF THE U. S. A.

WANTED: Protestant family of good character to adopt an eight-months-old, healthy and unusually attractive boy of fine heredity. Matter in charge of high-grade child-caring agency. Applications around southeastern Pennsylvania preferred. Apply to Box 234, care of The Nation, giving full details.

MAMUMIT SCHOOL, Pawling, Dutchess Co., New York

A Modern Community Boarding School for the Children of Workers—Boys and Girls 9 to 14 years. Can take three more girls and two more boys at a tuition charge which covers actual cost.

Arthur Warner's three articles on

La Follette's Record have been reprinted in pamphlet form and can be ordered from

The Nation

20 Vesey Street
New York

10 cents a copy
$5.00 a hundred
$30.00 a thousand

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1924 No. 3088

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 247
EDITORIALS:
The Chances in the Election 250
Fashions in Newspaper Hoaxes 251
"Theirs Not to Reason Why" 251
A Noble Editor 252
"MOBILIZATION" OR "DEFENSE TEST"? 253
MAIN STREET'S BEEN PAVED! By Sinclair Lewis 255
LA FOLLETTE'S "STRATEGY." By William Hard 260
THE NEW PSYCHOLOGY AND THE FRANKS CASE. By Leonard Blumgart 261
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 262
CORRESPONDENCE 263
TAKING AWAY THE BANKING. By Wilbert Snow 264
BOOKS:
Rollo in America. By Woodbridge Riley 264
Retrospective. By Alice Beal Parsons 265
A New Single Tax. By Henry Raymond Mussey 265
Proust in English. By Ernest Boyd 266
A Rolling Stone. By Albert DeSilver 267
The Negro. By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois 267
AMERICAN MUSIC VIA EUROPE. By Henrietta Straus 268
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Gagging the Press in Italy 269
The Anglo-Russian Trade Treaty 269

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor MARK VAN DOREN, Literary Editor

ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager

Contributing Editors

ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS

ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

IN HIS LABOR DAY speech John W. Davis has shown once more that it is his political strategy to invade the La Follette territory—not by denouncing the Wisconsin Senator but by taking the same position on various questions. Thus, he has come out against government by injunction, for important changes in the Esch-Cummins Act, and for the approval of the child-labor amendment to the Constitution. This will be gratefully noted in the La Follette camp, for the further Mr. Davis comes over to the La Follette position the more difficult will it be for the Republicans to portray La Follette as a wild and dangerous radical. For instance, the Senator has been roundly abused for wishing to abolish the Railroad Labor Board, and that proposal has been widely heralded as meaning the undoing of one of the great achievements in the battle between capital and labor. Now Mr. Davis is willing to throw it over. He has also suddenly discovered that there is such a tradition as free speech and a free press in America. We congratulate him upon the discovery, because if there was any man silent and tongue-tied during the battle the liberals have been making since the beginning of the war to uphold the right of peaceful assemblage, free speech, and a free press, it was John W. Davis. In all the gallant struggle made by the American Civil Liberties Union, for example, to uphold the rights of the citizen, Mr. Davis has had not one word to say either as president of the Bar Association or otherwise. If he wishes to prove his sincerity now he can easily do it. Let him denounce by name the public officials and the mining companies in his own West Virginia who have made of democracy in that State a mockery and a sham. Let him denounce the mayors in those Gary-owned Pennsylvania towns who today refuse to permit meetings to be held if they do not like their purpose.

IT IS UNKIND of the head of the National Federation of Federal Employees to complain of the sweat-shop wages paid by the national government to its workers just when the country is thrilling with Mr. Coolidge's Labor-Day declaration that the cost of living has been going down and wages going up. Living costs began to go down in the middle of 1920 while the Democrats were still in power, continuing in that direction for some time in spite of the corruption in Washington under Mr. Harding, but since Mr. Coolidge himself has been President his own official statistics show an upward trend again. Mr. Coolidge goes back over ten years—six of which were under a Democratic administration—and picks out the hourly rate of wages in a few favored industries to prove the high earnings of labor. He says nothing of the total time that men are working or of men who are not working at all. He does not give actual earnings of actual men, and there are no satisfactory figures on this point for the country as a whole. In the last report from the New York State Department of Labor, however, we note that July was the fourth successive month of contracting pay rolls in factories, and that they were $6,000,000 less in July of this year than in July, 1923. Also only eleven firms advanced wages in that month against seventeen that reduced them. Reductions applied especially to the textile and the carpet industries.

AND NOW COMES Luther G. Stewart, president of the National Federation of Federal Employees, to say that although living costs are 69 per cent higher than ten years ago the pay of the government's workers, even with the bonus of $20 a month, is only 15 per cent higher. Mr. Stewart says:

> Take the sleek-looking guards at the Congressional Library as an example. People do not know that the guards would prefer a little more corned beef and cabbage and less statuary and mural decorations. They do not know that the guards must provide their own uniforms, at increased prices since Congress so generously allowed the woolen industry a tariff, and must support a family and pay the notoriously high rents at the national capital on a wage of $1,140 a year, working seven days a week.
>
> This situation is true not only with most of the federal employees in Washington, numbering 60,000 outside the postal service; it is true equally with the 200,000 federal government workers scattered throughout the United States.

Nevertheless, Mr. Coolidge has solid reasons upon which to base his ringing declarations in regard to reduced living costs and increased wages. He has the incontestable proof of personal experience. Since he became President he has escaped what Mr. Stewart calls "the notoriously high rents at the national capital" by moving into a free house painted white, while his wages have risen from a stipend of $12,000 a year to one of $75,000. Lucky Cal!

HOW FARES THE FARMER? After an investigation covering a period of several years the Department of Agriculture has discovered that he is in a bad way. The farmer discovered it himself some time ago; but let that pass. The farmer may at least take comfort in knowing statistically just how badly off he is.

> Interest paid on total farm indebtedness consumed all capital earnings in the crop years 1920-21 and 1921-22. In the next two years there was a return of 3.1 per cent on the total capital invested in agriculture, including rewards of management. This investment, however, was written down from $79,607,000,000 in 1920 to $59,409,000,000. Land and buildings by themselves were written down from $66,316,000,000 to $48,300,000,000.
>
> The department has estimated for the five-year period the return on all the capital invested in agriculture. It puts this rate at 6.2 per cent for 1919-20; 0.6 per cent for 1920-21; 1.4 per cent for 1921-22; 3.1 per cent for 1922-23; and 3.1 per cent for 1923-24. Even this meager showing was only made by valuing the labor of farm operators and their families at no more than the current rate for common labor. While agricultural capital as a whole had only the small returns above mentioned, it was paying an average of more than 6.7 on mortgage and other indebtedness.

Mr. Coolidge is smiling with promises of what his party is going to do for agriculture, but if the future is to be judged by the present, and it is, the Republicans have nothing to offer the farmer but a stone—or at most a gold brick.

ITS "INSTINCTIVE GROPING for leadership in the interest of law enforcement" (we think Mr. Dawes's phrase will become classic) has again brought Herrin, Illinois, to murder and riot. Six men have been killed in a battle between Klansmen and sheriffs' deputies. The start of the trouble is shrouded in bitter accusations and criminal charges. The only thing the public understands or cares to understand is that law is dead in a county in Illinois; that men's lives are in danger; and that hooded cowards have instituted a reign of terror that dates back many months. Mr. Dawes may admire the fine, free spirit that inspires the members of the Klan in Illinois; most of the rest of us would prefer to see life and liberty left in the unromantic hands of the officers of the law.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE has done two excellent things since the beginning of his campaign for which he is entitled to all praise. He has enunciated the historic American doctrine in regard to the colored man and his rights as an American citizen. He has heartily approved the nomination of a colored man for Congress in New York City, and has otherwise spoken out so clearly that no one can have any doubt as to where he stands on this issue. The second matter is the President's refusal to join in the navy hue and cry against the British in regard to the elevation of the guns on battleships. He has declared that he will not permit the subject to be opened by the navy. That has naturally set the admirals to raging. If we may judge from the Washington dispatches, the navy feels that the President has sold us out to the British. We can only rejoice that this source of friction between the two great Anglo-Saxon countries has been eliminated by the President. The whole incident shows clearly how our naval officers, so far from being preservers of the peace as they contend, are constant sources of the kind of friction that leads to war.

THE PRIZES for peace plans, in the competition inaugurated for Europeans by Edward A. Filene, have been awarded. More than 15,000 persons competed—5,319 in France, 4,700 in Great Britain, 4,400 in Germany, 1,000 in Italy. The names of the winners are not yet announced, but the peace plans are appearing from each of the four nations separately at intervals of a week. In making public the plans by French competitors, a statement in behalf of Mr. Filene says:

> It is not so important that we should find in these projects a final solution of the problem of peace as that we should understand that they are a fairly accurate index of the main movements of thought in Europe today. . . . It was with this purpose in view, of affording the American public a general line on the thought of the more active and the more thinking elements in Europe's main countries, that Mr. Filene inaugurated the awards.

With this thought in mind it is instructive to note that in the thirty-six plans by Frenchmen to whom prizes were awarded there is general support of the Dawes plan and advocacy of reduction of armaments. The League of Nations is regarded as necessary, with appeal to moral rather than physical force, while many suggest changes to admit the United States and propose the admission of Germany and Russia. Mutual guaranties of security through treaties are also suggested. Most of the competitors see the need of a stabilization of the currencies of Europe as a means of restoring normal life, and thus laying the basis of permanently peaceful relations. They also seek a solution for the traffic chaos.

THE REICHSTAG has done the inevitable and approved the London agreement on the Dawes plan. It could do nothing else in view of Marx's threat to dissolve the Reichstag and go ahead without its consent if need be. The only question now is what price the Government has had to pay finally to win the Nationalist support. Whether the price is some seats in the present Cabinet or something else, time will soon show. What has been done by Marx was the only thing to do, whether his government believed in the workability of the compromise or not. For Germany and for other countries the acceptance of the agreement should bring at least temporary relief from bickering and some economic revival. But what the German people will yet have to pay socially for this new fixing of their liabilities remains to be seen. There are plenty who behold in it nothing but a loss of all the gains made by the workers during the war and the revolution, including the eight-hour day. Sufficient unto the day! The really important thing, we say again, is that Europe has at last made a treaty by mutual consent and that friendly personal relations have finally been established between French and German statesmen. Future difficulties must be met as they arise—in the spirit of Ramsay MacDonald if the world is to advance.

THE DAWES REPORT has apparently cleared the air for France and Germany to get back to the basis laid down by Loucheur and Rathenau two and a half years ago. At the conclusion of the recent conference they agreed to meet in Paris about the first of October and draft a commercial treaty. Such an agreement Philip Snowden characterizes as "a trade menace to Great Britain of a most serious character." English miners have already appealed to Mr. MacDonald to prevent further coal deliveries by Germany to Italy, France, and Belgium, as it is causing the closing of British mines. And British business men in general are suspicious that France has now thrown over her dreams of military domination in order to attain domination through commercial relations. Whether this fear is exaggerated or not, there seems to be no other way to peace on the Continent than the way of accord between France and Germany. It would be tragic if Great Britain, after striving for Franco-German political accord, should shift its ground for fear of losing its French trade to Germany. Great Britain has gained nothing from the past commercial chaos; she will be the first to profit from general prosperity.

HERMAN M. BERNELOT MOENS came to the United States with letters from the Dutch Government recommending him as a distinguished zoologist and anthropologist worthy of the highest consideration. He embarked on a careful study of race mixtures in Washington, and with the help of government scientists and photographers took pictures of many of the intermingled types in the Washington public schools. About this time the war broke out and struck the Department of Justice like an attack of measles. In 1918 the Department decided that Mr. Moens was a German spy; agents entered his room and seized documents and scientific materials which have never been recovered by the owner. They found incidentally that he was neither German nor a spy, but they discovered his collection of photographs of nude children, taken by government photographers. These were seized. Finally the scientist was indicted on a charge of possessing obscene pictures and exhibiting them (to the agent who stole them from his rooms). The indictment was dismissed but another was drawn, and for five years Mr. Moens lived with this vicious charge hanging over him. His work was stopped, his scientific material was confiscated, his name was blackened—and now, casually, under the new regime of decency in the Department of Justice, the indictment has been withdrawn. Mr. Moens is no longer under criminal charges, but he has wasted five years of his career and suffered indignity and injustice. If a distinguished American scientist were so treated by a foreign government—by Holland, for instance—we wonder how our patriotic senators would behave.

IF FANNIE HURST were a foreign literary person visiting our shores, she could probably be trusted to comment on something more interesting than the beauty of the American woman or the docility of the American husband. At any rate, Miss Hurst has recently been visiting in Moscow and her impressions, cabled to the New York Times by Walter Duranty, were well above the intelligence standard set by most departing guests. She finds Russia amazingly young—sustained by the virtues of youth and afflicted with its faults:

> Not only nine executives out of ten you meet are young, but you feel tremendously that the whole country has been put in the hands of the growing generation to make or mar it after their own pattern. There is all of youth's crudity, ignorance, and recklessness, youth's restiveness and contempt, even toward elders and older ways. But there is also youth's tremendous vitality, youth's hopefulness, and youth's power to work miracles, because it does not know that impossibilities are impossible. . . .
>
> And they are all so desperately in earnest, these youngsters, so absorbed in their own affairs, so impervious to criticism. They seem to have no time for many things we consider important. For instance, the women look neat enough in white summer frocks, but do any young girls ever pause to think how much nicer they would look with a piece of ribbon? And that goes all through—there are so many beautiful old things in and round Moscow, but such utilitarian ugliness as will come from impatience and almost disgust for delicacy and refinement.

THE BARK WANDERER, the last of New Bedford's famous whaling fleet, is piled up on the Middle Ground Shoal; she will lie there until the storms of the North Atlantic rack and wrench and burst her stout ribs asunder and float her old bones off to scatter them in the wreckage of the Seven Seas. The Wanderer was 146 years old, having been built in Mattapoisett in 1778. In her long life she had probably poked her blunt, pugnacious nose into every lonely sea from the South Shetland Islands to Jan Mayen Land, and her every timber must have been soaked and preserved in the oil of the thousands of whales that had fallen her victims. The Wanderer set out on what was to have been her last whaling voyage on August 25; on her return she was to have been dismantled. The crew was not quite large enough, the skipper decided soon after setting sail, and so he anchored the Wanderer and went ashore to recruit others. In the tumultuous seas that piled up in the Atlantic next day the bark dragged her anchors, and as she was swept into shoal water the crew abandoned her. About the middle of the last century, when whaling was a great American industry, we had more than 700 vessels engaged in the chase, most of them sailing out of New Bedford. But the scarcity of whales, due to their relentless pursuit, together with the discovery of petroleum, brought the industry to decay, and in 1902 our fleet had declined to thirty-eight vessels. Now there are so few that no records are kept, and the New Bedford fleet is wholly gone. Of late the Wanderer had been requisitioned for the movies. So perhaps it wasn't accident but suicide that brought her finally to Middle Ground Shoal.

IT WAS IN BOSTON, distinguished as the Athens of America and birthplace of the art of vaudeville, that a recent survey demonstrated conclusively the advance of the last half century in the art of education. The Boston University School of Education gave Massachusetts scholars a spelling test, and compared the results with a trial made in 1879. One might expect the well-known younger generation to fall far below the record of their serious-minded ancestors. The clergymen of Boston could have explained that the sinful frivolity of flirting, jazzing flapperdom had penetrated even to the fifth grade of a generation precocious in vice and light-minded in learning. Instead, here is material for a sermon on the glories of progress. On the useful little word "which," for example, the school-children of 1924 rate 76 per cent against a mere 69.2 per cent in 1879; and on "too" the score is 79.4 to 23 per cent. The investigators proudly credit the improvement to modern teaching methods, which concentrate on useful words in spelling lessons instead of the "eleemosynary" and "synchronization" of our grandfathers. It is true that some heretical advocates of drastic school reform have held that spelling should not be taught as an independent subject at all; but that must have been before they heard of this triumph of twentieth-century science.

The Chances in the Election

WHAT are the chances in the presidential election? There is only one thing upon which a majority of the Washington political correspondents agree, and that is that the election will be thrown into Congress. For the rest, veteran observers admit that never has there been as baffling a campaign nor such contradictory reports as come out of every State in the Union. One meets equally competent observers from a given place who are so far apart in their views as to make it impossible to reconcile them. Take Michigan, for instance. The staff of one of the most influential dailies there agrees that La Follette will carry the State. Take any Detroit business man and he will assure you that the State will go for Coolidge by an overwhelming majority. From some States come reports of complete apathy; from others that there is profound public interest.

None the less, certain facts stand out clearly. John W. Davis is running by himself. It is not even a ticket which is being offered to the Democratic voters. In the East as little mention as possible is being made of Charles W. Bryan because he is extremely unpopular. Mr. Davis has had to make over his organization and it has not always been skilfully done; the McAdoo forces have been deliberately alienated. Writing in the pro-Coolidge New York Evening Post, Clinton W. Gilbert declares that "in the entire region west of the Mississippi, except the Southwestern States, the contest is between President Coolidge and Senator La Follette," and he quotes a Republican just back from the Southwest as saying that he hardly ever heard Mr. Davis's name. If it were not for the solid South it would seem as if the Davis candidacy would disappear, despite the fact that he is making excellent campaign speeches. He does not appeal to the imagination of the public and his is the dreadful handicap of steering a middle course.

When it comes to the contest between La Follette and Coolidge, the advocates of La Follette are profoundly cheered, for it is certain that the showing he will make will be extraordinary in spite of the necessity of building entirely new machinery, the lack of experienced leaders, and the pitifully small sums of money which are coming to W. T. Rawleigh, the treasurer (whose address is Freeport, Illinois). It is not as it was in the Progressive Party's campaign in 1912. Not only was Mr. Roosevelt better known and more popular, there were enlisted under his banner many men and women of national distinction. Money poured in upon the treasurer; the new machinery came to pass almost overnight; a powerful press championed him. It was soon socially fashionable to join the Roosevelt ranks. This year the spectacular is lacking, the money, and the large group of nationally known leaders and dailies. Yet the third party is going ahead in a way to amaze. That is to be recognized in the respectful way the opposition treats it and the admirably fair reporting of the La Follette campaign by the press of the large cities—it is real news and the editors know it. The third party progresses because for once we have a reform movement which has come out of the masses and has not been started from above. It is possibly the very absence of machinery and of moth-eaten and shop-worn political leaders that gives La Follette's battle such an appeal, besides the fact that the American people like the spectacle of this brave and unpurchasable man presenting himself to the public on his own record and his own platform and inviting the public to vote for him.

Quite striking is the way week by week the Republicans themselves are beginning to take the La Follette cause more seriously. At first they conceded him only Wisconsin. Now an apparently official Republican forecast in the New York Herald Tribune gives La Follette Wisconsin, Minnesota, Montana, North and South Dakota. Clinton W. Gilbert, who is certainly no visionary idealist but a practical and experienced realist, makes some remarkable statements which he declares to be founded on information from inside Republican sources only. He declares that La Follette has developed strength in California sufficient already to insure his running second there. Arizona will go either to La Follette or Coolidge and so will Nebraska, where Mr. Gilbert insists that Bryan will run third. In Iowa, he reports, the Republicans are in a serious way because the corn crop is bad, because Joseph Allen, a leading Iowa progressive, has unexpectedly bolted to La Follette, and Dante Pierce, owner of the powerful farmers' paper, the Iowa Homestead, has thrown his great influence to the Wisconsin Senator. If La Follette were to carry all the States which Mr. Gilbert concedes to him, or puts down as close and doubtful, he would receive 93 electoral votes, without counting California or any Eastern State as a possibility, and giving Nevada, Wyoming, Utah, and Oregon to Coolidge or Davis. Since the latter is bound to get 126 electoral votes in the Southern States alone, any such achievement by La Follette as Mr. Gilbert's article suggests would not impossibly throw the election into Congress.

The Republican forecast in the Herald Tribune is a grave confession of weakness in that it claims only 295 electoral votes for Coolidge, who must obtain 266 to win. To claim in August a margin of only 29 votes comports neither with the usual political procedure nor with the extravagant claims that it is to be a walk-over for Coolidge. In the 295 are included the votes of California, Iowa, Illinois, Colorado, Indiana, New York, New Jersey, and Washington. The loss of California, Iowa, and Washington would on this showing defeat Mr. Coolidge. So would the loss of Iowa, Washington, Nevada, Wyoming, and Idaho. If that is the best the Republicans can claim they are in need of condolence. It is a fact that their reports in nowise justify Wall Street's three to one odds on Coolidge. Moreover, New Hampshire is actually in revolt. Money and organization and a fine speaking campaign in Rhode Island would take that State away from Coolidge, and the growing opposition to him in his own State is instanced by the large amount of space and friendly attention devoted by the Boston Herald to Senator Wheeler. The latter's candidacy will be helped tremendously if the Republicans commit the incredible folly of trying him on their bogus charges.

Yes, for La Follette the outlook is beyond all belief encouraging. It would be idle to assert that the great underground swell of discontent with the other parties, which is needed for a landslide, is in sight today. But there are amazing straws. Multitudes who will vote for La Follette are not daring to say so. Others are coming out for him day by day, as has William G. McAdoo's brother. In a Pasadena newspaper office a straw vote showed 57 for La Follette, 22 for Coolidge, and 3 only for Davis. A student fraternity in the University of Washington voted 3 for Davis, 6 for Coolidge, and 38 for La Follette. A national poll by the Hearst newspapers gave, on September 2, Coolidge 11,190, La Follette 10,625, and Davis 3,443. In New York City La Follette led Coolidge by nearly 200 votes. Polls favoring the others will doubtless soon appear. But let us remember that the polls mentioned are for the man for whom, the New York Evening Post said a few weeks ago, only the "lunatic fringe" could possibly vote.

Fashions in Newspaper Hoaxes

SO the story of the floating cafe, anchored fifteen miles outside of New York harbor, was a fiction! This tale of a 17,000-ton steamship where the wealthy might slake their alcoholic thirst just beyond the reach of the law, printed in the New York Herald Tribune of August 16, was admitted by that newspaper a week later to be fiction warp and woof. The Herald Tribune made a clean breast of it, explained that it had been imposed upon by one of its reporters, and announced that the latter had been "dishonorably dismissed."

Well, it was not always thus with newspaper hoaxes. Time was when they were regarded as strokes of enterprise almost if not quite legitimate; when a newspaper perpetrated them knowingly and brazenly as part of the day's work. Indeed the success of one of the world's greatest newspapers, the now extinct New York morning Sun, was founded on a gigantic, intentional, and carefully planned hoax. We shall not argue that newspapers have grown more honest and accurate. We are not sure that they have; we are not certain that there has been anything more than a change in fashion. The modern demand for "human interest," for "punch" and "color," for pathos and humor, leads to exaggerations and distortions that are in effect as untruthful presentations as were achieved by any of the hoaxing of the past. Then, too, the pressure of propaganda has much to answer for. Only last week we called attention to a summary in the Herald Tribune of the report by the Federal Council of Churches on National Defense Day, which was as essentially untrue as the tale of the floating cafe. No apology for this has been forthcoming.

But we did not set out to moralize; we wanted to recall to our readers the kind of faking that "got by" in the past, especially the famous hoax of the New York Sun. At the time, 1835, that journal was a fledgling less than two years old, the first penny paper in New York City, established to compete against other prints which sold for six cents. The owner, Benjamin H. Day, had just engaged Richard Adams Locke as chief editorial writer at a salary of $12 a week, and the latter showed his gratitude by proposing and writing the famous moon hoax which made the Sun. The plot began with the publication on August 21, 1835, of an item credited to the Edinburgh Courant, saying that Sir John Herschel, who was experimenting at the Cape of Good Hope with a wonderful new telescope, had made some remarkable astronomical discoveries. Four days later there were three columns on the first page, saying that the new telescope had made objects on the moon's surface as visible as views on the earth at a distance of 100 yards. Marvelous details were set forth. This time the information was credited to a supplement in the Edinburgh Journal of Science, supplied to the Sun by a "medical gentleman" just arrived from Scotland who had noticed the previous item. Thereafter for a week followed instalments in regard to the newly discovered marvels of the moon, each more astounding than the one before. The vegetation and animals were described, including a horned bear and a biped beaver. Of the latter it was said:

> It carries its young in its arms like a human being and walks with an easy, gliding motion. Its huts are constructed better and higher than those of many tribes of human savages, and from the appearance of smoke in nearly all of them there is no doubt of its being acquainted with the use of fire.

Finally the Sun's readers were introduced to the great Temple of the Moon and to a creature close to human, a kind of man-bat. All New York buzzed with the marvelous discoveries; the presses couldn't grind fast enough to supply public demand. Eventually a committee of scientists arrived from Yale, asking leave to consult the original accounts. Locke said they were in the hands of the printer, and then rushed on ahead of the delegation to tell the foreman to send them to another plant. Thus they were kept going from shop to shop until they had to catch their train back to New Haven. The young Edgar Allan Poe is said to have abandoned a story he was working on, "Hans Pfaal," because the moon hoax trespassed upon and surpassed his ideas.

Eventually Locke admitted the hoax. But apparently there was no public resentment, and meanwhile the Sun—and indirectly penny journalism in America—had been made. On August 28 the Sun announced a sale of 19,360 copies daily. This, it claimed, was 2,360 copies in excess of the sales of the London Times, and the largest circulation in the world.

"Theirs Not to Reason Why"

THAT most useful institution, the Williamstown Institute of Politics, which has just concluded its fourth successful year, performs a great service in bringing together men and women of varying shades of opinion, but not greater service than in bringing to its councils representatives of the military branches of the United States government. We are well aware that there are some people who have been outraged by the constant talking of certain admirals, in marked contrast to the generals who, whether by order or not, have remained quiet. But the admirals, notably Admiral Rodgers, have enunciated such crassly imperialistic doctrines, so redolent of the before-the-war German militarism and so full of the doctrine that we must bow down and worship before our government as one which can never do any wrong, that we consider their contribution to the cause of American education of extraordinary value. Rear Admiral Rodgers's picture of us as a nation likely to wage devastating war upon all other nations of the earth just as soon as our population overflows our boundaries portrays us as becoming what most Americans thought Germany was in 1914 when it was talking so much nonsense about its place in the sun.

But the priceless contribution to the session on our relations with the Caribbean and South American countries was that of Admiral Huse, who declared that although he was one of the leading officers who took part in the attack on Vera Cruz he did not now know why we had gone into the city to take the Custom House! "Theirs not to reason why!" The navy got its orders from Washington, where Mr. Wilson and his Cabinet, upon whose heads rests the guilt, ordered the taking of the Custom House, with the resultant hundreds of Mexican deaths and the loss of nineteen American lives. "It was a glorious victory," but history will find it difficult to record why it should have been done or what was accomplished. It did not get us the salute we demanded for the boat incident at Tampico. It did not help us to capture Villa. It enormously increased the dislike and hatred and fear of us throughout South and Central America. The navy had no choice; we have no question that it was as humane as men can be when they attack towns with modern weapons. Mussolini's fleet killed a number of orphans it did not mean to when it "upheld" its flag at Corfu.

Now it is just this attitude of mind, the willingness to be part of a machine which cannot reason why, but which is taught never to admit that the head of the government which gives the orders the sailors or soldiers must obey can do wrong, that makes the military arms so fraught with danger to any country, whether it be the Germany of the Kaiser or the American republic of today. The bold teaching that America shall adopt the law of tooth and claw whenever there shall come a plethora of population, and that no civilian may question the righteousness of any act of army or navy or government, shows how far we have progressed in the direction of militarism. It is the spirit in these matters which counts infinitely more than the act. In itself the coming mobilization day is in no sense as alarming as the propaganda motive behind it, the effort to link the civilian population with a day of military practice and parade, and so to propagandize the public. This procedure will, without question, find an echo in a demand for greater appropriations and a larger army when the next Congress meets. The military propaganda of the War Department ceases never by day or by night. Almost every army officer is not unnaturally an active militaristic propagandist; and so are many of the 80,000 reserve officers whose lips will be padlocked on all public questions—unless they agree with the Government—if the effort to drive Captain Paxton Hibben out of the Reserve Corps because of dislike of his views on Russia should prove successful.

So we are grateful for mobilization day in that it has aroused great public feeling in America against the idea. Resolutions have even come to us from business associations from whom we never expected such ringing old-fashioned Americanism. We are sincere in our belief that there is no greater danger before the country today than the spread of German militarism among us. If we had no other reason for supporting Robert M. La Follette for President, we should find it in our belief that while he is not a pacifist, nor an opponent of all wars, we think him to be keenly aware of the rise of the militaristic tide because his platform calls for immediate curtailment of army and navy. Thus we believe that active militaristic propaganda would cease the minute he took office and that we should have in Washington the same spirit of amity in the conduct of our international affairs which so glorifies the ministry of Ramsay MacDonald and through him has brought about a temporary solution of the political miseries of Europe.

A Noble Editor

WHEN Henry W. Massingham died on August 28 there passed a great soul. "The greatest editor I ever knew," Henry W. Nevinson, the dean of British correspondents, has called him; and there are many to share the estimate. But beyond and above the editor was the man. "He announces a message of revolution as if it were a new gospel of love," once wrote George W. Smalley of the man who for sixteen years made of the London Nation the broadest, bravest, wisest, most humane and enlightened of British publications. So noble and modest a spirit appears all too rarely in the newspaper world—there is no one to fill his place in England or abroad, for such a combination of gentleness with firmness, of complete courtesy and extraordinary knowledge with such an admirable style is seldom found. Never was there any one to state a case more clearly, to subject to a more searching analysis the statements of politicians, illuminating their falsity or proving their worth. Steeped in principle, he was a true humanitarian who could no more measure his principles with the yardstick of a spurious patriotism or a narrow nationalism than he could preach the doctrine that might shall rule.

True, when the war came, Mr. Massingham, like other British liberal editors, was swept off his feet. But he was the first to recover from the shock, and so determinedly and brilliantly did he uphold the right of the Anglo-Saxon editor to apply his reason and his principles to the national situation in war time that Lloyd George not only honored him by vituperating him, but forbade the export of his journal from England. The one now dies honored as a farsighted, wise, and honest journalist; the other, recognized the world over as a political mountebank, lives to decrease his fame by journalistic potboiling which nobody reads or regards. The true heroes are still not those the public is graciously allowed to worship by the controllers of opinion, but those who are steadfast; who yield not a jot or a tittle of their principles; who bear misrepresentation and calumny with resignation and cheerfulness, and find their reward in the consciousness that the stars in their courses fight for them, whether they live to see their principles triumph or not.

Bred and nurtured in the teachings of Cobden and Bright, Mr. Massingham yielded slowly to the new party of Labor, but for the decay of liberalism as a result of its suicidal alliance with the war mania he finally found compensation in the broader and wider vision of the new economic movement. Mr. Massingham was not only a political writer. In literary fields he wandered as freely and with as stimulating effects. His column "A Wayfarer in London" was the envy of his colleagues, but its charm was not to be captured by anyone else. With wit, grace, kindliness, and good humor he portrayed his contemporaries and the world about him. Replete with rare personal touches, the column contained also much of historic value. Even when the Rowntree Trust ousted him from the editorial chair that none else could fill, his serenity never deserted him, nor its charm his pen. Witness his last contribution to the New York Nation, a review of Henry W. Nevinson's "Changes and Chances," printed in the issue of April 23 of this year. From the New York Nation he took his publication's name. We are as happy to record that the namesake surpassed the original as we sorrow to record our grief because the world can no longer claim Henry W. Massingham as its own.

"Mobilization" or "Defense Test"?

(We reprint with pleasure the following paragraphs from a statement issued by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America; nowhere else have we seen so careful a statement of facts or so dispassionate an appraisal of the forces behind the military demonstration on September 12.)

THE observance of September 12, the anniversary of the American victory of St. Mihiel, by a demonstration of mobilization . . . was an original idea of the War Department. All statements to the effect that it is specifically required by the National Defense Act of 1920 and that the whole plan is merely a carrying out of the act are in error. . . . A widely known New York newspaper has asserted editorially . . . that the law requires annual mobilization tests on which the War Department has defaulted for three years. There is nothing in the law suggesting a test demonstration. The War Department itself acknowledges that the only portions of the National Defense Act relevant to the proposed test are . . . as follows:

> The organized peace establishment including the regular army, the national guard, and the organized reserves, shall include all those divisions and other military organizations necessary to form the basis for a complete and immediate mobilization for the National Defense in the event of a national emergency declared by Congress. The army shall at all times be organized so far as practicable into brigades, divisions, and army corps, and whenever the President may deem it expedient, into armies. For purposes of administration, training, and tactical control the continental area of the United States shall be divided on a basis of military population into corps areas. Each corps area shall contain at least one division of the national guard, the organized reserves, and such other troops as the President may direct. . . .
>
> The duties of the War Department General Staff shall be to prepare plans for national defense and the use of the military forces for that purpose, both separately and in conjunction with the naval forces, and for the mobilization of the manhood of the nation and its material resources in an emergency to investigate and report upon all questions affecting the efficiency of the army of the United States, and its state of preparation for military operations; and to render professional aid and assistance to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff.

When the War Department refers to the Defense Act as a warrant for "defense test" it is giving its own interpretation to the act. The Department justifies it on the ground that Congress has intrusted national defense to a reserve army; that such a potential army is useless without elaborate organization and mobilization plans; that such plans are futile unless they are tested and their procedure visualized, and unless popular interest is aroused in their execution.

"Mobilization"

The word "mobilization" was from the first used in connection with the celebration in official quarters. In his correspondence with Mr. F. J. Libby of the National Council for the Prevention of War, the President was apparently technically correct in so far as the formal designation of the day is concerned. Yet as early as January 5 of this year the Army and Navy Register referred to the plan in these words:

> The prospect of staging the greatest peace-time military demonstration in the history of the United States came one step nearer realization this week when Secretary of War Weeks gave favorable consideration to the Mobilization Day plans on which general staff officers have been working for months.

The Army and Navy Register is not an official journal, but it is apparent from the foregoing that the designation, "Mobilization Day," was not the result of an effort to discredit the demonstration. On this point the President appears to have been misinformed.

The question would seem to be placed beyond controversy by statements printed on August 1 in the New York Evening Post, an ardent supporter of the Administration, under the name of its Washington staff correspondent:

> The memory of the Great War is recent and the choice of the word "mobilization" was unfortunate. It was worse than unfortunate; it was stupid. But army officers are bad popular psychologists. They don't usually have to bother with psychology. But this was a time when they were dealing with psychology. They were planning a nice display of the army and its connections, something like the annual turnout of the police and fire department, to interest the people in the army. . . . With this psychological purpose in view the army officers called for a mobilization. There is no mistake about it. The records show it. And the army officers privately admit they made a blunder. Since the very first they have been trying to change the word from mobilization to defense and the pacifist societies have been trying to make the original word stick.

It should be said that the War Department disclaims any such admission of a "blunder" and defends the course it has followed throughout. The Department puts much emphasis upon the difference between a mobilization of America's citizen army and a European mobilization with all its implications.

Disclosure of War Department's Plans

There is no question that the plans of the War Department for active civilian cooperation were elaborate, and worked out in considerable detail. General Pershing's statement released by the War Department on May 18 closed with these words: "We want them all [the American people] to participate in this 'Defense Test,' and in some suitable manner celebrate the day in commemoration of the victory of American arms at St. Mihiel."

A peculiarly unfortunate incident of the controversy that has arisen over the plan has been the failure to make public the War Department's order of April 26, until after the controversy had become acute and had taken a political turn. . . . That order, made public on July 30, made it clear that "the Secretary of War has decided to initiate for continental United States a mobilization demonstration which will serve as an occasion for assemblages and ceremonies involving public manifestations of loyalty and practical patriotism." The order went so far as to suggest that there should be parades, prayers for our national welfare, patriotic music, addresses on national defense and mobilization, and organized recreation and amusement. . . .

The Force of Religious Opinion

The affair has resulted in a remarkable demonstration of the potential influence of religious opinion and of the religious press upon the Government. The War Department has been considerably exercised over the numerous letters of inquiry and protest that were inspired by articles in the religious weeklies and resolutions passed by religious bodies. Nor have the protests come merely from pacifists and pacifist societies; some of them have come from the most conservative sources. Two prominent clergymen resigned their commissions as chaplains in the reserve corps because of the War Department's plans. Others have expressed their intention of obeying the mobilization order under protest. Influential religious journals to which social radicalism is quite unwelcome have carried ringing denunciations of the "militaristic gesture." Certain church federations called upon the President, . . . to call it off. . . .

The Government's View

It should be said that there is a certain logic in the War Department's position, with reference to the test of its plans. The Department is thinking in terms of the military resources and mobilization plans of other nations. They cite the French army, totaling, regulars and colonials, 752,000 men, with 4,420,000 trained reserves and compulsory training; the Japanese army, with its 250,000 men in active service and 1,904,000 reserves, and compulsory training; the Russian army to which they assign a strength of 700,000 under arms, and a total trained man power of 5,432,760, with compulsory training.

The American army on the other hand, is limited by law to 125,000 enlisted men, a national guard, which at no time greatly exceeds the regular army, and the officers who served in the World War, a wholly civilian force, who constitute the major part of the potential military establishment. In the foreign countries enumerated, mobilization would doubtless be, as War Department officials point out, a colossal regimentation of the population compared with which the plans for September 12 are but a summer holiday. As the army sees it, assuming the necessity of a test of defense plans, those of the War Department represent the least possible disturbance of our civilian life. And in support of this view they cite the evident indifference of European countries to the published plans for Defense Day.

Significance of a Minority Protest

There is no indication that the protests which have given the War Department so much concern represent more than a minority opinion. While several of the governors have protested, the majority of them are apparently cooperating with the Federal Government. The League of Women Voters has condemned the project, but other representative bodies are offering no objection.

The Secretary of War has received from the president general of the Daughters of the American Revolution a letter assuring him that twenty-six societies which she names "will cooperate with the Government in the holding of the 'Defense Test' on September 12." For the most part they are military orders or war memorial organizations, such as the Sons of the American Revolution, the Daughters of 1812, the United Confederate Veterans, etc., of which there is a surprising number. . . .

Yet the response from leaders of ethical and religious thought has been vigorous and impressive, and furnishes an example of the effectiveness of even minority sentiment when morally buttressed and presented with persistence.

The protests of Governor Baxter of Maine, Governor Bryan of Nebraska, Governor Sweet of Colorado, and Governor Blaine of Wisconsin have appeared in the press. Governor Bryan consented to mobilization of the Guard, but Governor Sweet has refused even this participation. Governor Baxter declares he will take no action toward securing observance of the day. Upon publication of Governor Baxter's statement which was the first of the series, Governor Blaine of Wisconsin wired him, heartily agreeing with his position.

Governor Smith of New York, who has kept the matter before him for some time, has finally agreed to cooperate in the plan but has called upon the public to go to church on September 12 and give thanks for the preservation of peace and security and to pray for the continuing of goodwill among all nations. . . .

Main Street's Been Paved!

By SINCLAIR LEWIS

WHEN THE NATION ASKED ME to visit Gopher Prairie, Minnesota, and ask the real he-Americans what they thought of the presidential campaign, I was reluctant. Of all the men whom I met in Gopher Prairie years ago, during that college vacation when I gathered my slight knowledge of the village, Dr. Will Kennicott was the one whom I best knew, and for him I held, and hold, a Little Brother awe. He is merely a country practitioner, not vastly better than the average, yet he is one of these assured, deep-chested, easy men who are always to be found when you want them, and who are rather amused by persons like myself that go sniffing about, wondering what it all means.

I telegraphed the doctor asking whether he would be home, for sometimes in summer he loads his wife and the three boys in his car and goes north for a couple of weeks' fishing. He answered—by letter; he never wastes money by telegraphing. Yes. He was in Gopher Prairie till the middle of August; would be glad to talk with me; knew Carrie (his wife) would enjoy a visit with me also, as she liked to get the latest gossip about books, psychoanalysis, grand opera, glands, etc., and other interests of the intellectual bunch in N. Y.

I arrived in Gopher Prairie on No. 3, the Spokane Flier. Many people will be interested to know that No. 3 is now leaving Minneapolis at 12:04, that the St. Dominick stop has been cut out, and that Mike Lembcke, the veteran trainman so long and favorably known to every drummer traveling out of Mpls., has been transferred to the F line, his daughter having married a man in Tudor.

I was interested to see the changes in Gopher Prairie in the past ten years. Main Street now has three complete blocks paved in cement. The Commercial and Progress Club had erected a neat little building with a room to be used either for pleasure and recreation or for banquets; it has card tables, a pool table, a top-notch radio; and here on important occasions, like the visit of the Congressman or the entertainment of the Twin City Shriners' Brass Band, the ladies of the Baptist Church put up a regular city feed for the men folks. The lawns are prettier than they used to be; a number of the old mansions—some of them dating back to 1885—have been rejuvenated and beautified by a coating of stucco over the clapboards; and Dave Dyer has a really remarkable California bungalow, with casement windows, a kind of Swiss chalet effect about the eaves, and one of the tallest radio aerial masts I have seen west of Detroit.

But quite as striking was the change in Dr. Kennicott's office.

The consulting-room has been lined with some patent material which looked almost exactly like white tiling—the only trouble with it, he told me, is that lint and so on sticks to it. The waiting-room is very fetching and comfortable, with tapestry-cushioned reed chairs and a long narrow Art Table on which lie Vogue, the Literary Digest, Photo Play, and Broadcasting Tidings.

When I entered, the doctor was busy in the consulting-room, and waiting for him was a woman of perhaps forty, a smallish woman with horn-rimmed spectacles which made her little face seem childish, though it was a childishness dubious and tired and almost timid. She must once, I noted, have been slender and pretty, but she was growing dumpy and static, and about her was an air of having lost her bloom.

I did not at first, though I had often talked to her, recognize her as Carol, Dr. Kennicott's good wife.

She remembered me, however, by my inescapable ruddiness and angularity; and she said that the doctor and she did hope I'd drop in for a little visit after supper—she was sorry they couldn't invite me to supper, but the new hired girl was not coming along as well as they had hoped, as she was a Pole and couldn't speak a word of English. But I must be sure to come. There would be a really fine concert from WKZ that evening—of course so much of the broadcast stuff was silly, but this would be a real old-time fiddler playing barn-dance music—all the familiar airs, and you could hear his foot stamping time just as plain as though he were right there in the room—the neighbors came in to enjoy it, every Thursday evening. Oh! And could I tell her—— There'd been such an argument at the Thanatopsis Club the other day as to what was the dernier cri in literature just now. What did I think? Was it Marcel Proust or James Joyce or "So Big" by Edna Ferber?

She couldn't wait any longer for the doctor. Would I mind telling him to be sure to bring home the thermos bottle, as they would need it for the Kiwanis picnic?

SHE whispered away. I thought she hesitated at the door. Then the big, trim doctor came out of the consulting-room, patting the shoulder of a frightened old woman, and chuckling, "So! So! Don't you let 'em scare you. We'll take care of it all right!"

From his voice any one would have drawn confidence; have taken a sense of security against the world—though perhaps a sense of feebleness and childishness and absurdity in comparison with the man himself; altogether the feeling of the Younger Brother.

I fumbled at my mission.

"Doctor, a New York magazine—you may not have heard of it, but I remember that Mrs. Kennicott used to read it till she switched over from it to the Christian Science Monitor—The Nation, it's called; they asked me to go around and find out how the presidential campaign is starting, and I thought you'd be one of the——"

"Look here, Lewis, I've got a kind of a hunch I know exactly what you want me to do. You like me personally—you'd probably take a chance on my doctoring you. But you feel that outside of my business I'm a complete dumbbell. You hope I'm going to pull a lot of bonehead cracks about books and writings and politics, so you can go off and print 'em. All right. I don't mind. But before you lash me to the mast and show me up as a terrible reactionary—that's what you parlor socialists call it, ain't it?—before you kid me into saying the things you've already made up your mind you're going to make me say, just come out and make a few calls with me, will you?"

As I followed him downstairs I had more than usual of the irritated meekness such men always cast over me.

He pointed to a handsome motor with an inclosed body.

"You see, Lewis, I'm doing all the Babbitt things you love to have me do. That's my new Buick coop, and strange to say I'd rather own it—paid for in advance!—than a lot of cubist masterpieces with lop-jawed women. I know I oughtn't to get that way. I know that if I'd just arrange my life to suit you and the rest of the highbrows, why, I'd make all my calls on foot, carrying a case of bootlegged wood alcohol under one arm and a few choice books about communism under the other. But when it drops much below zero, I've got a curious backwoods preference for driving in a good warm boat."

I became a bit sharp. "Hang it, doctor, I'm not a fool. Personally, I drive a Cadillac!"

THIS happened to be a lie. The only mechanical contrivance I own is not a Cadillac but a Royal typewriter. Yet I was confused by his snatching away my chance to be superior by being superior to me, and for the second I really did believe I could beat him at motoring-owning as I can beat him at theories of aesthetics.

He grinned. "Yeh, you probably do. That's why you haven't got any excuse at all. I can understand a down-and-outer becoming a crank and wanting to have Bob La Follette or this William X. Foster—or, God! even Debs!—for President. But you limousine socialists, a fellow like you that's written for the real he-magazines and might maybe be right up in the class of Nina Wilcox Putnam or even Harry Leon Wilson, if you did less gassing and drinking and more work and real hard thinking—how you can go on believing that people are properly impressed by your pose of pretending to love all the lousy bums—well, that's beyond me. Well, as I said: Before we go into politics and Coolidge, I want to show you a couple of things to point out what I mean."

He called to Dave Dyer, in the drug-store. Dave is really an amiable fellow; he used to keep me supplied with beer; and we would sit up, talking science or telling dirty stories or playing stud poker, till a couple of hours after everybody else in town had gone to bed—till almost midnight.

Dave came out and shouted: "Glad to see you again, Lewis."

"Mighty nice to see you, Dave."

"I hear you been up in Canada."

"Yuh, I was up there f'r little trip."

"Have nice trip?"

"You bet. Fine."

"Bet you had a fine trip. How's fishing up there?"

"Oh, fine, Dave. I caught an eleven-and-a-half pound pickerel—jack-fish they call 'em up there—well, I didn't exactly catch it personally, but my brother Claude did—he's the surgeon in St. Cloud."

"Eleven naf pounds, eh? Well, that's a pretty good-sized fish. Heard you been abroad."

"Yes."

"Well. . . . How'd the crops strike you in Canada?"

"Fine. Well, not so good in some parts."

"How long you planning stay around here?"

"Oh, just a couple days."

"Well, glad to seen you. Drop in and see me while you're here."

I was conscious, through this agreeable duologue, that Dr. Kennicott was grinning again. Dave Dyer's amiability had lubricated my former doubtfulness and I was able to say almost as one on a plane of normality with him: "Oh, what are you sniggering at?"

"Oh, nothing, nothing—posolutely Mr. Leopold, absotively Mr. Loeb. (Say, that's a pretty cute one, eh? I got it off the radio last night.) I just mean it always tickles me to see the way you loosen up and forget you're a highbrow when you run into a regular guy like Dave. You're like Carrie. As long as she thinks about it, she's a fierce Forward Looker and Deep Thinker and Viewer with Alarm. But let the hired girl leave the iron on a tablecloth and burn it, and Carrie forgets all about being a Cultured Soul and bawls hell out of her. Sure. You write about Debs, but I'd like to see you acting natural with him like you do with Dave!"

"But really, I'm very fond of Gene."

"Yeh. Sure. 'Gene' you call him—that's the distress signal of your lodge—all you hoboes and authors and highbrows have to say 'Gene.' Well, I notice when you talk to Dave, you talk American, but when you get uplifty on us, you talk like you toted a monocle. Well, climb in."

I considered the sure skill, the easy sliding of the steering-wheel, with which he backed his car from the curb, slipped it forward, swung it about the new automatic electric traffic signal at the corner of Main and Iowa, and accelerated to thirty-five.

"I guess you've noticed the paving on Main Street now," he said. "People that read your junk prob'ly think we're still wading through the mud, but on properly laid cement the mud ain't so noticeable that it bothers you any! But I want to show you a couple of other things that otherwise you'd never see. If I didn't drag you out, your earnest investigation would consist of sitting around with Carrie and Guy Pollock, and agreeing with them that we hicks are awful slow in finally making Gopher Prairie as old as Boston. . . . Say, do you play golf?"

"No, I haven't——"

"Yeh. Thought so. No Fearless Author or Swell Bird would condescend to lam a pill. Golf is a game played only by folks like poor old Doc Kennicott of G. P., and the Prince of Wales and Ring Lardner and prob'ly this H. G. Wells you're always writing about. Well, cast your eye over that, will you."

We had stopped, here on the edge of Gopher Prairie—this prairie village lost in immensities of wheat and naivetes, this place of Swede farmers and Seventh Day Adventists and sleeve-garters—beside a golf course with an attractive clubhouse, and half a dozen girls wearing smart skirts and those Patrick sweaters which are so much more charming, more gay, than anything on Bond Street or Rue de la Paix.

And in a pasture beside the golf course rested an aeroplane.

I could say only: "Yes. I see. But why the aeroplane?"

"Oh, it just belongs to a couple more Main Streeters from some place in Texas that are taking a little tourist trip round all the golf courses in the country—terrible pair, Lewis; one of 'em is a Methodist preacher that believes hard work is better for a man than whiskey—never would dare to stand up in a bacteriological argument with this give-'em-the-razz scientist friend of yours, DeKruif; and the other is a cowardly lowbrow that got his Phi Beta Kappa at Yale and is now guilty of being vice-president of a railroad. And one other curious little thing: I went into Mac's barber-shop to get my shoes shined this morning, and Mac says to me: 'Afraid you got to let 'em go dusty, Doc—the bootblack is out playing golf.' Now, of course, we're a bad, mean, capitalistic bunch that 're going to vote for that orful Wall Street hireling, Coolidge. In fact, we're reg'lar sadists. So naturally we don't mind playing golf with the bird that blacks our shoes, and we don't mind the hired girl calling us by our first names, while you earnest souls——"

He had forced me to it. "Oh, go to hell!"

He chuckled. "Oh, we'll save you yet. You'll be campaigning for Cal Coolidge."

"Like hell I will!"

"Look, Lewis. May I, as a rube, with nothing but an A. B. from the U of Minn (and pretty doggone good marks in all subjects, too, let me tell you!) inform you that you pulled 'hell' twice in successive sentences, and that the first person singular future indicative of the verb 'to be' is 'shall' and not 'will'? Pardon my hinting this to a stylist like you. . . . Look, I'm not really trying to razz you; I'm really trying the best method of defense, which I believe is attack. Of course you don't think so. If the Japs were invading America, you'd want to have a swell line of soap boxes built along the California coast, and have this bird Villard, and this John Haynes Holmes, and this Upton Sinclair—and prob'ly Lenin and Trotzky and Mother Eddy and some Abrams practitioners and Harry Thaw—all get up on 'em and tell the dear artistic Japs how you love 'em, and then of course they'd just be too ashamed to come in and rape our women. But, personally, I'd believe in going out with one grand sweet wallop to meet 'em."

"Doctor, you have two advantages. Like all conservatives, all stout fellows, you can always answer opponents by representing them as having obviously absurd notions which they do not possess, then with tremendous vigor showing that these non-existent traits are obviously absurd, and ignoring any explanation. But we cranks try to find out what is the reality of things—a much less stout and amusing job. And then, while we admit enormous ignorances, you never try to diagnose anything you can't physic or cut out. You like to do an appendectomy, but an inquiry into the nature of 'success'——"

"I've noticed one funny thing in all your writings and stuff, Lewis. Whenever you have to refer to a major operation, you always make it an appendectomy. Have you a particular fondness for 'em, or don't you know the names of any others? I'd be glad to buy you a medical dictionary. All right. I'll quit. Now I want to show you a few other changes in G. P."

He drove back into town; he pointed out the new schoolbuilding, with its clear windows, perfect ventilation, and warm-hued tapestry brick.

"That," he said, "is largely Vida Wutherspoon's doing. Remember her and you and Carrie used to argue about education? You were all for having Jacques Loebs and Erasmuses and Mark Hopkinses teaching, and she concentrated on clean drinking-pails. Well, she pounded at us till we built this. . . . Meantime, what've you done for education?"

I ignored it, and asked what sort of teachers in this admirably ventilated building were explaining Homer and biochemistry and the glory of God to the youth of Gopher Prairie.

"The teachers? Oh, I guess they're a bunch of dubs like the rest of us; plain ordinary folks. I guess they don't know much about Homer and biochemistry. . . . By the way, in which school are you giving your superior notions about Homer and biochemistry, and meanwhile correcting themes, and trying to help the girls that get so inspired by the sort of junk you and Mencken write that they blow home at three G. M., lit to the guards? You hint—of course you haven't met any of 'em but you know it all beforehand—you aren't satisfied with our teaching; we've got a bunch of dumb-bells. . . . Willing to come here and teach Latin, math, and history, so they'll be done right? I'm on the schoolboard. I'll get you the job. Want to?"

At my answer he sniggered and drove on. He showed me the agreeable new station—depot, I think he called it—with its flower-bordered park; the old-fashioned English garden put in by a retired German farmer; and the new State fish-hatchery. He demanded: "Well, how about it? Main Street seem to be existing almost as well as the average back alley of some burg in Italy?"

"Certainly. You have them completely beaten—materially!"

"I see. Well, now we've got one other exhibit that we, anyway, don't think is just 'material'—how birds like you love that word! We've got a baseball team that's licked every town of our size in the State, and we got it by hiring a professional pitcher and coach for five months, and going down into our jeans, without any 'material' return, and paying him three hundred dollars a week!"

"How much do you pay your teachers a month?" was all I had to say, but it provided voluble, inconclusive debate which lasted the twenty-odd miles to a hamlet called New Prague.

DR. KENNICOTT stopped at a peasant-like cottage in the Polish settlement of New Prague, and as he knocked I beheld him change from a Booster to the Doctor. What he did in that house I do not know. I do not understand these big suave men who go in to terrified women and perform mysteries and come out—calm, solid, like stockbrokers. During his fifteen minutes within there was the shriek of a woman, the homicidal voice of a man speaking some Slavic tongue—and as he started off he said to me only: "Well, I think I've got her to listen to reason."

"Good Lord, what reason? What do you mean? What happened in there? Who was the man? Her husband or another?"

I have never seen quite so coldly arrogant a cock of the eyebrow as Kennicott gave me.

"Lewis, I don't mind explaining my financial affairs to you, or my lack of knowledge of endocrinology, or my funny notion that an honest-to-God Vermont school-teacher like Cal Coolidge may understand America better than the average pants-maker who hasn't been over from Lithuania but six months. If you insist on it, of course I shouldn't mind a bit discussing my sexual relations to Carrie. But I do not ever betray my patients' confidence!"

It was splendid.

Of course it didn't happen to be true. He had often told me his secrets, with the patients' names. But aside from this flaw it was a noble attitude, and I listened becomingly as he boomed on:

"So! Let that pass. Now, why I brought you out here was: Look at this cross-roads burg. Mud and shacks and one big Ford garage and one big Catholic church. The limit. But look at those two Janes coming."

He lifted his square, competent hand from the steering-wheel and pointed at two girls who were passing a hovel bearing the sign "Gas, Cigarettes, Pop, and EATS"; and those girls wore well-cut skirts, silk stockings, such shoes as can be bought nowhere in Europe, quiet blouses, bobbed hair, charming straw hats, and easily cynical expressions terrifying to an awkward man.

"Well," demanded Kennicott. "How about it? Hicks, I suppose!"

"They would look at home in Newport. Only——"

He exploded. "Sure. 'Only.' You birds always have to pull an 'only' or an 'except' when we poor dubs make you come look at facts! Now, do stop trying to be a wise cracker for about ten seconds and listen to a plain, hard-working, damn successful Regular Guy! Those girls—patients of mine—they're not only dressed as well as any of your Newports or Parises or anywhere else, but they're also darn' straight, decent, hard-working kids—one of 'em slings hash in that God-awful hick eating joint we just passed. And to hear 'em talk—Oh, maybe they giggle too much, but they're up on all the movies and radio and books and everything. And both their dads are Bohemians; old mossbacks; tough old birds with whiskers, that can't sling no more English than a mushrat. And yet in one generation, here's their kids—real queens. That's what we're producing here, while you birds are panning us—talking—talking——"

FOR the first time I demanded a right to answer. I agreed, I said, that these seemed to be very attractive, probably very clever little girls, and that it was noteworthy that in one generation they should have arisen, in all their radio-wise superiority, from the bewildered peasants one sees huddling at Ellis Island. Only, was it Doc Kennicott and Dave Dyer and the rest of Main Street who were producing them? Dr. Kennicott might teach them the preferability of listening to the radio instead of humming Czech folk-songs, but hadn't they themselves had something to do with developing their own pretty ankles, buying their own pretty silk stockings, and learning their own gay manners?

And, I desired to be informed, why was it that to Dr. Kennicott the sleek gaiety of socialistic Slavic girls in New York was vicious, a proof that they were inferior, a proof that no one save Vermont conservatives should be allowed to go through Ellis Island, while the sleek gaiety of movie-meditating Slavic girls on Main Street was a proof of their superiority? Was it because the one part had Dr. Kennicott for physician and the other did not?

There was debate again. I perceived that I had not begun to get my interview; that I was likely to be fired by Mr. Villard. I calmed the doctor by agreeing that his ideas were as consistent as they were practical; and at last I had him explaining Coolidgeism, while he drove back to Gopher Prairie at thirty-five on straight stretches, twenty on curves.

"WELL, I hope you're beginning to get things a little straighter now, Lewis. I wanted you to see some of the actual down-to-brass-tacks things we've accomplished—the paving on Main Street, the golf course, the silk stockings, the radios—before I explained why everybody around here except maybe a few sorehead farmers who'll vote for La Follette, and the incurable hereditary Democrats who'll stick by Davis, is going to vote for Coolidge. We're people that are doing things—we're working or warring—and in the midst of work or war you don't want a bunch of conversation; you want results.

"Now, first you expect me—prob'bly you've already got it written; darn' shame you'll have to change it—you expect me to pan hell out of Bob La Follette. You expect me to say he's a nut and a crook and a boob and a pro-German. Well, gosh, maybe I would've up till a couple of years after the war. But as a matter of fact, I'm willing—I'm glad to admit he's probably a darn' decent fellow, and knows quite a lot. Maybe it's even been a good thing, some ways, to have a sorehead like him in the Senate, to razz some of the saner element who otherwise might have been so conservative that they wouldn't have accomplished anything. I imagine prob'bly La Follette is a good, honest, intelligent man, a fighter, and a fellow that does things. But that's just the trouble. We mustn't be doing too many things, not just now. There's a ticklish situation in the world, with international politics all mixed up and everything, and what we need is men that, even if maybe they haven't got quite so much imagination and knowledge, know how to keep cool and not rock the boat.

"Just suppose a couple of years ago, when Banting was working out insulin for diabetes but his claims weren't confirmed yet, suppose you and all the rest of you Earnest Thinkers, including La Follette, had come to me hollering that I was wrong to go on doing the honest best I could just dieting my diabetes patients. You tell me about Banting—but equally you tell me about some other scientist named, say, Boggs, who had something new for diabetes. What'd I have done? Why, I'd of gone right on being a stingy old conservative and dieting my cases!

"Now, when it proves Banting is right and Boggs is wrong, I follow Banting and kick out Boggs, but I don't do either till I know. Boggs might have been a wiz, that took his degree of X. Y. Z. at Jena, but he was premature—he was wrong—he wanted to do too much. Well, La Follette is Boggs, a beaner but plumb wrong, and I and some twenty-thirty million other Americans, we're Coolidge, sitting back and watching, handing it to Banting and such when they prove they've got the goods, but never going off half-cocked.

"The trouble with La Follette isn't that he'd lay down on his job or not understand about railroads and the tariff but that he'd be experimenting all the time. He'd be monkeying around trying to fix things and change things all the time. And prob'bly there's lots of things that do need fixings. But just now, in these critical times, we need a driver that won't try to adjust the carburetor while he's making a steep hill.

"So. Not that I mean we're worried—as long as we have a cool head like Cal's at the wheel, with his Cabinet for four-wheel brakes. We ain't been half so worried as you Calamity Howlers. You say that unless La Follette is elected, gosh, the dome of the Capitol will slide off into the Potomac, and Germany will jump on France, and prob'bly my aerial mast will get blown down. Well, far's I can see, most of the folks around here are getting their three squares a day, and the only thing that seems to keep agriculture from progressing is the fact that the farmers can get three bucks a quart for white mule, so they're doing more distilling than manuring.

"Oh, yes, we've had bank failures and there's an increase of tenant-farming. But d' ever occur to you that maybe it's a good thing to close up a lot of these little one-horse banks, so we can combine on bigger and better ones? And about this tenant business; is that any worse than when every farmer owned his own land but had such a big mortgage plastered on it that he didn't really own it at all?

"No, sir, you got to look into these things scientifically. . . . Say, is that left front fender squeaking or do I imagine it? There, don't you hear it now? I do. I'll have Mat fix it. Gosh, how I hate a squeak in a car!

"Now I imagine this sheet The Nation tries to let on that the whole country is rising against the terrible rule of Coolidge. And I saw a copy of this American Mercury —Guy Pollock lent it to me—where some bird said Coolidge was nothing but a tricky little politician with nothing above the eyebrows. . . . By the way, notice that Ford and Edison and Firestone are going to call on him? Of course those lads, that 're merely the most successful men of affairs and ideas in the country, they're plumb likely to call on a four-flushing accident! Oh, sure!

"Well, now look here. First place, did you ever see a four-flusher that went on holding people's confidence? I never did—Oh, except maybe this chiropractor that blew into town three years ago and darned if he isn't still getting away with it! In the second place, suppose Cal were just a tricky little politician, without a he-idea in his bean. Well, what do you need for the office of President?

"For medicine, and for writing too, I imagine, some ways, you need brains. You're working single-handed, no one to pass the buck to, and you got to show results. But a preacher now, all he's got to do is to make a hit with his sermons, and a lawyer simply has to convince the poor cheeses on the jury that his learned opponent is a lying slob. In the same way, for President you need a fellow that can pull the wool over everybody's eyes, whether it's in the primaries back home in Hickville or whether it's dealing with Japan or Russia. If Cal can get by without having any goods whatever, then he's the boy we want, to keep the labor unions in order and kid along the European nations!

"Then, next place. . . . Oh, all this talk is just wasted energy. You know and I know that Coolidge is going to be elected. Be better if they called the election off and saved a lot of money, and damn the Constitution! Why, nobody is interested, not one doggone bit.

"As you ride around the country, do you hear anybody talking politics? You hear 'em talking about Leopold and Loeb, about Kid McCoy, about the round-the-world fliers, about Tommy Gibbons's battle in England, about their flivvers and their radios. But politics—nix! And why? Because they know Coolidge is already elected! Even the unregenerate old Democrats, that would love to have Brother Charlie run the country on the same darned-fool, unscientific, they-say basis on which William Jennings has the nerve to criticize evolution!

"I haven't met one single responsible well-to-do person who's for La Follette. Who've we got boosting him, then? Well, I can tell you—I can tell you mighty darn' quick! A lot of crank farmers that because they don't want to work and keep their silos filled want to make up for it by some one who, they hope, will raise the price of wheat enough so they can get by without tending to business! The fellows that 've always followed any crazy movement—that ran after the Populists and the Nonpartisan League! And a lot of workmen in the cities that think if some crank comes into office they'll all become federal employees and able to quit working!

"But aside from these hoboes—— Well, I guess I've asked a hundred people who they were going to vote for, some around G. P. and some on the smoker down to St. Paul, and ninety out of the hundred say: 'Why, gosh, I haven't thought much about it. Haven't had time to make up my mind. I dunno. Besides, anyway, I guess Cal is going to win.'

"Now, about these so-called 'exposures' of the Attorney General and so on. Well, I've always suspected there was a lot more to it than you saw on the surface—lot of fellows trying to make political capital out of it—and the fact that Wheeler is running with La Follette proves my contention, and I for one don't propose to let him get away with it, let me tell you that right now!

"Nope. Unless we have an awful' bad crop failure, and the crops never looked better than they do this year, we've got you licked. Cal is elected. It's all over but the shouting."

I CALLED on Kennicott and his wife after six o'clock supper, but I could not get the talk back to the campaign. Carol hesitated that, yes, she did admire La Follette, and Davis must be a man of fine manners if he could be ambassador to the Court of St. James's, but just this year, with so many bank failures and all, it wasn't safe to experiment, and she thought she would vote for Coolidge; then some other time we could try changes. And now—brightening —had I seen "The Miracle" and "St. Joan"? Were they really as lovely and artistic as people said?

It was time to tune in on the barn-dance music from WKZ, and we listened to "Turkey in the Straw"; we sat rocking, rocking, the doctor and I smoking cigars, Carol inexplicably sighing.

At ten I felt that they would rather more than endure my going, and I ambled up a Main Street whose glare of cement pavement, under a White Way of resplendent electric lights, was empty save for bored but ejaculatory young men supporting themselves by the awning-cords in front of Billy's Lunch Room and the Ford Garage. I climbed to the office of Guy Pollock, that lone, fastidious attorney with whom Carol and I used once, in the supposition that we were "talking about literature," to exchange book titles.

He was at home, in his unchanged shabby den, reading Van Loon's "Story of the Bible."

He was glad to see me. With Kennicott I had felt like an intruder; to Carol I seemed to give a certain uneasiness; but Guy was warm.

After amenities, after questions about the death of this man, the success of that, I murmured, "Well, there've been a lot of changes in the town—the pavement and all."

"Yes, a lot. And there's more coming. We're to have a new water system. And hourly buses to the Twin Cities —fast as the trains, and cheaper. And a new stone Methodist church. Only——"

"'Ware that word!"

"I know it. Only—only I don't like the town as well as I used to. There's more talk, about automobiles and the radio, but there's less conversation, less people who are interested in scandals, politics, abstractions, gallantries, smut, or anything else save their new A batteries. Since Dr. Westlake died, and this fellow Miles Bjornstam went away, and Vida Sherwin's become absorbed in her son's progress in the Boy Scouts, and even Carol Kennicott—Oh, well, the doctor has convinced her that to be denunciatory or even very enthusiastic isn't quite respectable—I don't seem to be awakened by the talk of any one here.

"And in the old days there were the pioneers. They thought anybody who didn't attend an evangelical church every Sunday ought to be lynched, but they were full of juice and jests. They're gone, almost all of them. They've been replaced by people with bath-tubs and coupés and porch-furniture and speed-boats and lake-cottages, who are determined that their possessions of these pretty things shall not be threatened by radicals, and that their comments on them shall not be interrupted by mere speculation on the soul of man.

"Not, understand me, that I should prefer the sort of little people you must find in Greenwich Village, who do nothing but chatter. I like people who pay their debts, who work, and love their wives. I wouldn't want to see here a bunch of superior souls sitting on the floor and dropping cigarette butts in empty hootch glasses. Only——"

He scratched his chin. "Oh, I don't know. But it depresses me so, the perpetual bright talk about gas-mileage and mah jong here. They sing of four-wheel brakes as the Persian poets sang of rose leaves; their religion is road-paving and their patriotism the relation of weather to Sunday motoring; and they discuss balloon tires with a quiet fervor such as the fifteenth century gave to the Immaculate Conception. I feel like creeping off to a cottage in the Massachusetts hills and taking up my Greek again. Oh, let's talk of simpler things!"

"Then tell me your opinion of the presidential campaign. I suppose you'll vote for Coolidge. I remember you always liked books that the public libraries barred out as immoral, but you wanted to hang the I. W. W. and you thought La Follette was a doubtful fellow."

"Did I? Well, this time I'm going to vote for La Follette. I think most of the people who resent, when they go calling, having good talk interrupted by having to listen to morons saying 'Well, good evening, folks!' amid the demoniac static from the loud-speaker—most of them must vote for La Follette, and if we don't elect him this year, some time we shall. I have faith that the very passion in the worship of the Great God Motor must bring its own reaction."

"Kennicott feels he has us beaten forever."

"If he has, if the only voice ever to be heard at the altar is Coolidge on the phonograph and the radio, then our grandsons will have to emigrate to Siberia. But I don't believe it. Even the Kennicotts progress—I hope. His ancestors ridiculed Harvey, then Koch, and Pasteur, but he accepts them; and his grandsons will laugh at Coolidge as Kennicott now laughs at the whiskers of Rutherford B. Hayes.

"But meanwhile I feel a little lonely, in the evenings. Now, that the movies have, under the nation-wide purification by fundamentalism and the rigid Vermont ideals of the President, changed almost entirely from the lively absurdities of cowpuncher films to unfaithful wives and ginny flappers in bathing suits, I can't even attend them. I'm going—and, Lord, how I'll be roasted by the respectable lawyers!—I'm going out to campaign for La Follette!

"We must all do it. We've been bullied too long by the Doc Kennicotts and by the beautiful big balloon tires that roll over the new pavement on Main Street—and over our souls!"

La Follette's "Strategy"

(The Nation's Weekly Washington Letter)

By WILLIAM HARD

EVERY presidential candidate, as this writer is never wearied of pointing out, must have a strategy. The press gallery insists upon it. Further, in order to acquire a strategy he must have a "board" of strategy. The members of the board sit and "analyze the situation" and return to their chief and say: "We discover that most of the members of our party are Presbyterians. We accordingly, after much thinking, have worked it out that it would be a great stroke of policy on your part if you would refrain from denouncing John Calvin by name."

They give the candidate this strategical advice; and then the candidate, so far as this writer has ever been able to solve what happens, goes and consults his own temperament.

This writer stands for the theory that politics is much less mysterious, much less strategical, much less insincere, much more natural, much more instinctive, much simpler than often it is made out to be.

Mr. John W. Davis simply cannot help stressing international affairs. He happens personally to be interested in them. He has had personal experience in them. They come close to his mind. They come close to his heart. If he consulted strategy, he would be much more cautious in approaching that subject. The so-called Dawes report has the center of the international stage. Rightly or wrongly—and it makes no difference strategically which—the so-called Dawes report is popularly regarded as the greatest international achievement since the surrender of Germany. Every time Mr. Davis mentions international affairs he advertises the Republican candidacy for the Vice-Presidency. Nevertheless Mr. Davis conscientiously and passionately believes that a better way of conducting the European relations of the United States can be and should be devised, and he simply has to bear testimony to that belief.

Similarly, Calvin Coolidge, if he really consulted strategy, would be far more cautious in criticizing and opposing excess-profits taxes and in favoring and advocating reductions of the higher income surtaxes. Such ideas are far from being really popular. Mr. Coolidge nevertheless, conscientiously and with all the vehemence of a Vermont pocket-book, believes that taking large sums of money away from an individual in order to give it to the Government and to bureaucratic endeavors is a bad thing for the neighbors and for their prosperity.

Politicians all the time are doing violence to their strategical interests in favor of their temperamental preferences.

For this confiding, innocent, child-like view of politics this writer is much derided by his friends. He takes refuge in the conviction that there are more things than the Kingdom of Heaven which cannot be understood except by being sufficiently child-like to understand men of action.

Their professional observers may be grown up. They themselves are children. They do not, in fact, act by strategy. They act by something within them which makes them so act. It may be called impulse. It may be called creative evolution. Whatever it is, it is the thing which compels their behavior; and that is the reason why Napoleon went to Moscow to ruin and why Caesar went across the Rubicon to glory. Each was infinitely wise. Each nevertheless, irrespective of wisdom, followed something in him that made him want to do what he did, and he did it.

Davis, Coolidge, La Follette, each may think of strategy, but each in the end is more dominated by his nature than by his thought. Or, perhaps to put it more exactly, he is more dominated by impulses than by calculations.

La Follette, by nature, by impulses, is led to the question of monopoly.

How much intense public interest is there today in the question of monopoly? Surely any observer of public sentiment could name at least six or seven other public questions which are more exciting to the contemporary public than the question of monopoly. Nevertheless, La Follette absolutely will make the question of monopoly the leading question in his efforts to acquire the Presidency.

He will subordinate the question of the Ku Klux Klan. He will subordinate the question of the railroads. He will subordinate the question of public ownership of railroads. He will subordinate the question of agriculture and the question of labor, though the bulk of his support is strategically supposed to come from agriculturists and laborers. He will subordinate the direct appeal to them. He principally and dominantly will assail monopoly.

It is the good old ancestral Northwestern issue. Ignatius Donnelly had it. The Grangers had it. The Greenbackers had it. The Populists had it. The Progressives of 1912, being led by a New Yorker, did not have it so much. They discriminated between "good trusts" and "bad trusts."

The Northwesterners are not so subtle. They are more old-fashioned. They are for competition. They are for "the law of supply and demand."

Does anybody want to know the biggest joke in this campaign? Here it is: Business men say they are for "the law of supply and demand." That is one of their staples of conversation. That is one of their verbal immortal principles. They would rather talk about "the law of supply and demand" than about anything else. Then often they have entered into combinations and conspiracies through which by concerted action "the law of supply and demand" is negatived.

La Follette is for eliminating and uprooting and destroying all combinations and conspiracies, in so far as they are artificial, and for restoring competition and for allowing "the law of supply and demand" to go actually and ruthlessly to work. La Follette is actually and ruthlessly for the stuff which the business community says it is for.

How many voters will ever get that point? How many voters would give one minute off from a movie to understand the inwardness—whatever it may be—of the anthracite coal situation?

Such considerations will not—and cannot—deter La Follette any more than the indifference of the public to foreign affairs can deter Davis or any more than the hostility of the public to low taxes for the rich can deter Coolidge. Each candidate will follow something in him that is superior to strategy and superior to any regard for the feelings of that great supposed despot which each of them affects to worship—the electorate.

The world is not governed by great men who calculate the world. It is governed by great men who are sufficiently themselves to imagine that what they want the world wants too.

Is that view of politics child-like?

The New Psychology and the Franks Case

By LEONARD BLUMGART

THE letters Judge Caverly has been receiving each day of the trial of the murderers Loeb and Leopold are a slight indication of the enormous number of people who have sat in judgment on them. No doubt some have imagined themselves in the place of the parents of the murderers, or of their legal defenders or prosecutors, many in the place of the murderers themselves. By far the greatest number probably have identified themselves with the presiding judge and passed sentence.

Their approach to the case is for the most part subjective and emotional, yet those who are most clamorous for the death penalty rationalize it as a warning to future offenders. Even a practicing psychoanalyst with whom I talked was for hanging, for he holds the common belief that fear is the greatest preventive of crime. It never seemed to occur to him that fear is also a great cause of crime. May not crime be a result of the individual's primitive striving to overcome some real or imagined deficiency in his personality?

In the cases under discussion practically all the behavior can be viewed as compensation for a sense of inferiority either physical or emotional. The over-development of Leopold's intellectual life was a never-ending and ineffectual attempt to defend himself against his own homosexual perversion. He trained himself to have no emotions, because he associated all feeling with the one feeling which he knew marked him out from his fellows, and which he feared and abhorred. Leopold's fear of his own abnormal feelings, not fear of the consequences of his crime, was the basic cause of most of his behavior. The greatest deterrent of crime is intelligence. To quote the psychoanalyst again, "Why, Leopold has a superb intelligence!" Undoubtedly Leopold has a very superior intellect, as Dr. Healy's examination showed, but one would hardly call his behavior intelligent.

The psychiatrists for the defense made an objective examination of the physical, intellectual, and emotional aspects of the defendants' lives. They tried to cover all three aspects not only of the boys' present condition, but of their past and family history as well. The court and public opinion put a limit to that completeness. This is obvious from the testimony, and the evidence suppressed was unquestionably the most important. For it would have revealed the beginnings of these young men's abnormal behavior in abnormal instincts or perverse manifestations of normal instincts. Such beginnings, if observed today by a psychiatrist trained in the new psychology, would call for definite measures of reeducation. There must have been human beings like Loeb and Leopold before, but there has never been the scientific knowledge to illuminate them that we now possess in the method of psychoanalysis.

Leopold would have been easier to reeducate than Loeb. The evidence tends to show that Leopold is the victim of a neurosis, Loeb of a psychosis. The former is in all probability a functional disorder, while the latter acts more like an organic illness. Its chief characteristic is a progressive mental and emotional deterioration with a fantastic dilapidation. All the stories current concerning young Loeb, even though they are exaggerated by rumor and gossip, have a common denominator of fantastic and bizarre behavior. Leopold, on the other hand, has done brilliant intellectual work. Dr. Healy of Boston testified that he did a test in three minutes and fifteen seconds for which the best previous record was five minutes. At fifteen he had gathered and perfectly catalogued 3,000 specimens of birds. A short time before the murder he appeared before an ornithological congress, read a paper and showed movies of birds that most ornithologists had considered extinct. What patience, what persistence, what knowledge he displayed! Yet very few persons understand why he developed this intellectual power—to suppress and repress his own perverse processes. Were the public ready, it could hear of as tragic a perversion of normal instincts, as hopeless and tremendous a struggle against them as was ever made. But no, the pyschiatrists had to lower their voices, and even then they were prevented from telling all they knew.

The experts for the prosecution took their stand on the psychiatry of twenty years ago, which makes a sharp distinction between behavior which is insane and that which is criminal. Such men as Dr. William Healy, in his books, especially "The Individual Delinquent"; Dr. Bernard Glueck in this country, and Dr. M. Hamblin Smith, medical officer of H. M. Prison in Birmingham, England, in his book "The Psychology of the Criminal," are approaching the criminal in a newer way. They emphasize the importance of a diagnosis before treatment and of treatment instead of punishment; and they hold that the only method of investigating the relation of psycho-pathology to crime is the clinical examination of the individual criminal. Dr. W. C. Sullivan, Medical Superintendent of the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum in England, in his recent book, "Crime and Insanity," shows that many a patient under his care would have been held fully responsible and sane by the psychiatrist of the prosecution.

The legal conception of insanity is undoubtedly correlated with some fundamental psychological condition. But the majority of psychiatrists still keep insanity and crime in separate logic-tight mental compartments, in the inherited belief that disorder of the intellect is the sole criterion of insanity. This explains the widely divergent opinions of the psychiatrists in the Franks case. Those for the defense hold that the emotions of man are his dominating force, while those for the prosecution, after an examination that remains color-blind to emotional disorders, with a clear conscience and conviction base opinions on the boys' intact intellectual processes. Dr. Patrick on being asked, "Was Richard Loeb mentally diseased?" said, "Not unless I am to assume that every man who commits a deliberate and cold-blooded murder is mentally diseased." One is tempted to ask what keeps him from making that assumption. Is such a murder to be classified as a sane act?

The history of man's attitude toward wrongdoing, be it in the form of sin, crime, or insanity, makes a very dark picture. It is not so many years ago that the sinner was burned and the insane chained in dungeons as moral criminals, nor so many more that the law-breaker was broken upon the wheel. I wonder if most of those who are crying out for the hanging of those boys are not actuated by the same impulses that moved medieval inquisitors.

What do we know about human responsibility for human behavior? The mental and emotional processes by which we first come to recognize the difference between our current standards of right and wrong and then act upon that knowledge are shrouded in complete darkness. Upon what mental or physical processes are they based? We do not know, not even in the two extreme cases before the public at present. If we do not understand the code, how can we hold anyone responsible for not following it? May it not be our responsibility that is lacking?

I do not indict the parents; I indict all society. As a practicing psychiatrist I have met too many potential Loebs and Leopolds to be as shocked as the public is. I know how blinded we are by love for our children, how blundering in our behavior toward them. This event may lead society to question its attitude toward crime, and even more toward children. I do not think the time far distant when all crime and all bad behavior will be approached as human illness is now, where moral questions do not enter in.

I make no sentimental plea for the criminal. When fully understood, my attitude may seem even more severe than our present one. It aims primarily not at the crime but at the criminal. I would make of every law-breaker a patient whose whole personality, including his heredity, his social, physical, and mental history from birth would be taken into account, and who would be treated on the basis of that complete understanding and not solely on the basis of his crime. The whole modern trend of psychiatry, education, and penology is in that direction. Nor do I lose sight of society's right to protect itself. But when it punishes the criminal in kind its behavior is the same as his with the sole exception of legal sanctification. I do plead for something better than legalized crime.

Suppose we imprison these boys for life or even hang them. We shall have disposed of them, but how much further are we toward an understanding of them or their kind? Have we not for centuries been acting like the Queen of Hearts in "Alice in Wonderland," whenever anything displeases us shouting, "Off with their heads"? And isn't it about time we answered, "Nonsense" as Alice did, "very loudly and decidedly"?

In the Driftway

THE junking of the famous steamships St. Louis and Kronprinz Wilhelm has been chronicled in The Nation, but what about the final voyage of the venerable cutter of the Coast Guard, which failed to get through the ice off the Alaskan coast on her fiftieth annual cruise to the Far North? Under a headline, "Bear Makes Last Trip," the Drifter noticed more than a month ago that this historic ship had been trapped a thousand miles north of Unalaska, her propellers disabled and her hull dented after a fierce tussle with the ice, and that orders had been sent by radio for her to return home as soon as possible. And then the scrap-heap!

* * * * *

SO the annual mail for Point Barrow—the northernmost tip of Alaska—and way stations will not get through by the Bear this year. What a pity that the old boat should fail on her fiftieth trip! If only she could have completed a half-century! But so it goes. Anyhow the Drifter thinks the Bear deserves a requiem. Fifty years of fighting with the ice and storms of the Bering Sea and the Arctic Ocean! It's not a record to treat flippantly. And before that the Bear was a Dundee whaler for heaven knows how long. She was bought by the American Government for the Greely relief expedition, and afterward became the connecting link between the gregarious life of our States and the lonely pioneers in our most northerly province. Healy's Puk Oomiak (fire canoe), the natives called her, from the name of an early skipper.

* * * * *

THE DRIFTER never sailed aboard the Bear, but an anonymous correspondent has sent him some recollections which he is glad to pass on. He writes:

> So the Bear did not make it to Point Barrow? Well, that isn't the first time. Only a very few years ago I was on hand at the dock in Seattle to greet the little old six-knots-an-hour, 330-ton bark Belvedere (Captain and Mrs. Cottle) on her return from the very last whale hunt in Beaufort Sea. She and the Bear were the only two vessels that had gone North the previous year. But while the staunch and much more powerful U. S. S. C. Bear could not make Point Barrow by 500 miles, the little old Belvedere and her captain's wife, together with Portuguese harpooners and boat steerers and a crew of "undesirable" aliens with more or less dark skins, rounded the Point handily and leisurely poked along 1,000 miles eastward to Herschel Island, where a few people and Eskimos were patiently waiting for this their annual supply of tobacco, prunes, and morning mail.
>
> It is too bad that the Bear is suffering from arterio-sclerosis—or whatever her present owners call it—because I could name a number of men who for the next twenty years could perform with her Arctic epics to which she has been a stranger since her Scotch owners and skippers delivered her to Uncle Sam in St. Johns's harbor two generations back.

* * * * *

THE DRIFTER'S correspondent is worried because the Bear is known as a cutter. "When I was at sea on little coasting windjammers and deep-sea fishers," he writes, "a cutter was a one-masted sailer, having one jib on its bowsprit and a staysail behind it, and why they call an auxiliary barkantine like the Bear a cutter is a question I want answered before I croak." Well, the Drifter can only remind his correspondent that what is now the Coast Guard used to be known as the Revenue Cutter Service. Isn't it a fair guess that this was organized back in the days when sail was still king and that the original vessels of the service—the boats that gave it its name—were cutters in fact? If so, what more natural than that the word should be carried along to their successors?

* * * * *

THE DRIFTER surmises also that the Bear must have been the boat that carried the yearly mail to a man for whose sense of system and spirit of self-control a monument ought to be erected. Sheldon Jackson used to tell the story. The man in question subscribed to a daily paper which used to arrive a year at a time every summer. Instead of diving into the heap and scattering it broadcast in the quest of news, this intelligent individual piled it carefully in chronological order and, beginning with the earliest date, read one newspaper a day for the following year. Thus he had his fresh daily newspaper throughout the year like any city dweller. But what strength of mind it must have required at times not to peep ahead?

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Dollar Patriotism

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: You do not seem to understand the true significance of Mobilization Day. It isn't militarism. It is business and politics. As a militarist our Secretary of War would make the ghost of Napoleon laugh. As a political strategist he knows the moves of the game, which requires only a low order of cunning. Our industries are to be mobilized. That means our industrial Babbitts are to be shown how their business would be boomed by a war. They are to get a little taste of the fat things the War Department can dispense if it is not hampered and harassed by pussyfoot pacifists. Babbitt is to be led up into a mountain and shown the rewards of political conformity. Rattle the saber? That is far from Mr. Weeks's purpose. He is going to jingle the dollar. That is all. When the Big Business Man sees what he can get out of it, he will not grudge the heavy taxation he has to pay for the brass buttons on the uniforms of our generals and admirals who collect the ducats for our Shylocks in Central America and the Caribbees.

Pittsburgh, August 4 GEORGE SEIBEL

"A Threat to the World"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I take pleasure in sending you the inclosed copy of a resolution adopted at the last meeting of the Business and Professional Men's Association of Minneapolis.

> WHEREAS, The spirit of the United States is constantly asserted to be pacific and altruistic, and
>
> WHEREAS, The reputation of the United States as a peace-loving and altruistic nation received significant luster from the Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armament, and
>
> WHEREAS, The display of military force contemplated on September 12—Mobilization Day—will be contradictory to the spirit of good-will toward the peoples of the world and subversive of the interests of our own citizens who must thrive or fail with these peoples,
>
> Therefore, We, the members of the Business and Professional Men's Association of Minneapolis, Minnesota, do hereby protest against the aforesaid display of force, and do urge all other organizations that profess to humanitarian aims to do all in their power to prevent such a threat to the world, and we direct that a copy of this protest be sent to every such organization, to every newspaper in the Twin Cities, to every liberal periodical in the United States, to every Minnesota Congressman, to each of the United States senators from Minnesota, to the Secretary of War, to General John Pershing, and to President Coolidge.

This resolution was adopted at the regular luncheon meeting held on Tuesday noon, July 29, 1924.

Minneapolis, August 1 E. H. SUND, Secretary

Contributors to This Issue

SINCLAIR LEWIS, author of "Main Street," "Babbitt," and other novels and short stories, is covering much of his well-known territory for The Nation, interpreting the progress of the campaign in the minds of his friends.

LEONARD BLUMGART is a New York psychiatrist, a pupil of Freud and Rank.

WILBERT SNOW, winner of honorable mention in The Nation's poetry contest for 1923, is the author of "Maine Coast," a volume of verse.

WOODBRIDGE RILEY is professor of philosophy at Vassar College and author of "American Thought: From Puritanism to Pragmatism," and other works.

Taking Away the Banking

By WILBERT SNOW

When March winds carried prophecies of June,
And gray days were no longer winter-killed,
We all went out and worked till afternoon
To take the spruce-limb banking off, and filled
The air with shouts, heaping what soon would be
A bonfire blazing by the willow-tree.

We tugged at big ends of the bottom brush,
The small ends as reluctant to let go
As winter was himself, although the rush
Of warmth, once started, was an overflow
Of sunny days, blue-birds, and brooklets racing
Like children from worn mothers, tired of chasing.

We found that spring already underneath
Had started on his work, the light-brown grasses
Were flaunting spots of green, the little teeth
Of mice and snouts of worms had chiseled passes—
Worms we sent wiggling as a tempting cud
For hungry flounders coming out of mud.

O there were ugly days enough to come,
With rain and sleet and April fluffs of snow,
Big winds that moaned and made the wires hum,
And neighbors calling out, "We told you so";
But looking on it now I think the days
We coaxed the spring along, and felt the rays

Of March intensify the balsam smell
In those green boughs, and saw the underpinning
Exposed once more, and children run pell-mell
To hunt for crocuses, set fancies spinning
More rapidly than blooming hours of May
When all the hills of God kept holiday.

Books

Rollo in America

The Contrast. By Hilaire Belloc. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.50.

American Social History as Recorded by British Travellers. By Allan Nevins. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

THE subtitle of Belloc's "The Contrast" should be "Alien America." It starts with the thesis that everything in these benighted States is different from everything in England. On this thesis it is possible to draw up a long list of contrasts—physical, social, political, religious, literary, linguistic. All this is not done in the style of Muirhead's "The Land of Contrasts," where the contrasts are internal ones, such as the discrepancies between theory and practice, between the talk about personal liberty and prohibitory legislation. Belloc is more fundamental. The difference between the Old World and the New is a difference of kind and not of degree. He does not, like Muirhead, feel that, if you want to see Old England, you must go to New England. No, the surprise that awaits the Englishman in landing on this Western strand is that America is alien, foreign, not Europe, not the Old World at all, but fundamentally, radically, profoundly different.

All this is obviously hard on the Anglomaniac, the Hands-Across-the-Sea gentry, the people who talk of Our English Cousins. Belloc has American cousins, but he intimates that they speak with a different intonation. He had a grandmother from Pennsylvania, and it was perhaps she who presented him with the Rollo Books from which he gained his first pictures of America. Now we take it that "Rollo's Tour in Europe" gives about as true a picture of the gay capitals of effete civilizations as Belloc's book does of this wild Western world. And just as Rollo had his Mr. George to explain things, so has Belloc. His Uncle George is the genius loci, the notion of the creative Spirit of the Place. Capitalize this conception and you have "that mysterious, but undeniable and potent influence" which gives American society in European eyes a wholly foreign tone.

The new Rollo, then, met with a surprise when as a boy he visited these parts and traveled from the Narrows of New York to the salt dust of the deserts where he watched the "faces and gestures of these new men, these foreigners." Europe and America, therefore, being two systems, universes, creations, standing apart, everything must be different. The air is alien; its quality is metallic. The trees are different; their lines lead upward, they do not spread out. The rivers are different; they sprawl, they are not regular like European rivers. The Ohio at Cincinnati is no more the Meuse than a steel engraving is a mezzotint. One might, however, point out that a man from Westchester County would find Oxfordshire homelike, a man from Colorado Springs would find Frascati familiar, because in the one case there is rolling country and in the other the mesa formation.

The physical contrast between Europe and America is not as great as the social. The Los Angeles realtor would agree that California is "a glorified Riviera," but he would not preserve this as a private sentiment. He would go out and disfigure the landscape with the statement. He would have what Belloc calls the essential mark of the American social spirit—a desire for publicity, the spirit of the market-place. With the European publicity is the exception and privacy the rule. Unfortunately this contrast seems true, at least for the time being. It is true that in miles of our suburbs there is no division between one man's land and another's, that front lawns have about as much privacy as the Boston Common. But a change is already upon us. Hedges are coming in even in White-Collar Avenue, while gravitation to a retired country life is becoming the goal of the retired millionaire.

In the social contrast Belloc has not entirely proved his point. The two different lands have not produced two different races. Rather, similar economic causes have brought about similar social results. The evolution of the snob has come from the amassing of wealth whether it be among captains of industry or the landed gentry, whether along the banks of the Hudson or the banks of the Thames.

If history has repeated itself in the social sphere, it has also in the political, and this Belloc acknowledges. He makes it out a contrast but most Americans would consider it a parallel. As he puts it: The American people of today differ from the Europeans in this, that they have retained in very large degree the instinct of monarchy and are daily increasing its scope, such as in the three forms, the governor of the State, the mayor of the great city, and the President of the whole federation. Some Americans point with pride to the powers of the President, claiming that he has more real influence than any foreign prince or potentate. The English writer, a frank medievalist, argues that if the chief executive be the chief representative of the democracy, then this fusion of the individual with the people is the very sacramental stamp of monarchy, as was shown by the novel and peculiar depth of the national mourning at the death of Mr. Harding.

Along with this admiration for the monarchical principle goes a certain disdain for so-called representative bodies. If the person of the prince is sacrosanct, a congress or parliament, being impersonal, is therefore commonplace. Every thinking European, Mr. Belloc asserts, feels a natural reaction against the corrupt farce of his own contemptible parliaments as instanced in England by the Marconi scandal and by the sale of peerages. But is this a contrast with American politics? Belloc left our shores before the Sinclair affair. Big business seems much the same the world over. After it has made its pickings and stealings it grows pious. Malefactors of great wealth become benefactors of great wealth. We may not create Counts of Connecticut and Dukes of Delaware but we have our Carnegie pensions and our Rockefeller foundations and may some day have a Tea Pot Dome University.

One curious result of Belloc's book is that it plays into the hands of the Little American. The backwoods Congressman asks what we have to do with Europe. So does the English critic. The principle of contrast makes him a prophet of woe in foreign affairs. He declares that if America now attempts to arbitrate in post-war Europe, if one European interest or another captures American support, European and American culture are both doomed to receive wounds which may prove mortal.

As a sort of "control" to this latest transatlantic criticism we can utilize a native work. Nevins's "American Social History as Recorded by British Travellers" furnishes a perfect laboratory record of foreign reactions from 1789 on. There is the first period of utilitarian inquiry, the next of tory condescension, a third of unbiased portraiture, and the last of the records reaching from the Civil War to Kipling in his salad days and Chesterton with his amusing paradoxes.

Of these periods the second is the best known, for then the worst opinions were expressed. There was Mrs. Trollope, who objected to the domestic unmannerliness of the Americans, and above all Charles Dickens, who made us out a nation of great expectorators. As a contrast there were the less known earlier writers who took such topics as Washington at Mount Vernon and Jefferson at Monticello, emigrants crossing the Alleghanies, and the energy and prosperity of the American farmer, the last account, by William Cobbett, furnishing a sad contrast to the unhappy farmer of modern days. Probably the most interesting section is that of unbiased portraiture which describes the good old times from 1840 to 1870, when it was not illegal to bet on the races at Saratoga, when French cooking was not commercialized at New Orleans, and when prohibition did not prohibit in Maine.

Except for "Bull Run" Russell these writers, from Charles Lyell to Anthony Trollope, sketched our land with light but true touches. As Mr. Nevins rightly says, it was an era of detached appraisal without much political philosophy, when the attacks of the Quarterly and Blackwood's were more and more forgotten, when the country had passed beyond the rawness of youth, and the increasing wealth and power of the republic inspired a more respectful attitude in its visitors—in short, a natural reaction following those unfair attacks which had contributed to the American tendency to regard England as an enemy. These were the writers who did a real service in Anglo-American relations. The previous captious critics who plucked the feathers from the American eagle were largely responsible for the politician's favorite indoor sport of twisting the lion's tail.

WOODBRIDGE RILEY

Retrospective

Fraycar's Fist. By Mary Heaton Vorse. Boni and Liveright. $2.

ART always does some violence to life. Of necessity it must rearrange, reemphasize, isolate. It is perhaps particularly arbitrary and violent in the case of that highly developed and interesting form, the modern short story, which by preference has as its core a dramatic episode conditioned by much that has gone before and with consequences reaching after, but whose concentration causes it to incline toward melodrama, romanticism, sentimentalism, an inclination given a decisive push, in the case of writers who wish to see their work published by editors convinced that the way to please the public is to startle and to titillate. Briefly the very excellences of the short-story form have caused it to be commercialized.

The professional, impatient, or impecunious writer grasps at an easy situation or an easy word to convey his idea, instead of waiting for the luminous right one, so much more difficult to seek. Naturally, if he is a professional he knows how to turn out what the editors think the public wants. He contents himself, as does Mrs. Vorse in these collected short stories, with "We sped along the wide and jeweled immensity of tropic seas," "Never have I seen any woman walk as she did, with the sure grace of a wild creature," "the everlasting smoke that rolls up night and day from the tall chimneys of the mills," and invents a fantastic plot, as in Northern Lights, to show us the difficulty of a woman's struggle to be a person as well as a female.

Mrs. Vorse, of course, falls into the professional class, and one feels that it is a matter of bad luck as to the time into which she happened to be born that in all these stories a strong natural talent must struggle with the ineptitudes of a highly developed form which has been commercialized. Ably effective in the presentation of her material, possessed of a continually fresh interest in people, having a wide knowledge of human emotions and reactions which she manages to get into her yarns even though she is a victim of the fallacy of writing about places and peoples most removed from herself, probably because they seem to her or to the public she must please most romantic—thus highly endowed, her stories are nevertheless, with one exception, unimportant.

In that one instance talent triumphs over the traditions in which it is enmeshed. Fraycar's Fist, in spite of the facile journalistic style, is truly great. Written with a nicer rectitude of phrase it would take its place beside the finest of recent short stories. As it is it is a memorable piece of work. Various young writers with gifts inferior to those of Mrs. Vorse are turning out stories better than the others in this retrospective volume, simply because a few pioneers have blazed the way to a more scrupulous understanding of material. But few of them have given us anything comparable to this lyric dirge of the striking steel-worker who died of rage.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

A New Single Tax

The Economics of Freedom. By David Atkins. Duffield and Company. $4.

THIS is a hard book to review. An engineer turned economist ought to be easy to understand, but Mr. Atkins is not. If his position is not fairly presented, then, it is due to no lack of honest effort.

Mr. Atkins (in the latter part of his book) puts forward his proposals "to make taxation scientific and impersonal—and then forget it" and "to construct a basic and unimpairable measure of value and then employ it, not as a thing of value but as an entirely unprejudiced means of recording justly the sensitive, critical, and vital human appraisements of goods, services, facilities, culture, and order which give them value." These two important ends he would attain by laying all taxes throughout the national area upon land, on the basis of its area (not its value) modified by population density, and by using as money certificates of land ownership. Under his plan our internal currency would read thus: "These notes are issued in acknowledgment of land-titles, lodged in the United States Treasury, valued in terms of population density and guaranteed by a proportional obligation for the insurance of order." These notes would be redeemable on demand by a receipt for current or future taxation; and according to Mr. Atkins they could never lose value, for the national area is the fixed datum in national economic life. As population grows, as invention proceeds, as capital increases, as obstruction to production (resistance, to quote Mr. Atkins's favorite term) is lessened, output per acre-man-hour becomes larger. Therefore the command over value, that is, freedom, represented by a given area will increase rather than diminish. A dollar under this plan is to be "the expression of a definite fraction of the effort of total population, as modified by the cost of order, on total acreage for all time," though Mr. Atkins does not make it clear why the fraction will remain constant. The sharpest critics of his dollar, however, will doubtless concede it more stability than is possessed by that jumping-jack, our present "gold" dollar.

Effort, according to Mr. Atkins, is a means to freedom (an undefined central term broadly used—sometimes, it seems, almost synonymously with life itself). Freedom, or life, not goods, then, is the end—good liberal economic doctrine. Under autocracy, effort could be compelled by force; under democracy (a term used in the idealistic sense of self-imposed order), it can only be induced either by spur of material necessity or by the illimitable desire for more freedom. The total of value, that is, freedom, created by effort, is limited by the resistance of the area in which it is exerted. The first condition of lessened resistance is order; the second, common facilities, like roads and education. The furnishing of these conditions is the sole proper function of government. The taxation essential thereto is the responsibility of the landholder, whose control of the only basic wealth rests wholly on order, and who should pay on the basis of area and population density, and nothing else. Given this impersonal taxation and an unimpairable measure of value, Mr. Atkins believes that "reckoning upon our unquenchable desire for freedom, we are assured, with the one provision of order, a flow of effort more constant and spontaneous as a whole than anything we know in physics." Every honestly working individual could command a handsome minimum wage, while the progressive elimination of resistance would accelerate the flow of value, which everyone might share by individual effort.

The fundamental questions raised cannot be critically discussed in a brief review. Perhaps Mr. Atkins will allow even an economist to agree with him in his reprobation of the gold standard and his criticism of the economists for forgetting man's dependence on land, in their too great preoccupation with capital and interest. (Problems of the latter class Mr. Atkins skims lightly, by the way.) He will probably admit to a highly idealized conception of democracy and to practical difficulties of the first order both in the transition to his scheme and in its practical operation. If denied his easy assumption of a continued currency inflation during the coming quarter century, he will probably agree that his plan of transition means confiscation of present values on an enormous scale. But he will doubtless maintain against all comers the soundness and stability of a currency based on a fractional part of the national value as measured by land area and population and the correctness of a system of taxation on the same basis. His conception of value in terms of freedom, or life, and as depending on resistance to be overcome, does not seem so new as he appears to think, but is rather reminiscent of Professor Patten, and no less stimulating on that account. His book is far too long and repetitious; it is distinctly unsuccessful in getting the central things clearly and constantly before the reader; its psychology, I humbly submit, is defective, as perhaps befits the work of an engineer; and its manners are unnecessarily bad. To put forward real ideas under such a handicap is unfortunate; for it makes an undue demand on both the intelligence and the temper of the reader. Let him read patiently, nevertheless; for until men learn their true relation to the land, and learn to make money their servant instead of their capricious master, their economic life will continue to be in chaos.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Proust in English

Within a Budding Grove. By Marcel Proust. Translated by C. K. Scott Moncrieff. Thomas Seltzer. 2 vols. $5.

THESE two new volumes of Marcel Proust's "A la Recherche du temps perdu" are the English version of "A l'Ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs," the second part of that immense work, which has reached eleven volumes in French so far, with several further volumes in preparation. The mere dimensions of such a work as this are sufficient to inspire respect, and to arouse curiosity in that section of the public which likes to talk about books rather than read them. To the French mind particularly "Remembrance of Things Past," as the rather free English title of the whole runs, has seemed little short of portentous, rivaling the six thousand pages of Honoré d'Urfé's "L'Astrée," hitherto regarded as establishing the record in French literature. The result is that there has been much more enthusiasm displayed over Marcel Proust than knowledge of his work. In England, particularly, a veritable Proust cult has grown up, which found its characteristic expression in the tribute to his memory organized by his translator, where a strange collection of the notable and the illustrious unknown declare an unbounded confidence in the genius of Marcel Proust, while showing obvious signs of knowing little about him and of having read next to nothing of his work.

To that cult we undoubtedly owe the existence of the two first parts of "Remembrance of Things Past," and to the translation there has been extended the same welcome by proxy as to the original. Mr. Scott Moncrieff certainly undertook an ambitious, lengthy, and difficult task, which deserves credit, if only as a test of patience, skill, and endurance. But "Swann's Way" and "Within a Budding Grove" have been greeted as much more than that. Largely, as I suspect, by hearsay, they have been extolled as masterpieces, and it is confidently asserted that no such translator from the French has been seen in England in recent times. Naturally very few of Mr. Scott Moncrieff's admirers have actually gone through some 1,500 closely printed pages, with the French text before them, to verify the character of his translation. Having dipped here and there into the two last volumes for purposes of comparison, I am not so sure that this version of Proust is anything more than an ordinarily competent piece of translation.

In the first place, the translator has apparently decided to make the English Proust an exercise in the manner of Henry James. For this reason, almost every paragraph is studded with words between inverted commas, which do not require this Jacobean emphasis and do not so appear in French. James does suggest English analogies for Proust's method, but so does Meredith, and in neither case is there the remotest resemblance in style, even when allowance is made for the fundamental difference between French and English. In the second place, Mr. Scott Moncrieff is guilty of actual blunders, which are rather elementary in many cases, and indicate, at best, an unfamiliarity with the fine shades of French, which is a serious defect in the translator of a work which rests upon a perfect feeling for the nuances of French speech and manners. There is so much haphazard praise and blame of translations, by critics who carefully refrain from producing evidence for what they say, that a few specific examples are desirable at this point.

On page 1 "vulgaire esbrouffeur" is incorrectly rendered as "impossible vulgarian," while the force of calling a person "puant" is lost in the too literary form of "'pestilent' fellow." On page 2 "la plus grossière goujaterie" is mistranslated as "the crudest and coarsest form of snobbishness." The choice of "Mistress" as a rendering of Mme Verdurin's title "la Patronne" is open to the strongest objections. On page 34 "agitators," "mischief-makers," and "men who make trouble" are utterly fantastic misreadings of "agités," "brouillons," and "faiseurs d'embarras." When the cook is described as "économe," she appears in English as "an economist." The word "poncif" has consistently baffled Mr. Moncrieff, who thinks it means "typical." "Décavés crapuleux" does not mean "alcoholic wasters," nor is a person who is said to be "d'un vaseux" "too sticky for words." "Detrimental" is a strange rendering of our old friend "fin de siècle." If Mr. Moncrieff ever tells a very chic Parisienne, whose latest creation makes "un effet bœuf," that it is a "bovine effect," unless she realizes that he does not know French she will be insulted. If she further decides to "faire la punaise," she will be amazed to hear that she has "put her foot in it." When Bloch said that Legrandin was "très bien," he meant something quite different from "he's a bit of all right." Mr. Scott Moncrieff's misfortunes with "barbante," "barbifiant," and "raseurs" are worthy of a place in a collection of schoolboys' "howlers." The slang meaning of "ostrogoth," the force of "youpin," and the simple meaning of "belles madames" also escape him.

The English version of Proust, then, is not the world's greatest translation, nor is Proust himself, for that matter, the greatest French prose writer of the age. He is, however, a fascinating and interesting chronicler and psychologist, with no sense of form, repetitious and careless, yet, the author of a work which promises to be for its epoch what Saint Simon's Memoirs were for the age of Louis XIV. There is no more delightful section than "Within a Budding Grove," with its memorable portrait of Bergotte, the marvelous satiric sketch of the diplomatist M. de Norpois, its picture of the Swann ménage as seen by a child, and the remarkable analysis of the boy's love and jealousy of the little girl, Gilberte. To those with the absolutely essential knowledge of France and French manners, Marcel Proust will always be irresistible.

ERNEST BOYD

A Rolling Stone

Since Leaving Home. By Albert Wehde. The Tremonia Publishing Company. $3.

ALBERT WEHDE came to this country from Germany in 1885 when he was sixteen years of age, and was routed straight through to St. Louis. Since then he has wandered far and wide, and this volume is the story of his adventuring

After about a year of St. Louis he and another boy did a Huckleberry Finn trip down the Mississippi as far as some place in Arkansas, where the other lad made off with the boat, leaving Wehde high and dry with no other assets than a large turtle, which he sold for $1.15 net. From there he wandered some years around Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Oklahoma, and Texas, working at odd jobs and enjoying the most extraordinary adventures, including the shooting of a bad man, for which act of public spirit the local grand jury declined to indict him. Eventually his wanderings brought him to Galveston, where he stowed away on a freighter bound for Bluefields, Nicaragua.

The next ten years Wehde spent in Nicaragua, Honduras, and Guatemala, for the most part painting signs and prospecting for gold in unknown and remote places. He found little gold, but found much beauty and adventure, and succeeded in getting himself condemned to death in connection with a little matter of a revolution. However, he escaped, tried to enlist in Mr. Roosevelt's Rough Riders in the Spanish War, and eventually joined his relatives in Chicago in 1900.

From that time until 1914 he lived uneventfully in Chicago creating hand-wrought jewelry until the outbreak of the World War set his love of adventure on the move again. He had become a naturalized American, but the cause of Germany stirred both his imagination and his affections, and he became an agent for the German Government in the Far East. While so engaged, he tried to maintain a scrupulous regard for the laws of the lands in which he operated and apparently was fairly successful in doing so. When America entered the war he severed his German connections and came home, where, to his naive surprise, he was indicted and convicted under the neutrality statutes. Although I do not believe he intended to violate a federal statute, there seems little doubt that he did so, and, in any case, his activities must certainly have created resentment and have led to prosecution, as he might have expected. He spent nearly a year in the penitentiary at Leavenworth and found it a vile place, his experience confirming what is familiar to those acquainted with prison conditions generally. In one respect he made an important discovery while in jail—that fingerprints can be forged. He worked in the fingerprint office of the penitentiary and did considerable experimentation. He asserts that any good photo-engraver can forge fingerprints in a manner which defies detection and his statements on this score are so lucid and plausible that they call, I think, for investigation by our leading penologists, and, if true, for revision of the law in regard to fingerprint evidence.

His book, while not important, is an interesting story and will repay the reader with several hours of good entertainment.

ALBERT DESILVER

The Negro

The Negro from Africa to America. By W. D. Weatherford. George H. Doran Company. $5.

THIS is a scrap-book of 487 closely printed pages in rather small type. It gives evidence of extended research and hard work, but from the very nature of the author's method the general reader will find it an almost impossible book. It has no style or literary plan, but is made up of quotations long and short or of transcriptions of authors' meanings. Yet Mr. Weatherford's book is not merely a doctor's thesis. With all its cumbersome content and slavish use of authorities it has a central thesis.

> To those who can discern the meaning of things it is clear that a new light is dawning. Men are coming to desire a larger knowledge of all other men. Wise men realize that each group has a contribution to make to the world's civilization, and the sooner all groups can be brought to efficiency the sooner will the whole world be blessed with such contributions. Neither individuals nor races work out their destinies alone, but in cooperation.

The book is poorly balanced; slavery overweights it, political development is almost absent, and while there is much economic information, economic interpretation is often lacking. Mr. Weatherford's main authorities are unfortunately Weale's "The Conflict of Color" and Stoddard's "Rising Tide of Color," which latter he regards as "one of the most thoughtful books." A good book like Ellis's "Negro Culture in West Africa" he disparages. His comment on Woodson's "Negro in Education" is done in two words, while Stoddard gets a whole page. The Atlanta University studies which have to be mentioned are quoted without comment, while the silly studies of the Negro done by the Phelps Stokes Fund are spread out in large type. Even Mr. Weatherford, however, can find nothing to say for them.

The net impression of Mr. Weatherford's scheme of treatment is that of a well-meaning man who in spite of himself is oleaginous and patronizing. He starts, for instance: "I am interested in the Negro, not because he is a Negro but because he is a man. He has a personality just as I have and is capable of becoming a growing and progressing person." What could be better? And then he ends with this: "I have known some Negroes whose character was above reproach. Every Southern white man has known at least one such Negro"!

There is no doubt that Mr. Weatherford really represents an advance over the conventional Southern attitude. He is distinctly liberal toward the Negro and he believes in liberal Southern movements. But beneath the whole argument, old assumptions, old beliefs continually persist. His chapters on Africa, for instance, are painfully inadequate and misleading and leave us with the ancient idea that the black man inherited "a loose moral life," no economic "efficiency," and that his "laziness" and "emotional nature" are something to be got rid of. Havelock Ellis is not one of his authorities. On the other hand, he has made some researches in American slavery that are of value, as, for instance, his stressing of the fact that the first Negroes brought to Virginia were not slaves but servants.

Mr. Weatherford is painfully careful throughout his book to say very little about Reconstruction and the right to vote. Only seven of his five hundred pages are given to this great matter, and here he regards the enfranchisement of the Negro as a "colossal blunder." He lays the lack of present "understanding" between the races to the ballot:

> It was just here that Reconstruction did its most deadly work. By setting the white man and the black man in the South in political opposition there were antagonisms aroused which broke down all confidence and hence destroyed all mutual understanding.

Has the world ever known "understanding" between masters and forcibly emancipated slaves? After this tribute to the conventional Southern perversion of history he admits that it is impossible to stem the rising tide of democracy, and his brilliant suggestion is higher property and intellectual qualifications for the ballot, in order to eliminate "a great majority of the Negroes and, of course, many of the whites. This is only right"!

The book lacks frankness; it is often double-faced and contradictory; sometimes it is merely mushy; seldom is it strong; it is afraid of conclusions; it continually walks up to some wall of difficulty and then, turning nimbly, sheers off into vague phrases, meantime apparently losing sight of the wall entirely. In his interpretation of the Negro Mr. Weatherford is continually at fault. He has difficulty in understanding the self-determining, intelligent black man who stands on his own feet. He is continually quoting the smoother phrases of the late Booker Washington and the present Dr. Moton.

Yet the net verdict on Mr. Weatherford's work must be favorable. It does not represent the heights of Southern white emancipation, but the average stay-at-home effort of the new "inter-racial" class. As such it is the best thing the white South has produced. Here and there the author has a word, a sentence, or a paragraph which shows that he realizes more than he always says:

> As never before in his history, the Negro is finding self-expression. In music, poetry, art, in books, and in the press he is saying what he thinks. He is no longer the silent, suffering, cringing person we once knew. He is boldly speaking his mind, and it behooves the American people to give earnest heed to his voice.

W. E. Burghardt DuBois

American Music via Europe

By HENRIETTA STRAUS

ONE must go abroad, it seems, to find the American composer; for where, in his own country, he is still writing like the European composer, who, in turn, is trying to write jazz, in Europe he appears bent upon ridding himself of this imitative role. Whether it is that constant impact with an older culture has unlocked race memories; whether the influences which moved him from afar have become merged in a subconscious nostalgia; or whether it is both, one finds him no longer substituting a false activity for ideas. Instead, his inspirational sources begin to bear the stamp of authenticity.

Thus, in Paris, I found Ezra Pound writing medieval music based on a medieval text; while his friend George Antheil was writing, not jazz but music resolved to its essence. Pound, of course, is a poet whose spiritual haunts have long been those of the troubadour and trouvère. As their spiritual comrade-in-arms, therefore, it was perhaps natural that he should turn to music. "Music and poetry," he points out, "had been in alliance in the twelfth century. With their divergence," he adds, "the rhythms of poetry grew stupider," and "melodic invention declined simultaneously and progressively," with the result that "the horizontal construction (or mechanics of music) had gone or was, with increasing rapidity going, to pot."

With this "alliance," therefore, as his basic principle, he has taken the "Testament" of François Villon, and used it, in all its ribaldry and lyricism, as the text for an opera. He has not "set it to music," in our ordinary sense of the term, but rather has developed the melodic line from the intonation and accent of the spoken word. The few instruments called for by the simple scoring are used mainly to reinforce the voice; and while technically Pound is often at fault, for he is not a musician in the technical sense of the word, fundamentally his effects ring true. Aside from their movement and color, they seem medieval in spirit—not the pseudo-medieval atmosphere evoked by a twentieth-century mind, but the inevitable mate of the text. It is, on the whole, a most interesting experiment, though not solitary of its kind, as Januçek, in Prague, has also, it seems, been writing music derived from the spoken word; but whatever its aesthetic value may prove to be, it will always have the distinction of being one of the first original musical experiments that any American has yet dared to make.

The most far-reaching experiments, perhaps, by an American, or any other just at present, are those being made by George Antheil, whom one is tempted to call a genius. Born in Trenton, New Jersey, of Polish parents, he seems to have spent about half of his twenty-three years in Poland, and half in America. He went back to the latter country when he was fourteen, and during the seven years he was there studied with Von Sternberg and Bloch. What was even more important, perhaps, was that, during these same seven years, he was playing and experimenting with Negro orchestras, inventing, so he claims, many of the piano and percussion effects now used in presenting jazz. Today he has gone even farther, for the jazz he is writing now is not the jazz we know in America—he is right when he says he is three or four years ahead of that. It is, rather, music stripped of all "atmosphere" and nuance, such as Stravinsky has made, but more sensitive even than Stravinsky's to what Antheil calls "time space." By this he means that we are living more swiftly today, in an age when machinery has entered men's imaginations, and to express this "new propulsion of time spaces" we need a new music. Vertical music will not do it, because vertical music is too static, having reached its climax in Schönberg, whom he characterizes as "Mendelssohn with false notes." Resorting, therefore, to the only alternative, and carefully avoiding all "improvisation" (an unpardonable weakness, to him), he has definitely worked out a series of time-locked intervals of rhythm, or, to use his own term, musical "mechanisms," now pounding loudly, now whirring softly in space, with the regularity and precision of machines. The scoring of his jazz opera, for instance, is confined mainly to six or seven (I forget which) electric pianos. One can, indeed, think of no better analogies to his music than those which have already been made: the "ice-blocks" of Picasso, the "Timon" designs of Lewis; for Antheil, too, is a "primitive." In his first sonata for violin and piano he still clings to race memories, and Slavic rhythms alternate with those of the African savage. In his second sonata he discards the Slavic altogether for the African. When he now seeks inspiration he no longer goes to the Negro orchestras, but to Morocco itself; and so he gives us the concentrated essence of what one might call the spirit of America, with all its terrific energy, its speed pressure, its machine rhythms, by the Slav out of Africa. This musical phenomenon, which we still call jazz, for want of a better name, Paul Whiteman demonstrated last year to be the first authentic music to come out of America. What George Antheil is proving, however, is that it is the most significant music of today.

International Relations Section

Gagging the Press in Italy

LESS than a month before the following decree was issued Mussolini attempted to impress upon the Senate the fact that the Fascist Government was devoting itself to the restoration of normal conditions. This decree was drawn up a year ago, but was not put into effect until the tidal wave of popular indignation following the Matteotti murder threatened the foundations of Fascist rule. The very fear that prevented Mussolini from issuing such regulations a year ago has driven him to issue them now, only a month after he boasted in the Chamber of Deputies that they had not been put into effect. Avanti has already fallen victim to this measure; this means that the working class of Italy has been suddenly deprived of its chief organ. The text of the Regulations Governing the Promulgation of the Edict of 1848 Dealing with the Press, and approved by the Cabinet on July 12, 1924, follows:

ARTICLE 1. The responsible head of a newspaper or other periodical publication covered by articles 36 and 37 of the Edict of March 26, 1848, dealing with the press must, in addition to the qualifications determined by that decree, be either the editor or on the editorial staff of the newspaper or periodical, and must have had the recognition of the prefect of the province in which the publication is printed.

Senators and deputies cannot be responsible heads.

Anyone who has been twice sentenced for crimes committed through the press cannot become a responsible head, and must forfeit herewith any such position he may hold.

The prefect of the province can, by decree, deny recognition as responsible head to anyone not fulfilling the requirements established by the first paragraph of this article, or anyone to whom the second paragraph applies.

The act of the prefect in denying recognition must be accompanied by a statement of the cause; appeal from his decision can be made to the Minister of the Interior, and appeal from the decision of the Minister of the Interior can be made to the fourth section of the Cabinet on legal grounds.

ART. 2. The prefect of the province is empowered, except where a legal suit is involved, to issue a warning to the head of a newspaper or periodical:

(a) If the newspaper or periodical, by false or misleading news causes any interference in the diplomatic action of the Government in its foreign relations, or hurts the credit of the nation at home or abroad, causing undue alarm among the people, or in any way disturbs the public peace.

(b) If the newspaper or periodical, by editorial articles, notes, titles, illustrations, or inserts, incites to crime or to class hatred or to disobedience of the laws or established order, or upsets the discipline of those engaged in public service, or favors the interests of foreign states, groups, or persons as opposed to Italian interests, or insults the nation, the King, the royal family, the Summo Pontifex, the religion, the institutions, or the authority of the state or of friendly Powers.

The warning shall be accompanied by a decree stating the cause for the warning, after hearing the opinion of a committee composed of a judge nominated by the chief presiding officer and of an attorney for the King named by the attorney general of the Court of Appeals, as well as a representative of the journalistic profession nominated by the local press association where such an association exists, or, in the absence of such a body, by the presiding officer of the local court. The committee shall remain in office for one year.

ART. 3. The prefect of the province, after hearing the opinion of the committee referred to in the previous article, is empowered to deny recognition to the responsible head if a warning has been issued twice during the year. The prefect can deny recognition to a new head if the previous one has been recalled, or if he has been sentenced twice within two years to penalties restricting liberty for not less than six months for each crime committed through the press, or whenever the paper affected by such a measure adopts a new name in order to continue publication. Appeal from the decision of the prefect can be made through the channels provided by Article 1.

ART. 4. Newspapers or other periodicals published in violation of the preceding provision shall be suppressed. Suppression shall be enforced by the state authorities, without necessity for special authorization. Those responsible for the offending publication shall be punished according to the provisions of the existing laws.

ART. 5. Sections 1, 4, and 5 of Article XIV of the Penal Code are hereby abrogated. Determination of crimes contemplated shall devolve upon the court.

Every other crime of the press or crime committed through the press shall be judged in conformity with the legislation already in force, and in accordance with the penalty established for the crime. . . . Procedure for all crimes of the press, or crimes committed through the press, shall be by direct summons.

ART. 6. This decree shall go into effect on the day of its publication in the Gazzetta Ufficiale of the kingdom, and shall be submitted to Parliament for incorporation into law. Within fifteen days from the date when the decree goes into effect, newspapers and periodicals shall comply with the provisions established in Article 1.

The Anglo-Russian Trade Treaty

IN last week's issue of The Nation we printed the text of the more interesting and controversial sections of the general political treaty concluded by Great Britain and the Russian Soviet Union. The trade agreement, which forms a part of the whole treaty, is reprinted below with a few minor cuts and summarized sections made necessary by space limitations.

THE TRADE TREATY

ARTICLE 1. For the purpose of developing and strengthening the commercial relations between their respective territories, the contracting parties agree that, without prejudice to any more favorable provisions contained in the present treaty, all facilities, rights, and privileges which in the territories of either of the contracting parties shall be accorded in matters of commerce to the nationals or juridical persons of any other foreign state, established in the territories of that state, or to their property shall be extended, on condition of full reciprocity, to the nationals of the other party, to juridical persons established in the territories of that party and to their property. Each of the contracting parties shall accord to goods, the produce or manufacture of the territories of the other, all facilities, rights, and privileges which are or may hereafter be accorded in the territories of the other to goods, the produce, or manufacture of the territories of any third foreign country in all that relates to prohibitions and restrictions on importation or exportation, customs duties and charges, transport, warehousing, drawback, and excise. The provisions of this paragraph shall extend to the treatment of commercial travelers' samples.

With the same purpose in view His Majesty's Government, on its part, agrees to extend the facilities of the export credits scheme as laid down in "The Overseas Trade (Credits and Insurance) Act, 1920," as amended by subsequent enactments to trade between Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and further agrees that in respect of these and any similar facilities the said trade shall be placed on the same footing as trade with any other foreign country. . . .

[Special privileges accorded by the Union to border states in Asia or states formerly a part of the Russian Empire or states forming part of the Russian customs union need not be extended to Great Britain.]

ART. 2. Taking into account that the monopoly of foreign trade in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics belongs to the Government, and that this Government may engage in trading operations either directly through the trade representative of the Union or through any body or authority under its control, or otherwise, both parties agree on the following:

1. The trade representative and his assistants (members of the council of the trade representation), the number of which shall be determined at a later date by mutual agreement of both parties, shall be members of the Union embassy in London, and shall, as such, enjoy all the privileges and immunities appertaining thereto, including extraterritoriality for their offices in the embassy. For this purpose the existing offices of the trade delegation and such other offices as may form the subject of future agreement shall form part of the embassy.

2. The Government of the Union assumes the responsibility for all transactions conducted by or on behalf of the Union trade representative in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and agrees that all such commercial transactions shall be subject to the laws and courts of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, but in view of the responsibility for these transactions which is assumed by the Government of the Union, neither it nor its representatives will be called upon to give security for complying with the orders of the court.

3. This trade, as well as the trade of the above-mentioned bodies, including the trade of any companies organized by the trade representative in conformity with the laws existing in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, shall enjoy the same privileges and facilities and be conducted on the same footing in Great Britain and Northern Ireland as trade which is not conducted by governments.

ART. 3. Goods, the produce or manufacture of the territories of either of the contracting parties, passing in transit across the territories of the other by routes open to transit under the general legislation of the country, shall be free in those territories from all transit duties.

ART. 4. Juridical persons (including limited liability and other companies and associations) formed for the purpose of commerce, insurance, finance, industry, transport, or any other business and established in the territories of either party shall, provided that they have been duly constituted in accordance with the laws in force in such territories, be recognized as having a legal status in the territories of the other, and in particular shall have there the right of appearing before the tribunals, for the purpose of bringing or of defending an action.

In any case the said juridical persons shall enjoy, in the territories of the other party, the same general rights as are or shall be accorded to similar juridical persons of any other foreign country. . . . [The right of such juridical persons to carry on business in the territory of the other party is not affected by this provision, which does, however, apply to such persons constituted before as well as after the signing of the treaty.]

ART. 5. Each of the contracting parties undertakes to grant to the subjects or citizens of the other the right to enter its territories on conditions not less favorable than those applicable to the subjects or citizens of the most favored nation.

The subjects or citizens of one of the contracting parties who have been permitted to enter the territories of the other may reside there and exercise their trades, industries, or professions on condition that they comply with the regulations in force for the citizens of the most favored nation in the territories to which they have been admitted, and they shall be at complete liberty to leave the territories to which they have been admitted whensoever they please.

The subjects or citizens of each of the contracting parties in the territories of the other shall have free access to the courts of justice for the prosecution and defense of their rights without other conditions or taxes beyond those imposed on nationals or on subjects or citizens of the most favored foreign state, and shall, like them, be at liberty to employ in all causes their advocates, attorneys, or agents from among the persons admitted to the exercise of those professions according to the laws of the country.

ART. 6. The subjects or citizens of each of the contracting parties shall in the territories of the other be exempt from all forms of compulsory military service whatsoever, whether in the army, fleet, air forces, national guard, or militia. They can only be subject to military exactions, requisitions, and compulsory contributions in kind on payment of compensation. They shall be exempt from all money contributions, compulsory loans, and pecuniary taxes for war purposes and from compulsory billeting, except in so far as such contributions, loans, taxes, and billeting are imposed by the law of the country on all the inhabitants.

The subjects or citizens of each of the contracting parties shall in the territories of the other likewise be exempt from all judicial, administrative, and municipal functions whatsoever, other than those imposed by the law relating to juries, as well as from all compulsory services, except in cases of sudden and unexpected occurrences involving great public danger, and from all contributions, whether pecuniary or in kind, imposed as an equivalent for personal service. They shall be subject only to such taxes and charges as are imposed upon the inhabitants generally by the law of the country.

[In regard to these matters subjects or citizens of each country are accorded most-favored-nation treatment on the territory of the other.]

ART. 7. The subjects or citizens of one of the contracting parties admitted into the territories of the other shall be at liberty to communicate freely by post and by telegraph and to make use of telegraphic codes, provided that they specify beforehand the code being used, and under the conditions and subject to the regulations laid down in the International Telegraph Convention of St. Petersburg of 1875, as revised at Lisbon in 1908.

[Articles 8 and 9 deal with the rights of subjects, citizens, or juridical persons of either state on the territory of the other, the recognition of arbitration clauses in contracts, and the carrying out of arbitration awards.]

ART. 10. The subjects or citizens of one of the contracting parties admitted into the territories of the other shall not be subjected personally or with regard to their property or to their activities to any other or higher taxes, imposts, or obligations than those which are or may be imposed in the like conditions upon subjects or citizens of the last-named party, with the exception of special cases provided for by the laws in regard to all foreigners. Such special laws shall not impose taxation on the subjects or citizens of one party in the territories of the other in respect of their industry, trade, occupation, or business, and in regard to all forms of taxation such subjects or citizens shall not be placed in a less favorable condition than the subjects or citizens of the most favored nation. . . . [Juridical persons are similarly protected.]

ART. 11. Each of the contracting parties undertakes to treat the vessels of the other not less favorably than national vessels or the vessels of the most favored nation. This equality of treatment shall extend to the rules and regulations governing the transport of goods or passengers from and to the ports of the contracting parties and to any duties or charges levied on the vessels, their cargoes, or passengers, and also to facilities for the stationing, loading, and unloading of vessels in ports, docks, quays, harbors, and roadsteads, as well as tonnage or other dues, charges, and payments of all kinds levied on ships,

Books of Love, Life and Laughter

Your Pick of Hundreds of Great Books——60,000,000 Sold in Five Years—Mail In Your Order To-day—Order by Number—Read Master Writers Like De Maupassant, Balzac, Mark Twain, Boccaccio and Many Others Equally Entertaining

5c ONLY EACH

ORDER BY NUMBER

Take Your Pick at Only 5c Per Book

ORDER BY NUMBER

231 Humorous Sketches. Mark Twain
166 English as She is Spoke. Mark Twain
291 Jumping Frog. Mark Twain
14 What Every Girl Should Know. Mrs. Sanger
91 Manhood: Facts of Life
217 Puzzle of Personality. Wm. J. Fielding
190 Psycho-Analysis: The Key to Human Behavior. Fielding
447 Auto-Suggestion — How it Works. Fielding
651 How to Psycho-Analyze Yourself. Bonus
648 Rejuvenation — Science's New Fountain of Youth. Fielding
650 K. K. K.—The Kreed of the Klansmen
58 Tales from the Decameron. Boccaccio
672 Illicit Love, etc. Boccaccio
673 Tales of Love and Life. Boccaccio
674 The Falcon, etc. Boccaccio
344 Don Juan. Balzac
15 Balzac's Short Stories.
6 Love, and Other Stories. De Maupassant
199 The Tallow Ball. De Maupassant
178 One of Cleopatra's Nights. Gautier
557 Is The Moon a Dead World? Shipley
559 Robinson Crusoe.
560 Electra. Euripides. Trans. by Harvey
561 African Jungle Tales
562. Antigone. Sophocles. Trans. by Harvey
563 New Light on Prehistoric Cultures. Shipley.
564 Volney's Ruins of Empires.
570 Legend of Saint Julian. Flaubert
571 Kant's Critical Philosophy
572 Beggar's Opera. John Gay
573 Gist of Herbert Spencer
574 The Christian System and Other Essays. Schopenhauer
575 Essays in Ethics. Schopenhauer
576 The Enchiridion or Manual. Epictetus
577 The Lifted Veil. Eliot
578 The Haunted House and Other Poems. George Sylvester Viereck
579 The Three Sphinxes and Other Poems. Viereck
580 A History of Polar Exploration and Adventure. Helen Putnam Van Sicklen
581 Lucretius on Life and Death
593 As a Man Thinketh. James Allen
598 Haeckel: Philosopher-Naturalist. Fenton
617 Hamilcar: Great Man of Carthage. Flaubert
630 The Second Story Man. Upton Sinclair
660 My Brother Paul. Theodore Dreiser
676 Sarah Bernhardt's Love Letters to Pierre Berton. Translated by Sylvestre Dorian
678 Haldeman-Julius—The Man and His Work. Gunn
680 Louis Pasteur: The Man and His Work. Dr. Morris Fishbein
693 Memorandum Book
A-1000 1924 Republican and Democratic Platforms
590-591-592 The Millennium. 3 vols. Upton Sinclair
558 Great Pirates. Finger
666-667 Sarah Bernhardt As I Knew Her. 2 vols. Dorian
670 Josh Billing's Comical Lexicon
669 Josh Billing's Humorous Epigrams
363 Journalism in Tennessee. Twain
675 Philosophy of Love. Sarah Bernhardt
661 America and Sex Impulse. Theodore Dreiser
514 Hints on Writing Poetry
555 Structure of the Earth
556 Hints on Etiquette
567 Darwin as a Naturalist
568 Darwin and Evolution
595 Happy Hypocrite. Beerbohm
596 History of Modern Mexico
652 Is K. K. K. Destructive? Debate. Imperial Wizard Evans and Zangwill
658 Walking Tours. Stevenson
662 Amusing Answers to Correspondents. Twain
664 Oscar Wilde's Letters to Sarah Bernhardt
665 Love Letters of Sarah Bernhardt to Sardou
668 Humorous Fables. Twain
583-584-585-586-587-588 Jungle, 6 vols. Upton Sinclair
594 The Overman. Upton Sinclair
659 The Lost Phœbe. Theodore Dreiser
653 What Every Boy Should Know. Fielding
654 What Every Young Man Should Know. Fielding
239 26 Men and a Girl. Gorky
46 Salome. Oscar Wilde
163 Sex Life in Greece and Rome
95 Confessions of an Opium Eater. De Quincey
189 Eugenics. Ellis
83 Marriage, Past and Present. Mrs. Besant
222 The Vampire, etc. Kipling
98 How to Love
77 What Great Men Have Said About Women
304 What Great Women Have Said About Men
4 Age of Reason. Paine
42 Origin of the Human Race
322 Buddhist Philosophy
219 Human Tragedy. A. France
18 Idle Thoughts. Jerome
38 Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde
45 Tolstoi's Short Stories
25 Rhyming Dictionary
82 Common Faults in English
192 Book of Synonyms
20 Let's Laugh. Nasby
24 The Kiss, etc. Chekhov
215 Miraculous Revenge. Bernard Shaw
102 Sherlock Holmes Tales
145 Great Ghost Stories
23 Great Sea Stories
161 Country of the Blind. Wells
165 Discovery of the Future. H. G. Wells
130 Controversy on Christianity. Ingersoll and Gladstone
277 Man Without a Country. Hale
221 On Women. Maeterlinck
30 What Life Means to Me. Jack London
491 Psychology for Beginners
477 Theosophy in Outline. Willis
438-439 Secret Memoirs. 2 vols. Madame De Pompadour
461 Essays. Haldeman-Julius
463 Art of Reading. Haldeman-Julius
466 Is Progress an Illusion? Haldeman-Julius
454 The Unworthy Coopers. Haldeman-Julius 105 7 Hanged. Andreyev
131 Redemption. Tolstoi
1 Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam
314 French Short Stories. Daudet
324 Life of Lincoln. Bowers
153 Chinese Philosophy of Life
162 Rue Morgue. Poe
74 On Threshold of Sex
92 Hypnotism Made Plain
149 Historic Crimes. Finger
66 Crimes of Borgias. Dumas
321 History of Evolution. Fenton
209 Aspects of Birth Control
208 Debate on Birth Control. Mrs. Sanger and Russell
376 Woman of No Importance. Oscar Wilde
377 A Night in Luxembourg. Gourmont
482 Five Weeks in a Balloon. Verne
437 Hints on Scenario Writing
342 Hints on News Reporting
326 Hints on Writing Short Stories
496 Hints on Writing One-Act Plays
292 Fifi. De Maupassant
296 Lyric Love. Robt. Browning
281 Wisdom of Dickens. Swasey
282 Humor of Lincoln
417 Nature of Dreams. Carrington
65 Meditation. Marcus Aurelius
295 Master Builder. Ibsen
232 Three Strangers. Hardy
21 Carmen. Merimee
289 Pepys' Diary
27 Last Days Condemned Man. Hugo
205 Artemus Ward—His Book
336 Mark of the Beast. Kipling
16 Ghosts. Ibsen
151 Man Who Would Be King. Kipling
198 Majesty of Justice. Anatole France
150 Lost Civilization. Finger
143 Time of Terror. Balzac
323 Life of Joan of Arc
124 Theory of Reincarnation
125 War Speeches of Wilson
12 Poe's Tales of Mystery
212 Life and Character. Goethe
132 Foundation of Religion
61 Tolstoi's Essays
44 Aesop's Fables
156 Andersen's Fairy Tales
84 Love Letters of a Nun
172 Evolution of Love. Key
318 Christ in Flanders. Balzac
43 Marriage and Divorce. Greeley and Owen
123 Life of Du Barry
250 Romeo and Juliet
59 Epigrams of Wit and Wisdom
100 Red Laugh. Andreyev
236 Heart Affairs of Henry VIII
56 Wisdom of Ingersoll
93 How to Live 100 Years
290 Poe's Gold Bug
158 Alice in Wonderland
41 Xmas Carol. Dickens
144 Was Poe Immoral?
322 Man Who Was. Kipling
87 Love. Montaigne
89 Love Letters of Genius
516 Book of Real Adventure
517 Mark Twain: Philosopher
519 Guide to Rabelais. Goldberg
524 Death: And Its Problems
532 Essays on Jesus. Harvey
533 Essays on Friends of Jesus
537 Life of Barnum. Finger
538 Robin Hood. Finger
540 Love Stories in Yellow, Black, etc. De Gourmont
541 Stories in Green, Zinzolin, etc. De Gourmont
554 Child's Garden of Verses
19 Nietzsche: Who He Was
170 Constantine and Beginnings of Christianity
73 Whitman's Poems
311 Lodging for Night. Stevenson
133 Electricity Explained
510 Electric Energy: What it Does. Moritzen
224 God: Known and Unknown. Butler
32 Poe's Poems
327 Ice Age. Finger
202 Survival of Fittest. Tichenor
28 Toleration. Voltaire
184 Primitive Beliefs
275 Building of the Earth. Fenton
230 Fleece of Gold. Gautier
204 Sun Worship. Tichenor
345 Clarimonde. Gautier
187 Whistler's Humor
76 Prince of Peace. Bryan
113 Proverbs of England
114 Proverbs of France
119 Proverbs of Ireland
168 Epigrams. Wilde
29 Dreams. Schreiner
180 Epigrams of Shaw
313 Decay of Lying. Wilde
148 Strength of the Strong. London
2 Wilde's Ballad of Reading Gaol
3 Essays. Voltaire
329-330 Dante's Inferno. 2 vols.
214 Speeches of Lincoln
126 History of Rome. Giles
69 Life of Mary, Queen of Scots
308 She Stoops to Conquer. Goldsmith
60 Emerson's Essays
157 Plato's Republic
216 Wit of Heine. Eliot
8 Lady Windermere's Fan. Wilde
94 Trial and Death of Socrates
182 Daisy Miller. H. James
22 Tolstoi: His Life and Works
191 Evolution vs. Religion.
129 Rome or Reason. Ingersoll
49 Evolution. Haeckel
62 Schopenhauer's Essays
280 Happy Prince. Wilde
522 Life of Tom Paine. Gunn
493 New Discoveries in Science
489 Yiddish Short Stories
488 Great Yiddish Poetry
471 Essence of Confucianism
469 The Egypt of Yesterday
465 Esperanto for Beginners
420 Great Spanish Love Stories
419 Life: Its Origin and Nature
416 God of Vengeance. Asch
397 Irish Fairy Tales
398 Irish Folk Songs and Tales
399-400 Arabian Nights. 2 vols.
395 Autobiography of Cellini
396 Embers. Haldeman-Julius
369 Artemus Ward's Travels
363 Miggles, etc. Harte
357 City of Dreadful Night. Kipling
334 Caught, etc. Haldeman-Julius
319 Saint-Gerane. Dumas
307 Tillyloss Scandal. Barrie
301 Sailor, Cowboys' Songs
26 Going to Church. Shaw
284 Poems of Burns
200 Ignorant Philosopher. Voltaire
103 Pocket Theology. Voltaire
211 Idea of God in Nature. Mill
246 Hamlet. Shakespeare
278 Friendship, etc. Thoreau
218 Essence of the Talmud
7 Liberal Education. Huxley
52 Voltaire. Hugo
104 Waterloo. Hugo
134 Misanthrope. Molière
171 Has Life Any Meaning? Harris & Ward
57 Rip Van Winkle. Irving
90 Mikado. Gilbert
325 Essence of Buddhism
33 Brann: Sham Smasher
48 Bacon's Essays
167 Plutarch's Rules of Health
53 Insects and Men. Darrow
339 Thoreau—the Man Who Escaped from the Herd
80 Pillars of Society. Ibsen
122 Spiritualism. Doyle & McCabe
55 Spencer: Life and Works
266 Life of Shakespeare
268 Merchant of Venice
142 Bismarck's Life
179 Gems from Emerson
276 Speeches of Washington
320 Prince. Machiavelli
138 Studies in Pessimism. Schopenhauer
96 Dialogues. Plato
196 The Marquise. Sand
195 Nature. Thoreau
247 Macbeth. Shakespeare
116 Proverbs of China
279 Will o' Mill. Stevenson
36 Soul of Man. Wilde
78 Hints on Public Speaking
238 Reflections on Science. Huxley
159 Guide to Plato. Durant
75 Choice of Books. Carlyle
121 Proverbs of Arabia
293 Villon. Stevenson
54 Importance of Being Earnest. Wilde
99 Tartuffe. Molière
155 Maxims. Napoleon
177 Subjection of Women. Mill
193 Wit of Charles Lamb
86 On Reading. Brandes
210 Stoic Philosophy. Murray
235 Essays. Chesterton
251 Midsummer Night's Dream
88 Vindication of Paine. Ingersoll
146 Snow-bound. Pied Piper
203 Rights of Women. Ellis
316 Prometheus. Aeschylos
50 Paine's Common Sense
85 Attack on Mill. Zola
101 Thoughts of Pascal
242 As You Like It. Shakespeare
249 Julius Cæsar. Shakespeare
274 Animals of Ancient Lands
79 Enoch Arden. Tennyson
233 Literature and Art. Goethe
234 McNeal-Sinclair Debate on Socialism
315 Pen, Pencil, Poison. Wilde
287 Whistler: Man and His Work
164 Michael Angelo's Sonnets
252 Othello. Shakespeare
17 On Walking. Thoreau
283 Courtship of Miles Standish
117 Proverbs of Italy
343 Life of Columbus
9 Great English Poems
147 Cromwell and His Times
347 Guide to Stoicism
352 Short Stories. Wm. Morris
5 Life of Johnson. Macaulay
72 Color of Life. Haldeman-Julius
256 Venus and Adonis
317 L'Allegro. Milton
115 Proverbs of Japan
118 Proverbs of Russia
181 Epigrams. Thoreau
310 Wisdom of Thackeray

Order by number instead of titles. For instance, if you want "Carmen," simply write down "21." Remember the minimum quantity is 20 books—as many more as you like. Send money order, check (add 10c to personal checks or exchange), stamps or cash with all orders. If you want books shipped prepaid, enclose 10 per cent of the amount of order in addition. Otherwise books will be sent express collect. Canada and foreign price, 7 cents per book delivered.

Haldeman-Julius Company, Dept. B-105, Girard, Kans.

such as sanitary, port, quay, harbor, pilotage, quarantine, lighthouse, and other similar dues levied in the name of or for the profit of the government, public functionaries, private individuals, corporations, or establishments of any kind.

The contracting parties undertake that imported or exported goods shall not be subjected in their ports or on their railways, rivers, or canals to any differential due, surtax, charge, or disability of any kind based on the flag of the ship by which the goods are imported or exported and to the detriment of the flag of either party. . . .

[Article 12 details certain services and privileges to which provisions of the present treaty shall not extend.]

ART. 13. Nothing in the preceding article shall prevent either party from reserving its coasting trade in whole or in part to national vessels, provided that

(a) The party so reserving in whole or in part its coasting trade cannot claim, in virtue of the present treaty, that its vessels shall be admitted to the coasting trade of the other party.

(b) Notwithstanding such reservation, vessels of the other party may proceed from one port to another either for the purpose of landing the whole or part of their cargoes or passengers brought from abroad, or of taking on board the whole or part of their cargoes or passengers for a foreign destination, or of carrying between the two ports goods consigned on through bills of lading or passengers holding through tickets to or from a foreign country. While so engaged, these vessels and their passengers and cargoes shall enjoy the full privileges of the present treaty.

So long as the coasting trade of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is thrown open to vessels of the Union, it is agreed between the parties that if at any time any part of the coasting trade of the Union is thrown open to the vessels of any other foreign country it shall at the same time and under the like conditions be thrown open to British vessels.

ART. 14. All vessels which, under the law of either contracting party, are national vessels shall for the purposes of the present treaty be deemed to be vessels of that party.

[Articles 15 and 16 provide for the mutual protection of copyrights, trade-marks and against unfair competition.]

ART. 17. The stipulations of the present treaty may, subject to any modifications mutually agreed upon, be extended to any of His Britannic Majesty's self-governing Dominions or to India by an exchange of notes to be effected between the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Government of the Dominion concerned, or of India.

In the event of the treaty not being extended to any particular Dominion or to India, goods produced or manufactured in such Dominion or in India shall enjoy, in the territories of the Union, complete and unconditional most-favored-nation treatment so long as goods manufactured or produced in the territories of the Union are accorded, in such Dominion or in India, treatment as favorable as that accorded to goods manufactured or produced in any other foreign country, but liberty is reserved by the Government of the Union to denounce this paragraph at any time in respect of any particular Dominion or of India.

ART. 18. The stipulations of the present treaty shall apply to any British colony, possession, or protectorate, and to any territory oversea which is subject to the control of His Britannic Majesty, if notice is given by His Britannic Majesty's representative at Moscow in respect to any such colony, possession, protectorate, or territory of the desire of His Majesty that the treaty should apply thereto. . . . [Goods of such territories as those mentioned above to which the treaty does not apply are nevertheless accorded most-favored-nation treatment.]

ART. 19. The present treaty shall be ratified and the ratifications shall be exchanged in London as soon as possible. It shall come into force immediately upon ratification, and shall remain in force for a period of three years from the exchange of ratifications, and thereafter until the expiration of twelve months from the date on which either of the contracting parties shall have given notice to the other of its intention to terminate the treaty.

In the event of the treaty being extended to any self-governing Dominion or to India by an exchange of notes under Article 17, the application of the treaty to such Dominion or to India may be terminated by twelve months' notice on either side.

[The same is true "as regards any colony, possession, protectorate, or territory to which the present treaty has been applied under Article 18."]

PROTOCOL

At the moment of proceeding to the signature of the commercial treaty between Great Britain and Northern Ireland on the one hand and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the other, the undersigned, duly authorized, have agreed as follows:

Nothing in Article 1 of the commercial treaty signed this day shall prejudice the right of either party to enforce special sanitary or other provisions for the purpose of securing the safety of persons or of animals or of plants useful to agriculture, of regulating the trade in arms and ammunition under general provisions of law, or the trade in any particular article under the provisions of any general international convention which is binding on either party.

Declaration by His Majesty's Government with regard to Article 13

His Majesty's Government recognizes the right of the Government of the Union, in reserving the coasting trade to national ships, to include in that reservation the carrying of goods and passengers between ports of the Union whether situated on the coast of the same or of different seas.

Declaration by the Government of the U. S. S. R. with regard to Article 14

The Government of the Union maintain their right of property over all the ships of the former Russian navy as well as over the ships of the Russian commercial fleet, nationalized by the decree on the nationalization of the commercial fleet dated January 26, 1918, which have not been sold by the Soviet Government or with its consent.

The Government of the Union on several occasions had the opportunity to make similar declarations to all foreign Powers, and protested in the notes addressed to their governments against any kind of commercial transactions with these ships, presenting the full lists of names of such vessels.

The Government of the Union maintain their right to claim the restitution of these vessels as the indisputable property of the peoples of the U. S. S. R. Therefore the Government of the Union will never recognize as British any of these ships found in possession of British nationals or firms and will treat them as the property of the peoples of the U. S. S. R.

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL

I. The Development of the Drama. By Dr. Will Durant. 35 lectures. Sundays at 5 p. m., Sept. 14-June 21; at Church of All Nations, 2d Ave. at 1st St. Adm. 25c; course tickets $5.00. Prize play competition.

II. A History of Art. By Dr. Will Durant. 35 lectures; with stereopticon slides of all the masterpieces. Weds. at 8:30 p. m., Sept. 17-June 17; at the Baptist Church, 2d Ave. at 11th St. Adm. 25c; course tickets $5.00. Weekly museum visits.

III. A Survey of Modern Literature. By H. W. L. Dana, John Macy, J. C. Powers, Johan Smertenko, and Will Durant. 25 Lectures, beginning 8:30 p. m., Oct. 11, with lecture on "Rabelais," by Prof. Dana.

Send for detailed syllabus to 239 E. 14th St.

Special Opening Lecture, 8.30 p. m., September 10, "The Three Candidates and the Two Parties," by Dr. Will Durant, Baptist Church, 2d Ave. at 11th St. 25c.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1924 No. 3089

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 273
EDITORIALS:
The Parties and Our Foreign Policy 276
War in the Textbooks 277
Black Voices 278
Sport Is Elected 278
OUR NEXT PRESIDENT: LA FOLLETTE OR WHEELER. By Gilson Gardner 279
NEW MORALS FOR OLD:
Dominant Sexes. By M. Vaerting 280
WHAT YOUR CHILD LEARNS. By Melville J. Herskovits and Malcolm M. Willey 282
LIBERALISM IN THE COLLEGES. By Paul Blanshard 284
LA FOLLETTE AND STANDARD OIL. By William Hard 286
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 287
CORRESPONDENCE 288
DEW AND BRONZE. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin 290
BOOKS:
Art and Jazz. By Thomas Craven 290
Wizards and High Priests. By H. L. Mencken 290
The Voice of Mercy. By Norman Thomas 291
Music More than Tonal Fragrance. By Henry T. Finck 292
Dies Irae. By Emil Lengyel 292
Irving Babbitt Continues. By C. Hartley Grattan 293
Books in Brief 293
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Rumanian Oil and Foreign Money. By Emil Lengyel 295
Communism in the Evening Post 296

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN
Managing Editor Literary Editor
ISABEL LA MONTE, Advertising Manager
Contributing Editors
ANATOLE FRANCE JOHN A. HOBSON NORMAN THOMAS
ROBERT HERRICK H. L. MENCKEN CARL VAN DOREN
LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent for Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

RAMSAY MacDONALD made a noble and constructive speech at Geneva on security and disarmament. He sees clearly the folly of large armaments, the impossibility of securing any country's safety by the old system of secret international intrigue which went by the name of military alliances, holy or otherwise, and he is right in saying that if Europe continues to carry on as now another war will be inevitable. Therefore, he puts his hope in arbitration and the League of Nations, and his splendid trust and faith in the League are worth infinitely more to its advocates in this country than the candidacy of John W. Davis. We wish only that he might take a leaf out of the book of Denmark and proceed to do some disarming on his own account without reference to others. But we suppose that as long as the present dangerous French militarism continues it will be impossible for him to swing his countrymen to that idea. M. Herriot, on his part, spoke well for arbitration and for the admission of Germany to the League of Nations, and then fell back on one of those high-sounding but utterly deceptive phrases (which continue to enchain mankind), "Justice and force must go hand in hand." When will the world learn that it is only by the elimination of force that peace can be made secure? Fortunately Lord Parmoor was there nobly to voice the sentiment that small countries will never get equality of treatment if the effort to get it is to be founded upon military force. Sooner or later men will see that the disarmers are the only practical people dealing with the subject of peace.

THE PEACE RESOLUTION adopted at Geneva before the British and French premiers left is thus far only the expression of a wish and a hope. The real work remains to be done—the discovery of a method which will reconcile the fears of M. Herriot with the vision of Mr. MacDonald in a workable method of world arbitration. This is a task of fearful difficulty, but the very willingness of discordant Europe to face it is a genuine reason for rejoicing. When one compares the atmosphere at the meeting of the Assembly of the League of Nations this year with that which prevailed in 1923 the difference in that alone is a reason for optimism. When one notes the progress toward European accord in the few months since the days of Poincaré and Baldwin he can believe a plan for disarmament and arbitration may be devised which will prove solid ground upon which to summon a world conference. Let us hope there is a peace spirit in the world which can be moved to as great a fervor and devotion and sacrifice as that of the war spirit.

THE WAY TO DISARM is to disarm. Little Denmark shows the way, for her Prime Minister is to introduce a bill in Parliament in the middle of October wiping out the army and navy and providing merely for an armed constabulary. We are inclined to rank this as one of the greatest international happenings of the year. Of course, by every imperialist and militarist teaching, such as is inculcated by our army and navy officials, Denmark is craven and cowardly and is ready to relinquish its national existence at the threat of an invader. To us this decision is the wisest step that Denmark could take, and the example ought to be followed at once by the other Scandinavian countries, by Belgium and Holland. It is preposterous for a nation like Belgium to maintain an army. It can have only three probable enemies in the future: France, England, or Germany. Against any one of them it would be helpless if it came to battle. Not by mobilizing its entire man-power could it hold its position for more than a day or so. The result of the war with Germany proved that. So why waste money and deprive its industrial life of hundreds of thousands of workmen for nothing? If Denmark remains unarmed and unafraid, and is then attacked, it will have an infinitely greater power of appeal to the moral opinion of the world than if it were to throw away 40,000 or 50,000 of its citizens in a fruitless struggle.

WHILE MR. HUGHES REFUSES to take any official part in the European settlement, individual Americans are accepting various responsible positions allocated to citizens of the United States by the London protocol. Owen D. Young is acting temporarily as Agent-General for Reparations. S. P. Gilbert, former Under Secretary of the Treasury, will succeed Mr. Young. Gates W. McGarrah, chairman of the Mechanics and Metals National Bank of New York, will be the American member of the governing board of the new German bank of issue. Both Mr. Young and Mr. McGarrah are men with the long experience and usual connections that one would expect. But the future Agent-General for Reparations is a man of 32 who gained most of his experience during the war. The record of each of these Americans is that of a successful and respected banker. They are experts in money and presumably will keep their eyes and minds on economic and monetary reconstruction in Europe. The machinery of the Dawes plan has begun to turn, but slowly at present, as they are getting up steam—the steam of confidence—preparatory to launching the 800 million gold-mark loan. Germany has made one payment of 20 million gold marks and as we go to press is due to make another. The French on their part are reducing the occupation of the Ruhr.

BURLINGAME PUEBLO

MAINE'S EARLY ELECTION of her Governor has long been regarded as a useful political barometer, and this year the Klan issue added interest. The Democratic candidate came out flatfootedly against the K. K. K., while the Republican nominee was understood to be friendly to the order. Superficially, therefore, the election of Ralph O. Brewster, Republican, by a majority of more than 30,000 votes, looks favorable both for Mr. Coolidge and the Klan. But the Republican majority in the gubernatorial election of 1920 was 65,000. Is the drop of more than 50 per cent due to anti-Republicanism or anti-Klanism? Probably some of both. Republicanism ought to be able to hold its own in Maine if anywhere in the country. Farmers there have not been subject to the depression that has hurt the West, while the State is also almost untouched by the severe slump in the textile trades that is felt elsewhere in New England. Despite Mr. Coolidge's rosy words in regard to the prosperity of labor, the financial editors tell us that one reason for the recent passing of the dividend on the common stock of the American Woolen Company (engaged in a most highly protected industry) was to justify a cut in wages later. The cotton trades are even less happy. All seventeen mills of the Consolidated Textile Corporation are closed, and one of its subsidiaries has just defaulted on the interest on its bonds.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE, who on Labor Day said "We have had our revolution and our reforms," continued his gospel of stand-pattism by a speech in Baltimore on September 6 in which he attacked the proposal sponsored by Senator La Follette for an amendment to the Constitution making it possible for Congress by a two-thirds vote to validate legislation overthrown by the Supreme Court. The proposal is admittedly drastic, but the situation calls for nothing less. Had the Supreme Court limited itself to strictly judicial powers—as its creators undoubtedly intended and as similar bodies in other countries with written constitutions are doing today—it would deserve Mr. Coolidge's eulogy as a defender of the rights of the minority and the liberty of the individual. But the Supreme Court has in evolution become a third legislative body, and its concern for many years has been for property rights rather than for human rights. As a legislature it has become fearfully dangerous because it is an appointive body made up of nine lawyers with a life tenure. Progressive legislation is impossible as long as it exercises its present powers. Mr. Coolidge is one of those timid and tory souls who had he been alive in 1787 would have opposed such a novel and revolutionary scheme of government as that proposed by the Constitution behind which he now takes frightened refuge.

WITH A CERTAIN GUSTO, which is natural if not wholly justified, the Richmond Times-Dispatch comments on a threatened lynching in the streets of New York City. A man was barely saved from hanging at the hands of a mob infuriated by his wanton assault on his own wife and daughter. The pleasure with which the Richmond paper records this incident is obviously born of sectional pride; the lynching spirit had flared up in the very "home of more of the professional and political South-baiters than any other city in the world." And it takes particular delight in pointing out that on the same day the Richmond Chamber of Commerce was adopting resolutions expressing its sorrow at the death of a colored citizen of Richmond and its feeling that "his passing is a heavy blow to this city in which he had spent his entire life." Far from resenting this display of scorn for Northern lawlessness and pride at Southern tolerance, The Nation is happy to record it. The more Southern patriotism comes to be identified with an effort to prove the South humane and law-abiding, the better for all of us. The spread of the Klan has shown how contagious militant lawlessness can become in the North and South alike. Perhaps a spirit of pugnacious insistence on fair play will spread as far and as fast.

> Regardless of age, occupation, or present physical condition, you are expected to answer the Roll Call on that day exactly as if you were called into active service. Each nurse enrolled in our service appreciates that its primary purpose is a reserve to the Army and Navy Nurse Corps, and therefore should be prepared to answer a call of this sort whenever it may come. It does not mean war, but it does mean preparedness and efficiency.

THUS THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE of the Red Cross (which is supposedly an international and humanitarian body) called its members to the colors on September 12 to take part in a defense test (which was to be, we were told, neither militaristic nor warlike in any way). The letter of which the quotation is a part was addressed to all the Red Cross nurses in the country through the local committees. Thus the war-time organization of the Red Cross has again been called into being, and the war-time spirit, too, so that the nurses may forget that all suffering humanity is their charge. They may instead stand, if not for war, for "preparedness and efficiency" and realize that their primary allegiance is to the army and navy. A letter like this throws light both on the organization that sends it and on the real purpose and spirit of Defense Day.

THE CIVIL STRIFE IN CHINA is a recurrence on a menacing scale of the little private wars between generals that have broken out spasmodically for three or four years past and kept the country in a ferment. In a pond just big enough for one frog two frogs have been croaking defiantly for some time, Governor Lu Yung-hsiang of Chekiang province and Governor Chi Hsieh-yuan of Kiangsu province. They have now decided to fight it out. Chekiang and Kiangsu, being adjoining provinces and by their position commanding the wealthy city of Shanghai and the strategic mouth of the Yangtze, the stake is big. In addition, Chi Hsieh-yuan is allied to Wu Pei-fu, the leader of one of the two big military groups, while Lu Yung-hsiang is allied to the opposing group, headed by Chang Tso-lin, the Manchurian dictator whom Wu Pei-fu defeated two years ago and who since has been smarting for revenge. No issues, no matters of policy are involved. It is a personal struggle between two groups of generals, all of whom have been equally pestilential. As we go to press news comes that Chang Tso-lin has declared war upon the Peking Government supported by Wu Pei-fu and that Sun Yat-sen may try to assist the Manchurian commander in a campaign against their common foe. That may widen the trouble. Unhappy China!

WITH THE SURRENDER and confession of Boris Savinkov passes the last active and important present antagonist of the Soviet Government within its borders. Savinkov had an advantage over many of the other adversaries of the Soviet Government; his name was surrounded with the romantic glamor of the old-time revolutionary conspirator. But his career as a counter-revolutionary must have convinced him that the methods of the conspirator have outlived their day in Russia. It was his fatal mistake, as well as the mistake of the other active opponents of the Soviet Government, that he viewed the Russian Revolution as a plot of a few power-loving individuals and not as a movement of masses. Notwithstanding his popularity and strong personality, his was but a small following of doubtful character which only succeeded in implicating him in the anti-Jewish pogroms perpetrated by the bands of Bulak-Balakhovich. He could carry on his activities at all only by the grace of foreign enemies of the Soviet Union, and from his confession it appears that persons in high official places in France, Czecho-Slovakia, Poland, and even America lent their aid to his terrorist conspiracies.

EVERYBODY KNOWS THAT MUSSOLINI has a past, not a dark past but a bright red one. And so it is not startling to read such a quotation, for instance, as the London Labor Leader recently printed from a speech delivered by him in 1910 on the subject of "Patriotism."

> The Republicans defend the fatherland. We rise superior to it and deny it. The proletariat has no fatherland; nor in truth has the bourgeoisie. In case of war we Socialists will not go to the front—we will raise insurrection within our borders. The proletariat must no more shed its blood for the Moloch of patriotism.

But we are rather more interested in the recent past of this ex-Republican-Socialist who has now become little "Cousin to the King" by virtue of receiving the Collar of the Annunciata. As lately as 1919, when Mussolini was a leading Fascist but was neither dictator and Premier of Italy nor in any way related to the King, he spoke these words:

> The Senate must be abolished—we demand that this feudal survival disappear! We demand proportional representation! Faced with the question "Monarchists or Republicans?" we reply from henceforth "Republicans." We utterly oppose all ideas of dictatorship. We demand the confiscation of riches ill-gotten during the war.

A statement like this, in the light of what has and what has not happened under this man's rule, will be recalled long after his earlier indiscretions are forgotten.

WHILE MUSSOLINI'S PAST is being disinterred and aired, we are given the privilege of gazing into the future of another of Italy's patriots—Gabriele d'Annunzio. This gentleman and poet, who has fought and flown, defied and ruled, lived and loved under the white light of his own pitiless publicity, is now retiring into the silences. He will live henceforth withdrawn from the world. He will not answer mail, the telephone, nor the door-bell. He has dogs that "bite well" and he will put up no signs to "Beware!" No matter how the world clamors at his bolted gate, no matter how it misses and needs and wants him—it can't have him, and may as well submit to an unhappy future of muddling along somehow by itself. We shrink from the prospect; but none the less we cannot help admiring the way d'Annunzio retires. Somehow, without effort, he manages to make more noise in closing his door against the world than most men would in winning a battle.

ONE DIFFERENCE between a monarchy and a republic is that in a monarchy royalty is without honor, while in a republic it is dear to the heart of every citizen, especially the humblest. These are sad days for kings, and probably the lot of them would be glad to die off if only the proletariat would let them. But it won't—anyhow in America. The Prince of Wales may go about England almost unnoticed, but he may not move a foot in America without having the event elaborately photographed and described. Incidentally his presence brings publicity to many persons who could not otherwise get it—and this is one excellent reason for making a great deal of him. The wholly hit-and-miss character of most newspaper publicity has always interested us, and it has been seldom better illustrated than in connection with the Prince's visit. Take the boxing instructor of His Royal Highness, for instance. One would say that the American public was not panting to see his photograph. Yet because in sparring with royalty he was touched lightly on the mouth, his picture appeared on the front page of the New York World under the caption "Biffed by Prince." Well, who wouldn't be biffed by the Prince to achieve such fame? Indeed what democratic American wouldn't be biffed by the Prince merely for the pleasure of the biff?

TO THE SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN upon its one hundredth birthday our heartiest congratulations. During that long period it has never failed to uphold the highest traditions of American journalism; at times it has exercised an almost unequaled ethical influence upon our political life, notably during the fateful years from 1898 to 1902 when we took our first plunges into imperialism and overseas conquests. The explanation of its high-mindedness and refusal to stoop to the tricks of yellow journalism is to be found in the Bowles family, which founded it, and has ever since carried it on, ever placing principle above profit. We believe this record to be unique in American journalism. Established by Samuel Bowles and carried on by his son and grandson of the same name and now by a great-grandson, Richard Hooker, the Republican has long been the model of what a newspaper in a medium-sized city ought to be. More than that it has contributed enormously to the cultural development of its community as well as to the ideals of the American republic. Its story is not only one of idealistic striving; its existence has been made possible only by the most extraordinary devotion of the three Samuel Bowles, who often actually had to count every postage stamp in order to keep it going. For decades the Republican saw eye to eye with The Nation upon almost every issue of the day. If we regret that of late years it has followed the popular hue and cry, we must none the less recognize gratefully its honesty, its sincerity, and the unfailing cleanness of its columns.

The Parties and Our Foreign Policy

FROM an old and valued friend of The Nation comes the following letter explaining why he cannot support Senator La Follette:

> While La Follette is at the present time undoubtedly the one outstanding personality capable of leading a movement for the development of a third and more progressive party—more progressive, I mean, than the Democratic Party is likely to become in the near future—and while I very decidedly belong in the progressive ranks, I cannot, in the present emergency in world affairs, support a man who is so completely dominated by the isolationist ideal for our country as La Follette is. In my opinion, the great and urgent issue before us—more important than the plight of the Western farmers or any purely American economic question—is the relation of the United States to the European situation. That situation, for which we are largely responsible, cannot be mended without our active and responsible participation in world affairs. The control of our foreign affairs by a man or a party which sets himself or itself subbornly athwart the international movement would, I believe, be a greater menace to our national well-being as well as to that of the rest of the world than would the triumph of either of the two old parties.
>
> We can put up for four or eight or a dozen years more with the unstable and unjust economic conditions against which Senator La Follette is campaigning, but we cannot, without the gravest peril of world disaster, put up for even one quadrennium with the present chaos in European economic and political affairs.
>
> May I add that I am not unmindful of the fine words on our foreign policy contained in the platform adopted by the Progressive Convention held at Cleveland a few weeks ago. If I ignore these it is because in this, as in the pronouncements of the Republican and Democratic conventions, I attach little importance to these vote-catching declarations of policy. In every one of these cases the real platform is the man nominated.

We are happy to print these views not only because of the sincerity and honesty with which they are held but because they reflect an angle of the political situation which is bothering a good many people. Some we know are supporting Davis because he is for the League of Nations, although they oppose him at every other point. Others are going to vote for Coolidge, holding their noses as they do so, for the curious reason that they are sure nothing at all will happen in foreign affairs if Mr. Coolidge remains in office. His steadfast opposition to the League also fills them with satisfaction. The awkward gestures he has made about another disarmament conference make them feel that he has not got it in him to achieve anything.

Now, the editors of The Nation and many others, who are as eager as the writer of the above letter to have the United States point the way out of the European mess but are opposed to any entangling alliances, are supporting Mr. La Follette, not merely because of the foreign plank in his platform but precisely because "the real platform is the man nominated." Not only is he his own platform, but his principles in dealing with other countries are attested by years of public utterance. He has repeatedly declared himself against our financial imperialism and our bloody aggressions in the Caribbean; he has laid it down that if he is elected the flag will not follow the investor and he will not permit the prostitution of the State Department as at present into a "trading-post" for large American corporations seeking oil and other concessions abroad. So far as the American hemisphere is concerned our present policy toward our sister republics is driving us and them straight on the rocks. A right attitude here is perhaps even more important for our moral and spiritual welfare and the safety of the republics to the south of us than any adequate solution of the European entanglements.

As to the European situation, Mr. La Follette was there a year ago and saw conditions for himself. We do not believe that he is an absolute isolationist, and his record proves that he would be ardent in espousing any reasonable plan for disarmament. He would oppose our immediate, unreserved entrance into the League of Nations if he were President—wisely and honorably, in our judgment. But as for forgetting all about Europe, that is impossible for any President. So it comes down, aside from the League, to the question of the spirit with which Mr. Davis or Mr. Coolidge or Mr. La Follette would approach our international problems—in other words, we get back, like our correspondent, to the personality in the case.

How important that is, the case of Ramsay MacDonald shows. As we write he, speaking at Geneva, is the greatest figure in the Western political world. He put through the final Dawes agreement without having a single card in his hand that was not in Baldwin's or Lloyd George's. It was the spirit of the man that counted, and what he achieved was defined and illustrated by his actually putting the hands of the French delegates into those of the Germans. In our judgment, if Mr. Davis were President he would approve, as did his mentor, Woodrow Wilson, our conquest of the Caribbean by bankers and bullets—we can recall no utterance of his to the contrary—and he would probably carry on the Hughes policies as to oil and foreign investments. In European affairs he would likewise take the prevailing big-business views; his administration would most assuredly play the game the way the bankers and politicians have wished it played since they tricked or lied their peoples into the war. He has never had the vision to advocate cancellation by us of the debts of the Allied governments in return for a reasonable reparation policy and the reduction of military budgets, although this is our greatest opportunity for constructive action. Inhibitions without end would be his. Mr. La Follette would take office as free as Ramsay MacDonald—did not both oppose the war and all its evil works?

As for Mr. Davis's personal views on Europe, it must be recognized that they differ radically from those of most of the other leaders of his party. The Democratic platform, it will be remembered, declares for a referendum on the League, a proposal which Newton D. Baker denounced as a mockery and a sham because no such referendum could be taken without waiting for years to create the machinery. He called upon the spirit of Wilson to confound the authors of the plank which he termed the betrayal of everything Wilson stood for and as sounding the deathknell of the League. Granting again our correspondent's view as to the worthlessness of planks, it is a fact that hardly any of the Democratic party leaders care a hang about the League or want to go into it, and although platforms may be disregarded personal opposition cannot be.

If anybody votes for Mr. Davis, believing his election would mean the immediate entrance of the United States into the League, he is throwing away his ballot.

The simple question for any voter to answer is: Do you believe in the kind of conventional international politics which Mr. Davis has played and that all his professional and business associates favor? If anyone wishes for the spirit of human brotherhood—with the emphasis on human as opposed to property rights which Robert M. La Follette typifies—he must needs vote for the Senator from Wisconsin.

War in the Textbooks

IN another column we publish a startling analysis of three popular textbooks on civics used in American high schools. On questions of immigration, of property and the rights of labor, of Russia and radicalism children in our schools are being fed the stuff that Rotarians are made of. In place of the empty formalisms that used to make up the ordinary school-civics courses, we now find an amazing collection of vicious prejudices and thick unashamed propaganda. School-children are being taught that private property and democracy are identical; that labor parties are bad; that most unions are dangerously revolutionary or destructive; that our leading industrialists are benefactors of society; and that foreigners are suspicious characters.

In connection with this it is interesting to compare the results of a careful if rather mathematical study of the treatment of war in our school histories which has been published by the Association for Peace Education. The work was done by three university professors: John Monroe and Ralph L. Henry of Carleton College, Northfield, Minnesota, and J. M. McElhannon of Baylor College, Belton, Texas. Twenty-four standard textbooks and twenty-four popular supplementary readers were chosen for analysis, and the results were classified according to the actual amount of space in text and illustration given to wars, to "neutral" material, and to peace. Following that quantitative measurement was a carefully guarded estimate of the influence of the war material. To weigh this most important but more imponderable factor the authors of the study rated the books according to certain levels of presentation:

> (1) A strongly emotional treatment which would create an intense desire in the children to participate in the experiences depicted; (2) an attractive coloring of the material which, though it might not stir the emotions to any marked degree, would make the young readers think that war was a most worthy undertaking; (3) a straightforward presentation of the bare events which would produce little effect upon children; (4) a true statement of the horrors of war—the suffering, the destruction, the carnage, and the bestiality which would lead children to shun the thought of war.

The figures resulting from the tests are difficult to correlate. In several cases books containing a high percentage of war material have few or comparatively harmless war pictures; and some of these war-filled texts are rated among the less harmful from the point of view of emphasis and effect. But some general conclusions are inescapable. The war material in the textbooks ranged from 93.5 per cent to 19.1 per cent, but over half the books give more than 30 per cent of their space to this one subject. The authors conclude, however, that

> There is a slight tendency toward improvement in the newer texts, although of the books with the highest war percentage three out of the first six were published since the entry of the United States into the World War. Of the eight with the lowest war percentage, however, all but one have been written since 1917. The books with the highest percentage of peace content are all comparatively recent books. The surprising fact is that only three books on the list include more than 3.5 per cent of direct peace material.

In the supplementary readers, written for the most part in "story-book" style and eagerly absorbed by the children, the proportion of war material runs from 100 per cent to zero. But the first five on the list, including such old favorites as "Boys of '76" and Roosevelt's "Winning of the West," all average above 48 per cent. This, the compilers of the figures believe, is wholly disproportionate with the facts of our history:

> Leaving out of consideration the colonial warfare between the whites and Indians, the United States has in the course of five wars been engaged in military operations a total of only seventeen years, or only 12 per cent of the 148 years elapsed since 1775.

The study of the total effect of these texts and of their probable influence on children was done with particular care, and the names of the leading war-mongers among these books is of interest. Of the history texts the five worst, in order of their virulence, are as follows: Guitteau's "Our United States—A History," Montgomery's "The Leading Facts of American History," Mace and Bogardus's "History of the United States," Garner and Hensen's "Our Country's History," and McMaster's "Brief History of the United States." "Of the more up-to-date books," says the report, "Beard and Bagley, and Bassett give war the sanest treatment. These authors frequently have pictured war as it really is. . . . The five worst offenders were published since 1917."

Among the supplementary readers the five most warlike were these: La Salle's "Short Stories of New America," Coffin's "Boys of '76," Guerber's "Story of the Thirteen Colonies," Roosevelt's "Winning of the West," Southworth's "Builders of Our Country." The report states that all these books are "wholly bad from the standpoint of war," although "The Winning of the West" sometimes pictures war truly. But at least fifteen of the twenty-four readers are admirably free from "false laudation or mock heroics."

The authors of this study make a few suggestions for changing this unwholesome mental fodder:

> War is not innate. It is produced by our concepts and by what we teach our children. And one of the worst offenders on earth is the Western Caucasian. War is a useless relic of savagery. It is the most wasteful of all enterprises and it becomes increasingly wasteful as society becomes more complex. Real war is brutal, bloody, cruel; there is little noble or worthy of emulation about it. The time for teaching the truth about it has come. Educators and historians have too long poisoned the mind of the oncoming generations with their glorification of war. The future demands a type of history that will not exaggerate the place of war, which will show its true nature, and which will develop in children the will to peace. Parents should demand such histories, school boards should instal them, publishers should issue them, and historians should prepare them.

Black Voices

IN Richmond there is a society of colored men who are held together by their common desire to preserve the religious songs of their race, the "spirituals" which, long regarded as a kind of curiosity, are coming more and more to be viewed as one of the eminent contributions of this continent to the arts. In Charleston there is a society of white men and women who have the same purpose, but who further specialize by trying to recover songs which may have flourished in some particular community or even on some particular plantation without ever having happened to catch the general ear and so to be carried throughout the country, as has happened to certain of the songs which, for that reason, everybody knows. By such means the dignity of the religious songs of the Negroes is emphasized, but there still remains the need of some adequate study of this fascinating body of literature, which now drifts about on the winds of chance memory, running the risk of being lost in competition with the louder and ruder melodies of the current era.

Whoever makes that study will rarely be able to trace one of the spirituals to its actual author. The singers are lost in the songs. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, must have been tentatively composed, by Negroes whose emotions took this outlet, and must have tried their fortune with the race at large. Only some of them met with the kind of response which perpetuated them. The others fell and died as sounds die when there are no ears with the sympathy to understand them.

The surviving songs are therefore, in a true sense, the possession, if not the positive creation, of the race. If they do not bear witness to the talents of individuals, to the private impulses of the composers, to their methods and schools of song, they bear abundant witness to the deeper, impersonal feelings of the race which nourished them.

They testify, naturally, most of all to the sadness which the race felt in its bondage. "Nobody knows the troubles I bear," the burden of one of them, might almost be the burden of all of them. The black voices lifted up in these songs came from throats which ached. Yet with what pathetic faith they clung to the hope of consolation which their religion promised them! This world was full of grief, but just beyond it lay the Jordan, over which a sweet chariot might at any moment swing to carry the slave to a long and joyous home. Shouting salvation, he would enter the promised land, where he would have shoes and be permitted to walk all over God's heaven. Though his conception of paradise was of the simplest, it was utterly sincere. It was shaped by a profound need and spoken without self-consciousness.

At the root of the spirituals lay what Miguel Unamuno has called the tragic sense of life in men and in peoples, one of the great recurrent notes in all the wisdom and all the music of the folk everywhere. For this reason, perhaps, these songs persist while the brassy compositions of the white evangelists go their way to unremembered and well-deserved oblivion. The dominant race, spurring itself to effervescent optimism, could not listen to the undertones of human life, but negligently left them to its bondsmen. But in the long run it will be the bondsmen whose voices are heard.

Sport Is Elected

WE are in the midst of a presidential campaign. If we are as political a people as we are believed to be, our thoughts and energies should be concentrated upon candidates, issues, and possibilities. Yet judging from the newspapers one reads and the conversation one overhears, the people are more occupied with the chances in the forthcoming World's Series in baseball; with the performances of the celebrated French horse Epinard, now running on American tracks; with the polo match between American and British teams; with the international lawn-tennis contests for the Davis Cup; with the Firpo-Wills fight; with the airplane flight around the world; or even with the man who traveled from Holland to Marseilles, turning somersaults all the way. Rarely before have so many exciting events been taking place all at once. We shall have to wait until election day to learn the fate of La Follette, Davis, and Coolidge. But whatever happens to them, we may say already—and with entire confidence—that the popular vote has been cast in favor of sport. It has been seated on the American throne. It has been clothed with almost dictatorial powers.

Of all the sporting events of the season the world's flight was, of course, incomparably the greatest. Perhaps one ought not to speak of it as a sporting event. It was more than that, to be sure. It was a splendid feat of intelligence, of skill, and of daring. Yet flying around the world, although now proved to be possible, is far from practicable. The success of our army fliers was made possible only by almost constant attendance and assistance. Extensive repairs were made to the airplanes, engines were changed, the machines were almost built over in course of the flight, so as to raise the old question: "If a knife be rebladed, it is still the same knife. But if then a new handle is added, is it the same or another knife?" Then, too, the time required was long when one recalls that the flight was made with the fastest kind of locomotion devised by man. Five months, fourteen days elapsed between the departure of the fliers from California and the date when they touched again on the American continent. The old clipper ships could do it as quickly; it takes only a fraction of that time to make the circuit of the world by railroad and steamship. Of course the army aviators were not trying for speed. They aimed at safety and success. Yet one may say with assurance that round-the-world flight by airplane is still a long way off as a regular and recognized means of travel. It is not yet a commercial possibility, nor even an opportunity for the tourist looking for new thrills.

This absorption in sports—already so great and apparently on the increase—is both a good and a bad sign of the times. The sports that are featured in the press are chiefly the spectacular professional performances in which a few individuals take part while thousands look on. Sometimes the performances are detrimental or dangerous to the participants, while the most benefit that the spectators can hope for is mental recreation and a bit of fresh air. Yet if these great spectacular events sometimes seem like an opiate for the people—or the "bread and circus" of the Roman Empire—one should recognize that they develop and encourage a great growth of amateur sport, of no import whatever to the newspapers but of supreme consequence to the health and spirits of the people.

Our Next President: La Follette or Wheeler

By GILSON GARDNER

TO what end is this La Follette campaign? What good can come out of it? Is there a chance to win? Or assuming La Follette can't win, and assuming he can prevent the election of either Coolidge or Davis, and throw the election into Congress, what then?

Before answering the last question, it might be well to see just what chance La Follette has to win. It is being assumed by many of La Follette's supporters and friends that his race is an effort to "poll a large vote"; to make a protest against the two-party system as it now functions; to throw a monkey-wrench into the works; and finally, to lay the foundations for a new party of opposition. That La Follette and Wheeler might get enough votes in the Electoral College actually to enter the White House is disbelieved by most people.

The writer does not concur in this disbelief. There are many reasons for believing that the independent ticket might carry enough States to win.

Briefly, there are considerations such as these. The Davis-Coolidge opposition is to all intents and purposes the same ticket. Both are representative of conservatism. They are both, as the orators now continuously repeat, tagged by Wall Street. The banker vote will be divided between them. Coolidge is likely to get the larger share. He is the nominee of a party which is traditionally conservative and his record is all reactionary.

The La Follette-Wheeler ticket has the great advantage of unity. There is no candidate competing for the liberal vote. There is no one to divide it with. All shades of liberal and semi-liberal and positive liberal opinion have got together. The Socialists have studiously avoided naming a national candidate and have indorsed the progressive ticket. There is no one except La Follette to represent the so-called "common people." He is the champion of the laboring man, the distressed farmer, the persecuted foreign-born American, the folks who suffered under the war hysteria; all those classes which resent infringement on their personal liberties and civil rights, champions of free speech and freedom of thought and of religion, will naturally drift into the independent camp.

Conceding Coolidge and Davis the full and cordial support of bankers, stock-brokers, railroad owners, and landlords; conceding them the support of the owning classes, there are still more qualified voters in the working class. And among the latter may be included the salaried and rent-paying people, husbands and wives, and the generally unwealthy.

If it should develop that there is a great silent vote made up of such as these and if the prospect of a genuinely independent candidate should draw out the 26 million voters who have never taken part in politics; if the La Follette-Wheeler ticket should chance to appeal to that floating element which was so conspicuous in the test polls as supporters of Henry Ford and which figured as a seven million majority in the Harding election; then it would not be at all beyond the possibility of believing that the La Follette-Wheeler ticket would find itself elected by a landslide.

But if there is no general massing of the popular vote for the liberal candidates, if party habit sits heavily upon the population and millions take the beaten path of inherited names and slogans so that November 10 finds a normal Republican return from a certain number of States and a normal Democratic return from a certain number of other States and a normal progressive independent return from half a dozen La Follette States; and the Electoral College lacks the 266 votes necessary for a choice, what then?

Have the progressives thought what then? Have they faced this larger probability and can they give a reason for their conduct in the face of it?

The Constitution sends the election from the Electoral College into Congress. First the House of Representatives has a chance to choose. They must choose from the three candidates for President having the most votes and they must vote by States, each State casting one vote and each State being governed in that choice by the political complexion of a majority of its representatives in the House. But a careful tabulation of the House with five States deadlocked shows that there is no majority to be had. What then? Will the influences which control political parties and the government abide by the sacredness of party name and accomplish a deadlock in the House? Or will certain members be approached by powerful interests and with potential bribes and with arguments that their genuine duty to their country requires that they forget mere party labels and cast their votes to break the deadlock and to elect a candidate who is "safe and sound"? Might there not arise a conspiracy which would seek to prevent the government falling into the hands of a "dangerous radical"? By snatching the power through corrupt acts and perpetuating a candidate of one or the other of the two old parties?

Those who remember the Hayes-Tilden deadlock will realize that there is nothing fantastic about this supposition. The Hayes-Tilden election produced a deadlock and a commission was appointed to go into certain Southern States and steal a few electoral votes. (One of the commissioners was rewarded by an appointment later on the Supreme Court.) But the scheme worked and Hayes reigned for a four-year term.

Very well, say the friends of La Follette. Anything like that would illustrate conclusively the effect of the money power on the organization of the two old parties and would spell the end of those parties and the beginning of a new order. It may be necessary, they say, to have such a happening in order to break the present corrupt bipartisan control.

Next comes the alternate choice of a Vice-President from the vice-presidential candidates, for the Constitution says if the House is unable to elect and March 4 arrives, then the Senate shall choose between the two candidates for Vice-President having the highest number of votes in the Electoral College. Some political prophets are making the mistake of thinking that the highest vote in such case would go to Dawes and Charlie Bryan. More likely the choice would be between Dawes and Wheeler. The La Follette-Wheeler ticket will, if it does not run first, certainly run second, and if it does the choice in all human probability will be Wheeler. Dawes will have no show in the Senate. The straight reactionary Republican element in the Senate is now an impotent minority. Officially, it is a majority. Officially, it controls the Senate and distributes the patronage. The last session of Congress, however, demonstrated conclusively that no such thing as a Republican majority exists in the Senate and that the real control rests with the coalition which was formed by Democrats and progressives headed by La Follette.

Wheeler, as a Democrat, would be the logical choice of the Democratic Senators. Wheeler, as a progressive, would command logically the support of the La Follette progressive bloc. It is easy to see, therefore, that even allowing for the disaffection of a few reactionary senators like Bruce of Maryland there would be a clear majority in this coalition to make Burton K. Wheeler Vice-President. In the absence of a President, the Electoral College and the House having failed to choose one, the Vice-President under the Constitution would act as President and Burton K. Wheeler would enter the White House.

This is very likely what will happen. Then what? Will Wheeler ask La Follette to enter his Cabinet or will he consider that La Follette is more important in his position of leadership in the Senate? Probably the latter.

What will happen under the administration of Burton K. Wheeler as President of the United States? A new kind of Attorney General certainly, not even a Harlan F. Stone. A Secretary of War of a different variety from Mr. Weeks. A new Assistant Secretary of Navy not of the Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., and Denby type. A different sort of Secretary of Treasury from the Mellon brand. Also there would be a different kind of person to enforce the prohibition law, for Wheeler showed when he was State attorney of Montana that he believed in law enforcement, not of the favored class variety. Perhaps Warren S. Stone would become Secretary of the Treasury and William H. Johnston Secretary of Labor. These would seem logical selections. But without proceeding to build up all the executive force of our new young President from the West, it is easy to see that several changes would take place in the executive branches of the Government. And in Congress the influence of the executive would doubtless be felt not exactly along Calvin Coolidge lines. The next Congress is more likely to be Democratic liberal than it is to be Calvinistic Republican, so that there would be more chance for harmonious team-work with La Follette helping on the Hill and Wheeler recommending than there would be with a Coolidge in the White House deadlocked against a liberal Congress.

So the prospect is not so sad after all.

New Morals for Old

Dominant Sexes

By M. VAERTING

CERTAIN peculiarities of physical form are today considered typical feminine sex characters. Thus roundness and fulness of figure are generally regarded as characteristic of women; larger size and strength among men are accepted as a sex difference, biologically determined.

